And what about Jesus himself? This is a bold example; we have to be cautious how we use it. But we remember that in his flesh Jesus was subject to physical limitations, as we are. He grew hungry and tired as we do. He does not seem to have known everything (see Matt. 24:36). As for his praying, we know that in the garden he prayed for up to three hours that the cup of the wrath of God poured out against sin might be taken from him if it was God's will (Matt. 26:36-46). Jesus came to a position of quiet trust and confidence as a result of that prayer time. Still, we might say that he was praying for a while at least for something that turned out not to be God's will for him.

Is it any wonder that we have problems knowing what to pray for?

The "Burden Bearer"

But enough of the problem. We know it all too well. The point of the passage is that the Spirit "helps us" in the weaknesses I have been describing and, though we do not know what we should pray, he "intercedes for us with groans that words cannot express." We are weakness itself, but the Holy Spirit is all-powerful.

The first Greek word Paul uses for the Spirit's role in prayer is a long one, and the simple English translation "helps" does not even come close to doing it justice. The word is sunantilambanetai. Like many long Greek words it is put together from a few shorter ones, in this case three. The first is sun. It means "with," "along with," or "together with." The second word is anti. It means "for" or "in the place of." The main word, the verb, is lambanō. It means "to take," "take hold of," "remove," or "bear." All together the word refers to a person coming alongside another to take part of a heavy load and help him bear it.

This reminds us of the word Jesus used to describe the Spirit when he prophesied his coming to the disciples just before his crucifixion. He called him a paraklētos, which literally means "one called alongside of another" to help. It is sometimes translated "advocate" (which also means "to call alongside of), or "comforter."

The idea of the Holy Spirit coming alongside a Christian to help is the same in both cases. But the special meaning in the word used here in Romans is to help by bearing the Christian's burden. It pictures our ignorance of what to pray for as a heavy load. We are struggling along under it, as it were. But the Holy Spirit comes alongside and helps us shoulder the load. He identifies with us in our weakness, as Jesus did by his incarnation, and he labors with us.

The second word Paul uses is intercession, saying that "the Spirit himself intercedes for us with groans that words cannot express." An intercessor is a person who pleads one's case. So the meaning is that the way the Holy Spirit comes alongside us to help and shoulder our burden is by pleading our case with God when we do not know how to do it. We do not know what to pray for, but the Holy Spirit does. So he prays for us, and God "who searches our hearts knows the mind of the Spirit" and answers his very correct and powerful prayers wisely.

Jesus did that for Peter in one of the best illustrations of intercession in the Bible. He told Peter that Satan wanted to sift him like wheat. Then he said, "But I have prayed for you, Simon, that your faith may not fail. And when you have turned back, strengthen your brothers" (Luke 22:32). Peter did not know what to pray. In fact, he probably wasn't praying at all. Later that evening he even fell asleep while praying. But Jesus prayed for him, and Jesus' prayers were answered, as a result of which Peter was strengthened and went on to many years of useful service.

But none of this is meant to suggest that we have nothing to do in prayer or have no responsibility to pray. We do have responsibility in prayer, which is made quite clear by the word helps. The apostle says that "the Spirit helps us in our weakness." He does not eliminate our need to pray regularly and fervently.

What about the word groan? This has been a problem among commentators since they cannot agree on who does the groaning. Is it the Spirit? The text seems to say that. Yet the majority feel that the Spirit, being God, does not groan, indeed cannot groan. Martyn Lloyd-Jones is emphatic on this point: "The Godhead does not groan; it is inconceivable for every reason." However, if it is not the Holy Spirit who groans, it must be the Christian himself. Is this the correct interpretation?

I think the context is a help here and that it is no accident that the word groan or groanings occurs three times in verses 22-27. The first occurrence refers to the inanimate creation, Paul writing that "the whole creation has been groaning as in the pains of childbirth right up to the present time" (v. 22). The second instance is ourselves. "Not only so, but we ourselves, who have the firstfruits of the Spirit, groan inwardly..." (v. 23). Since the word occurs a third time in reference to the Holy Spirit ("the Spirit himself intercedes for us with groans..."), there seems to be a meaningful progression from inanimate nature to the redeemed to the third person of the Godhead. It is a bold progression, but it appears to be deliberate.

What does it mean? Obviously it does not mean that the Holy Spirit is unable to articulate his concerns. Yet, if the idea of bearing a heavy burden is still in view, it may be that this is what is governing the apostle's thought. A groan is appropriate to burden bearing.

Suppose you are helping someone carry a very heavy load. What is more expressive: a groan as you stagger along beneath it or a great deal of articulate chatter? Suppose your helper is saying, "My, this piano is heavy. They certainly do make pianos heavy, and awkward, too. Probably we should have spent the money and gone ahead and hired professional piano movers. I don't think I want to do this very often. Have you ever moved a piano before?" If you are struggling with the heavy load, too, that is probably the last thing you want to hear. If someone is chattering away like that, you would probably just want to tell this so-called helper to shut up and lift the piano. A real burden-bearer groans with you. I suggest that this is the image Paul is using.

The bearing of our prayer burdens does not have to be in words because, as the passage goes on to say, God "who searches our hearts knows the mind of the Spirit" and answers accordingly.

I think F. Godet has the right progression when he summarizes the three groaning agents in this way:

What a statement of the unutterable disorder which reigns throughout all creation.... Nature throughout all her bounds has a confused feeling of it, and from her bosom there rises a continual lament claiming a renovation from heaven. The redeemed themselves are not exempt from this groaning, and wait for their own renewal which shall be the signal of universal restoration; and finally, the Spirit, who is intimate with the plans of God for our glory (1 Cor. 2:7) and who distinctly beholds the ideal of which we have but glimpses, pursues its realization with ardour.

The last words refer to passion that goes beyond mere words.

A First Prayer Primer

Romans 8:26 and 27 imply or explicitly teach so many lessons about prayer that a number of them can be listed as a summary of what we have been learning. They constitute something of a prayer primer for Christians.

1. We are supposed to pray. Regardless of the problems we may have with prayer—and we are reminded that the saints have all had problems with prayer at times—we are nevertheless supposed to pray. In fact, the Word of God commands us to pray. Indeed, we are told to "pray continually" (1 Thess. 4:17). Anything God tells us to do is for our good, and we are poorer if we fail to do it. Prayer is one of the great spiritual disciplines.

2. Do not expect prayer to be easy. Why should it be? Nothing else in the Christian life is easy. Why should prayer be any different? When we were studying the last half of Romans 7, I pointed out that the Christian life is a struggle and that we should not expect simple or quick-fix solutions. Our contemporary American culture has conditioned us to want easy cure-alls. In the area of our sanctification we expect immediate victories either by a formula or spiritual experience. But God does not work that way. We are called to a struggle, and our perseverance in that struggle is itself a victory, even if the results are not visible or spectacular. And the Holy Spirit will help us bear our burden.

So also in prayer. You do not have to feel good about it, though you will in most cases. You do not even have to see results. What is important is that you keep on, and keep on keeping on. One bit of verse puts it like this:

> We are not here to play, to dream, to drift;
> We have hard work to do and loads to lift.
> Shun not the struggle; face it; 'tis God's gift.

3. Realize what you are doing when you pray. Although the discipline of prayer is itself a struggle and more often than not we do not know what we should be praying for, we nevertheless can know and need to know what we are doing. We are addressing ourselves to the great sovereign God of the universe and are presenting our adoration, confessions, thanksgivings and supplications to him. He is hearing these prayers and responding to them consistently, perfectly, and wisely out of his own inexhaustible abundance.

Does prayer get God to change his mind? Of course not! No reasonable person would want that—because if God's way is perfect, as it is, to get him to change it would be to get him to become imperfect. If that ever happened, the universe would fall into disorder! Any thinking person wants God always to run things according to his own perfect will, not ours.

But here is a parallel question: Does prayer change things? The answer to that is Yes—because God who ordains the ends also ordains the means, and he has made prayer a means to those ends. He has promised us that prayer is effective. Notice the difference between the two questions.

Does prayer get God to change his mind? No. It does not.

Does prayer change things? Yes, because God has ordained that it should be this way. Jesus has told us, "Ask and it will be given to you; seek and you will find; knock and the door will be opened to you. For everyone who asks receives; he who seeks finds; and to him who knocks, the door will be opened" (Matt. 7:7-8). James wrote, "... You do not have, because you do not ask God" (James 4:2), adding, "The prayer of a righteous man is powerful and effective" (James 5:16b). Remember, too, that when we are talking about change the chief thing that happens in prayer is that prayer changes us.

4. Be encouraged by these verses. It is true that "we do not know what we ought to pray for." But the Holy Spirit does, and the Holy Spirit has been given to us by God to assist precisely in this area, as well as in other ways. With his help we will make progress.

One commentator has compared learning to pray to a man learning to play the violin. At first he is not very good. But he gets the schedule of the classical music broadcasts in his area, buys the violin parts to the music that he knows will be played, and then tunes in the radio each afternoon and plays along as best he can. His mistakes do not change what is coming in over the radio in the slightest. The concertos continue to roll on in perfect harmony and tempo. But the struggling violinist changes. He gets better week by week and year by year, and the time eventually comes when he can play along with the orchestra broadcasts pretty well.

Prayer is like that. There are plenty of mistaken notes, and groans, too. But there is also progress and joy and encouragement, since God is continuing to conduct the perfect heavenly symphony, and the Holy Spirit is continuing to prepare us for the day when we will be able to take our place in the divine orchestra. In the meantime we can know that the Holy Spirit, the Paraclete, like a wise and faithful teacher, is by our side.

Chapter 108.
Knowing the Will of God

Romans 8:27

At the beginning of the last study I said that I do not know of any subject that has caused more perplexity for more Christians than prayer, unless it is the matter of knowing God's will. I also said that the two are related. They are related in our text, as well as in other places, for the verse speaks of the Spirit's intercession for the saints "in accordance with God's will."

This verse introduces the matter of "God's will" at the level of the Spirit's part in prayer, not our part. "We do not know what we ought to pray for..." (v. 26). Nevertheless, it shows that there is such a thing as God's will, which inevitably raises the question of our relationship to it. In respect to prayer we ask questions like: What should I pray for? How should I pray? Can I pray with confidence? In respect to God's will we ask such closely related questions as: Does God have a perfect will for my life? Can I know what that will is? If I can, how do I find it? Can I ask God to show it to me? What is my responsibility for discovering it?

I can testify that in my own experience in pastoral counseling over a period of many years, I have been asked more questions about knowing or discovering the will of God than any others.

Alternative Views

A few years ago a very good book on this subject appeared in Christian bookstores. It was written by Garry Friesen, a professor at Multnomah School of the Bible in Portland, Oregon, together with J. Robin Maxson, pastor of the Klamath Evangelical Free Church, Klamath, Oregon. The title is Decision Making & the Will of God. It is a good book because it examines the traditional evangelical views about knowing the will of God, critiques them, and proposes a helpful alternative. Let me summarize.

The traditional view distinguishes between three meanings of the phrase "will of God." The first is God's sovereign will, which the Westminster Shorter Catechism refers to as his eternal decrees
"according to the counsel of his will, whereby, for his own glory, he hath foreordained whatsoever comes to pass" (Answer to Question 7). This sovereign will of God is hidden; it is not revealed to us, except as it unfolds in history. The second meaning of the term is God's moral will, which is known to us because it is revealed comprehensively in Scripture. It is what God wants or desires, as opposed to what he decrees. The third meaning is God's individual will, a term that refers to God's plan for an individual life and is what people are thinking of most often when they speak of searching for or finding God's will.

In their book Friesen and Maxson rightly accept the first two of these "wills": God's sovereign will and his moral will. But they dispute the third, that is, that God has an individual will for each life and that it is the duty of the individual believer to find it or "live in the center of it." The grounds for their critique are these arguments:

1. The existence of an ideal "individual will of God" for Christians cannot be established by reason, experience, biblical example, or biblical teaching.

2. The practice of looking for such an ideal will has created needless frustration in decision making for many.
3. The traditional view does not work out in most situations, if ever. It is hard to apply in the minor decisions of life or in deciding between genuinely equal options, for example.
4. The traditional view is hopelessly subjective. None of the usual ways of trying to find the supposed will of God are unambiguous: an inner witness, circumstances, counsel, personal desires, or special guidance.

In light of these obvious problems and their own examination of the biblical material, the authors propose an alternative view, which they call "the way of wisdom." A summary of their approach goes like this:

1. In those areas specifically addressed by the Bible, the revealed commands and principles of God (his moral will) are to be obeyed.
2. In those areas where the Bible gives no command or principle (non-moral decisions), the believer is free and responsible to choose his own course of action. Any decision made within the moral will of God is acceptable to God.
3. In non-moral decisions, the objective of the Christian is to make wise decisions on the basis of spiritual expediency.
4. In all decisions, the believer should humbly submit, in advance, to the outworking of God's sovereign will as it touches on each decision.

My own evaluation of this book is that it is extremely helpful and is a significant breakthrough in cutting away many of the hangups on this subject that have nearly incapacitated some Christians. Its exposure of the weakness of subjective methods of determining guidance is astute. Its stress on the sufficiency of Scripture in all moral matters is essential. Its proposal of a "way of wisdom" in (most) decision-making matters is liberating. My only reservation is that it does not seem to deal adequately with special (and therefore also very important) situations.

I want to argue that Romans 8:27 makes an important contribution to this subject.

According to God's Will

The first and very obvious thing this verse does is to reinforce the idea of God's sovereign or hidden will—hidden, that is, from us. Sometimes scholars call this God's "secret" will, because it has not been revealed. It is, as the Westminster Shorter Catechism says, "whatsoever comes to pass."

The existence of this sovereign or hidden will is evident from Romans 8:27 and its context in two ways. First, the verse is talking about the role of the Holy Spirit in praying with us in situations in which we do not know what to pray for. It tells us that the Holy Spirit does know what to pray for and that the Spirit's prayers, quite obviously and naturally, are according to God's will. This teaches that there is a divine will and that it is hidden in these instances. The second way the existence of God's sovereign or hidden will is evident is in the fact that the phrase we are studying has a parallel in verse 28, which says, "And we know that in all things God works for the good of those who love him, who have been called according to his purpose." The last words, "according to his purpose," are the same thing as "in accordance with God's will" in the preceding verse. So what the Holy Spirit is praying for, among others, are the "things" in which God is working for the good of those who love him. These "things" are the events of life, which God controls for our good but which are unknown to us, at least until they happen.

The context of these verses also deals with the moral will of God or, as we could say, the will of God for his people as disclosed in Scripture. This is what verse 29 speaks of. For no sooner does Paul speak of God's "purpose" (v. 28) than he goes on to declare in general terms what that purpose is: "For those God foreknew he also predestined to be conformed to the likeness of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brothers." At this point the sovereign will of God and the moral will of God clearly come together or overlap, for the text is making clear to us that God orders all events according to his sovereign plan in order that his people might become like Jesus Christ.

But let's go back to verses 26 and 27 at this point and ask: Is this what the things "we do not know what to pray for" are? Not exactly! Because if these things are merely our conformity to the character of Jesus Christ, then we already know this and should not be confused about it. We do not need the Holy Spirit's help in praying for the revealed will of God because it has already been revealed to us.

If we do need the Spirit's help, it is clearly in the area of things not revealed and for which we therefore do not know what or how to pray, and since the Holy Spirit prays for us in these areas "in accordance with God's will," there must be a will of God for us in these areas.

We may not know what it is.

We do not need to be under pressure to "discover" it, fearing that if we miss it, somehow we will be doomed to a life outside the center of God's will or to his "second best." We are free to make decisions with what light and wisdom we possess.

Nevertheless, we can know that God does have a perfect will for us, that the Holy Spirit is praying for us in accordance with that will, and that this will of God for us will be done— because God has decreed it and because the Holy Spirit is praying for us in this area.

This should be an encouragement to everyone.

Special Guidance

And yet, it leaves an important question hanging. Does God ever reveal to us specific parts of this plan for our lives? Or to put it another way, Can we expect him to? Should we ever seek such direction? Actually, these three variations on the question have slightly different answers.

Does God ever reveal to us specific parts of his plan for our lives? Yes. Infrequently perhaps, but nevertheless sometimes.

Can we expect him to do? No, if by that we mean that we have a right to receive some special revelation.

Should we ever seek such direction? Of course, but we must be careful how we do it and not become frustrated or be made indecisive if God fails to answer these petitions.

Speaking personally, I have not experienced many specific directions for my life from God, but I have had several, the clearest being my call to the ministry. I was in grade school at the time and had been thinking about being a pastor and Bible teacher. I asked God for a specific sign, and he gave it to me clearly. I did not presume upon it. I recognized that it could have been what many would call coincidence or that I might have misunderstood what God was saying. I anticipated and received additional confirmation along this line as I grew older. Nevertheless I took the sign at face value and moved forward in the belief that God had called me to precisely the kind of work I am doing now. And obviously he had.

Moreover, there is the matter of growth. It is true that we never know entirely what we should pray for and that in some cases we do not have the slightest idea what to pray for. But that does not mean that this is always the case or that we will fail to become increasingly perceptive about the will of God in such matters as we mature. The text says that the Holy Spirit helps us in our weakness, praying for us when we do not know how to pray. Yet obviously we will grow stronger and wiser and will therefore increasingly know better how to pray and what to pray for as the Spirit works with us. This is why Paul could admonish the Ephesians, "Be very careful, then, how you live—not as unwise but as wise, making the most of every opportunity, because the days are evil. Therefore do not be foolish, but understand what the Lord's will is" (Eph. 5:1517).

Remember the illustration of the violin player. It has been helpful to many. If prayer is like practicing the violin, it is also an exercise in coming to discover God's will. It is a way in which we progressively discover what it means to be like the Lord Jesus Christ and in that way increasingly become like him.

A "God's Will" Primer

At the end of the last study I offered what I called "a first prayer primer," listing some points to keep in mind about prayer. It strikes me that it would be helpful to offer a parallel primer on the subject of knowing God's will. This primer has six points.

1. There is a perfect will of God for all people and all events, and therefore there is also a perfect will of God for each individual believer. I do not think Garry Friesen and J. Robin Maxson deny this in their book, although they seem to, so intent are they in denying that there is a unique and special "individual will of God" for us to discover and live out. They say, "The idea of an individual will of God for every detail of a person's life is not found in Scripture."
Therefore, "many believers are investing a great deal of time and energy searching for something that is nonexistent."

But if there is a sovereign though hidden will of God, as they admit, and if it is all-inclusive, as it obviously must be, then it must embrace an individual will for every detail of every person's life, believers as well as unbelievers, even if we do not or cannot perceive it. What Friesen and Maxson probably mean is that this "individual will of God for every detail of a person's life" is not something that is available to us to be discovered.

A person may object at this point that if such a will is not subject to discovery, then whether it exists or does not exist is meaningless. But that does not follow. On the contrary, it is of the greatest importance for us to know that God has a plan for our lives and is directing us in it, particularly when we do not know what it is. It means that we can trust him and go forward confidently, even when we seem to be walking in the dark, as we often are.

2. The most important parts of the plan of God for our individual lives are revealed in general but morally comprehensive terms in the Bible. Romans 8 contains some expressions of this plan, namely that we might be delivered from God's judgment upon us for our sin and from sin's power and instead be made increasingly like Jesus Christ. The decisive steps of God's plan include (1) foreknowledge, (2) predestination, (3) effectual calling, (4) justification, and (5) glorification (vv. 29-30), all of which we will examine in the next few studies.

But there are also many specifics.

The Ten Commandments contain some of these. It is God's will that we have no other gods before him, that we do not worship even him by the use of images, that we do not misuse his name, that we remember the Sabbath by keeping it holy, that we honor our parents, that we do not murder or commit adultery or steal or give false testimony or covet (see Exod. 20). The Lord Jesus amplified upon many of these commandments and added others, above all teaching that we are to "love each other" (John 15:12).

It is God's will that we be holy (1 Thess. 4:3).

It is God's will that we should pray (1 Thess. 5:17).

In the twelfth chapter of Romans Paul will say, "Do not conform any longer to the pattern of this world, but be transformed by the renewing of your mind. Then you will be able to test and approve what God's will is—his good, pleasing and perfect will" (v. 2).

3. As concerns the parts of God's will for our individual lives that are not revealed in the Bible, it is impossible for us to know them by any amount of merely human seeking. This does not mean that God cannot reveal these parts of his will to us or does not in some cases. (More of that later.) But it does mean that the only way we can know these hidden parts of God's will is if he reveals them to us and that, if they are not revealed to us in general moral categories in the Bible, their discovery is beyond our ability. We will not find the answer to our questions about the will of God in these areas by reading signs, following hunches, bargaining with God, or by any other similar folly.

4. Lest we be discouraged by this, however, we need to realize that for the most part we do not need to know the will of God in hidden areas, because the Holy Spirit knows it and is praying for us in these areas in accordance with God's will. This is what our text is chiefly saying, and it should be a great encouragement to us, as I suggested above.

Even if we knew what to pray for and prayed for it accurately or without distortion, and if our ability to walk in God's way depended on such personal prayers and understanding, we would still be uncertain. For one thing, we could not be sure we were praying according to God's will. How could we? We are usually off base on just about everything concerning prayer. For another thing, even if we prayed aright and knew we were doing so, we could still never be certain that we would actually walk in the way revealed to us. On the other hand, if the Holy Spirit is praying for us in these areas according to the sovereign and efficacious will of God, we can be confident and quite bold, knowing that this sovereign and efficacious will of God will be done.

Suppose Peter had been aware of the danger he was in at the time of the Lord's arrest. He might have prayed that God would keep him from falling by denying Jesus. That would have been a good prayer. But it was not what God had in mind for him, and when he actually did fall later Peter would have thought that God had not answered his prayer or had failed him. As it was, Jesus took the part of the Holy Spirit on this occasion and prayed for Peter that his faith would not fail, even though he would be allowed to deny Jesus. And Peter's faith did not fail. Moreover, Jesus prayed that Peter would be restored and that his restoration would enable him to strengthen his brethren when they later went through similarly dark days of failure. That, too, came to pass.

5. Since we do not generally know God's will for our lives in areas not covered by the Bible's moral directives (and do not need to know it), we must learn to make the wisest decisions possible, knowing that God has given us freedom to do so. In emphasizing this approach to life's decisions, Friesen and Maxson are entirely right and very helpful.

The authors recognize the proper place of many elements in making wise decisions, including some that they had previously discounted as ways to discover the supposed "individual will of God." They include items like open doors or opportunities, personal likes or dislikes, desires, impressions, and hunches. All these have a place as long as they are recognized for what they are, that is, not special revelations from God but important human factors that should rightly be taken into account. Planning is proper, though we must recognize that God can alter circumstances and thus force a redirection of our plans. Whatever happens, we need to be submissive to the will of God in advance and as it unfolds before us.

6. In spite of these careful remarks regarding the believer's normative guidance, God is not in a box, and as a result he can (and from time to time does) reveal his will to individuals in special ways. There are too many Christians who rightly attest to such leading to deny it.

I feel about this matter much as I do about the question of speaking in tongues. I do not believe there is anything in the Bible to teach that tongues-speaking is a gift to be particularly sought after or desired. I do not even believe that much of what passes for this gift today is from the Holy Spirit. I think it is largely psychological. Nevertheless, I cannot follow the hard logic of some, particularly of Reformed people (even though I am one), who argue that tongues cannot occur today because all supernatural occurrences have ceased. I follow Paul, who argues that we are not to "forbid" its practice (1 Cor. 14:39).

Let us think the same about special guidance. We cannot demand it. We recognize that much of what passes for special guidance is self-deception and must therefore be on guard against it. But we should also recognize that it can occur and be careful not to question it too rigorously in others—and if God guides us in this way, we must be quick to respond.

Part Ten. Unquenchable Love

Chapter 109.
All Things Working Together for Good

Romans 8:28

It is always a humbling experience to study the Word of God, and I have been humbled as I have moved from our last study about knowing the will of God to the tremendous text that is to occupy us now: Romans 8:28. "And we know that in all things God works for the good of those who love him, who have been called according to his purpose."

It seemed to me that the last study was rather difficult. At any rate, in writing it I had difficulty trying to distinguish between the various ways in which we use the term "God's will" and in trying to suggest what we can know and cannot expect to know about it. But then I came to our text, and the problems I had been laboring with in the last study suddenly seemed quite simple. Earlier Paul said, "We do not know what we ought to pray for." Now he writes, "We know that in all things God works for the good of those who love him." We do not know! We know! The first knowing concerns the details of what God is doing in our lives; we do not understand these things, we puzzle over them. The second knowing concerns the fact of God's great plan itself. Paul tells us that we do know this; we know that God has a plan. He teaches this quite simply. If God has "called [us] according to his purpose," he must have both a purpose and a place for us in it. Moreover, we know that everything will obviously work together for our good in the achievement of that purpose. This is tremendous! Because of these truths this verse has been one of the most comforting statements in the entire Word of God for most Christians.

Faith and Circumstances

Yet this verse also poses an obvious problem. "In all things God works for the good of those who love him," the text says. But how can this be?

How is this possible when the world is filled with hatred and evil, and when good people, as well as evil people, suffer daily?

Two days before I wrote this study, the ministerial staff of Tenth Presbyterian Church had its regular weekly meeting, and the ministers shared some of the problems they were dealing with. Three days earlier one of our members had been murdered. She was a lovely Korean girl, only twenty-one years old, and she had been very active in Tenth's ministries. Her name was Julee Yang. She sang in the choir, tutored disadvantaged children from one of the city's housing projects, and participated in a young people's group that is focused on the city. Julee worked in a jewelry store and was shot in the back when two young thugs came into the store to steal money. In a surprising turn of events, the murder was captured on a hidden video camera. According to some reports, it was the very first actual murder to have been captured on videotape. The funeral was the day of our staff meeting.

Other staff members shared counseling concerns. One was dealing with a person suffering from extreme personal setbacks, including a case of cancer. She had been thinking of suicide. Another was dealing with a young man who had been diagnosed as having AIDS.

The night before, I had conferred with another pastor who was planning a memorial service for a stillborn infant and wanted to talk about what comfort he could give the grieving parents. That same day, I was to visit another pastor who was under pressure in his church and was quite possibly going to be forced out of it, in spite of nearly two decades of faithful Bible teaching in that place. The combination of these seemingly tragic situations had depressed us all, and we spent a great deal of time praying about them. Later I went to the New Jersey shore, about an hour and a half away, to gain some breathing space and pray for the staff and these problems.

"We know that in all things God works together for the good of those who love him." But do we really know that?

When times are good—when we have steady jobs, when our families are doing well, when no loved one is sick, and there have been no recent deaths—in times like these, well, it is easy to say, "We know that in all things God works together for the good of those who love him." But what about the other times?

What about times like those I was describing?

In such times we need to be sure we know what we are professing and are not merely mouthing pious nothings.

This great text has some built-in qualifications, and we need to begin with them. I call them

"boundaries."

1. For Christians only. The first boundary is defined by a question: To whom does this promise apply? Obviously it does not apply to everyone, for Paul's statement says, "We know that in all things God works for the good of those who love him." That verse is talking about Christians. So, to read on to the closely linked verses that follow, it is saying that everything works for the good of those whom God has predestined to be conformed to the likeness of his Son, those he predestined and called and justified and glorified. This is not a promise that all things work together for the good of all people.

Do you remember Robert Browning's well-known couplet: "God's in his heaven—/All's right with the world"? The lines are a small capsule of nineteenth-century Victorian thinking, when the world was more or less at peace, and progress in all areas of human life and endeavor seemed unlimited and inevitable. Nobody thinks that way today, and rightly so. It is because all is not right with the world, and anybody who thinks so is either out of his or her mind or is just not seeing things clearly.

Several centuries before Browning, the German philosopher Gottfried Wilhelm Leibnitz developed a line of thought known popularly as "the best of all possible worlds" philosophy. But this, too, was an illusion and still is. For most people this is not the best of all possible worlds at all. In fact, for many millions of people this world and the things they endure in it are terrible.

According to our text, it is only of Christians, not of all people, that these comforting words can be said.

2. To be like Jesus Christ. The second boundary to our text comes from another question: What is meant by "good"? That is an important question to ask, because if "good" means "rich," as some would like it to mean, the text is not true, since most Christians have not been given a great supply of this world's goods. The same thing is true if "good" means "healthy." Not all believers have good health. Similarly, "good" cannot mean "successful" or "admired" or even "happy" in the world's sense, since God asks many Christians to endure failure or scorn or very distressing personal experiences or severe disappointments.

What does "good" mean, then, if it does not mean rich or healthy or successful or admired or happy? The answer is in the next verse: "For those God foreknew he also predestined to be conformed to the likeness of his Son."

That is what the "good" is: "to be conformed to the likeness of his Son," in other words, to be made like Jesus Christ. That is an obvious good. It is impossible to think of a higher good for human beings, to be like one's Maker. Pastor Ray Stedman rightly calls this "what life is all about." But at the same time, seeing this allows us to see other not so obviously good things within the greater purpose. We can see how sickness, suffering, persecution, grief, or other ills can be used by God for this good end.

3. A good use of bad things. That leads to a third boundary for this text, and it comes from a third question: Are the things used in our lives by God for this good end necessarily good in themselves or only in their effect? The answer is the latter. In other words, this text does not teach that sickness, suffering, persecution, grief, or any other such thing is itself good. On the contrary, these things are evils. Hatred is not love. Death is not life. Grief is not joy. The world is filled with evil. But what the text teaches—and this is important—is that God uses these things (and others) to effect his own good ends for his people. God brings good out of the evil, and the good, as we saw, is our conformity to the character of Jesus Christ.

4. Knowing rather than feeling. The fourth and final boundary for the meaning of this text comes in answer to still another question: What is our relationship to what God is doing in these circumstances? The answer Paul gives is that "we know." He does not say that we "feel" all things to be good. Often we do not feel that God is doing good at all. We feel exactly the opposite. We feel that we are being ground down or destroyed. And it is not even that we "see" the good. Most of the time we do not perceive the good things God is doing or how he might be bringing good out of the evil. The text simply says, "we know" it.

Paul was no sentimentalist. He had been persecuted, beaten, stoned, and shipwrecked. He had been attacked and consistently slandered by the Gentiles as well as by his own countrymen. Paul did not go around saying how wonderful the world was or how pleasant his missionary endeavors had been. On the contrary, he reported that he had been "hard pressed on every side... perplexed... [and] struck down" (2 Cor. 4:8-9). But Paul came through the things that pressed down and perplexed him precisely because he knew that God was working out his own greater and good purposes through these events.

How did Paul know it? He knew it because God had told him this was what he was doing. And now Paul is telling us. He is saying that we, too, can know it and be comforted in the knowledge that "in all things God works for the good of those who love him."

The Part Without Boundaries

We have spent the first half of this study looking at four qualifications for this text: (1) that it is for Christians only; (2) that the good is not our idea of the good but God's idea and that it is to be made like Jesus Christ; (3) that the things God uses for this supremely good end are not necessarily good in themselves; and (4) that we can "know" this even though we may not feel or see it. However, having established these boundaries, we can turn joyfully to the one part of the text that has absolutely no boundaries whatever.

It is the term "all things." This tells us that all things that have ever happened to us or can possibly happen to us are so ordered and controlled by God that the end result is inevitably and utterly our good. Even the worst things are used to make us like Jesus Christ.

What is more, when we begin to look at this closely, we see that they are used not only for our good but for the good of other people as well.

Here are three examples.

First, Joseph. Joseph's story shows how God controls circumstances. Apart from God's purpose, most of which was hidden from Joseph for a very long time, no one would suspect that God was doing anything good at all. Joseph was a young man favored of his father, with what we would call a bright future before him. His brothers hated him because of his righteousness and their own sin, and they conspired to do away with him. At first they threw Joseph into a dry cistern, planning to leave him there to die. But when some Midianite traders passed by, they seized the opportunity and sold him to them to be a slave. In their turn, the Midianites sold him to a military man in Egypt whose name was Potiphar.

What a horrible experience for a young man. Joseph was only seventeen years old, and he was now a slave in Egypt, where he could not even speak the language. But even this was not all. For a time he prospered as Potiphar's slave. But when Potiphar's wife tried to seduce him and he refused, Joseph was accused of trying to violate her and was thrown into prison where he spent the next two years as an abandoned and seemingly forgotten man.

All this, bad as it was, was only the path by which God was planning to raise him to the throne of Egypt to be second in power only to Pharaoh himself.

Pharaoh had a dream. No one could interpret it. Then Pharaoh's chief butler, who had been in prison with Joseph two years before, remembered how Joseph had interpreted one of his dreams. He told Pharaoh, and Joseph was removed from the prison and brought to court, where he easily supplied the explanation. Pharaoh was so impressed that he promoted the former slave on the spot, and Joseph was able to direct the Egyptian grain harvests and store large quantities of grain. Thus he saved many lives during the ensuing famine.

The favor of his father, his dreams, his brothers' hatred, the passing of the Midianite caravan, his being sold to Potiphar, the enthrallment of his master's wife, two years in prison, the Pharaoh's dream—all these diverse circumstances, some quite evil in themselves, were used by God for the great and ultimate good of Joseph and others.

His own testimony, uttered years later in a reassuring conversation with his eleven brothers, who had since been reunited to him, was this: "Don't be afraid. Am I in the place of God? You intended to harm me, but God intended it for good to accomplish what is now being done, the saving of many lives" (Gen. 50:19-20).

Second, Job. From the world's point of view the story of Job is one of the saddest in the Bible. Job was a mature and upright man, one who feared God and shunned evil. He had seven sons and three daughters, and his wealth consisted of seven thousand sheep, three thousand camels, five hundred yoke of oxen and five hundred donkeys. He had many servants. Then, suddenly, in one day all this was taken from him. Raiders carried off the donkeys and oxen. Lightning killed the sheep. Chaldean bandits stole the camels and killed the servants. Finally, a building collapsed and his children were all killed in an instant.

Satan, who was behind this, stood back and expected Job to curse God for his ill fortune. But instead Job "fell to the ground in worship and said: 'Naked I came from my mother's womb, and naked I will depart/The LORD gave and the LORD has taken away; may the name of the LORD be praised'" (Job 1:21).

The next stage of the story tells how Job was afflicted with ill health, being covered with boils from his head to his feet. Then his friends heaped even greater pain on him by their shallow counsel. Job did not understand this at all. Even at the end of the story, when God restored his wealth and gave him a new family, he seems not to have known what God was doing. God was developing Job's character and confounding the supposed wisdom of Satan, who had said that God's people serve him only because he makes them prosperous. Job did not see this or feel it. But everything was nevertheless working together for good in the life of this great patriarch.

Third, Peter. Peter sinned in his pride, telling Jesus that although the other disciples might deny him, Peter at least would not. Not Peter! Then, he, too, sinned in his weakness, doing precisely what he had told Jesus he would not do. Peter denied the Lord three times, the last time with oaths and cursings.

What was the outcome? Jesus turned even these very bad things to good. He interceded for Peter so that the apostle's faith would not fail, and he asked the Father to order things so that, when Peter was restored, he would be stronger for his fall and able to strengthen his brethren. This is what Peter did, for later he wrote to other Christians:

Dear friends, do not be surprised at the painful trial you are suffering, as though something strange were happening to you. But rejoice that you participate in the sufferings of Christ, so that you may be overjoyed when his glory is revealed. If you are insulted because of the name of Christ, you are blessed, for the Spirit of glory and of God rests on you. If you suffer, it should not be as a murderer or thief or any other kind of criminal, or even as a meddler. However, if you suffer as a Christian, do not be ashamed, but praise God that you bear that name. For it is time for judgment to begin with the family of God; and if it begins with us, what will the outcome be for those who do not obey the gospel of God? And, "If it is hard for the righteous to be saved, what will become of the ungodly and the sinner?"

So then, those who suffer according to God's will should commit themselves to their faithful Creator and continue to do good.

1 Peter 4:12-19

All Things

Years ago I had a watch that my father had given me when I graduated from high school. It was an unusual watch in that its back was transparent. You could look into it and see the mechanism working and the wheels turning. Some wheels went forward. Some went backward. Some turned quickly, others slowly. There was a large mainspring and a few small hairsprings. There were levers that were popping up and down.

The Christian life is like the parts of that watch. At times the events of our lives move forward quickly and we sense that we are making fast progress in being made like Jesus Christ. At other times events move slowly, and we seem to be going slowly ourselves or even slipping backward. Sometimes we seem to be going up and down with no forward motion at all. At such times we say that our emotions are on a roller coaster or that we just can't seem to get on track. Our lives have petty annoyances that spoil our good humor. Sometimes we are overwhelmed with harsh blows, and we say that we just can't go on. It may be true; perhaps we really can't go on, at least until we are able to pause and catch our spiritual breath again.

But God has designed this timepiece of ours—this plan for our lives. That is the point. It has been formed "according to his purpose," which is what our text is about, and it is because we know this, not because we feel it or see it, that we can eventually go on.

What can possibly come into our lives that can defeat God's plan?

There are many things that can defeat human planning. Our plans are often overturned by our sins and failures, others' opposition or jealousy, circumstances, or our own indifference. But not God's plans. He is the sovereign God. His will is forever being done. Therefore, you and I can go on in confidence, even when we are most perplexed or cast down.

What can happen to me that can defeat God's purpose?

Can some thorn in the flesh? Something to prick or pain me? Paul had his thorn in the flesh, but God's grace was sufficient for him and it was in his weakness that God was glorified.

Sickness? Job had boils, but God glorified himself in Job's sickness and even matured Job.

Death? How can death hurt me? "To be away from the body" is to be "at home with the Lord," says Paul (2 Cor. 5:8). Therefore, my physical death will only consummate the plan of God for me. And as far as those who remain behind are concerned, well, God will work his will for good for them also. No one is indispensable, so if I should die this afternoon, the next service of Tenth Presbyterian Church would still be held. The gospel would still be preached. Christians would still be strengthened and unbelievers won. This is because "in all things God works for the good of those who love him."

Chapter 110.
A Golden Chain of Five Links

Romans 8:29-30

When I was writing about Romans 8:28 in the previous study, I said that for most Christians that verse is one of the most comforting statements in the entire Word of God. The reason is obvious. It tells us that "in all things God works for the good of those who love him, who have been called according to his purpose." That is, God has a great and good purpose for all Christians and he is working in all the many detailed circumstances of their lives to achieve it.

Wonderful as that verse is, the verses that follow are even more wonderful, for they tell how God accomplishes this purpose and remind us that it is God himself who accomplishes it. The last reminder is the basis for what is commonly known as "eternal security" or "the perseverance of the saints."

Some time ago I came across an amusing but apparently true story. In 1966 the Hindu holy man and mystic Rao announced that he would walk on water. This attracted a great deal of attention, and on the day set for the feat a great crowd gathered around a large pool in Bombay, India, where it was to occur. The holy man prayerfully prepared himself for the miracle and then stepped forward to the pool's edge. A solemn hush fell over the assembled observers. Rao glanced upward to heaven, stepped forward onto the water, and then immediately plummeted into the pool's depths. Sputtering, dripping wet, and furious, he emerged from the pool and turned angrily on the embarrassed crowd. "One of you," he said, "is an unbeliever."

Fortunately, our salvation is not like that, because if it were, it would never happen. In spiritual matters we are all unbelievers. We are weak in faith. But we are taught in these great verses from Romans that salvation does not depend upon our faith, however necessary faith may be, but on the purposes of God.

And it is the same regarding love. The apostle has just said that in all things God works for the good of those who love him. But lest we somehow imagine that the strength of our love is the determining factor in salvation, he reminds us that our place in this good flow of events is not grounded in our love for God but on the fact that he has fixed his love upon us.

How has God loved us?

Let me count the ways.

These verses introduce us to five great doctrines: (1) foreknowledge, (2) predestination, (3) effectual calling, (4) justification, and (5) glorification. These five doctrines are so closely connected that they have rightly and accurately been described as "a golden chain of five links." Each link is forged in heaven. That is, each describes something God does and does not waver in doing. This is why John R. W. Stott calls them "five undeniable affirmations." The first two are concerned with God's eternal counsel or past determinations. The last two are concerned with what God has done, is doing, or will do with us. The middle term ("calling") connects the first pair and the last.

These doctrines flow from eternity to eternity. As a result, there is no greater scope given to the wonderful activity of God in salvation in all the Bible.

Divine Foreknowledge

The most important of these five terms is the first, but surprisingly (or not surprisingly, since our ways are not God's ways nor his thoughts our thoughts), it is the most misunderstood. It is composed of two separate words: "fore," which means beforehand, and "knowledge." So it has been taken to mean that, since God knows all things, God knows beforehand who will believe on him and who will not, as a result of which he has predestined to salvation those whom he foresees will believe on him. In other words, what he foreknows or foresees is their faith.

Foreknowledge is such an important idea that we are going to come back to it again in the next study and carefully examine the way it is actually used in the Bible. But even here we can see that such an explanation can never do justice to this passage.

For one thing, the verse does not say that God foreknew what certain of his creatures would do. It is not talking about human actions at all. On the contrary, it is speaking entirely of God and of what God does. Each of these five terms is like that: God foreknew, God predestined, God called, God justified, God glorified. Besides, the object of the divine foreknowledge is not the actions of certain people but the people themselves. In this sense it can only mean that God has fixed a special attention upon them or loved them savingly.

This is the way the word is frequently used in the Old Testament, Amos 3:2, for example. The King James Version translates God's words here literally, using the verb "know" (Hebrew, yāda): "You only have I known of all the families of the earth...." But so obvious is the idea of election in this context that the New International Version sharpens the meaning by translating: "You only have I chosen...."

And there is another problem. If all the word means is that God knows beforehand what people will do in response to him or to the preaching of the gospel and then determines their destiny on that basis, what, pray tell, could God possibly see or foreknow except a fixed opposition to him on the part of all people? If the hearts of men and women are as depraved as Paul has been teaching they are—if indeed "'There is no one righteous, not even one... no one who understands, no one who seeks God'" (Rom. 3:10-11)—what could God possibly foresee in any human heart but unbelief?

John Murray puts it in a complementary but slightly different way: "Even if it were granted that 'foreknew' means the foresight of faith, the biblical doctrine of sovereign election is not thereby eliminated or disproven. For it is certainly true that God foresees faith; he foresees all that comes to pass. The question would then simply be: whence proceeds this faith, which God foresees? And the only biblical answer is that the faith which God foresees is the faith he himself creates (cf. John 3:3-8; 6:44, 45, 65; Eph. 2:8; Phil. 1:29; 2 Peter 1:2). Hence his eternal foresight of faith is preconditioned by his decree to generate this faith in those whom he foresees as believing."

Foreknowledge means that salvation has its origin in the mind or eternal counsels of God, not in man. It focuses our attention on the distinguishing love of God, according to which some persons are elected to be conformed to the character of Jesus Christ, which is what Paul has already been saying.

Foreknowledge and Predestination

The chief objection to this understanding of foreknowledge is that, if it is correct, then foreknowledge and predestination (the term that follows) mean the same thing and Paul would therefore be redundant. But the terms are not synonymous. Predestination carries us a step further.

Like foreknowledge, predestination is also composed of two separate words: "pre," meaning beforehand, and "destiny" or "destination." It means to determine a person's destiny beforehand, and this is the sense in which it differs from foreknowledge. As we have seen, foreknowledge means to fix one's love upon or elect. It "does not inform us of the destination to which those thus chosen are appointed." This is what predestination supplies. It tells us that, having fixed his distinguishing love upon us, God next appointed us "to be conformed to the likeness of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brothers." He does this, as the next terms show, by calling, justifying, and glorifying those thus chosen.

D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones points out that the Greek word that is translated "predestined" has within it the word for "horizon" (Greek, proōrizō). The horizon is a dividing line, marking off and separating what we can see from what we cannot see. Everything beyond the horizon is in one category; everything within the horizon is in another. Lloyd-Jones suggests therefore that what the word signifies is that God, having foreknown certain people, takes them out of the far-off category and puts them within the circle of his saving purposes. "In other words," he says, "he has marked out a particular destiny for them." That destiny is to be made like Jesus Christ.

Two Kinds of Calling

The next step in this golden chain of five links is what theologians call effectual calling. It is important to use the adjective effectual at this point, because there are two different kinds of calling referred to in the Bible, and it is easy to get confused about them.

One kind of calling is external, general, and universal. It is an open invitation to all persons to repent of sin, turn to the Lord Jesus Christ, and be saved. It is what Jesus was speaking of when he said, "Come to me, all you who are weary and burdened, and I will give you rest" (Matt. 11:28). Or again, when he said, "If anyone is thirsty, let him come to me and drink" (John 7:37). The problem with this type of call is that, left to themselves, no men or women ever respond positively. They hear the call, but they turn away, preferring their own ways to God. That is why Jesus also said, "No one can come to me unless the Father who sent me draws him..." (John 6:44).

The other kind of call is internal, specific, and effectual. That is, it not only issues the invitation, it also provides the ability or willingness to respond positively. It is God's drawing to himself or bringing to spiritual life the one who without that call would remain spiritually dead and far from him.

There is no greater illustration of this than Jesus' calling of Lazarus, the brother of Mary and Martha, who had died four days before. Lazarus in his grave is a picture of every human being in his or her natural state: dead in body and soul, bound with graveclothes, lying in a tomb, sealed with some great stone. Let's call to him, "Lazarus, Lazarus. Come forth, Lazarus. We want you back. We miss you. If you will just get up out of that tomb and return to us, you'll find that we are all anxious to have you back. No one here is going to put any obstructions in your way."

What? Won't Lazarus come? Doesn't he want to be with us?

The problem is that Lazarus does not have the ability to come back. The call is given, but he cannot come.

Ah, but let Jesus take his place before the tomb. Let Jesus call out, "Lazarus, come forth," and the case is quite different. The words are the same, but now the call is no mere invitation. It is an effectual calling. For the same God who originally called the creation out of nothing is now calling life out of death, and his call is heard. Lazarus, though he has been dead four days, hears Jesus and obeys his Master's voice.

That is how God calls those whom he has foreknown and predestined to salvation.

Calling and Justification

The next step in God's great chain of saving actions is justification. We spent a great deal of time discussing justification in volume 1 of this series, so we need not discuss it in detail here. Briefly, it is the judicial act by which God declares sinful men and women to be in a right standing before him, not on the basis of their own merit, for they have none, but on the basis of what Jesus Christ has done for them by dying in their place on the cross. Jesus bore their punishment, taking the penalty of their sins upon himself. Those sins having been punished, God then imputes the perfect righteousness of Jesus Christ to their account.

What does need to be discussed here is the relationship of the effectual call to justification. Or to put it in the form of a question: Why does Paul place calling where he does in this chain? Why does calling come between foreknowledge and predestination, on the one hand, and justification and glorification, on the other?

There are two reasons.

First, calling is the point at which the things determined beforehand in the mind and counsel of God pass over into time. We speak of "fore" knowledge and "pre" destination. But these two time references only have meaning for us. Strictly speaking, there is no time frame in God. Because the end is as the beginning and the beginning is as the end, "fore" and "pre" are meaningless in regard to him. God simply "knows" and "determines," and that eternally. But what he thus decrees in eternity becomes actual in time, and calling is the point where his eternal foreknowledge of some and his predestination of those to salvation finds what we would call concrete manifestation. We are creatures in time. So it is by God's specific calling of us to faith in time that we are saved.

Second, justification, which comes after calling in this list of divine actions, is always connected with faith or belief, and it is through God's call of the individual that faith is brought into being. God's call creates or quickens faith. Or, as we could perhaps more accurately say, it is the call of God that brings forth spiritual life, of which faith is the first true evidence or proof.

Romans 8:29-30 does not contain a full list of the steps in a person's experience of salvation, only five of the most important steps undertaken by God on behalf of Christians. If the text were to include all the steps, what theologians call the ordo salutis, it would have to list these:
foreknowledge, predestination, calling, regeneration, faith, repentance, justification, adoption, sanctification, perseverance, and glorification. The full list makes the point. After predestination, the very next thing is our calling, out of which comes faith which leads to justification.

The Bible never says that we are saved because of our faith. That would make faith something good in us that we somehow contribute to the process. But it does say that we are saved by or through faith, meaning that God must create it in us before we can be justified.

Glorified (Past Tense)

Glorification is also something we studied earlier, and we are going to come back to it again before we complete these studies of Romans 8. It means being made like Jesus Christ, which is what Paul said earlier. But here is one thing we must notice. When Paul mentions glorification, he refers to it in the past tense ("glorified") rather than in the future ("will glorify") or future passive tense ("will be glorified"), which is what we might have expected him to have done.

Why is this? The only possible but also obvious reason is that he is thinking of this final step in our salvation as being so certain that it is possible to refer to is as having already happened. And, of course, he does this deliberately to assure us that this is exactly what will happen. Do you remember how he put it in writing to the Christians at Philippi? He wrote, "I always pray with joy... being confident of this, that he who began a good work in you will carry it on to completion until the day of Christ Jesus" (Phil. 1:4, 6). That is shorthand for what we are discovering in Romans. God began the "good work" by foreknowledge, predestination, calling, and justification. And because he never goes back on anything he has said or changes his mind, we can know that he will carry it on until the day we will be like Jesus Christ, being glorified.

All of God

I have a simple conclusion, and it is to remind you again that these are all things God has done. They are the important things, the things that matter. Without them, not one of us would be saved. Or if we were "saved," not one of us would continue in that salvation.

Do we have to believe? Of course, we do. Paul has already spoken of the nature and necessity of faith in chapters 3 and 4. But even our faith is of God or, as we should probably better say, the result of his working in us. In Ephesians Paul says, "For it is by grace you have been saved, through faith—and this not from yourselves, it is the gift of God—not by works, so that no one can boast" (Eph. 2:9). When we are first saved we think naturally that we have had a great deal to do with it, perhaps because of wrong or shallow teaching, but more likely only because we know more about our own thoughts and feelings than we do about God. But the longer one is a Christian, the further one moves from any feeling that we are responsible for our salvation or even any part of it, and the closer we come to the conviction that it is all of God.

It is a good thing it is of God, too! Because if it were accomplished by us, we could just as easily un-accomplish it—and no doubt would. If God is the author, salvation is something that is done wisely, well, and forever.

Robert Haldane, one of the great commentators on Romans, provides this summary.

In looking back on this passage, we should observe that, in all that is stated, man acts no part, but is passive, and all is done by God. He is elected and predestinated and called and justified and glorified by God. The aposde was here concluding all that he had said before in enumerating topics of consolation to believers, and is now going on to show that God is "for us," or on the part of his people. Could anything, then, be more consolatory to those who love God, than to be in this manner assured that the great concern of their salvation is not left in their own keeping?
God, even their covenant God, hath taken the whole upon himself. He hath undertaken for them. There is no room, then, for chance or change. He will perfect that which concerneth them.

Years ago Harry A. Ironside, that great Bible teacher, told a story about an older Christian who was asked to give his testimony. He told how God had sought him out and found him, how God had loved him, called him, saved him, delivered him, cleansed him, and healed him—a great witness to the grace, power, and glory of God. But after the meeting a rather legalistic brother took him aside and criticized his testimony, as certain of us like to do. He said, "I appreciated all you said about what God did for you. But you didn't mention anything about your part in it. Salvation is really part us and part God. You should have mentioned something about your part."

"Oh, yes," the older Christian said. "I apologize for that. I'm sorry. I really should have said something about my part. My part was running away, and his part was running after me until he caught me."

We have all run away. But God has set his love on us, predestined us to become like Jesus Christ, called us to faith and repentance, justified us, yes, and has even glorified us, so certain of completion is his plan. May he alone be praised!

Chapter 111.
Foreknowledge and Predestination

Romans 8:29

There are quite a few misunderstandings about Reformed or Calvinistic Christians, and one is that we are always talking about predestination. That is probably not so, though there are Calvinists who like to beat this drum, just as those in other communions like to emphasize certain forms of church government, the gifts of the Holy Spirit, or modes of baptism.

This study is about foreknowledge and predestination. But if you are inclined to think that I am overemphasizing these truths by talking about them here, I need to point out that this is the first time in our long study of the Book of Romans that I have explicitly spoken about either. This is my hundred and twelfth study of Romans, but it is the first one specifically addressing these themes. The reason is obvious. This is the first place in Romans at which Paul introduces these two terms. God's foreknowledge of a chosen people and his predestination of them to be conformed to the image of Jesus Christ lies behind everything he has been teaching in the first seven and a half chapters. But Paul has not discussed these ideas until he has first presented our desperate condition due to sin and God's remedy for sin through faith in Jesus Christ.

Strikingly, this is also the procedure John Calvin followed in the Institutes of the Christian Religion. Calvin is known for teaching about predestination. But a discussion of the doctrine does not appear until near the end of Book Three, after more than nine hundred pages devoted to other themes and more than two-thirds of the way through the volume.

"According to His Purpose"

Where do we start in discussing this doctrine? We have already made a start in the last study, showing that foreknowledge and predestination are two of five great doctrines described as a golden chain by which God reaches down from heaven to elect and save a people for himself.

Yet Paul's own start is in verse 28, where he has written, "And we know that in all things God works for the good of those who love him, who have been called according to his purpose." Since the word called also occurs again as one of the five doctrines in this chain, we are alerted to the fact that the chain of divine actions merely explains how God achieves this purpose. In other words, it is not foreknowledge or predestination that is primary but the purpose of God itself. What is that purpose? Clearly, it is that from the mass of fallen and perishing humanity God might save a company of people who will be made like Jesus.

We could put it like this: God loves Jesus so much that he is determined to have many more people like him. Not that we become divine, of course. Nothing in the Bible teaches that. But rather that we might become like him in his many communicable attributes: things like love, joy, peace, holiness, wisdom, patience, grace, kindness, goodness, compassion, faithfulness, mercy, and other qualities.

In order to do that, God selects, predestines, calls, justifies, and glorifies this people. That is, verses 29 and 30 tell how God accomplishes the purpose of verse 28.

Foreknowledge

I said in the last study that foreknowledge is the most important of these terms and that it is the most misunderstood. I also said that I would be returning to it to discuss it further, which is what I want to do now.

The problem with this term is that if we break it down into its two constituent parts, the word itself suggests the wrong idea. The first part of the word is "fore," which means "before," and the second part is "knowledge." So the word seems to refer only to knowing something before it happens. Starting from this point, many people have gone on to supply what, in their judgment, God is supposed to know beforehand, concluding that what he foreknows or foresees is faith. According to such suppositions, it is on the basis of a faith which God foresees that he saves people.

That is not what the verse says, of course. It says that God foreknows people, not what they are going to do, and faith is not even mentioned. In the flow of these verses, what we are told is that God: (1) has a purpose to save certain people, and (2) does something to those people as a first step in a five-step process of saving them.

Actually, as soon as we begin to look at the word carefully, we discover that it is used in a very specific way in the Bible. And for good reasons! When we use the word foreknowledge in relation to ourselves, to refer to knowing beforehand, the word has meaning to us. We can anticipate what a person we know well might do, for instance. But that sense of the word is meaningless in relation to God. Because God is not in time, as we are, he does not know things beforehand. God simply knows. He knows all things. That is what omniscience means. But even if we think in time categories, which is all we can do as creatures locked in time, we have to say that the only reason God can even be said to foreknow things is because he predetermines them. As Robert Haldane says, "God foreknows what will be, by determining what shall be."

No, the word foreknowledge has quite a different meaning in relation to God than it does in relation to us. It means that God "sets his special love upon" a person or "elects" a person to salvation.

This is a characteristic use of the word in the Old Testament. In Amos 3:2, which I mentioned in the last study, the King James Version has the words, "You only have I known [Hebrew, yāda] of all the families of the earth." That does not refer to God's knowledge in the usual sense of knowing all things, because in that sense God would have to be said to "know" all people and not just the people of Israel. In this verse the word has the meaning "set a special love upon" or "choose." In fact, as I have already pointed out, so obvious is the idea of election in this context that the New International Version sharpens the meaning by translating Amos 3:2 with the words, "You only have I chosen...."

We see the same idea when we examine the use of "foreknowledge" (or "foreknew") in the New Testament, where the references occur seven times. Two of these occurrences are of man's foreknowledge, our common usage of the term. Five are of God's foreknowledge, and they are the determining passages.

1. Acts 2:23. This verse occurs in the middle of Peter's great sermon on the day of Pentecost, in which he was explaining the plan of salvation to the Jews of Jerusalem: "This man [Jesus] was handed over to you by God's set purpose and foreknowledge; and you, with the help of wicked men, put him to death by nailing him to the cross." In this speech Peter is not merely telling his listeners that God knew Jesus would be crucified. That is not the point at all. Rather, he is saying that God sent him to be crucified; that is, that God determined beforehand that this is what should take place. This is what foreknowledge means in Peter's context.

The same idea is present two chapters further on, although in this passage the word foreknowledge is omitted. There the believers are praying and say, "Indeed Herod and Pontius Pilate met together with the Gentiles [the "wicked men" of Acts 2:23] and the people of Israel in this city to conspire against your holy servant Jesus, whom you anointed. They did what your power and will had decided beforehand should happen" (Acts 4:27-28).

Both these passages say that human beings were merely carrying out what God had previously determined should happen in order to save sinners by Jesus' crucifixion.

2. Romans 11:2. In Romans 9-11 Paul is defending the doctrine of the eternal security of the elect against the argument that it cannot be true since many Jews have not believed in Jesus. There are six or seven answers to that objection in these chapters, and in chapter 11 there is one that includes the word foreknew. "I ask then: Did God reject his people? By no means! I am an Israelite myself, a descendant of Abraham, from the tribe of Benjamin. God did not reject his people, whom he foreknew" (vv. 1-2).

What does that mean? Does it mean that God does not reject those whom he sees in advance will not reject him? Of course not. That is not what Paul is talking about, and if it were, it would not help his case at all. What he means is that, even in the case of Israel, God has not elected each and every individual to salvation, instead choosing only a remnant, but that those whom he has elected to salvation are kept in that salvation. Paul introduces himself as an example. His argument is that those whom God has foreknown (that is, "chosen") will never fall away or be rejected—the same point he has been making in Romans 8.

3. First Peter 1:2. Peter was a great preacher of predestination, and two of the New Testament's explicit references to foreknowledge occur in his first letter. Writing to Christians scattered throughout the Roman provinces of what we call Turkey, he says at the very beginning of his epistle: "To God's elect, strangers in the world, scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia and Bithynia, who have been chosen according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, through the sanctifying work of the Spirit, for obedience to Jesus Christ and sprinkling by his blood" (vv. 1-2). Verse 2 does not mean that God chose them because he foresaw that they would believe on or obey Jesus Christ, but rather the reverse. They believed and were being sanctified because God chose them to be saved.

4. First Peter 1:20. In verse 20 of the same chapter Peter is speaking of God's determination to send Jesus Christ to be the Savior. The text literally says that God "foreknew him [that is, Jesus] before the creation of the world." But in this verse "foreknew" so clearly means "foreordained" (as in KJV) that the New International Version translators use the word chosen: "He was chosen before the creation of the world." In other words, God the Father appointed Jesus to be the Savior even before the creation of man or man's fall.

That same translation could have been used in each of the other passages I have mentioned:

Acts 2:23—"This man [Jesus] was handed over to you by God's set purpose and choice (or predetermination)...."

Romans 11:2—"God did not reject his people, whom he chose...."

First Peter 1:2—"[To God's elect] who have been chosen according to the choice (or preordination) of God the Father...."

5. Romans 8:29. The fifth New Testament reference to God's foreknowledge is in our text, and the meaning, as I have been arguing, is the same as in the other verses. Romans 8:29 means that God set his special or saving love upon a select group of people in order that his good purpose, namely, to create a people to be like his Son Jesus Christ, might be achieved.

Interestingly, some of the versions, knowing that this is the true meaning of the verb foreknow, have tried to suggest it by freer translations. The New English Bible says, "God knew his own before ever they were, and also ordained that they should be shaped to the likeness of his Son." Charles Williams rendered the verse, "For those on whom he set his heart beforehand he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son." Goodspeed wrote, "Those whom he had marked out from the first he predestined to be made like his Son." The Roman Catholic Jerusalem Bible is particularly sharp. It says, "They [that is, the ones called according to his purpose] are the ones he chose specially long ago." These all suggest the correct meaning nicely.

Predestination

The second of our five golden terms is predestination, the one that bothers most people, though what bothers them is more accurately included in the word foreknowledge. That is, that God should set his love upon a special people and save them while overlooking others. Predestination means that God has determined the specific destiny of those he has previously decided should be saved and be made like Jesus.

This is a good place to look at the objections people have to this doctrine, whether described by the word foreknowledge or predestination.

1. If you believe in predestination, you make salvation arbitrary and God a tyrant. Actually, there are two objections here. Let us take the second one first. Does predestination make God a tyrant, crushing justice by some willy-nilly saving of some and damning of others? We can understand how people who know little about the Bible's teaching might suppose this, particularly since they think of God as being unjust anyhow. But anyone who has studied the Bible (or even just the Book of Romans) knows how wrong this is. What will happen if we seek only an even-handed justice from God? The answer is that we will be lost. Justice is what Romans 1 is about. The justice of God condemns us and can only condemn us. If we seek justice from God, we will find it by being cast into outer darkness forever.

In order to be saved, we need mercy and not justice, which is what predestination is all about. It is God showing mercy to whom he will show mercy. As Paul says in Romans 9:18, "... God has mercy on whom he wants to have mercy, and he hardens whom he wants to harden."

As far as salvation being arbitrary is concerned, we must admit that from our perspective we cannot see why God chooses some and not others or even some and not all, and therefore his foreknowledge and predestination do seem arbitrary. But that is only because we are not God and cannot see as God sees. We cannot understand the full scope of his purposes in saving some and not others, but that does not mean that God is without such purposes. In fact, everything we know about God would lead us to conclude that he has them, though we do not know what they are. What we know about God shows that he is infinitely purposeful in his actions.

Ephesians 1:11 puts predestination in this framework, saying, "In him we were also chosen, having been predestined according to the plan of him who works out everything in conformity with the purpose of his will." That is the opposite of being arbitrary. Similarly, in Ephesians 3:10 and 11, Paul says, "His intent was that now, through the church, the manifold wisdom of God should be made known to the rulers and authorities in the heavenly realms, according to his eternal purpose which he accomplished in Christ Jesus our Lord."

2. If you believe in predestination, you must deny human freedom. This is a common objection, but it is based on a sad misunderstanding of the freedom we are supposed to have as fallen human beings. What does the Bible teach about our freedom in spiritual matters? It teaches that we are not free to choose God. "There is... no one who seeks God" (Rom. 3:10-11). "The sinful mind is hostile to God. It does not submit to God's law, nor can it do so" (Rom. 8:7).

Predestination does not take away freedom. It restores it. It is because God foreknows me and predestines me to be conformed to the image of his Son that I am delivered from sin's bondage and set free to serve him.

The matter can also be looked at practically, in answer to a related question: Does predestination destroy freedom in experience? Sinclair Ferguson answers, "We have a practical illustration in the life of that man who of all men was most clearly predestined by God, namely, Jesus. Jesus was the freest and most responsible man who ever lived. Has there ever been a life in which the sense of God's predestining purpose has been more clearly seen than in our Savior? Is he not spoken of as the elect, chosen and predestined one? Were not his ways determined for him in the pages of the Old Testament? Yet was there ever a freer man in all the universe?" Ferguson summarizes: "We may be told that the doctrine of predestination turns God into a tyrant and man into a slave. But we discover to the contrary that it shows God to be a God of great grace and the children of God to be the freest men and women."

3. If you believe in predestination, you will destroy the motivation for evangelism. For why should we labor to save those whom God has determined to save anyway? The theological answer to this is that God determines the means to his ends as well as the ends > themselves. So, if he has determined to bring the gospel to Mary Jones by a faithful witness to her by Sally Smith, then it is as important and necessary that Sally Smith be a witness to Mary Jones as it is that Mary Jones become a Christian.

But I would rather answer the objection in another way. Suppose God does not elect to salvation and thus, because he has determined to save some, does not commit himself to create new life within them that will break down their hard hearts and enable them to respond in faith to the message of the cross when it is made known. I ask: If God does not commit himself to doing that, what hope do you and I as evangelists have of doing it? If the hearts of men and women are as wicked and incapable of belief as the Bible teaches they are, how can you and I ever hope to present the gospel savingly to anyone?

To put it in even more frightening terms, if salvation depends upon our efforts to evangelize rather than the foreknowledge and predestination of God, what if I do something wrong? What if I give a wrong answer to a question or do something that turns others away from Christ? In that case, either by my error or because of my sin, I will be responsible for their eternal damnation. I do not see how that can encourage evangelism. On the contrary, it will make us afraid to do or say anything.

But look at it the other way. If God has elected some to salvation in order that Jesus might be glorified and that many might come to him in faith and be conformed to his image, then I can be both relaxed and bold in my witness. I can know that God will save those he has determined to save and will even use my witness, however feeble or imprecise it might be, if this is the means he has chosen.

Far from destroying evangelism, predestination actually makes evangelism possible. It makes it an expectant and joyful exercise.

Salvation Is of the Lord

As I close, I come back to something I said earlier. All five of these great terms— foreknowledge, predestination, calling, justification, and glorification—refer to things God does. Why is this? That is a meaningful question when we remember that there are also things that we are to do ourselves. Faith is something we do. God does not believe for us. Similarly, sanctification involves our efforts, though it is also of God. Why does Paul not mention these things in Romans 8:28-30?

The answer is obvious. The apostle is dealing with our eternal security, and he is emphasizing God's work so we might understand from the beginning that this wonderful plan of salvation cannot fail. It would if it depended on us. Everything we do fails sooner or later, and that would certainly be true of salvation. Our faith would fail. Our ability to persevere would be extinguished. Our hold on God would weaken, and we would let go and in the end fall into hell.

But salvation is not like that.

It is not our choice of God that matters, but rather God's choice of us. It is not our faith, but his call. It is not our ability to persevere, but the fact that he has determined beforehand to persevere with us to the very end and even beyond.

Chapter 112.
God's Effectual Call

Romans 8:30

My wife Linda and I have many different personality traits, which is a natural thing for husbands and wives, and one of them is the way we respond to someone's call. If we are walking down the street and someone calls out so that we can hear the voice but cannot quite distinguish the words, my wife assumes that the person is calling her and turns around. I assume that the person is calling someone else and keep on going. The same thing is true if a driver of a car blows the horn.

I ignore it; it must be for someone else. Linda thinks someone is trying to get her attention.

I do not know what that says about the two of us, perhaps only that Linda is more "people oriented" than I am and that I am more "task oriented" than she is. But it is an interesting observation in view of the word we need to look at in this study. The word is "called," and it occurs in the statement that "those he [that is, God] predestined, he also called..." (Rom. 8:30).

This word is the next link in the great golden chain of salvation by which God reaches down from eternity into time to save sinners. The point of this word, the third link, is that, unlike myself but like Linda, those whom God calls not only hear his call but actually respond to it by turning around and by believing on Jesus Christ or committing their lives to him.

Calling: External and Internal

But we need to back up at this point and review a distinction I made two studies ago, when I first introduced the golden chain. It is the difference between a call of men and women that is merely external, general, and (in itself) ineffective for salvation, and a call that is internal, specific, and regenerating.

The first call is an open invitation to all persons to repent of their sin and turn to Jesus. As I have mentioned, it was spoken by Jesus himself in many places. For example, he said in Matthew 11:28, "Come to me, all you who are weary and burdened, and I will give you rest." In Matthew 16:24 he explained, "If anyone would come after me, he must deny himself and take up his cross and follow me." He said in John 7:37, "If anyone is thirsty, let him come to me and drink."

This last invitation was spoken in Jerusalem on the last day of the Feast of Tabernacles, when people from many lands and nationalities were assembled. There were Jews from every part of Palestine as well as from many regions of the Roman Empire. There were also Gentiles, some who had become Jewish proselytes but also some who, no doubt, were merely interested bystanders. We get a feeling of what this audience must have been like by remembering the composition of the crowd that had assembled at Pentecost when Peter preached the first sermon of the Christian era, likewise extending a general call to all to believe on Jesus. We are told that on that occasion Jerusalem was filled with "Parthians, Medes and Elamites; residents of Mesopotamia, Judea and Cappadocia, Pontus and Asia, Phrygia and Pamphylia, Egypt and the parts of Libya near Cyrene; visitors from Rome (both Jews and converts to Judaism), Cretans and Arabs..." (Acts 2:9-11).

When Jesus (and later Peter) called such people to faith, the call was universal. It was (and is) for everyone. Anyone who wishes can come to Jesus Christ and be saved.

Today that same call flows from every true Christian pulpit and from all who bear witness to Jesus Christ as Lord and Savior in every land.

The difficulty with this external, universal, and (in itself) ineffectual call, however, is that if people are left to themselves, no one ever actually responds to it. People hear the gospel and may even understand it up to a point. But the God who issues the invitation is undesirable to them, and so they turn away. Jesus told a story about a man who had prepared a great banquet and invited many guests (Luke 14:15-24). When the feast was prepared he sent servants with the invitation: "Come, for everything is now ready." But the guests all began to make excuses.

"I have just bought a field, and I must go and see it," said one.

"I have just bought five yoke of oxen, and I'm on my way to try them out," said another.

A third replied, "I just got married, so I can't come."

That is the way it truly is, since Jesus was not making up this story out of thin air. That was the way the people of his day responded to his general call. They would not accept his invitation. They rejected it, preferring to go their own ways and about their own business.

One of the great newspaper organizations in this country is the Howard organization, and if you are acquainted with it, you may also be aware of the Howard Company logo. It is a lighthouse beneath which are the words: "Give the people the light, and they will find their way." The idea is that people make foolish mistakes and bad decisions because they do not know the right way. Show it to them and they will follow it, is what the motto means. But that is not the way the Bible describes our condition spiritually. When Jesus was in the world he was the world's light. The light was shining. But the men of his day did not respond to Jesus by walking in the right path. Instead they hated the light and tried to put it out. They crucified the lighthouse.

This is how people still respond to the universal invitation. It is why Jesus said, "This is the verdict: Light has come into the world, but men loved darkness instead of light because their deeds were evil" (John 3:19). It is why Paul wrote, "There is no one who understands, no one who seeks God" (Rom. 3:11). And it is why Jesus declared, "No one can come to me unless the Father who sent me draws him..." (John 6:44).

But this is where the second kind of call comes in, the kind that is actually spoken of in Romans 8:30. Unlike the first call, which was external, universal, and (in itself) ineffective, this second call is internal, specific, and entirely effective. In other words, it effectively saves those —and all those—to whom it is spoken.

The best discussion of the effectual call I know is in John Murray's small classic, Redemption Accomplished and Applied, where he begins by making the distinction I have just made, showing that there is such a thing as a general or universal call and that there are examples of it in the Bible. But then he points out rightly that "in the New Testament the terms for calling, when used with reference to salvation, are almost uniformly applied, not to the universal call of the gospel, but to the call that ushers men into a state of salvation and is therefore effectual. There is scarcely an instance where the terms are used to designate the indiscriminate overture of grace in the gospel of Jesus Christ." Here are some examples:

Romans 1:6-7—"And you also are among those who are called to belong to Jesus Christ.... called to be saints."

Romans 11:29—"For God's gifts and his call are irrevocable."

First Corinthians 1:9—"God, who has called you into fellowship with his Son Jesus Christ our Lord, is faithful."

Ephesians 4:1—"As a prisoner for the Lord, then, I urge you to live a life worthy of the calling you have received."

Second Timothy 1:8-9—"So do not be ashamed to testify about our Lord, or ashamed of me his prisoner. But join with me in suffering for the gospel, by the power of God, who has saved us and called us to a holy life...."

Second Peter 1:10—"Therefore, my brothers, be all the more eager to make your calling and election sure...."

In each of these texts and many others, including our text in Romans 8:30, the call of God is one that effectively saves those to whom it is addressed. Putting the above texts together, it is a call that unites us to Jesus Christ, bringing us into fellowship with him, and sets before us a holy life in which we will be sure to walk if we have truly been called. Putting the call into the context of Romans 8, it is the point at which the eternal foreknowledge and predestination of God pass over into time and start the process by which the individual is drawn from sin to faith in Jesus Christ, is justified through that faith, and is then kept in Christ until his or her final glorification.

Effectual calling is the central and key point in this great golden chain of five links.

The Power of God's Call

Now that we have distinguished between the external and internal calls, we need to ask why it is that the internal or specific call is so effective. Why does it bring those who hear it to salvation? The answer is not at all difficult to find. The reason the effective call is effective is that it is God's call. It issues from his mouth, and all that issues from the mouth of God accomplishes precisely that for which he sent it.

This is what Isaiah 55:10-11 teaches us, when it records God as saying:

> "As the rain and the snow come down > from heaven, and do not return to it > without watering the earth and making it > bud and flourish, so that it yields seed > for the sower and bread for the eater, > so is my word that goes out from my mouth:
> It will not return to me empty, but will > accomplish what I desire and achieve > the purpose for which I sent it."

God's words are always effective. They accomplish their purpose. But to be faithful to our text we need to point out that what we are dealing with in Romans 8:30, in terms of God's calling of sinners, is a call to salvation rather than another purpose. So we need to ask exactly how the effective call of God works in the achieving of this goal.

The chief thing the effective call of God in salvation does is to cause the regeneration, or rebirth, of the one thus summoned. In the study by John Murray that I referred to earlier, Redemption Accomplished and Applied, Murray says that it does not make much difference whether we put regeneration before effectual calling, or effectual calling before regeneration, since the critical determining act is God's in any case. But when the relevant texts are carefully considered, the order nevertheless seems to be as I have indicated. That is, God calls the individual with a specific and effective call, and the call itself produces new spiritual life in the one who hears it, on the basis of which he or she is enabled to respond to the gospel.

In my judgment, the best illustration of how this works is that of the raising of Lazarus from the dead recounted in John 11, the illustration I introduced in the earlier, introductory study of these terms. We are encouraged to take it as an illustration, because it is in the midst of this story and in obvious reference to it that Jesus utters the well-known words, "I am the resurrection and the life. He who believes in me will live, even though he dies; and whoever lives and believes in me will never die..." (vv. 25-26).

What happens in this story? Jesus comes to the tomb of Lazarus and calls out to this dead man, "Lazarus, come out!" and Lazarus does. Clearly the call of Jesus created life in the formerly dead corpse, as a result of which Lazarus responded to Jesus by emerging from the tomb.

That is what happens when God calls us to salvation. His call creates spiritual life in the one called, and the proof that spiritual life is there is that we respond to him. How do we respond? We respond by turning from sin—the theological word is repentance—and by believing on Jesus Christ. In other words, the call of God produces life in the sinner, just as the word of God brought the heavens and earth into existence at the very beginning of creation. The first evidences of that new life are repentance from sin and faith in Jesus.

A moment ago I said that, according to John Murray, it makes little practical difference whether we put regeneration before calling, or calling before regeneration, and that is probably true, though the correct biblical picture seems to be calling first, then regeneration. However, this is not the case in regard to regeneration or calling, on the one hand, and faith and repentance on the other. In this case, the calling of God necessarily comes before the fruit of that calling. It is only after God calls and regenerates that one repents of sin and believes the gospel.

Which comes first, faith or life? The person who knows the Bible answers, "Life." Otherwise, salvation would depend on ourselves and our own ability, and none of the certainties that Paul is speaking about in Romans 8 would be possible.

Some Important Observations

There are a few important qualifications and observations on what I have been saying, and it would be a mistake to overlook them. Let me list three briefly.

1. Two responses. I said earlier that the trouble with the general call is that men and women do not naturally respond to it, meaning that they do not become Christians by this call alone. But I need to balance this by adding that, although they do not respond to the call of God unto salvation, they nevertheless can respond superficially by such outward things as coming forward at a religious meeting, making outward profession of faith, or even joining a church. And not only can they, many do. That is why Peter says in the text quoted earlier, "Therefore, my brothers, be all the more eager to make your calling and election sure..." (2 Peter 1:10). He means that we must be sure that we really have been called by God and are truly born again, and have not merely been called by the preacher.

Donald Grey Barnhouse, one of my predecessors as minister of Tenth Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia (1927-1960), wrote:

If men heed no more than the outward call, they become members of the visible church. If the inward call is heard in our hearts, we become members of the invisible church. The first call unites us merely to a group of professing members; but the inward call unites us to Christ himself, and to all that have been born again.

The outward call may bring with it a certain intellectual knowledge of the truth; the inward call brings us the faith of the heart, the hope which anchors us forever to Christ and the love which must ever draw us back to him who first loved us. The one can end in formalism, the other in true life. The outward call may curb the tendencies of the old nature and keep a soul in outward morality; the inward call will cure the plague that is in us and bring us on to triumph in Christ.

2. The importance of the general call. My second qualification concerns the importance of the general call. Everything I have said thus far has stressed the necessity of the special, or internal, call of the individual to salvation by God. I have said that no one naturally responds to God on the basis of the general call alone. But now I need to add that although that is true, it is nevertheless also true that the general call is necessary, since it is through the general, or universal, call that God calls specifically.

Let me say it this way: The effectual or specific call comes through the general call. That is, it is through the preaching of the Word by God's evangelists and ministers and through the telling of the Good News of the gospel by Christians everywhere that God calls sinners. He does not call everyone we Christians call. We sow the seed broadly; some of it falls on stony or shallow soil, just as some of it also falls on good soil. But when the seed falls on the soil God has previously prepared and when God, the giver of life, blesses the work of sowing—so that the seed takes root in the good soil and grows—the result is a spiritual harvest. People are saved, and they do pass into that great chain of God's saving acts, including foreknowledge, predestination, calling, justification, and glorification, that is outlined in the eighth chapter of Romans.

Let me put it still another way. If God calls effectively through the general call, it is as necessary that there be a general call if some are to be saved as it is that there be a specific and effectual call. Our call does not regenerate. God alone is the author of the new birth. All must be born "from above." Nevertheless, the way God does that is through the sowing of the seed of his Word, which is entrusted to us.

Nobody but God could invent this way of saving human beings. If it were left to us, we would say that either (1) God has to do it; we can do nothing, or (2) we have to do it; God can do nothing. As it is, the work of effectively calling people to Christ is of God, yet using human beings.

3. Am I elect? There is this last qualification. Sometimes people get bogged down by the subject of God's foreknowledge and predestination, and they end up saying, "Well, if God is going to elect me to salvation, he will just have to do it. There is nothing I can do." Or else they get hung up on knowing whether or not they are elect. They say, "How can I know I am elect? If I am not, there is no hope for me," and they despair. This question bothered John Bunyan, the author of The Pilgrim's Progress, for a long time and caused extraordinary despair in him.

But there is no reason for either such passivity or such despair. How do you know whether or not you are elect? The answer lies in another question: Have you responded to the gospel? In other words, have you answered God's call?

How do we know that the patriarch Abraham was an elect man? It is because, when God called to him to leave Ur of the Chaldeans and go to a land that he would afterward inherit, Abraham "obeyed and went, even though he did not know where he was going" (Heb. 11:8), and because he persevered in that obedience to the very end of his life.

How do we know that Moses was predestined to be saved? It is because, though raised in the lap of Egyptian luxury, when he had grown up he "refused to be known as the son of Pharaoh's daughter," choosing "to be mistreated along with the people of God rather than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a short time" (Heb. 11:24-25). He sided with God's people.

How do we know that Paul was elected to salvation? It is because, though breathing out hatred against God's people and trying to kill some of them, when Jesus appeared to him on the road to Damascus, calling, "Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me?" the future apostle to the Gentiles was transformed. He saw his sin and turned from it. He saw the righteousness of Christ and believed on Jesus. He obeyed and served God from that time on. Moreover, when he wrote about salvation later, as he did in the letter to the Romans, he showed beyond any doubt that it was not he who chose God, but rather God who chose him and called him to be Christ's follower.

How do you know if you are among the elect?

There is only one way, and it is not by trying to peer into the eternal counsels of God, stripping the cover from the book of his divine foreknowledge and predestination. The only way you will ever know if you are among the elect is if you respond to the gospel. We are told in the Bible: "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and you will be saved..." (Acts 16:31). Do it. Then you can know that God has set his electing love on you and that, having loved you, he will continue to love you and keep you to the end.

Will you believe? It would be a delight if God would use this study of the effectual call to call you effectually.

Chapter 113.
Justification and Glorification

Romans 8:30

Anyone who is involved in a business of any size knows the necessity of a long-range plan. There are one-year plans, five-year plans, and even ten-year plans. The longer these plans are the more often they need to be reviewed, revised, and updated. An executive who can create an accurate long-range plan, foreseeing most of the contingencies that will affect the company in future years, and then keep on top of it, is an extremely valuable asset to his or her organization.

We have been studying a long-range plan, in fact, the longest-range plan that has ever been devised or could be devised. It is a plan that has had its origins in eternity past and will find its consummation in eternity future. It is all-embracing. Everything that has ever happened or ever will happen in history is part of it. And it is utterly certain. So detailed is this plan and so wisely is it drafted that nothing will ever arise to upset it or even cause an alternative plan to be necessary. Of course, I am speaking of the plan of God outlined for us in Romans 8:28-30.

This plan begins with God's foreknowledge and predestination, expresses itself in time in the calling of individuals to faith in Jesus Christ as Lord and Savior, includes justification, and ends in glorification, when these foreknown and predestined persons are made entirely like Jesus. We are to look at the last two steps of the plan in this study.

Justification by Faith

The first term we need to look at is justification, but we do not need to study it in detail here, since it was the chief focus of our study in volume one and has been mentioned many times since.

Justification is the opposite of condemnation. When a person is in a wrong relationship to the law and is condemned or pronounced guilty by the judge, condemnation does not make the person guilty. The person is only declared to be so. In the same way, in justification a person is declared by God to be in a right relationship to his law, but not made righteous. In a human court a person can be declared righteous or "innocent" on the basis of his or her own righteousness. But in God's court, since we humans have no righteousness of our own and are therefore not innocent, believers are declared righteous on the ground of Christ's atonement.

It helps to realize that the full New Testament doctrine is not merely justification alone, though this is the only word Paul uses in his abbreviated listing of it in Romans 8, but justification by grace through faith in Jesus Christ.

That definition has four parts.

1. The source of our justification is the grace of God (Rom. 3:24). Since "there is no one righteous, not even one" (Rom. 3:10), it is clear that no one can make or declare himself or herself "righteous" (v. 20). How, then, is salvation possible? It is possible only if God does the work for us—which is what "grace" means, since we do not deserve God's working. Paul frequently emphasizes this by adding the words free or freely to "grace," which is redundant but nevertheless strong writing.

2. The ground of our justification is the work of Christ (Rom 3:25). We saw this in volume one in our discussion of the word propitiation. It is because this work has been done that God has been able to justify us justly.

"Justification," writes John R. W. Stott, "is not a synonym for amnesty, which strictly is pardon without principle, a forgiveness which overlooks—even forgets (amnestia is 'forgetfulness')— wrongdoing and declines to bring it to justice. No, justification is an act of justice, of gracious justice.... When God justifies sinners, he is not declaring bad people to be good, or saying that they are not sinners after all; he is pronouncing them legally righteous, free from any liability to the broken law, because he himself in his Son has born the penalty of their law-breaking.... In other words, we are 'justified by his blood.' "

3. The means of our justification is faith (Rom. 3:25-26). Faith is the channel by which justification becomes ours. This is not mentioned in the chain of God's saving actions listed in Romans 8:29-30, but it is the fruit of God's effectual calling and its result, which is regeneration. When we are born again we show it by repenting of sin and turning to Jesus Christ in faith, believing that he is our Savior. Two things should be said about faith.

First, faith is not a good work. It is necessary, essential. But it is not a good work. In fact, it is not a work at all. Faith is God's gift, as Paul makes clear in Ephesians 2:8-9: "For it is by grace you have been saved, through faith—and this not from yourselves, it is the gift of God—not by works, so that no one can boast."

Second, although faith is the means of our justification, it is also the only means. Luther expressed this by the words sola fide ("by faith alone"), thus adding a word not present in the text of Scripture but by it nevertheless catching the essence of the idea. Clearly, if faith is not a good work but only receiving what God has done for us and freely offers to us, then it is by faith alone that we can be justified, all other acts or works being excluded by definition. The only means by which any person can ever be justified is by believing God and receiving what he offers.

4. The effect of our justification is union with Christ. This idea was developed fully in Romans 5 and in an earlier section of chapter 8. It is the ground of the benefits of our salvation unfolded in Romans 5:1-11 and of our victory over sin elaborated in Romans 5:12-8:17.

Stott explains it this way:

To say that we are justified "through Christ" points to his historical death; to say that we are justified "in Christ" points to the personal relationship with him which by faith we now enjoy. This simple fact makes it impossible for us to think of justification as a purely external transaction; it cannot be isolated from our union with Christ and all the benefits which this brings. The first is membership of the Messianic community of Jesus. If we are in Christ and therefore justified, we are also the children of God and the true (spiritual) descendants of Abraham.... Secondly, this new community, to create which Christ gave himself on the cross, is to be "eager to do what is good," and its members are to devote themselves to good works....

To be sure, we can say with Paul that the law condemned us. But "there is now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus."

Hope of Glory

Glorification, the fifth and final term of Romans 8:29-30, is also a word we have studied earlier. In fact, we met the term as early as Romans 5:2 (which anticipates Rom. 8:28-30), where Paul spoke of Christians as rejoicing "in the hope of the glory of God." What does Romans 5:2 mean?

It means that we know that one day we will be glorified and that we rejoice in this certainty. That is, we know that we will be like Jesus. He is God and is therefore like God in all respects; we will be like him. We will not become God, of course. But we will become like him in his communicable attributes: love, joy, peace, mercy, wisdom, faithfulness, grace, goodness, selfcontrol and other such things (see Gal. 5:22-23). In that day sin will no longer trouble us, and we will enjoy the complete fullness and eternal favor of God's presence.

When does glorification take place?

There is a sense in which much of it takes place when we die, for then we will be freed from sin, which has taken up residence in our bodies, and will be like Christ. As John wrote, "... we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is" (1 John 3:2). Yet I am sure John Murray is right when he insists in his treatment of this word that, in its fullest sense, glorification awaits the return of Jesus Christ and the resurrection of our bodies. In fact, the text in 1 John, which I have just quoted, says this. It does not say simply that "we shall be like him." It says, "When he appears, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." Here is how Murray puts it:

1. Glorification is associated and bound up with the coming of Christ in glory.... So indispensable is the coming of the Lord to the hope of glory that glorification for the believer has no meaning without the manifestation of Christ's glory. Glorification is glorification with Christ. Remove the latter and we have robbed the glorification of believers of the one thing that enables them to look forward to this event with confidence....

2. The glorification of believers is associated and bound up with the renewal of creation. [This is the teaching of Romans 8:19-22, which we studied earlier. In those verses the glorification of our bodies, which means their resurrection, and the renewal of creation are placed together.]

When we think of glorification, then, it is no narrow perspective that we entertain. It is a renewed cosmos, new heavens and new earth, that we must think of as the context of the believers' glory, a cosmos delivered from all the consequences of sin, in which there will be no more curse but in which righteousness will have complete possession and undisturbed habitation. "And there shall in no wise enter into it anything that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie: but they which are written in the Lamb's book of life" (Rev. 21:27). "And there shall be no more curse: but the throne of God and of the Lamb shall be in it; and his servants shall serve him: and they shall see his face; and his name shall be on their foreheads" (Rev. 22:3, 4).

Past Tense, Future Blessing

The most striking feature of Paul's mention of glorification in Romans 8:30 is that it is in the past (aorist) tense, a fact noted when I first introduced this chain of words three studies back. Since glorification is clearly future from our perspective, this requires explanation.

Some commentators think that here Paul departs from strict accuracy or logic in order to stress the absolute certainty of this future event. That is, it is so assured that it can be spoken of as if it were past. D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones says this, writing, "The Apostle's argument is that, as we know most certainly that we have been called and justified, we can be equally certain of our glorification. Nothing can prevent it because it is a part of God's purpose for us." Likewise Leon Morris: "So certain is it that it can be spoken of as already accomplished. It is in the plan of God, and that means that it is as good as here."

Other scholars call this use of the past tense an aorist of anticipation or a prophetic aorist, which is almost the same thing. Since God has decreed it, it will happen and can be considered as having happened. Charles Hodge inclines to this explanation when he says, "God... sees the end from the beginning... so that in predestinating us, he at the same time, in effect, called, justified and glorified us, as all these were included in his purpose."

F. Godet is also helpful, though to my way of thinking his explanation is probably not quite what Paul has in mind here. He reminds us that there is a sense in which we have been glorified. That is, our federal head Jesus Christ has been glorified, and we are glorified in him. If this is the case, the verse would be matched by Ephesians 2:6, where Paul teaches that "God raised us up with Christ and seated us with him in the heavenly realms in Christ Jesus." This does not mean merely that taking our place in heaven is a future certainty but that we have actually already been seated in heaven in the person of Christ. The only reason I say that in my judgment this is not what Paul has in mind here is because in Romans there seems to be a flow from eternity past to eternity future, the middle portion of which dips into time. Paul seems to be describing something that began in the past, has affected us in the present, and will carry us into the future.

If we must make a choice among these three interpretations, I would side with either or both of the first two.

Yet it may be—I think I prefer this—that the chain simply moves back into eternity at this point. We have seen that it begins in eternity and then dips down into time. The flow of the verses would be most satisfying if the chain simply moved back into God's timeless eternity once again, glorification being spoken of as past because it is indeed past (or eternally present) in the mind of God.

What about Sanctification?

As I close my detailed discussion of these specific terms, I want to ask a question that is also raised by Lloyd-Jones in his exposition—wisely, I think. It concerns the one obvious omission in this list: sanctification. Why is sanctification not included, particularly when it is supposed by many to be the central theme of Romans 5 through 8?

I have already addressed myself to the latter part of this question, namely, whether Paul is discussing sanctification in these chapters. I did that at the beginning of this volume, arguing that it is not Paul's purpose to discuss sanctification at all, though much of what he says necessarily touches on it. He is arguing the case for perseverance or eternal security, which is why he introduces the phrase "hope of glory" as early as Romans 5:2. That is the central and important theme, and it comes back at the end, in Romans 8, which is what we are studying now.

But that is not a full answer to the question.

Why not?

Well, Paul has not been discussing foreknowledge, predestination, or effectual calling in these chapters either, yet he mentions those terms here. If they are included, why not sanctification? Again, the apostle is unfolding the flow of salvation from the decrees of God in the past to our glorification in eternity future. Isn't sanctification an indispensable part of that flow? Isn't it as necessary and certain as the other items?

Why, then, is sanctification omitted?

Here are the reasons Martyn Lloyd-Jones offers.

1. Sanctification is not part of the argument Paul has in mind at this point. Paul is focusing on the acts of God for our salvation, and his point is that our salvation is certain because it is God who is thus acting. Our security depends upon what he has done, not on what we may or may not be able to do. To put it in other words, our security in Christ does not depend upon our sanctification. Eternal security is not the anticipated outcome of some process. Sanctification is a process while these other items are divine acts. From the point of view of Paul's argument in Romans 8, these are entirely different things.
2. Sanctification is an inevitable consequence of justification. Therefore, Paul does not need to mention it. As soon as a person is called by God and is justified, in that same moment sanctification begins. This is because of regeneration or the imparting of a new nature to the saved person. There is no justification without regeneration just as there is no regeneration without justification. So the one who is justified, who now also possesses a new nature, will inevitably show that new nature by beginning to live a new life. That is why we can say that a claim to justification apart from growth in holiness is presumption.

3. Sanctification is inevitable also from the standpoint of our glorification. Indeed, it is a preparation for it. To go back to the text I cited toward the beginning of this study, I note that when John, writing of glorification, says "We know that when he appears, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is," he immediately adds, "Everyone who has this hope in him purifies himself, just as he is pure" (1 John 3:2-3). In other words, it is the assurance of our glorification that spurs on our sanctification.

What the great Welsh preacher gets out of this (rightly, in my opinion) is that the proper way to teach sanctification is not by concentrating on "me," "my feelings," or certain steps to "personal holiness," but rather on what God has done for us. That is, the proper approach to sanctification is to fix our eyes on God and our minds on the great biblical doctrines.

How do most people teach sanctification today? Either it is by methods ("These are the steps; do this, and you will become holy"), or it is by experience ("What you need is a special filling of the Holy Spirit [or tongues or whatever]").

This is not the biblical pattern. As Lloyd-Jones says:

The way to preach holiness is not to preach about "me" and "my feelings" and to propound various theories as to how I can be delivered; it is, rather, to preach justification and glorification. By so doing you will include sanctification. Such is the Apostle's method—"whom he justified, them he also glorified." It is because certain people do not know the truth about justification and glorification as they ought that they are defective in their teaching about sanctification. A man who has his eye on his future state of glorification will spend his time in preparing himself for it.

Suppose you are invited to a party by the President of the United States. If you are normal, you would take some time to get ready, choosing a special dress or suit and making whatever other special preparations might be necessary. In the same way, the fact that we are going to be with Jesus Christ and be like him should influence our behavior and life choices.

When I was teaching on Romans 6:2 and 11, explaining how it is that we have "died to sin," I said that we have died to it in the sense that we have died to the past. And I developed a slogan: You cannot go back; there is no place for you to go but forward.

That is absolutely true, of course. We cannot go back. The eternal purpose of God in saving us, unfolded in the five great acts of God described in Romans 8:29-30, makes that plain. But just as it is important to say that we cannot go back, so is it also important to say that we are going forward. God's foreknowledge of us is followed by his predestination of us to be conformed to the image of Jesus Christ. His predestination of us to be made like Jesus is followed by our being called to saving faith. Our calling is followed by our justification. Our justification is followed by our glorification. Therefore, it is as certain that one day we will be with Jesus, and be completely like Jesus, as it is that God exists and that his long-range plan is realistic, effective, and unchangeable.

This is God's great plan. So let's get on with our part in it and be thankful that his grace has drawn us in.

Chapter 114.
The Perseverance of the Saints

Romans 8:30

We are all familiar with the saying about people who can't see the forest for the trees, and you must know people like that. You probably even know Bible teachers like that. I do not want this to be true of our study of Romans 8. So, at this point of our studies, having examined each of the five great terms of verses 28-30 in detail, I want to step back and look at the great doctrine of which they are all only individual parts.

It is not at all hard to recognize what that doctrine is, for we have been mentioning it in one way or another ever since we began the chapter. It is the perseverance of the saints, or eternal security. Or, as some say colloquially, "once saved, always saved." It is the truth that those who have been truly brought to faith in Jesus Christ—having been foreknown and predestined to faith by God from eternity past, having been called, regenerated, and justified in this life, and having been so set on the road to ultimate glorification that this culminating glorification can even be spoken of in the past tense—that these persons will never and can never be lost. Perseverance is implied in each of the terms we have studied, but this is the place to go back and look at the entire forest.

The Biblical Doctrine

Yet we do not want to distort the doctrine by oversimplification, as some do. We want to understand it as it is taught in Scripture—as Paul teaches it in Romans 8, for instance. Therefore, we need to begin our overview by excluding some common misunderstandings about perseverance.

First, perseverance does not mean that Christians are exempted from all spiritual danger, just because they are Christians. On the contrary, the opposite is true. They are in even greater danger, because now that they are Christians the world and the devil will be doggedly set against them and will try to destroy them—and would, if that were possible. We do not need to go very far in Romans to see this fact, for in the next section of this chapter Paul lists some of the hostile forces believers face. He will speak of trouble, hardship, persecution, famine, nakedness, danger, and sword, concluding, "For your sake we face death all day long; we are considered as sheep to be slaughtered" (v. 36, quoting Ps. 44:22).

It is because we really do face many spiritual dangers that the doctrine of perseverance is so important.

Second, the doctrine of perseverance does not mean that Christians are always kept from falling into sin, just because they are Christians. Sadly, Christians do sin. Noah fell into drunkenness. Abraham lied about his wife Sarah, saying she was his sister rather than his wife, thinking to protect his own life. David committed adultery with Bathsheba and then arranged for the murder of Uriah, her husband. Peter denied the Lord. Perseverance does not mean that Christians will not fall, only that they will not fall away.

Jesus predicted Peter's denial. But he added, "I have prayed for you, Simon, that your faith may not fail. And when you have turned back, strengthen your brothers" (Luke 22:31).

Third, perseverance does not mean that those who merely profess Christ without actually being born again are secure. This truth explains the many warnings that appear in Scripture to the effect that we should give diligent attention "to make [our] calling and election sure" (2 Peter 1:10). In this area Jesus' statements are among the most direct. He said, for example, "All men will hate you because of me, but he who stands firm to the end will be saved" (Matt. 10:22). We are able to stand firm only because God perseveres with us. But it is also true that we must stand firm. In fact, the final perseverance of believers is the only ultimate proof that they have been chosen by God and have truly been born again.

The Christian doctrine of perseverance does not lead to a false assurance or presumption, though some who claim to be saved do presume on God by their sinful lifestyles and willful disobedience.

Perseverance does not make us lazy.

Perseverance does not make us proud.

No, the real doctrine of perseverance is precisely what Paul declares it to be in Romans 8: that those whom God has foreknown and predestinated to be conformed to the likeness of his Son will indeed come to that great consummation. They will be harassed and frequently tempted. Often they will fall. Nevertheless, in the end they will be with Jesus and will be like him, because this is the destiny that God in his sovereign and inexplicable love has predetermined for them.

The Problem Passages

However, it is not possible to present this doctrine, even in the context of an exposition of Romans 8, without dealing with some of the biblical passages that seem to contradict it. These passages trouble some Christians and are often in their minds when they hear the security of the believer mentioned. Perhaps they trouble you.

Consider, for example, Hebrews 6:4-6, which says, "It is impossible for those who have once been enlightened, who have tasted the heavenly gift, who have shared in the Holy Spirit, who have tasted the goodness of the word of God and the powers of the coming age, if they fall away, to be brought back to repentance...." Doesn't that imply that those who are saved can be lost?

Or what about 2 Peter 2:1-2? "But there were also false prophets among the people, just as there will be false teachers among you. They will secretly introduce destructive heresies, even denying the sovereign Lord who bought them—bringing swift destruction on themselves. Many will follow their shameful ways...." Doesn't that say that people who have been redeemed by Christ can later deny him and thus fall away and perish?

Or what about Paul's words in 1 Corinthians 9:27? "I beat my body and make it my slave so that after I have preached to others, I myself will not be disqualified for the prize." Are believers subject to "disqualification"?

Or what about the four kinds of soil in Jesus' parable in Matthew 13? Some of the seed springs up quickly, but later it is scorched by the sun or else is choked by weeds. It perishes.

Or what about the five foolish virgins of Matthew 25? They are waiting for the bridegroom's coming, but because they went away to get oil and were not actually there when he came they were excluded from the wedding banquet.

I am sure you can add your own "problem" texts to these suggestions.

It is important to wrestle with these passages, of course, and not merely dismiss them with some glib statement of "once saved, always saved." Otherwise we will indeed be presuming, and we will miss the very important warnings the texts convey. However, a careful examination of these passages will show that although they can be said to put a proper hedge around perseverance, lest we presume upon it or take it lightly, they do not contradict the doctrine.

Three Categories

How do we approach these difficulties? Martyn Lloyd-Jones does it at great length in more than one hundred pages of careful argument in the second of two volumes on Romans 8. I do not want to take that much space to do the identical thing here. Those who want to examine the matter in greater detail can use the Welsh preacher's work. However, Lloyd-Jones is helpful for us in that he puts the problem texts I have been introducing into a few manageable categories and treats them in that way. In a much briefer manner, I want to follow his procedure. Category 1: Passages that seem to suggest that we can "fall away" from grace.

This category contains the most difficult and most frequently cited passages. Therefore, it is the one we need to explore at greatest length.

The first passage is the one in which the phrase "fallen away from grace" occurs, Galatians 5:4. An examination of the context shows that what Paul is addressing is the problem of false teaching that had been introduced into the Galatian churches by a party of legalistic Jews who were insisting that circumcision and other Jewish practices had to be followed if the believers in Galatia were truly to be saved. Here the contrast with grace is law, and the apostle is saying that if the believers should allow themselves to be seduced by this false teaching, they will have been led away from grace into legalism. This is not the same thing as saying that they will have lost their salvation, though the doctrine of the legalists was indeed a false doctrine by which nobody could be saved. Paul's argument is that the Galatian Christians should "stand firm" in the liberty Christ had given them and not become "burdened again by a yoke of slavery" (Gal. 5:1).

The parable of the four kinds of soil also falls into this category of problem texts. Does it teach that it is possible for a person to be genuinely born again and then fall away and be lost, either because of the world's scorching persecutions or its materialistic entanglements? The image we have of young plants suggests this, since the plants in the story obviously do have life. But if we examine Jesus' own explanation of the story, we will see that he makes a distinction between a person who only "hears" the word and a person who "hears the word and understands it" (Matt. 13:19, 23). The one who merely hears may receive the word he does not actually understand "with joy" and thus seem to be saved. But "he has no root" in him, which he proves by lasting "only a short time." Those who understand and thus have the root of genuine life in them show it by their endurance and fruit.

Jesus' point, since the parable concerns the preaching of the gospel in this age, is that not all preaching of the word will be blessed by God to the saving of those who hear it. Only some will be converted.

Another passage that falls in this category of problem texts is the story of the five wise and five foolish virgins. This is a disturbing parable because it teaches that there will be people within the visible church who have been invited to the marriage supper, profess Jesus as their Lord and Savior, and actually seem to be waiting for his promised return, but who are nevertheless lost at the end. It is meant to be disturbing. But if we compare it with the other parables in the same chapter—the parable of the talents and the parable of the sheep and the goats—it is clear that Jesus is saying only that in the church many who are not genuinely born again will pass for believers, until the end. It is only at the final judgment, when the Lord returns, that those who are truly saved and those who only profess to be saved will be differentiated.

The most difficult of the passages that seem to suggest that believers can fall away from grace is 2 Peter 2:1-2, which refers to people "denying the sovereign Lord who bought them." This sounds as if Peter is describing people who, having been redeemed by Jesus and having believed in him, later deny him and fall away.

We should be warned against this misunderstanding by the way the chapter continues. Then we see that Peter is actually speaking of people who have learned about Jesus Christ and have even escaped a considerable amount of the external pollution of the world by having the high standards of the Christian life taught to them, but who have repudiated this teaching in order to return to the world's corruption, which they actually love. Peter rather crudely compares them to "a dog" [that] returns to its vomit" and "a sow that is washed" but nevertheless goes back to "her wallowing in the mud" (v. 22). The reason they do this is because their inner nature is unchanged. They may have been cleaned up externally, but like the Pharisees, their insides are still full of corruption. These are the people who deny the Lord who bought them.

But how can Peter say that Jesus "bought" them? As I say, this is a difficult text and has proved so for many commentators. But the answer seems to be that Peter is also thinking of an external purchase or deliverance here. Since he begins by speaking of those who were false prophets among the people of Israel, what he seems to be saying is that just as they were beneficiaries of the deliverance of the nation from Egypt but were nevertheless not true followers of God, so there will be people like this within the churches. They will seem to have been purchased by Christ and will show outward signs of such deliverance, but they will still be false prophets and false professors.

None of these passages teach that salvation can be lost. They are either referring to something else, like falling from grace into legalism, or they are teaching that those who merely make an external profession of faith, however orthodox or holy they may seem, will fall away. As John writes in his first letter, "They went out from us, but they did not really belong to us. For if they had belonged to us, they would have remained with us; but their going showed that none of them belonged to us" (1 John 2:19).

There are a large number of verses in this category, but they are much alike and therefore do not each require separate treatment. For example, there is Philippians 2:12: "... continue to work out your salvation with fear and trembling." And 2 Peter 1:10: "Therefore, my brothers, be all the more eager to make your calling and election sure. For if you do these things, you will never fail." And also Hebrews 6:4-6, "It is impossible for those who have once been enlightened, who have tasted the heavenly gift, who have shared in the Holy Spirit, who have tasted the goodness of the word of God and the powers of the coming age, if they fall away, to be brought back to repentance."

This last passage, which I have already mentioned, is particularly troubling to many. So let me begin with it. One observation is that even if the text does indirectly teach that a Christian can fall away and be lost, its specific teaching would be that such a person could thereafter never be saved a second time "because [they would be] crucifying the Son of God all over again" (v. 6). Few would want to accept that. So even those who do not believe in eternal security need to find another, better interpretation.

In this case, the answer is in the entire thrust of Hebrews, which was written to Jews who had been exposed to Christianity and had even seemed to accept it somewhat, to go on to full faith and not to draw back again into Judaism. Everything in the book points in this direction. So this "problem" passage is actually talking about people who might have had a taste of Christianity but who fall away without ever actually becoming true Christians. If this has happened, they cannot come back, because in a certain sense they have been inoculated against Christianity.

However, the real situation emerges in verse 9, where the author of the book writes, "Even though we speak like this, dear friends, we are confident of better things in your case—things that accompany salvation." In other words, the author considered his readers to be genuine believers, which meant that, in his opinion, they would not draw back but would go on to embrace the fullness of the doctrines of the faith, as he is urging them to do.

The other verses—Philippians 2:12 and 2 Peter 1:10—are not nearly so difficult. They merely remind us of what I said earlier: that the fact of God's perseverance with us does not suggest that somehow we do not have to persevere, too. We do. In fact, it is because God is persevering with us that we will persevere. Remember that Philippians 2:12, which tells us to "work out" our salvation, is immediately followed by verse 13, which says, "for it is God who works in you to will and to act according to his good purpose." That is, God gives us the desire and then enables us to achieve what he desires. Category 3: Warning passages.

The final category of problem passages contains warnings, like Romans 11:20-21: "... Do not be arrogant, but be afraid. For if God did not spare the natural branches, he will not spare you either." Or Hebrews 2:1-3, which urges us to "pay more careful attention... to what we have heard" and ends with "How shall we escape if we ignore such a great salvation?" Or 1 Corinthians 9:27, where Paul issues a warning to himself: "... so that after I have preached to others, I myself will not be disqualified for the prize."

The reason for these passages is that we need warnings from God in order to persevere. Or, to put it in other language, they are one of the ways God has to ensure our perseverance. The proof of this is seen in the different ways unbelievers and believers react to them. Do the problem verses I have cited as "warnings" trouble unbelievers? Not at all. Either they regard them as mere foolishness and something hardly to be noticed, or they take them in a straightforward manner but assume that their lives are all right and that the verses therefore do not concern them. It is only believers who are troubled, because they are concerned about their relationships with God and do not want to presume that all is well with their souls when it may not be.

These passages provoke us to higher levels of commitment and greater godliness, which is what they are given for. And even this should encourage us. As Martyn Lloyd-Jones says, "To be concerned and troubled about the state of our soul when we read passages such as these is in and of itself evidence that we are sensitive to God's Word and to his Spirit, that we have spiritual life in us."

God's Plan and God's Glory

As I said at the beginning of this study, I have taken a great deal of time to discuss these "problem passages" because I know that they loom large in the minds of Christian people whenever the doctrine of perseverance is discussed. And rightly so. We need to consider them carefully. But there is a danger in such close examination, for then we may give the impression that the related texts are all on the problem side and that there are very few passages that teach eternal security. That is not true, of course, even though in this study I will not balance my treatment of the problems with an equal number of passages on the positive side.

There are many such texts. I am sure you know some of them. There are two in the words of the Lord himself: "My sheep listen to my voice; I know them, and they follow me. I give them eternal life, and they shall never perish; no one can snatch them out of my hand" (John 10:2728).

"And this is the will of him who sent me, that I shall lose none of all that he has given me, but raise them up at the last day" (John 6:39).

There are also the confident words of Paul that "he who began a good work in you will carry it on to completion until the day of Jesus Christ"

(Phil. 1:6). And, of course, Romans 8:31-39, the end of the chapter:

What, then, shall we say in response to this? If God is for us, who can be against us? He who did not spare his own Son, but gave him up for us all—how will he not also, along with him, graciously give us all things? Who will bring any charge against those whom God has chosen? It is God who justifies. Who is he that condemns? Christ Jesus, who died—more than that, who was raised to life—is at the right hand of God and is also interceding for us. Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall trouble or hardship or persecution or famine or nakedness or danger or sword? As it is written:

No, in all these things we are more than conquerors through him who loved us. For I am convinced that neither death nor life, neither angels nor demons, neither the present nor the future, nor any powers, neither height nor depth, nor anything else in all creation, will be able to separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus our Lord.

Why will we persevere? We will persevere because this is God's plan for us, and the end of it all will be God's glory.

Chapter 115.
Five Unanswerable Questions

Romans 8:31-36

Anyone who has studied the Bible with care knows that there are times when we come to some soaring pinnacle of revelation and are left nearly breathless by the view. This is what happens when we come to the last great paragraph of Romans 8. Commentators have called these verses a "hymn of assurance," "a triumph song," "the highest plateau in the whole of divine revelation." But these accolades are surely all too weak. This is a mountaintop paragraph. It is the Everest of the letter and thus the highest peak in the highest Himalayan range of Scripture.

I love the mountains, and some of my very best memories are linked to them. I remember a time some years ago, when my children were all young and our family was spending several weeks above Lake Geneva, near Montreux in Switzerland. There is a cable car there that takes people up a great massif called the Rocher de Nez, and on more than one occasion we went up the lift and spent many hours walking through the flower-filled meadows of the high Alpine slopes. Once on a perfect summer day we sat balanced on a ridge, looking off across the ranges and down into a valley where the cows were grazing, listening to the sonorous bells of the feeding herd and the chirping of the many birds—and reading Heidi, of course. One never forgets such experiences. I will never forget that day.

It is something like that to come to Romans 8:31-39. We have made our way up the steep ascent of doctrine in the first half of this great letter. We are able to look out over the beautiful but somewhat lower vistas of the book's second half. Yet now, for the time being, we are on the peak, and the experience is glorious.

John R. W. Stott has given me the title for this study, for in his short treatment of Romans 5-8, he speaks of "five undeniable affirmations" followed by "five unanswerable questions." We have already looked at the undeniable affirmations. They are five words: foreknown, predestined, called, justified, and glorified. Now we are to look at the questions.

Strictly speaking, there are seven questions in these verses, two each in verses 31 and 35, and one each in verses 32, 33, and 34. But the first question is not really part of the set. It is a formula Paul has for moving from exposition to the conclusion of an argument; we have already seen it several times in the letter. It means, "In light of what I have been teaching, what conclusions follow?" And the last two questions (in verse 35) are actually part of the same inquiry. So there are five main questions in all. These five questions concern things that might be imagined to be able to defeat God's plan for us or harm us. But each is unanswerable, because there is nothing that can have this effect.

John Stott says, "The apostle hurls these questions out into space, as it were, defiantly, triumphantly, challenging any creature in heaven or earth or hell to answer them or to deny the truth that is contained in them. But there is no answer, for nobody and nothing can harm the redeemed people of God."

These questions alone make this a mountaintop paragraph.

"Who Can Be Against Us?"

The first question is in verse 31: "If God is for us, who can be against us?" Taken by itself, the second half of this question is not at all unanswerable. Who can be against us? Why, many people and many things, of course! And not only can they be against us, they are. Theology has spoken of three great enemies of the Christian: the world, the flesh, and the devil. The world is against us because Christianity is an offense to it and is opposed to its God-rebelling ways. The world will get us to conform if it can; failing that, it will try to do us in. Our flesh is also an enemy because it contains the seeds of sin within it; we are unable to escape its baleful influence in this life. And, as if that were not enough, we have a powerful enemy in Satan, who is described by the apostle Peter as "a roaring lion looking for someone to devour" (1 Peter 5:8).

Yes, there are plenty of enemies out there who are against us, and there is even an enemy within. But what are these when they are put into a sentence containing the verse's first half, "If God is for us..."?

That is it, you see. I am sure you recognize that the word if in this sentence does not imply any doubt, for Paul has just banished doubt in the passage before this. He has shown how God has set his love upon us, predetermining that we are to be conformed to the likeness of his own beloved Son. Then, having made the predetermination, he has called, justified, and glorified us. In this verse "if means "since"—"since God is for us"—and that makes the difference.

It is as if Paul is challenging us to place all the possible enemies we can think of on one-half of an old-fashioned balance scale, as if we were weighing peanuts. Then, when we have all the peanuts assembled on the scale, he throws an anvil onto the other side of the balance. That side comes crashing down, and the peanuts are scattered. "If God is for us, who can be against us?" Who can stand against God? The answer is "nobody." Nothing can defeat us if the Almighty God of the universe is on our side.

"How Will He Not Also...?"

"Ah," someone says, "but that is assuming that God himself does not change. Nothing can stand against God, true enough. But what if God should grow weary of us, forget about us, and move on to something else?" Paul deals with this speculation in verse 32, asking, "He who did not spare his own Son, but gave him up for us all—how will he not also, along with him, graciously give us all things?"

Each of these five questions is unanswerable because each is grounded upon some undeniable truth, as we will see, and the undeniable truth in this verse is that God has given us his Son. If Paul had merely asked, "Will God give us all things?" we might hesitate to answer, for how could we be confident he will? He has given us much, to be sure. But all things? Wouldn't we be right to think that even God might have limits to his grace and generosity? That might be reasonable were it not for the fact that God has already given us his Son. Jesus Christ, the divine Son of God, is the greatest thing God had to give. Yet he gave him—and not merely to be with us in some mystical way. He gave him over to death so that we might be rescued from the judgment due us for our sins.

Paul is challenging us to look at the cross and reason as follows: If God did that for us, sending his own Son, Jesus, to die in our place, is there anything he can possibly be imagined to withhold?

Some years ago a Bible teacher was speaking to a group of children, and he said that he would give a prize of ten dollars to anyone who could think of a promise that God might have made to us that he has not already made. The teacher might as well have offered a billion dollars, as he said, because our text tells us that God has already guaranteed us "all things" since he has not withheld his Son. The verse is a blank check for our true needs.

For example, we need strength to overcome temptation. By ourselves, we cannot resist temptations to sin. Will God give the strength we need to overcome it? Of course. Paul says elsewhere, "No temptation has seized you except what is common to man. And God is faithful; he will not let you be tempted above what you can bear..." (1 Cor. 10:13).

We also need a friend to be with us through life's dark places, so we will not despair and lose hope. Will God be a friend to us? Of course he will. Jesus said, "I no longer call you servants, because a servant does not know his master's business. Instead, I have called you friends..." (John 15:15); "And surely I am with you always, to the very end of the age" (Matt. 28:20).

Do we need direction for how we are to live and how we are to please God? God will provide that direction. God says, "I will instruct you and teach you in the way you should go" (Ps. 32:8a).

Do we need comfort when we have lost a loved one? God is the only sure source of comfort.

Will God be with us in death's dark hour? Of course. He will sustain us in death and bring us joyfully into his glorious presence at the last. The Bible says, "Precious in the sight of the LORD is the death of his saints" (Ps. 116:15). And lest we somehow think that some important need of ours has been overlooked, we remember Paul's words to the Philippians, spoken under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit: "And my God will meet all your needs according to his glorious riches in Christ Jesus" (Phil. 4:19).

Clearly, if God gave us Jesus, the greatest of all possible gifts, he can be counted on to give us all the lesser gifts. As John Stott says, "The cross proves [God's] generosity."

"Who Will Bring Any Charge?"

The third of these questions moves into the legal area, as if we were now in a court of law, asking whether someone might exist somewhere to accuse us and thus bring us into final spiritual condemnation. The question is in verse 33, "Who will bring any charge against those whom God has chosen?" Who could do that, Paul queries, since "it is God who justifies"?

Do you remember that great scene in the writings of the minor prophet Zechariah in which the high priest of that day, whose name was Joshua, is seen standing in the temple, no doubt preparing to present the people's sacrifice, and Satan is also there accusing him? Joshua is dressed in filthy clothes, symbolizing his sin. The devil is arguing that Joshua is unfit for his office, because he is a sinner. But God is also there, and he rebukes Satan through an angel, who says: "The LORD rebuke you, Satan! The LORD, who has chosen Jerusalem, rebuke you! Is not this man a burning stick snatched from the fire?" (Zech. 3:2). Then we are told how Joshua's filthy clothes are removed and how he is clothed with rich garments and a clean turban, symbols of his justification through the work of Jesus Christ. Who could accuse him now? The answer is clear: "No one, no one at all." Because God has justified him.

This is the picture conjured up by Paul's question. Apart from the work of God in Christ there would be many to condemn us—the devil, of course, and others, even our own hearts. But consider Paul's counter: "It is God who justifies," indeed, has justified us (see v. 30). Who could possibly secure our condemnation when we have already been acquitted by the highest court of all?

"Who Is He That Condemns?"

The fourth question is so closely related to the third that some have considered them to be asking the same thing. Yet there is a difference, as I will now explain.

Paul had earlier asked whether the good purposes of God toward us could change, concluding that they could not, since God has already given us Jesus, the greatest of all gifts (v. 32). Now Paul seems to go a step further, asking whether the attitude of Jesus could change. Verse 34 asks the question: "Who is he that condemns?" It answers, "Christ Jesus, who died—more than that, who was raised to life—is at the right hand of God and is also interceding for us."

The Bible teaches this truth in a striking image, using the word paraclete (or lawyer) for both the Holy Spirit and Jesus. A paraclete is "one called alongside another to help," which is also the exact meaning of the word advocate, the only difference being that one is derived from Greek and the other from Latin. Jesus used this word of the Holy Spirit when he told the disciples that he was going to send the Holy Spirit to them to be their Counselor (John 16:5-15), and John used the term to speak of Jesus himself, saying that in him we have an "advocate" (KJV) who "speaks to the Father in our defense" (1 John 2:1). This is a picture of a divine law firm with two branches, a heavenly office and an earthly one. On earth the Holy Spirit pleads for us, interpreting our petitions correctly. In heaven the Lord Jesus Christ pleads the efficacy of his shed blood to show that we are saved persons and that nothing can rise up to cause our condemnation by God.

"Who Shall Separate Us from... Christ?"

The final, all-embracing, and climactic question is in verse 35: "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?" and the development of the answer carries us to the chapter's end.

John Stott writes:

With this fifth and last question, Paul himself does what we have been trying to do with his other four questions. He looks round for a possible answer. He brings forward all the adversaries he can think of, which might be thought to separate us from Christ's love. We may have to endure "tribulation," "distress" and "persecution"—that is, the pressures of an ungodly world. We may have to undergo "famine" and "nakedness"—that is, the lack of adequate food and clothing, which, since Jesus promised them to the heavenly Father's children, might seem to be evidence that God does not care. We may even have to experience "peril" and "sword"—that is, the danger of death and actual death, by the malice of men; martyrdom, the ultimate test of our faith. It is a real test, too, because (v. 36) the Scripture warns us in Psalm 44:22 that God's people are for his sake "being killed all the day long." That is, they are continuously being exposed to the risk of death, like sheep for the slaughter.

These are adversities indeed. They are real sufferings, painful and perilous, and hard to bear. But can they separate us from the love of Christ? No! Verse 37: far from separating us from Christ's love, "in all these things"—in these very sufferings, in the experience and endurance of them— "we are more than conquerors."

What Do You Say?

These five questions are so important that we are going to return to them and study them in detail in the next few studies, much as we returned to the "five undeniable affirmations" in verses 29 and 30, after having looked at them more generally. But before we do that I want to return to the question I separated out at the beginning, namely, the introductory question: "What, then, shall we say in response to this?" (v. 31a).

Paul asks this summary question in a plural form, "What shall we say?", including everybody to whom he is writing. But I want to ask it in the singular. I want to ask it of you: "What do you say to these things? What is your response?"

This question is a divisive one, in the sense that it very clearly separates believers from unbelievers. Ask this question of a person who is not a Christian, and you will get one of two responses. One possibility is that the person will be utterly indifferent to the question and to the doctrines of God's grace that lie behind it. That is, he couldn't care less about the answer, because he thinks the whole thing is utter foolishness. Or else the person will respond with hostility: "Who are you to think that God has shown such special favor to you? To actually send Jesus to die for you and then promise to keep you through all the problems of this life and take you to heaven? What amazing arrogance!" If you talk about the Christian faith to unbelievers, I am sure you have met with both these responses.

But what is the case with Christians? Their response is quite different. They rejoice in what God has done for them.

I admit that there are Christians who are confused about these teachings and some who are timid. They are afraid to be too strong when talking about God's keeping power with his saints, believing that an emphasis on perseverance is dangerous. "Won't it cause people to grow careless about their faith?" they wonder. It does not, of course. But even though some are confused and some are timid, I maintain that there is nevertheless an enormous gulf between Christians' responses and the responses of those who are yet in their sins.

The heart of the believer warms to these truths, cautiously perhaps, but nevertheless responding with joy. For within all who truly know Christ there is the conviction that his is indeed a great love; that his love for us is the very foundation of our salvation; and that, because his is a divine love, all Christians can be assured that his love for us will never be shaken, weaken, vary, fluctuate, or change. On the contrary, believers know that the love of God in Christ is the greatest reality in the universe. It is the strongest, most steady, firm, unbending, solid, substantial, constant, uniform, dependable thing of all.

So I ask, "What do you say in response to these affirmations?" Do they strike a harmonious note within you? If so, it is proof that God has been at work in your life, bringing you out of darkness into his marvelous light. If these doctrines do not seem appealing to you—if they do not seem true or if you regard them with indifference—I warn you that you are not a Christian, that you do not know the Lord Jesus Christ in a saving way. I present him to you as your Savior. I challenge you to repent of your sin and turn to him.

It is this very gospel, the Good News of the fixed love of God in Jesus Christ, that is commended to you. As Paul wrote earlier in the letter, "But God demonstrates his own love for us in this:

While we were still sinners, Christ died for us" (Rom. 5:8).

God used this great doctrine of the keeping power of the love of God in Christ to save Charles Haddon Spurgeon, one of the most powerful evangelists who ever lived. He became a Christian when he was only fifteen years of age. But he had already noticed that friends of his, who had begun life well, had made a wreck of their lives by falling into gross vices. Spurgeon feared that he might fall into them, too. In later years he explained his thinking: "Whatever good resolutions I might make, the probabilities were they would be good for nothing when temptation assailed me. I might be like those of whom it has been said, 'They see the devil's hook and yet cannot help nibbling at his bait.'" Spurgeon feared that he would disgrace himself and be lost.

It was then that he heard that Jesus will keep his saints from falling and will bring them safely to heaven. The doctrine had a particular charm for him, and he found himself saying, "If I go to Jesus and get from him a new heart and a right spirit, I shall be secured against these temptations into which others have fallen. I shall be preserved by him." It was this truth, with others, that brought C. H. Spurgeon to the Savior.

"What do you say to these things?" This is a divisive question, as I said. But it is a decisive one too, and I urge you to decide. May God give you grace to respond to the message in faith and with joy.

Chapter 116.
Enduring Love

Romans 8:32

John Calvin always expressed himself beautifully and frequently with great power. He has done both in his comments on Romans 8:31:

"'If God is for us, who is against us?' "This is the chief and therefore the only support to sustain us in every temptation. If God is not propitious to us, no sure confidence can be conceived, even though everything should smile upon us. On the other hand, however, his favor alone is a sufficiently great consolation for every sorrow, and a sufficiently strong protection against all the storms of misfortune."

The great Reformer then cites a number of Bible texts in which believers dare to despise every earthly danger because of trusting God alone.

Psalm 23:4. "Even though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for you are with me."

Psalm 56:11. "In God I will trust; I will not be afraid. What can man do to me?"

Psalm 3:6. "I will not fear the tens of thousands drawn up against me on every side." Calvin then concludes, "There is no power under heaven or above it which can resist the arm of God."

That is all very true, and it is what the apostle Paul wants us to conclude as the result of Romans
8:31, the first verse of the great defiant paragraph that concludes the eighth chapter. But a new question arises in our minds: Granted that nothing can be against us if God is for us, but is God really for us? How can we know that the great God of the universe is actually on our side?

Perhaps he is too busy to care about us.

Maybe we are too insignificant for him to give us even a second thought.

What if our sins have caused him to regret that he brought us into being in the first place?

Paul has no doubts along any of these lines, of course. But lest we do, he follows his first question with a second one, which is meant to blow these fearful musings to the winds: "He who did not spare his own Son, but gave him up for us all—how will he not also, along with him, graciously give us all things?" (v. 32). The verse means: We can know that God is for us and will be for us always because he has already given us his Son.

Facts Not Emotions

I want to examine Paul's statement in some detail because, like each of these great questions and statements, it is vitally important. But before I do, it is also important to notice what Paul does not say. If Paul were one of our contemporary Bible teachers or modern theologians, he might answer our doubts by saying, "You do not need to worry about the future, because God loves you. God is love."

That would be true, of course. In fact, that is the ultimate affirmation of this paragraph: Nothing in heaven or earth or "in all creation, will be able to separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus our Lord" (v. 39). But Paul was a pastor, and he knew well that we can all easily doubt such statements, particularly when life becomes difficult. "All right," we may say, "I grant that God is love. But does he love me? How can I believe he loves me when I have lost my job, when my husband [or wife] has left me for someone else, when I have been diagnosed with an incurable disease? In fact, even when things go well, there are times when I just do not feel that God loves me or even that he cares about me at all."

Paul knew that mere assurances that God loves us are not effective. So, instead of dealing with our doubts on the emotional level—which is what "God loves you" does—he turns from emotional experience to sure facts. According to this verse, we can know that God is for us, not because we somehow sense that it is his nature to be loving, but because he has given us his Son to die for us. That is, we can know God's nature because of what he has already done in human history.

Actually, that is what Paul also does in verse 39, which I said was the ultimate affirmation of this paragraph. He says that nothing in heaven or earth or "in all creation, will be able to separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus our Lord." But notice that even there, where he is speaking explicitly of God's love, it is nevertheless the love of God that is "in Christ Jesus our Lord." This is a way of saying that it is only in Christ and through the work of Christ that we can know and be assured of God's love.

Someone has noted rightly that there is hardly a verse in the Bible that speaks of God's love that does not also, either explicitly or by inference, speak of the cross of Christ or the atonement.

What Hath God Wrought?

The cross of Christ is so important to Paul that he will present various aspects of it in this and the next two verses. Yet Paul's purpose here is not to develop a theory of the atonement; he has done that already in Romans 3. His immediate purpose is to remind us of the factual elements of the atonement so that we will know that God is truly on our side.

What facts does he tell us in this verse?

1. That this is God's action; God has done it. This is the kind of point that is easy to pass over and not even think about. But it is actually extremely important, and a failure to see it leads to errors. I will present two of them.

The first error is made by people who think of the atonement as something accomplished by a loving Jesus to change the mind of God, who is imagined to be angry. To this way of thinking, God is ready to condemn us, but Jesus enters the picture to plead for us. "I love these people," he says. "Look, I am dying for them, in their place. Spare them for my sake." So God, who initially is reluctant or hostile, eventually agrees. "All right," he says. "I'll do it since you seem to care so much."

That is a travesty of what happened, of course. For whenever we read the Bible we find from beginning to end that the salvation of sinners by the death of Jesus is God's idea, that he, to use theological language, is the author or source of our salvation. Think of Isaiah 53:4:

> Surely he took up our infirmities and carried our sorrows, > yet we considered him stricken by God, smitten by him, and afflicted.

The point of the verse, as emphasized by the added italics, is that God was responsible for Jesus's death. Isaiah makes the same point two verses further on, in verse 6.

> We all, like sheep, have gone astray, each of us has turned to his own way; > and the Lord has laid on him the iniquity of us all.

Isaiah 53:6 is one of the clearest statements of substitutionary atonement in the Bible, but it is no less a statement of the fact that God the Father conceived and carried out this plan. God was not made to love us by Christ's death. He loved us from the beginning, and it is because he loved us that Jesus died. We can easily see how important this truth is to the argument for eternal security that Paul is making.

The second error people make in thinking of Christ's death is that they see it as a result of human actions only. "What a terrible day that was, when evil, jealous men killed the best man who ever lived," they might say.

It is true that evil men conspired to do away with Jesus. But the Bible never stops there when it speaks of the atonement. Do you remember how Peter put it when he addressed the Jews of Jerusalem on Pentecost, a few bare weeks after the crucifixion? He asserted their guilt. There was no escaping that. But he said this, "This man was handed over to you by God's set purpose and foreknowledge; and you, with the help of wicked men, put him to death by nailing him to the cross" (Acts 2:23, emphasis added). They were guilty, but the important thing is that Jesus' death had been planned and was accomplished by God.

So the atonement shows that God loved us from the beginning, indeed, has always loved us. It shows that he is truly on our side.

2. That the atonement involved God's only Son. The second point of fact Paul makes in verse 32 is that the atonement involved God's one and only Son. This teaches a number of things, one of them being Jesus' full deity. Indeed, this is basic to what comes next. For it is his being divine that gives the death of Jesus its full force and meaning. If Jesus were only another human being, his death would have no more value or significance than that of any other human being, a great example perhaps, but certainly not an atonement. It is because Jesus is the unique Son of God and therefore both holy and of infinite value that his death can be a true atonement for our sin.

John the Baptist introduced Jesus by saying, "Look, the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world!" (John 1:29). This is important, too, because it adds something to the first statement. Showing that God is the author of our salvation points out that God has always been disposed to love us; indeed, he has loved us from eternity. But if that is all that can be said, a question would immediately arise: But how much does he love us? We, too, often love, though not well. Our love weakens. Could it be that God is like us in love, that he loves but not a whole lot—not enough to actually see us through all life's difficulties?

The answer, of course, is that God loves with an intensity and affection infinitely surpassing ours. And we know this because he has given us his own Son, his one and only Son. Jesus is the greatest gift God had to give. There is nothing in all the universe more precious to God than his Son and nothing greater than God's Son. So when God gave Jesus, he proved the greatness of his love by the most precious gift of all.

> The guilty pair, bowed down with care, God gave his Son to win.
> His erring child he reconciled and rescued from his sin.
> O love of God, how rich and pure, how measureless and strong.
> It shall forevermore endure, the saints' and angels' song.
> F. M. Lehman, 1917

3. That God spared him not. The third assertion in this verse carries us a step beyond even what we have seen so far, for it tells us that God "did not spare" Jesus. He could have spared him, but he did not.

Almost everyone who writes on this verse carefully recognizes that it contains a strong reference to the story of Abraham's near sacrifice of his son Isaac on Mount Moriah. This is because the Septuagint (Greek) translation of the Old Testament uses the Greek word for "spared" that is found in Romans 8:32 to translate one of God's words to Abraham following the patriarch's amazing obedience to God's command to sacrifice his son. The New International Version translates it as "withheld" in the Genesis text, but it is the same word. God said, "... because you have done this and have not withheld [spared] your son, your only son, I will surely bless you and make your descendants as numerous as the stars in the sky and as the sand on the seashore..." (Gen. 22:16-17).

The irony of the story, however, is that although Abraham was obedient to God up to the point of actually raising the knife to kill his son—that is, he did not spare him—God intervened to accomplish just that. God did spare Isaac, though Abraham was willing not to do so.

But the story also illustrates, and undoubtedly was also used by God to teach Abraham, that one day God literally would not spare his own Son but would allow him to die in order that Isaac and Abraham and all other believers down through the long ages of human history might be spared. Jesus is the only one who has ever deserved to be spared. Certainly none of us do. But by refusing to spare his Son, God spared us so that we might be saved and come to spend an eternity in glory with him. Somehow God taught that to Abraham on Mount Moriah, which is why Abraham named the place Jehovah Jireh, "The Lord Will Provide" (Gen. 22:14). God provided for us by giving up Jesus.

4. That God delivered up Jesus for us. This brings us to the fourth of the statements Paul has tucked into this single verse about the actions of God the Father in saving us through Jesus' death on > Calvary. The previous statement was negative: "He did not spare his own Son." This statement is positive: "but gave him up for us all." It is a way of making the point more emphatic.

What does the statement mean when it says that God "gave him up" for us all? It means that God delivered him to death, of course. Jesus died, whereas Isaac did not have to die on Mount Moriah. But it is not just physical death that is meant here. This death was a spiritual death, involving a temporary separation from the Father when Jesus was made sin for us and actually bore the wrath of God against sin in our place. Do you remember the agony of the Lord Jesus Christ in the Garden of Gethsemane? Jesus prayed that "this cup" might be taken from him and in his grief sweat, as it were, great drops of blood (Luke 22:39-44). Later on the cross he prayed, "My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?" (Matt. 27:46). This was not a man shrinking from mere physical death. If it were, Socrates would be a better model for us than Jesus. Instead, it was the horror of the holy, eternal Son of God as he faced the experience of being made sin for us and of bearing the wrath of separation from the love of God in our place. He was delivered up so that we might be spared. He bore the wrath of God so that we might never have to bear it. D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones writes:

Such, then, is the measure of God's love, and it is the only adequate measure of a love which is "beyond measure." How pathetic and hopeless is the position of people who think that they safeguard the love of God by denying the substitutionary theory of the atonement, who say that our Lord did not cry out in an agony, and who imagine that the measure of the love of God is that God says, "Though you have killed my Son, I still love you, and am still ready to forgive you"! They believe that they safeguard and magnify the love of God by denying the truth concerning the wrath of God, and that God must and does punish sin.... What they actually do is detract from the love of God. The love of God is only truly seen when we realize that "He spared not his own Son"....

It is in such an action that you see the love of God. He loved such as we are, and to such an extent, that for us he punished his only Son, did not spare him anything, "delivered him up for us all," and poured upon him the final dregs of his wrath against sin and evil, and the guilt involved in it all.

From the Greater to the Lesser

At this point it is easy to see how Paul's argument wraps up. For, having reminded us of the greater truth, indeed the greatest truth of all, the apostle insists that the lesser will certainly follow from it. It is like saying, "If a rich benefactor has given you a million dollars, he will certainly not withhold a quarter if you need it for a parking meter."

"He who did not spare his own Son, but gave him up for us all—how will he not also, along with him, graciously give us all things?" What are these "all things" Paul mentions? Well, all things, of course! Still, we have to understand this in the context of the terms Paul has been using. It does not mean all material things, as if Paul were promising that we would be rich. Or even good health necessarily. It is rather along the line of verse 28, which says that "in all things God works for the good of those who love him, who have been called according to his purpose." It means that God will overrule everything for our benefit, so that even evil will somehow be worked into God's great purpose, which is to make us like Jesus.

Whatever your circumstances, whatever trials, whatever pains, whatever persecutions, whatever hardships—God will use all of these things to make you like Jesus. Beyond that, he will provide all true necessities for your growth in holiness and perseverance in faith until the very end.

Love That Will Not Let Go

I want to end with a great hymn written by a Scottish minister of the last century whose name was George Matheson. He lived from 1842 to 1906. Matheson was blind, having lost his sight in his early youth, and his blindness gives great power and pathos to the words of the hymn, which clearly refer to it. But the occasion for the hymn was not the blindness but, in his own words, some "extreme mental distress," which had brought him great "pain." The story that grew up around this hymn, that his fiancee left Matheson when he lost his sight, seems to be unfounded. Nevertheless, something happened, something so painful that he never related it to anyone.

Matheson wrote this hymn on the evening of June 6, 1882, when he was alone in the manse in Inellen, Scotland, his family having all gone to Glasgow for his sister's wedding.

O Love that wilt not let me go,
I rest my weary soul in thee;
I give thee back the life I owe,
That in thine ocean depths its flow
May richer, fuller be.
O Light that followest all my way,
I yield my flickering torch to thee;
My heart restores its borrowed ray,
That in thy sunshine's blaze its day
May brighter, fairer be.

O Joy that seekest me through pain,
I cannot close my heart to thee;
I trace the rainbow through the rain,
And feel the promise is not vain
That morn shall tearless be.
O Cross that liftest up my head,
I dare not ask to fly from thee;
I lay in dust life's glory dead,
And from the ground there blossoms red
Life that shall endless be.

No one can read those lines without knowing that George Matheson knew the love of God in Christ Jesus and was assured that, whatever his circumstances might be, "he who did not spare his own Son, but gave him up for us all" would surely "along with him, graciously give us all things."

Christian, reason it out. Do not be double-minded in your spiritual understanding. Know that God is working out all things for your good and that he will surely keep on doing so until the end.

Chapter 117.
Our Perfect Salvation

Romans 8:33

We have been dealing with the last full paragraph of Romans 8, and the focus of our discussion is the five unanswerable questions it contains. We have looked at two of these already: (1) "If God is for us, who can be against us?" and (2) "He who did not spare his own Son, but gave him up for us all—how will he not also, along with him, graciously give us all things?" In this study we come to the third unanswerable question.

The question asks: "Who will bring any charge against those whom God has chosen?" It is unanswerable because "it is God who justifies."

When I was writing about these five questions earlier, I pointed out that each is unanswerable because of some great spiritual truth. The truth behind the first great question is that God is for us. Therefore, "Who can be against us?" The truth in the second question is that God has already given us the best gift he could possibly have given. Therefore, "How will he not also, along with him, graciously give us all things?"

What is the truth in this third question? It is that God has justified us. No charge can be brought against those whom God has chosen if God, the supreme Judge of the entire universe, has acquitted them.

Let me state this another way. In the first question we are reminded that in God we have a Champion. In the second question we are reminded that in God we have a Benefactor. In the third question we are reminded that in God we have a Judge.

The Judge Appears

Ah, but that is just the problem. A judge? The very word triggers feelings of anxiety within us, and when we think of God as the Supreme Judge and of the fact that we must stand before him one day, our souls are rightly troubled and distressed. This thought filled the great Protestant Reformer Martin Luther with fearful contemplation, which he captured in one of his greatest hymns:

> Great God, what do I see and hear!
> The end of things created!
> The Judge of mankind doth appear
> On clouds of glory seated!
> The trumpet sounds, the graves restore
> The dead which they contained before:
> Prepare my soul to meet him.

In our day a great deal of cultural energy has been spent trying to dispel these anxieties, lest we think about the final judgment and become troubled by the prospect. We numb ourselves by banal and unending entertainment, crowd our hours with frantic activity, bolster our sagging selfimages by pop psychology and self-help programs. But in our quiet moments, if we have any, our subconscious thoughts surface to remind us that we are not what we should be, that we have willed to go astray like lost and foolish sheep, and that one day there will certainly be an accounting.

This disturbing realization is captured in a popular song by Billy Joel that says quite rightly, "I know that it'll catch up to me, somewhere along the line." We are troubled on three counts.

First, our consciences accuse us. We put on a front for other people and sometimes fool them.

We get them thinking that we are better or nicer or smarter or more godly than we actually are. But we do not do very well fooling ourselves. We know what our thoughts are in our secret moments—the lusts, angers, lies, and blasphemous ideas we harbor within. We may dull those thoughts, but we cannot escape them. This is what Paul was talking about in Romans 2:12-16, where he spoke of the final judgment day and of how even the thoughts of the heathen accuse them:

All who sin apart from the law will also perish apart from the law, and all who sin under the law will be judged by the law. For it is not those who hear the law who are righteous in God's sight, but it is those who obey the law who will be declared righteous. (Indeed, when Gentiles, who do not have the law, do by nature things required by the law, they are a law for themselves, even though they do not have the law, since they show that the requirements of the law are written on their hearts, their consciences also bearing witness, and their thoughts now accusing, now even defending them.) This will take place on the day when God will judge men's secrets through Jesus Christ, as my gospel declares.

As if it were not bad enough that our consciences accuse us, we also have Satan as our great "accuser." The Bible tells us this, in case we were not aware of it, for there he is called "the accuser of our brothers [that is, Christians], who accuses them before our God day and night" (Rev. 12:10). It is Christians whom Satan particularly accuses, for he already dominates unbelievers and does not want to awaken them to their sin.

If you are a Christian, Satan is accusing you to God. He is saying, "Did you see what John Smith did? That is no way for a Christian to act. That act is disgraceful, ungodly, secular. How can a person do that and still claim to be a Christian? How can you regard him as a Christian?"

Satan is saying, "Do you know what Mary Smith is thinking about right now? Her thoughts are unworthy of even a highly immoral woman, let alone a Christian. Aren't you ashamed of her conduct? I know I am."

Satan is saying, "I wouldn't have those people as my followers. How can you accept them? How can you have sent your Son to die for them?"

And Satan is making such accusations "day and night," according to the text in Revelation.

Yet it is not our own consciences or even Satan that really troubles us if we are at all spiritually perceptive. Rather, it is that we must stand before God, the Omniscient One, before whom all hearts are open, all desires known. That is the truly troubling prospect. That is what distressed Luther in the days before he came to understand the gospel and rejoice in what God had done for him in Jesus Christ. He used to tremble, asking himself, "How can I stand before God in the day of his judgment?" The wisdom of his age said that he could stand before God by good works. "But," said Luther, "what works can come from a heart like mine? How can I stand before the holiness of my Judge with works polluted in their very source?"

Have you never thought this way? Have you never trembled at the thought that one day you must stand before God? In our day, of course, it is quite possible that such a thought has not crossed your mind. Much of our culture is designed to keep you from contemplating that awesome happening.

If you have never thought this way, if you have never trembled for your soul in light of your sins, then I say, "God help you." How can you believe in the gospel if you have never trembled under law? How can you be comforted by a text like Romans 8:33 if you have never seen your need to be saved from sin by Jesus Christ, to be justified by God on the basis of Christ's atonement and the gift of his righteousness?

It Is God Who Justifies

I am not unfolding the meaning of this great text in Romans to bring you discomfort, of course. I do this only to awaken you to what the text says. The important thing is not merely that God, the author and accomplisher of our salvation, is our Judge. It is that this great, sovereign, and inescapable Judge has acquitted us through the work of Jesus Christ—if we have believed on Jesus Christ and trust him.

I want you to see two great things Romans 8:33 teaches us.

If you have been saved by God through the work of Jesus Christ, you are among those "whom God has chosen."

That is an interesting way of putting the statement, isn't it? Paul does not say, "Who will bring any charge against sinners?" For there are sinners whose sins are covered by the blood of Jesus Christ, and there are sinners whose sins are not covered by the blood of Christ. In the case of the latter, not only are the charges made—by their own consciences, by Satan, and by God himself— those charges stick! Those sinners are guilty, and there is no escape from the inevitable and resulting condemnation. It is only those "whom God has chosen" who will escape such sharp condemnation.

The word chosen takes us back to verses 28-30, which give the context in which the new status of "those whom God has chosen" is to be understood. Who are these persons? They are those "who have been called according to his [that is, God's] purpose" (v. 28). They are those whom "God foreknew" and "predestined to be conformed to the likeness of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brothers" (v. 29).

Using the five great words of that passage, they are those whom God "foreknew," "predestined," "called," "justified," and "glorified." What Paul is saying in our text is: How could anyone possibly bring any lasting or prevailing charge against such persons?

If you are among those whom God has chosen, it is also true that God has justified you of all sin.

It is God himself who has justified you! A few paragraphs back, I wrote that the greatest fear we have, if we think through our spiritual state carefully, is not that our consciences and/or Satan accuse us, but that the God who knows everything is our Judge. It terrifies us to consider that while we may harden our hearts or deaden our consciences and perhaps even fool Satan, we cannot avoid or fool God. It is God with whom we have to deal. Ah, but that very fact is our comfort. For if, instead of being condemned by God we are actually acquitted or justified by him, then who is left to condemn us? If we have been saved by God, who can possibly overturn God's judgment?

Do you see how this works? If we have actually been justified by God, the fact that causes us most to tremble is actually that which gives us most assurance and comfort.

Let me spell this out in a few particulars:

1. Our greatest offense is against God, however great our offenses against other persons may be. So, if God has forgiven us, we are justified indeed. David sinned against Bathsheba, with whom he committed adultery, and against her husband Uriah, whom he arranged to have killed. But in his great psalm of repentance he rightly declared to God, "Against you, you only, have I sinned and done what is evil in your sight" (Ps. 51:4a). As a consequence, he knew that if God cleansed him from his sin, he would have complete restoration. That is why he says in that same psalm, "Cleanse me with hyssop, and I will be clean; wash me, and I will be whiter than snow" (v. 7). God did cleanse him, and he was washed from his iniquity. David was justified because of Christ's righteousness.

2. God knows the law perfectly. This second important aspect of our being justified by God is rooted in the fact that the law is God's law, after all, and God, who knows that law, has justified us. Therefore, we need not fear that some smart lawyer, like Satan (Rev. 12:10), will somehow find something we have done that has not been covered by the blood of Christ or some technicality that would make it impossible for God to justify us.

God is omniscient. He knows every stipulation of the law. He knows us in every particular. He knows our outward sins and our inward sins. He knows the sins of our heart as well as the sins of our minds. He knows the sins we would have done had we been given the chance to do them, and he knows the sins we sought out opportunities to commit. He knows our sins against others and our sins against ourselves. Nothing is outside the scope of God's knowledge. Nevertheless, knowing all this, God has justified us. And the reason he has justified us is that he also knows every detail of Christ's work and is fully aware of its value. He is aware—because he has so ordained—that "the blood of Jesus, his Son, purifies us from all sin" (1 John 1:7).

3. God has satisfied all possible claims against us; he has done this himself, through Jesus Christ. We have seen this before, but it is worth reminding ourselves that there is both a negative and a positive side to justification. The negative side has to do with the atonement: Christ's bearing the punishment of our sin in our place. It is what the New English Bible emphasizes in its translation of Romans 8:33: "It is God who pronounces acquittal." We are pardoned because of Christ's work—that is, not condemned. But justification is much more than this, which is why the New English Bible translation does not go far enough and why the New International Version is better. "Acquittal" has only a negative connotation. It is true, but justification also involves the positive side of the transaction. If we are "justified," we are clothed with the very righteousness of Christ.

Elsewhere I have described justification as having these two parts: (1) our sin has been placed upon Jesus Christ and has been punished there, and (2) his righteousness has been placed on us. Or, as I have also said, it has been credited to our account.

Here is the way D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones puts it: "To justify means more than to pardon; it means more than to forgive. As we have seen repeatedly in our study of the first four chapters of this Epistle, it means that God makes a declaration, a judicial declaration, to the effect that he has not only forgiven us, but that he now regards us as just and righteous and holy, as if we had never sinned at all.... God not only imputes my sin to his Son, he takes his righteousness and imputes it to me."

In the words of that great hymn, "Jesus, Thy Blood and Righteousness":

Bold shall I stand in that great day;
For who aught to my charge shall lay?
Fully through thee absolved I am,
From sin and fear, from guilt and shame.

"No one can lay any charge against me," writes Lloyd-Jones, "because I am arrayed in this righteousness."

4. The jurisdiction of God's court is universal. Therefore, being acquitted by that court, we can never be condemned by any other. This aspect of our justification assures us and gives us comfort, even when our own thoughts and consciences accuse us.

We are aware of how lawyers will appeal to a higher court if they fail to get the verdict they are after in the lower court. In fact, they do it routinely. Even in a jury trial, a verdict can be appealed if there was an error in presenting evidence or if the judge erred in his instructions to the jury. Suppose, under rare circumstances, your case was appealed even to the Supreme Court of the United States and you were acquitted.

Even then there are situations in which you could conceivably still be in jeopardy. Suppose that jurisdiction in your case was challenged by another country. It might be possible for you to be acquitted here but then for you somehow to fall into the hands of people from that other country and be tried by them and found guilty.

On earth our status can be terribly uncertain. But not if we are judged and justified by God. The court of God is the Supreme Court of all Supreme Courts. His bench is the highest of all tribunals. There is no national government that can challenge God's judgment. Therefore, when Paul says, "Who will bring any charge against those whom God has chosen? It is God who justifies," he is asserting with great strength that those who are in Christ need fear no condemnation—not now, not ever. No one can overthrow the blessed judgment that has been rendered by God in our favor.

Prepared to Meet Him

All this is what Martin Luther discovered, of course, and it is why he became the prophet of the Reformation. In his early days, before he had studied the Bible and had learned that God has made the righteousness of Jesus Christ available for those who trust him, Luther feared for his soul. Earlier I referred to his great hymn on the judgment. It contains a verse about sinners who have not trusted Christ:

> ... sinners, filled with guilty fears,
> Behold his wrath prevailing;
> For they shall rise and find their tears
> And sighs are unavailing:
> The day of grace is past and gone;
> Trembling they stand before the throne,
> All unprepared to meet him.

That was once Martin Luther's fear. But then Luther discovered that God had made the necessary preparation through the death of Jesus Christ. He understood that justification can never be on the basis of our works, for it is our works that have gotten us into trouble in the first place. Rather, justification is provided on the basis of the work of Jesus Christ. Jesus died for sinners, and the righteousness in which believers are enabled to stand in the day of God's judgment is his righteousness that is imputed to them—and to us, if we are Christians.

That is the ground of our confidence. That is our security: the work of Jesus Christ and that alone. The last verse of Luther's hymn, picking up the theme of verse one, therefore cries,

> Great God, what do I see and hear!
> The end of things created!
> The judge of mankind doth appear,
> On clouds of glory seated!
> Beneath his cross I view the day
> When heaven and earth shall pass away
> And thus prepare to meet him.

I have no desire to frighten you with thoughts of the final judgment. I want you to find comfort in Christ. But I need to say one more thing. If you are not in Christ—if your sins are not covered by his blood and you are not clothed in his righteousness—you should be frightened! There is no comfort for you. One day you will have to meet God, whom you have dishonored, and be judged by Christ, whom you have spurned. Who will save you in that day, if God himself is not your Savior? If you are not in Christ, in that day you will find God to be a stern, unyielding Judge.

But this is not yet that day. This is the day of God's grace. Jesus Christ is still proclaimed as Savior. Believe on him. Trust him. If you do, you will enter into a salvation that neither earth nor hell can shake and that God himself has made secure.

Chapter 118.
Our Wonderful Mediator

Romans 8:34

Up to this point our study of the last part of Romans 8 has taught the doctrine of eternal security by presenting what God the Father has done on our behalf. This was particularly clear in verses 28-30, where it was a case of God's working, God's choosing, God's predestining, God's calling, God's justifying and God's glorifying. It was also the case in the following three verses in which Paul began to ask his unanswerable questions: (1) "If God is for us, who can be against us?" (2) "He who did not spare his own Son, but gave him up for us all—how will he not also, along with him, graciously give us all things?" and (3) "Who will bring any charge against those whom God has chosen?"

Even when the death of Jesus was mentioned, as it is in question two, it was mentioned from the viewpoint of God's giving up his Son.

With the fourth of these five questions, Paul's approach changes, as the work of Jesus Christ himself is suddenly brought forward. "Who is he that condemns?" Paul asks. Again there is no answer, because "Christ Jesus, who died—more than that, who was raised to life—is at the right hand of God and is also interceding for us."

In other words, having just said that God justified his people, Paul now speaks of the ground of that justification and offers four reasons why those who have been justified can be assured that they are forever free from condemnation. These reasons, all of which have to do with Jesus Christ's work, both past and present, are: (1) Christ's death, (2) Christ's resurrection, (3) Christ enthronement at the right hand of God, and (4) Christ's continuing intercession for us.

Christ's Death for Sin

As soon as we reflect on the teaching in this verse we are immediately impressed with how much doctrine Paul has compressed into it. He has done this with an economy of words, and nowhere is this more evident than in the first of his four statements. "Christ Jesus, who died" is all he says.

Why did he not elaborate on this a little bit?

The answer surely is that he has already done so in the earlier parts of the letter. In those earlier chapters we learn that Jesus died for sin, making an atonement for it. By means of his atonement he propitiated or turned aside the wrath of God, which sin deserved. Moreover, since Jesus had no sin of his own for which to atone, we learn that he did this on our behalf, or vicariously. Some years ago the great Swiss theologian Karl Barth was asked what was the most important word in the Bible, the questioner no doubt thinking that Barth would say "love" or some such godly quality. But instead Barth answered, "Hyper." In Greek, Hyper is a preposition, meaning "on behalf of or "in place of another. Barth called this the most important word because it signifies that the death of Jesus was in our place and for us. He died so that we might not have to die spiritually.

I suppose the most common response to this, particularly from a Christian congregation, is that we already know all about it. Indeed, we have known it for a long time. Why do we have to keep saying it again and again? Why repeatedly bring up the death of Jesus Christ?

Well, if you really do know this and really do live by faith in Christ and his atonement, there probably is no need to keep on repeating it, although those who know it best generally are those who love hearing it most often. Katherine Hankey's hymn says rightly, "I love to tell the story, for those who know it best/Seem hungering and thirsting to hear it like the rest."

But I suggest that we do need to hear it (and often), for the very reason Paul is repeating himself in Romans. Remember, he is writing about assurance. And the reason he is writing about assurance and at such length is that we tend to waver on this subject and doubt our salvation. This is particularly true when we fall into sin, whether outright sins of commission or those more subtle sins of the mind or spirit, perhaps even the sin of doubting God's word about salvation. In such a frame of mind we find ourselves wondering whether we really are saved or are still saved, assuming that we were saved once but have perhaps fallen away.

If you find yourself thinking like this, you need to hear that "old, old story" again. You need to hear what Jesus did for your sin, bearing the punishment of God upon it in your place.

"But suppose I sin?" you ask. Don't say "suppose." You have sinned and will continue to sin. That is not the right question. The question is rather, "Did Jesus die for my sin or did he not?" If he did, then the punishment for that sin has been undertaken by Jesus in your place, and there is no one (not even God) who can condemn you for it. Jesus took your condemnation.

"But suppose I question this?"

This questioning of yours—is it a sin or isn't it? If it is not a sin, if it is only a mere intellectual puzzling over the full meaning of what Jesus Christ has done and why, there is no problem. Christians are free to ask God questions and state what they do not understand. If it is a sin, that is, if it is outright disbelief of God's Word, even then why should this sin more than any other separate you from God's love and condemn you —if Jesus has, in fact, died for it?

I do not mean by this that your sin is covered by Christ's blood if you are among those who reject his atonement and scorn it. That is an unbelief that has never known faith. If you do this, you are not regenerate. I am speaking to those who are born again and love Jesus but who have doubts concerning their salvation. To them I say, as Paul does, "Christ died." He died for you.

When he hung on the cross, Jesus said of his atoning work, "It is finished" (John 19:30). And it was! It was finished forever. There is nothing that can ever be added to it or be taken away.

Christ's Resurrection

The second reason why we can be assured of our salvation on the basis of Jesus work for us is his resurrection, which Paul introduces with the words "more than that, who was raised to life."

That is a strange way of introducing the doctrine of the resurrection, because it is linked to Christ's death as if it adds something to it. And how can that be, if the atonement is a finished work, as I just said? Once again, this is something Paul explained earlier in Romans when he was dealing with the work of Jesus more extensively. Think back to what the aposde said at the end of chapter four, as he brought the first great section of the book to a close and prepared to move on into the second great section, which we are now studying: "He [Jesus] was delivered over to death for our sins and was raised to life for our justification" (Rom. 4:25).

What does that mean, "raised to life for our justification"? As the Bible describes them, both the resurrection and justification are works of God. So the verse is saying that God raised Jesus from the dead in some way that relates to his work of justification. Since justification is based on Christ's propitiation, the connection between resurrection and justification is not one of cause and effect. Rather, it must be one of demonstration. The point of the resurrection is to verify the justification, which is based upon the death. It is God's way of showing that Jesus' death was a true atonement and that all who believe on him are indeed justified from all sin.

Let me put it this way. When Jesus was alive on earth he said that he was going to die for sin, becoming a ransom for many. In time he did die and was placed in a tomb where he lay for three days.

Had he died for sin? He said that was what he was going to do, but the words alone do not prove his death was an atonement. Suppose Jesus was deluded? What if he only thought he was the Son of God and the Savior? Or again, suppose he was not sinless? He claimed to have been sinless.

He seemed to be. But suppose he had sinned, even a little bit? In that case, he would have been a sinner himself, and his death could not have atoned even for his own sin, let alone for the sin of others. The matter would remain in doubt.

But then the morning of the resurrection comes. The body of Jesus is raised, and the stone is rolled back from the opening of the tomb so the women and later others can see and verify that he has indeed been raised. Now there is no doubt, for it is inconceivable that God the Father should thus verify the claims of Jesus if he was not his unique Son and was not therefore a true and effective Savior of his people.

As the great Bible teacher Reuben A. Torrey said in one of his writings, "I look at the cross of Christ, and I know that atonement has been made for my sins; I look at the open sepulcher and the risen and ascended Lord, and I know that the atonement has been accepted. There no longer remains a single sin on me, no matter how many or how great my sins may have been. My sins may have been as high as the mountains, but in the light of the resurrection the atonement that covers them is as high as heaven. My sins may have been as deep as the ocean, but in the light of

"Who is he that condemns?"—who could possibly condemn us if Jesus has died for us and has been raised as proof of our justification?

Christ's Enthronement at God's Right Hand

We are climbing a grand staircase in studying these four phrases that speak of the saving work of Christ, both past and present. But we are likely to miss a step at this point if we are not very careful, because the third step deals with the ascension and enthronement of the Lord Jesus Christ, and this is not something heard a great deal about in most churches. (In the more liturgical churches there is a special day known as Ascension Day on which the doctrines associated with Jesus' return to heaven are often noted.)

There are two chief teachings involved. The first is Jesus' glorification. This was God's answer to the prayer Jesus uttered just before his arrest and crucifixion, recorded in John 17. He said, "I have brought you glory on earth by completing the work you gave me to do. And now, Father, glorify me in your presence with the glory I had with you before the world began" (John 17:4-5). Jesus laid this glory aside in order to become man to accomplish the work of redemption. But now, contemplating the end of his work, he asks for that glory to be restored.

And it has been! According to Acts, at the moment of his martyrdom Stephen saw the glorified Jesus "standing at the right hand of God" (Acts 7:56), and Paul was stopped and redirected by Jesus' voice while on the way to Damascus to persecute the early Christians (Acts 9:3-5). The apostle John later had similar visions of Jesus, according to the Book of Revelation.

The other teaching associated with Ascension Day is the one Paul seems chiefly to be concerned with here. It is Christ's "session," his being seated at God's right hand. Since the "right hand" was considered the place of honor, for Jesus to be seated there involves his exultation.

That alone is significant in regard to our eternal security, for it means that the One who has achieved it for us by his death has been honored for precisely that achievement.

But there is more to the doctrine than even this. The most important thing about Jesus' being seated is that sitting implies a finished work. As long as a person is standing, there is still work to do. But once it is finished, the person rests from that work, as God rested from his "work of creating" (Gen. 2:2).

This point is developed carefully in the letter to the Hebrews, where a comparison is made between the work of Israel's earthly priests, according to the pattern of temple worship that had been given by God, and the work of Jesus, who was the high priest to come. This theme dominates Hebrews, beginning as early as chapter 4 and continuing as far as chapter 10. The point is that Jesus' priestly work is superior to and replaces the preparatory work done by earthly priests.

Then comes this important statement in chapter 10: "Day after day every priest stands and performs his religious duties; again and again he offers the same sacrifices, which can never take away sins. But when this priest [Jesus Christ] had offered for all time one sacrifice for sins, he sat down at the right hand of God. Since that time he waits for his enemies to be made his footstool, because by one sacrifice he has made perfect forever those who are being made holy" (Heb. 10:11-14, emphasis added). The Jewish temple had no chairs in it, though there were other articles of furniture. This signified that the work of the priests was never done. Indeed, even the great sacrifice offered on the Day of Atonement had to be repeated year by year. But when Christ offered himself as a sacrifice, that sacrifice was the perfect fulfillment of the prior types and a true and utterly sufficient atonement for sin. It did not have to be repeated. Therefore, when Jesus had offered this sacrifice and it was accepted by God the Father, he showed that the work was completed by sitting down at God's right hand.

Where is Jesus now? He is seated at God's right hand. So whenever you doubt your salvation and are becoming disturbed by such thoughts, look to Jesus at the right hand of the Father, realize that he is there because his work of sacrifice is completed, that nothing can ever add to it or take away from it, and that you are therefore completely secure in him.

What would have to happen for you to lose your salvation, once you have been foreknown, predestined, called, justified, and glorified by God? For that to happen, God would have to throw the entire plan of salvation into reverse. Jesus would have to rise from his throne, go backward through the ascension (now a descension), enter the tomb again, be placed upon the cross, and then come down from it. For you to perish, the atonement would have had never to have happened. Only then could you be lost. But it has happened, according to the plan of God. And the fact that Jesus has been raised from the dead, brought to heaven, and been seated on the right hand of God the Father is proof that it has been accomplished. Your security is now as certain as the Lord's enthronement, which means that it is as unshakable as Jesus himself.

Christ's Present Intercession

The final reason why the believer in Christ can be assured of his salvation based on the work of Christ is Jesus' present intercession. Paul says that Jesus "is also interceding for us."

In light of the ideas of accusation, judgment, and acquittal that have appeared throughout this section, it is natural to see this intercession as Jesus' pleading the benefits of his death on our behalf in the face of Satan or any other individual's accusations. Bible teachers have often spoken of the verse that way, and I have done so myself on occasion. But this is probably not quite the right idea. Why? Because Paul has introduced the verse with the question "Who is he that condemns?" and the answer to that is "no one," as long as Jesus has died, been raised, and is now seated at the right hand of God and making intercession for us. There is no need for that kind of intercession, because in view of Christ's finished work and God's judgment no one is able to accuse us.

D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones says, "There is no need... for our Lord to defend the believer. He has already done so, 'once and for ever.' But, in any case, it is God the Father himself who sent his Son to do the work.

There can never be any query or question in God's mind with regard to any of his children."

In view of that, what does intercession mean here? In this context it must refer to Jesus' prayers for his people, much like his great prayer of John 17, in which he prays for and receives all possible benefits of his death for them for the living of their Christian lives.

It means that there is no need you can possibly have to which the Lord Jesus Christ is indifferent.

It means that there is no problem to which he will turn a deaf ear or for which he will refuse to entreat his Father on your behalf.

Let me share a paragraph on this subject from the writing of Donald Grey Barnhouse, which has blessed me:

You do not have a problem too great for the power of Christ. You do not have a problem too complicated for the wisdom of Christ. You do not have a problem too small for the love of Christ. You do not have a sin too deep for the atoning blood of Christ. One of the most wonderful phrases ever spoken about Jesus is that which is found on several occasions in the gospels. It is that "Jesus was moved with compassion." He loved men and women. He loves you. [Do] you have a problem? He can meet it, it does not matter what it is. The moment that the problem comes to you in your life, he knows all about it.... If there is a fear in your heart, it is immediately known to him. If there is a sorrow in your heart, it is immediately a sorrow to his heart. If there is a grief in your heart, it is immediately a grief to his heart. If there is a bereavement in your life or any other emotion that comes to any child of God, the same sorrow, grief or bereavement is immediately written on the heart of Christ. We find written in the Word of God, "In all their afflictions he was afflicted" (Isa. 63:9).

Jesus intercedes for us in precisely those things. Moreover, he is heard in his intercession, and he ministers to you out of the inexhaustible treasure house of his glory. That is why Paul was able to write to the Philippians, "And my God will meet all your needs according to his glorious riches in Christ Jesus" (Phil 4:19).

Bobby McFerrin, the popular singer and entertainer, has a little song called "Don't worry; be happy." It made him famous. I like the song, even though I know it is misleading for anyone whose sin is not atoned for by the blood of Christ. A person in his or her sin should worry. There is no happiness for one who stands under God's dreadful condemnation. But "there is now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus"! That first verse of Romans 8 tells us what the chapter is all about. There can be none because Jesus has died in our place, been raised for our justification, is seated at the right hand of God, and is even now carrying on a work of intercession for us.

Should people with such an intercessor worry? In their case, "don't worry" is a proper thing to say. And so is "be happy," though those words are undoubtedly too weak. We should rejoice with joy unspeakable.

Chapter 119.
No Separation from Christ's Love

Romans 8:35-36

Next to the bare facts of salvation, the greatest lesson a Christian can learn is that nothing can separate him or her from the love of Jesus Christ, which is the love of God. The world's values, entertainments, and sins are at odds with a believer's great calling and destiny. Yet all Christians can know that none of these things can triumph over them. Like a mountain climber ascending a dangerous precipice behind his guide, secured only by a rope, the Christian walks through life secured by the stout cord of God's love. Because the way is treacherous, any believer may often slip and fall. But a disciple of Jesus Christ is secure, because every Christian is bound to God by a gracious, unchanging, eternal, and indestructible love.

The Last Great Question

That is the point to which we come as we turn to the last of the five unanswerable questions Paul asks in the final paragraph of Romans 8. We have seen that the first three questions were unanswerable because of what God has done for us.

1. "Who can be against us?" No one can be against us, because God is for us, and God is the greatest force of all.
2. "He who did not spare his own Son, but gave him up for us all—how will he not also, along with him, graciously give us all things?" God will give the lesser gifts, because he has already given the greatest gift of all in Jesus.
3. "Who will bring any charge against those whom God has chosen?" No one will or can, because God has already justified his elect people.

The fourth question, which we looked at carefully in the previous study, is unanswerable because of what Jesus himself has done. "Who is he that condemns?" No one can condemn, because Jesus died, was raised from the dead, has ascended into heaven, is seated at the right hand of God the Father, and is even now interceding for us.

Having explored these four possible threats to our security—opposition, an imagined limit to God's gracious provisions for us, accusations, and condemnations—and having answered that in God we have a Champion, a Benefactor, a Judge, and an Intercessor, Paul now comes to the climax of his series of mounting rhetorical questions and asks the one that brings him to the very top of the mountain.

"Who shall separate us from the love of Christ?"

This question is also unanswerable, because there is no one nor anything that can be imagined to do it, even though Paul brings forth a long list of imagined separators. The only possible conclusion is the one we stated as we began these studies of Romans 8. As I said then, Romans 8 begins with "no condemnation" and ends with "no separation. There is "no separation," because nothing "will be able to separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus our Lord" (v. 39).

When Hostile Forces Assail Us

Sometimes Christians are accused of being unrealistic. This is probably accurate in some instances. Yet it is not true of Paul. When Paul says that nothing "will be able to separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus our Lord," he is not closing his eyes or shutting his ears to the hostile and destructive forces that surround the Christian at all times. On the contrary, he actually opens his arms to these forces and invites them to come forward, saying nevertheless and at the same time that they will never succeed in detaching us from Jesus Christ.

What are the forces arrayed against us? Paul lists seven in this verse, maybe choosing this number to suggest completeness. These are great forces, yet although they are great, all of them will fail.

1. Trouble. The first circumstance of life that might be thought able to separate a Christian from the love of Jesus Christ is "trouble" or, as the older King James Version of the Bible has it, "tribulation." I will focus on the KJV translation of this word, because "tribulation" does a better job of capturing the idea of hard circumstances pressing down upon us than does the less colorful "trouble" that the New International Version uses. The Greek word is thlipsis, which has to do with pressure.

The English word tribulation comes directly from the Latin noun tribulum, which meant a "threshing sledge." In the ancient world at the time of the grain harvest, the stalks of grain were brought to the threshing floor and a wooden threshing instrument, like a sled covered on the bottom with strips of metal, was dragged over the stalks to separate the heads of grain from the chaff. This instrument was called a tribulum because it pressed out the grain. This vivid picture produced the idea embodied in the word tribulation, because circumstances frequently press down on people so forcefully and unremittingly that it seems to them that they are being threshed like stalks of grain.

Perhaps you have experienced such harsh pressures. Life has been hard. You may have been abused as a child, have lost your job, have been deprived of a husband or wife or other family member, have undergone severe illness. Your strength may be nearly gone. But, says Paul, you may know that no tribulation, however severe, will separate you from Christ's love.

2. Hardship. The second circumstance of life that Paul thinks of as a possible separator is "hardship," which embodies a slightly different idea. The Greek word is stenochōria, and it is composed of two separate words, which mean "narrow" (stenos) and "space" or "territory" (chōra) respectively. So the idea is not so much that of being pressed down by circumstances, which is what "tribulation" means, but rather that of being confined within a narrow and oppressive space.

In our time I am convinced that many more people experience distress of this nature than outright pressures. Take the example of a man who is in a dead-end job. He entered his company with hopes for advancement, but he is now in his late forties and has been passed over for promotions several times. It is getting to where he cannot make a good lateral move, and he knows he will not move up much in the company, if at all. Meanwhile, he is married, with a wife and children to support and a mortgage to pay. He sometimes thinks of being free of these confining circumstances, but he knows that he cannot break free and still honor his commitments.

Or again, imagine a woman who is in her late thirties with two or three children who make tremendous demands on her, who has to survive on a rather meager budget, and who knows there is no future for her apart from the present circle of school, supermarket, baby-sitters, and the other marks of a most confined life.

How are you to triumph in such circumstances? The best way is to realize that Jesus Christ, the very Son of God, has fixed his love upon you and that nothing is ever going to separate you from his love. You may be in narrow straits now, but you are an heir of heaven, and one day your horizons will be as vast as the universe and as soaring as the stars. Nothing will deprive you of this destiny, because nothing, not even hardship, will be able to separate you from Christ's love.

3. Persecution. The Greek word for "persecution" (diōkō) contains the idea of being pursued by someone intent on our harm. It denotes harm that is relentless. What about such relentless persecutions? Very few of us suffer much outright persecution today, though Christians in other parts of the world endure it. But there are subtle persecutions, and there will undoubtedly be stronger and more outright persecutions if the present secularizing trends of western life continue.

Two things we can be sure of: (1) persecutions are a normal response to any forthright Christian witness or stand, and (2) we will experience them to the extent that we confront the world with Christ's claims. They may be as subtle as being shunned by those who regard themselves as quite sophisticated and Christians as being hopelessly "out of it" and dull. "Persecution" may mean being passed over for some honor or promotion. Ministers may experience this from a superior who pushes them into obscure posts because they are more interested in teaching the Word of God, with all its harsh edges, than in promoting the denominational programs. At times, particularly when Christians stand against some great national malaise, believers may even be sued in court to hush them up or render them ineffective.

Jesus said, "In this world you will have trouble. But take heart! I have overcome the world" (John 16:33b). Persecutions may separate us from a more lucrative worldly future or a more attractive image before the world, but persecutions will never separate us from Christ's love.

4. Famine. Most of the ancient world experienced famine at one time or another. Famine could result from lack of rain and the failure of crops; from natural disasters such as earthquakes, fires, floods, or locust plagues; or from war. Since those factors still exist today, hunger has not been eliminated for much of the world's population, despite technological advances in agricultural methods and the humanitarian efforts of those more fortunate. Hunger is a terrible thing. But even this cannot detach us from Christ, says Paul.

5. Nakedness. Today this word usually implies the state of undress normally associated with sexual activity or pornography. But in Paul's day it had to do more with poverty so severe that the person so afflicted was unable to buy the clothes he or she needed. It is a corresponding term to famine and, like it, may refer to economic hard times deriving from natural disasters or war.

6. Danger. Dangers, too, are of various types, though the focus here is on those to which Christians are exposed simply because they are Christians. Just as in New Testament times, in some countries Christians are arrested, tried, and imprisoned. In others they are attacked, beaten, and even killed.

I like what Robert Haldane wrote on this point:

These [dangers], at some times, and in some countries, are exceedingly many and great; and at all times, and in all countries, are more or less numerous and trying. If God were not their protector, even in this land of freedom, the followers of the Lamb would be cut off or injured. It is the Lord's providence that averts such injuries, or overrules events for the protection of his people. This too is little considered even by themselves, and would be thought a most unfounded calumny or a fantastical idea by the world. But let the Christian habitually consider his safety and protection as secured by the Lord, rather than by the liberality of the times. That time never yet was when the Lord's people could be safe, if circumstances removed restraint from the wicked. Those who boast of their unbounded liberality would, if in situations calculated to develop their natural hatred of the truth, prove, after all, bitter persecutors.

7. Sword. The last of these seven terms pushes the violence implied in the earlier ones to their furthest extremity, viewing circumstances in which Christians are executed or even murdered for their faith. This happened in the early church. Stephen was an early martyr. So was James. Others followed, and there was soon a trail of Christian blood to mark the progress of the gospel from land to land and through history.

So frequent and so vivid had this been, even by the time Paul wrote Romans, that the apostle felt compelled to establish martyrdom as a prophesied biblical datum, which he does by quoting Psalm 44:22: "For your sake we face death all day long; we are considered as sheep to be slaughtered." This has been literally true throughout history, which is Paul's point. Mission societies and organizations that deal with international violations of human rights say that even today as many as 600,000 Christians are killed every year for their faith. Even if, as is the case in our country, we are not literally being put to death for our religion, we are nevertheless regularly regarded in as low a fashion as the quotation from Psalms suggests—as sheep fit only for slaughter.

Christ's Love for Us

In view of these many dangers, toils, and cares that come into the lives of Christians, how can Paul say that there is nothing that can separate us from Christ's love? The answer, of course, is the nature of that love. It is high and long and broad and deep. It is eternal. The phrase "love of Christ" can mean either our love for Christ or Christ's love for us, but it is evident in this context that it is Christ's love for us and not our love for him that is the basis of our security and Paul's confidence.

Christ's love draws us out of ourselves and to him in the first place. It draws and wins disciples.

Years ago, Tenth Presbyterian Church supported a missionary to Korea whose name was Harold Voekel. He was in Korea at the time of the Korean War. He was drafted into the army and assigned to the prisoner-of-war camps as a chaplain. Tens of thousands of North Koreans were imprisoned in these camps. Some were Communists. They were active in stirring up riots and rebellion. When Voekel entered the first camp he immediately won the men's interest because he could speak their language. He said he wanted to teach them a song. It was the Korean version of our familiar children's hymn, often taught in Sunday school.

Jesus loves me! This I know,
For the Bible tells me so.
Little ones to him belong;
They are weak, but he is strong.
Yes, Jesus loves me,
Yes, Jesus loves me,
Yes, Jesus loves me,
The Bible tells me so.

When Chaplain Voekel had finished teaching this in one camp, he went to a second camp and so on until he had covered all the POW camps in Korea. Then he went around again, this time teaching a few simple things about this person Jesus, who loved the Koreans. He did this for months. Thousands became believers. Discipline in the camps improved. The Communists had difficulty finding followers. When the truce finally came and the country was divided at the infamous 38th Parallel, thousands of these former prisoners of war refused to return to North Korea and Communism and instead chose to live in the south where they could continue to learn about and worship Jesus.

There is no greater message than the message of the love of Jesus Christ for us. It has captured the imagination and won the hearts of widespread millions throughout history.

The love of Christ satisfies those it has drawn and won as disciples. And the proof is this: Once the soul has tasted Christ's love, it can never be satisfied with anything else. Not all the pleasures, not all the idols of this earth can satisfy the person who has known the love of Christ. One of our hymns puts it nicely when it says,

Draw and win and fill completely,
'Til the cup o'erflows the brim;
What have we to do with idols
Who have companied with him?

The love of Christ not only draws and satisfies, it also keeps us safe forever. This is what Paul is chiefly saying in this paragraph. Here is a great passage on this theme by Donald Grey Barnhouse:

The love of Christ was eternal, for it was that love which moved him to leave heaven's throne and come down to this earth to redeem us. That love was deep, for it was that love which urged him on to the end of the road as he humbled himself to the death, even the death of the cross. That love was broad, for it was that love which opened the arms of God to all the world of sinners and made it possible for the very ones who nailed him to the cross to be forgiven and come back to the Father's heart. And that love is unchanging, for it is that love which comes to us today in the midst of our need, whatever it may be, and takes us out of darkness and into light, and from doubt to certainty, and from death to life.

In our text that love is presented to us in the phase of its permanence. God stoops to tell us that Christ is not fickle. What amazing condescension that such a verse should be in the Bible. The Lord leaves heaven and comes down to earth; he allows himself to be led to the judgment hall where he is buffeted and spat upon. He walks to Calvary and permits men to nail him to the cross. From that cross he cries out, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." We see these things happen and he tells us that they have happened for us.... We look upon him with amazement, and wonder if he really means it. Then he smiles at us and tells us that he really does mean it and that he really does love us, and that nothing, nothing, nothing can separate us from that love.

Paul's Sufferings and Christ's Love

I do not know how you are reacting to this, but I can guess how at least some are. There are some who will comment, "Well, that is all right for Paul to say, since he was an apostle and undoubtedly enjoyed special privileges. I am only a normal Christian. Can this really apply to me?"

If you are saying that, let me remind you of Paul's experiences. True, he was an apostle. But this meant that it was his lot to endure greater rather than lesser hardships than ourselves, in both quantity and degree. He writes about them in 2 Corinthians 11:23-29:

... I have worked much harder, been in prisons more frequently, been flogged more severely, and been exposed to death again and again. Five times I received from the Jews the forty lashes minus one. Three times I was beaten with rods, once I was stoned, three times I was shipwrecked, I spent a night and a day in the open sea, I have been constantly on the move. I have been in danger from rivers, in danger from bandits, in danger from my own countrymen, in danger from Gentiles; in danger in the city, in danger in the country, in danger at sea; and in danger from false brothers. I have labored and toiled and have often gone without sleep; I have known hunger and thirst and have often gone without food; I have been cold and naked. Besides everything else, I face daily the pressure of my concern for all the churches. Who is weak, and I do not feel weak? Who is led into sin, and I do not inwardly burn?

Everything Paul speaks about in Romans 8 as a possible separator from the love of God in Jesus Christ is included in these verses as something Paul himself had experienced or was in danger of facing. Eventually, as we know, he was martyred. So Paul is not writing from some ivory tower or speaking "off the wall," as we say. He knew it all. Yet none of these things separated him from Christ's love, and today he is in the presence of Christ in heaven and will be forever.

So will it be for you, if you have truly tasted of Christ's love. This love is the greatest thing in the universe. Why settle for less?

Chapter 120.
More Than Conquerors

Romans 8:37

There are passages of the Bible that are so familiar that we often pass over truths that would be startling if we were coming to them for the first time. Romans 8:37 is an example. We have just been reminded in the previous verse, by a quotation from the Old Testament, that the people of God "face death all day long" and are "considered as sheep to be slaughtered" (Ps. 44:22). But now, in verse 37, we are told that nevertheless we are all "more than conquerors."

Sheep that conquer? We can think of lions that conquer, or wolves or polar bears or wild buffalo.
Edgar Allan Poe even spoke of "the conquering worm," meaning that at last death comes to all. But sheep? The very idea of sheep as conquerors seems ludicrous.

This is figurative language, of course. But the image is not meaningless, nor is it as ludicrous as it seems. In contrast to the world and its power, Christians are indeed weak and despised. They are as helpless as a flock of sheep. But they are in fact conquerors, because they have been loved by the Lord Jesus Christ and have been made conquerors "through him."

Yet even that is not the most startling thing about this verse, for the victory of Christians is described as being more than an ordinary victory. In the Greek text a single compound verb, hypernikōmen, lies behind the five English words "we are more than conquerors." The middle part of the word is the simple verb nikaō, meaning "to overcome" or "to conquer." (The famous statue "Winged Victory" in the Louvre in Paris is called a Nike, which means "victory" and was the name given to the goddess of victory in Ancient Greece.) The first part of the verb, hyper, means "in place of," "over and above," or "more than." From it we get our word super, which means almost the same thing. When we put the two parts of the word together we find Paul saying that believers are all "super-conquerors," or "more than conquerors" in Jesus Christ.

But how can that be? How can those who are despised and rejected—troubled, persecuted, exposed to famine and nakedness, danger and sword—how can such people be thought of as overcomers, super-overcomers at that?

It is a question worth pondering—and answering. Let me suggest a few reasons we may think like this.

Against Supernatural Forces

The first reason why the victory given to Christians by Jesus Christ is a superlative victory and why we are "more than conquerors" is that we are fighting against an enemy who is more than human.

This is the note on which Paul ends his letter to the Ephesians, reminding the Christians at Ephesus that "our struggle is not against flesh and blood, but against the rulers, against the authorities, against the powers of this dark world and against the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly realms" (Eph. 6:12). In this passage Paul is thinking of the devil and his hosts, and he is saying that our battle, however human it may seem, is actually supernatural. It is a spiritual battle. If our enemies were mere human beings or mere natural forces, our victory, if we achieved it, would be a natural victory. But, as it is, our foes are supernatural, and therefore our victories are supernatural, too. We are more than conquerors.

The devil is the embodiment of these hostile spiritual forces, and he is a cunning foe. I have often said that we must not overrate Satan's strength, as if he were the evil equivalent of God. Satan is a creature. Therefore he is not omnipresent, omniscient, or omnipotent. Only God is that.

However, Satan is very dangerous.

And crafty! The devil devises more schemes in a minute than we can conceive in a lifetime, and all of them are directed toward our destruction. How can we stand against such an evil, crafty foe, let alone be a "super-conqueror" of him and his forces? It is not in our own strength, of course. It is as the text says: "through him who loved us." Martin Luther stood against these spiritual forces, prevailed over them through Christ, and wrote about it in the hymn we know as "A Mighty Fortress":

> Did we in our own strength confide,
> Our striving would be losing;
> Were not the right Man on our side,
> The Man of God's own choosing.
> Dost ask who that may be?
> Christ Jesus, it is he;
> Lord Sabaoth his Name,
> From age to age the same,
> And he must win the battle.

None of us could stand against Satan's hostile forces even for a moment, but in Jesus Christ we can stand firm and fight on to victory.

Lifelong Battles

Second, Christians are "more than conquerors" because the warfare we are engaged in requires us to fight lifelong battles.

In his excellent study of this verse Donald Grey Barnhouse sharply contrasts our battles as Christians with the limited battles other soldiers fight: "In earthly battles soldiers are sometimes called upon to fight day and night. But there comes a moment when flesh and blood cannot take more and the struggle comes to an end through the utter exhaustion of the soldier. But in the spiritual warfare there is no armistice, no truce, no interval. The text is in the present tense... in the Greek: 'For thy sake we are being killed all the day long' (RSV). From the moment we are made partakers of the divine nature, we are the targets of the world, the flesh and the devil. There is never a moment's reprieve. It follows, then, that our conquest is more than a conquest, and thus we are more than conquerors."

Eternal Results

The third reason why Christians are more than conquerors is that the spiritual victories achieved by God's people are eternal. This is a very important point and one we need to remind ourselves of constantly.

We are creatures of time, and we live in a perishing world. Apart from spiritual battles and spiritual victories, everything we accomplish will pass away, no matter how great an earthly "victory" may seem in the world's eyes or our own. How can it be otherwise when even "heaven and earth will pass away" (Matt. 24:35)? Great monuments will crumble. Works of art will decay. Fortunes will be dissipated. Heroes will die. Even great triumphs of the human intellect or emotion will be forgotten. Not so with spiritual victories, for our spiritual victories impart meaning to the very history of the cosmos.

I am convinced that this is what our earthly struggles are about and that this is how we are to view them. When Satan rebelled against God sometime in eternity past, God was faced with a choice, humanly speaking. He could have annihilated Satan and those fallen angels, now demons, who rebelled with Satan against God. But that would not have proved that God's way of running the universe is right. It would only have proved that God is more powerful than Satan. So, instead of punishing Satan immediately, God allowed Satan's rebellion to run its course. In the meantime God created a universe and a new race of beings, mankind, in which the rebellion of Satan would be tested. Satan could have his way for a while. He could try to order things according to his will rather than God's. He would even be allowed to seduce the first man, Adam, and the first woman, Eve, into following him in his rebellion.

But God would reserve the right to call out a new people to himself, the very people Paul has been writing about in Romans 8. These individuals would be foreknown, predestined, called, justified, and glorified—all according to God's sovereign will. And when they were called they would be thrust into the spiritual struggle that Satan and his demons had brought upon the race. Satan would be allowed to attack, persecute, and even kill God's people. But for them, for those who have been brought to know the love of God in Christ Jesus, these sufferings would not be an intolerable hardship but would instead be a privilege that they would count themselves happy to endure for Jesus.

I am convinced that in his supreme wisdom God has ordered history in such a way that for every child of Satan who is suffering, a child of God is suffering in exactly the same circumstances. And for every child of Satan who enjoys the fullness of this world's pleasures, there is a child of God who is denied those pleasures.

The unbeliever curses his or her lot if deprived and made to suffer. The believer trusts and praises God and looks to him for ultimate deliverance. Unbelievers boast of their superiority if they are fortunate in securing this world's success or treasure. Believers acknowledge God as the source of whatever good fortune they enjoy, and if deprived of these things, as is frequently the case, they say, as Job did, "The LORD gave and the LORD has taken away; may the name of the LORD be praised" (Job 1:21b).

And the angels look on, as they also did in Job's case. "Is Satan's way best?" they ask. "Does the way of the evil one produce joy? Does it make him and God's other creatures happy? Or is the way of God best? Are believers the truly happy ones, in spite of their suffering?"

We, too, may pose such questions, and even wonder about the truth of Jesus' words in the Sermon on the Mount:

> Blessed are the poor in spirit....
> Blessed are those who mourn....
> Blessed are the meek....
> Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for righteousness....
> Blessed are the merciful....
> Blessed are the pure in heart....
> Blessed are the peacemakers....
> Blessed are those who are persecuted because of righteousness....
> Matthew 5:2-10

Those words are indeed true! They are profoundly true. They are what God's people are proving every day of their lives as they suffer and in some cases are put to death, being literally counted "as sheep to be slaughtered."

"But the poor in spirit are despised," someone says. True enough, but "theirs is the kingdom of heaven." "But those who mourn, mourn alone," says another.

They often do, in human terms. But when they mourn an unseen presence stands beside them, Jesus himself, and they are truly "comforted." They know "the peace of God, which transcends all [human] understanding" (Phil 4:7). "But the meek are crushed and beaten down."

In this world they are. Indeed, for God's sake "we face death all day long." But our kingdom is not here, any more than Jesus' kingdom was here, though in the end we will "inherit [even] the earth."

"But those who hunger and thirst after righteousness are strange, odd. Most people don't want to have anything to do with them."

True, but their longings will be satisfied by God himself, while those who seek earthly pleasures will fall short of joys here and in the end will be cast into the lake of fire, where thirst is never quenched.

"But the pure in heart have no welcome here, no secure place."

True enough, but they will see God. They have a home in heaven.

"Why do we need peacemakers?" asks another person. "We need strong armies to fight the world's conflicts." Peacemakers are despised. The strong and powerful are favored.

But those who make peace "will be called sons of God."

"Who would want to be persecuted, especially for righteousness' sake?"

No one, of course. But when Christians are persecuted, they count it a privilege, for it shows that they are standing with Jesus, belong to his kingdom, and have a reward laid up for them in "the kingdom of heaven."

Victories in such sufferings are eternal in the same way that the victory of our Lord upon the cross is eternal. Our sufferings endure for a moment, but they achieve an eternal victory. They point to the truth and grace of God forever. I am convinced that in the farthest reaches of heaven, in what we would call billions of years from now, there will be angels who will look on everyone who has been redeemed by Jesus Christ and thrust into spiritual warfare by him, and they will say, "Look, there is another of God's saints, one who triumphed over evil by the Lord's power!" Revelation 12:11-12 describes how they will exclaim of our great victories over Satan:

> "They overcame him by the blood of the Lamb and by the word of their testimony;
> they did not love their lives so much as to shrink from death.
> Therefore rejoice, you heavens and you who dwell in them!"

In achieving those eternal victories, we who love the Lord Jesus Christ will have indeed been more than conquerors.

Eternal Rewards

The fourth reason why we are more than conquerors in the struggles of life is that the rewards of our victory will surpass anything ever attained by earthly conquerors.

The kings of this world generally fight for three things: territory, wealth, and glory, often all three. And they reward their soldiers with a proportionate share of these attainments. The Romans settled their soldiers on land won from their enemies, though chiefly to consolidate their territorial holdings. Armies have usually been allowed to share in war's spoils. Napoleon said that men are led by "trinkets," meaning titles, medals, and other such glory symbols. The world's soldiers have their rewards, but they are earthly rewards. The people of God look for rewards in heaven. The apostle Paul wrote to the Corinthians, "... Run in such a way as to get the prize. Everyone who competes in the games goes into strict training. They do it to get a crown that will not last, but we do it to get a crown that will last forever" (1 Cor. 9:24-25).

In this life, like our Master, we may wear nothing but a crown of thorns. But in heaven we will wear crowns that are incorruptible and will possess an inheritance that will never slip away.

No Greater Cause

The final reason why we are more than conquerors is that the goal of our warfare is the glory of God, and that is an infinitely worthy and utterly superior thing.

A few lines back I wrote of our reward as being imperishable crowns, using the image the Bible itself gives us. With that in mind I call your attention to a scene in Revelation 4:1-11. The setting is the throne room of heaven, and there, before the throne of Almighty God, are twenty-four elders who represent the people of God saved from all nations and all ages. They, too, are seated on thrones and wear crowns, because the saints reign with Jesus. In the center, immediately surrounding the throne, are four living creatures who cry out day and night, "Holy, holy, holy is the Lord God Almighty, who was, and is, and is to come" (v. 8).

Whenever the four living creatures worship God with these words, the twenty-four elders rise from their thrones, fall before God, and worship him. Then—and this is the point for which I recall this picture—they lay their crowns before the throne, saying,

> "You are worthy, our Lord and God, to receive glory and honor and power, > for you created all things, and by your will they were created and have their being" [v. 11].

This picture is extremely beautiful, for it shows that the crowns of victory won by God's people are won by God's grace and therefore rightly belong to him. They are our crowns, but they are laid at the Lord's feet to show that they were won for his honor and by his strength. In this, as well as in all the other things I mentioned, we are more than conquerors.

But there is one more thing to say: The way to victory is not by "going up" to any self-achieved glory but rather by "stooping down" in suffering.

Remember the picture of Satan given in Isaiah 14? Satan said, "I will ascend to heaven; I will raise my throne above the stars of God; I will sit enthroned on the mount of assembly, on the utmost heights of the sacred mountain. I will ascend above the tops of the clouds; I will make myself like the Most High" (vv. 13-14). But God tells Satan, "You [will be] brought down to the grave, to the depths of the pit" (v. 15).

Where Satan aimed to sit is in some measure where the saints of the ages are raised, for they sit on the "mount of assembly," higher than anything except the throne of God, as we have just seen. But notice how they get there. Not by trying to dislodge the Almighty from his throne. Rather, they are exalted because they have followed in the steps of their Master, who > ... did not consider equality with God something to be grasped,

> but made himself nothing, taking the very nature of a servant, being made in human likeness.
> And being found in appearance as a man, he humbled himself and became obedient to death— even death on a cross!
> Therefore God exalted him to the highest place and gave him the name that is above every name, > that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, in heaven and on earth and under the earth, > and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.

Philippians 2:6-11

Jesus was the prototype—the true sheep fit only "to be slaughtered." He was "the Lamb that was slain from the creation of the world" (Rev. 13:8). But he was also a super-conqueror, and we are more than conquerors through him.

Chapter 121.
The Love of God in Christ Jesus

Romans 8:38-39

There are times in every Christian's life when what is called for is a clear and ringing testimony, and there are times when what is most needed is a careful and persuasive argument supporting Christian truth. Overall, both are essential, for a personal testimony is no adequate substitute for an argument, when that is needed. Conversely, an argument is no substitute for a testimony, when that is needed. In today's wishy-washy, subjective Christian climate we need arguments especially. But, and this is the point I am making, we need personal testimonies, too.

I say this because of the final verses of our chapter. Paul has been offering arguments for why we who believe in Christ can consider ourselves eternally secure. Indeed, he seems to have brought out every possible argument he can think of. These are the arguments behind each of the five undeniable doctrines and five unanswerable questions of verses 28-37. They are basic to Christianity itself. But there is also a time for testimony and, being a good teacher and persuader, Paul does not forget it. That is why, in verses 38 and 39, he once again writes in the first person. It is the first time he has done so since verse 18. He has given his arguments. Now we are to hear his personal convictions.

What does he write? "For I am convinced that neither death nor life, neither angels nor demons, neither the present nor the future, not any powers, neither height nor depth, nor anything else in all creation, will be able to separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus our Lord." What a glorious testimony! There is no false optimism here, for what Paul says is based upon the sound arguments of the preceding verses. But this is no mere academic presentation either. For, as anyone can immediately sense, it flows from a great and dedicated heart and is so passionate, so stirring, that most people instinctively regard this as both the climax of the chapter and the highest point of the entire letter.

In this testimony Paul faces all the possible "separators" of Christians from the love of God in Christ he can think of—he lists ten of them —and then dismisses each one.

The Gates of Death

For most people in our age, as also in the past, the most fearful of all adversaries is death—and rightly so. Apart from what we are told about death and the afterlife in Scripture, death is an unknown, save that it ends our existence here and is inescapable. That is frightening. Francis Bacon wrote rightly, "Men fear death as children fear the dark." They do. They tremble before it.

Moreover, death is the greatest of all separators. Obviously it separates us from life itself. But it also separates us from places and people we love. And it separates the soul and the spirit from the body, and separates both from God if the individual is not saved. Terrible! Yes, but for the believer in Christ this is not the final word. Death does separate us from things of the world, including other people. But it can never separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus.

How do we know this? We know because Christ has conquered death. He has triumphed over it.
Paul assured the Corinthians that, "'Death has been swallowed up in victory' [cf. Isa. 25:8]. 'Where, O death, is your victory? Where, O death, is your sting?' [cf. Hos. 13:14]. The sting of death is sin, and the power of sin is the law. But thanks be to God! He gives us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ" (1 Cor. 15:54-57).

Paul wrote to Timothy in the same fashion, saying that "our Savior, Christ Jesus,... has destroyed death and has brought life and immortality to life through the gospel" (2 Tim. 1:10).

As a matter of fact, death, far from separating believers from the love of God in Christ Jesus, actually ushers them into an even closer relationship with him. Alexander Maclaren, who calls death "the separator," puts it nicely: "The separator becomes the uniter; he rends us apart from the world that he may 'bring us to God.' " We know God now, but only in part. In that day we shall know "fully," even as we also are known (cf. 1 Cor. 13:12). And there shall be no soul "asleep" and no purgatory for those who are in Christ Jesus. Paul said that "to be away from the body" is to be "at home with the Lord" (2 Cor. 5:8). His personal testimony was: "... I desire to depart and be with Christ, which is better by far" (Phil 1:23).

When William Borden of Yale lay dying in Egypt on his way to mission work in China, which he never reached, he left a farewell note that expressed a similar testimony. The note said, "No reserve, no retreat, and no regrets." Of course not! Death did not separate Borden from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus.

Nor Even Life...

The second possible separator that Paul mentions is "life," which at first glance seems to be a strange choice of word—until we remember that life sometimes seems even more cruel than death. It is why we sometimes call death a "release" or "mercy."

Life brings separations, just as death does. The political aftermaths of wars sometimes separate members of families from one another. This has happened in Eastern Europe, China, North and South Korea, and other divided countries in our lifetimes. Sometimes poverty forces people to move away from loved ones if they have to leave their homes to find jobs. And consider sickness or the encroaching limitations of old age. As we age, mobility becomes increasingly limited, eyesight and hearing fail, minds and memories dim. In these things we experience separation from the simple pleasures the world once offered us. But there is no separation from God's love.

Let me give you an example.

In the week I prepared this study I received a letter from a man who had attended Tenth Presbyterian Church about twenty-five years ago. His story was a sad one. He had slipped into homosexuality in his youth, and by his own confession his lifestyle had cost him his family—he had a wife and children—his profession, and his health. This man now had AIDS, and he was writing to say that during his terrible illness he had found the Lord and wanted to receive the weekly cassette version of "The Bible Study Hour," which he knew of and had found spiritually nourishing.

Here is what he wrote: "Unfortunately, I am losing my eyesight due to AIDS. I'm reading your material as fast as I can, before I find myself unable to do so.... Your tapes will enable me to continue my studies after the light fails.... I have become obsessed with God. I can't get enough of his Word. He literally has become my sole incentive to live. I have lost so much already and am losing everything else, but I cannot lose him. He is the only reason I hold on to life, miserable as it is. My living now is preparing me for eternity."

I found myself greatly touched by that letter, particularly at this point in our studies, since it is such a marvelous testimony to the truth that even life's misery cannot separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus.

Neither Angels nor Demons

When Paul mentions "angels" and "demons" as his next pair of possible separators, he confuses most readers, since we cannot be absolutely certain of what he is referring to. The word angels usually means "good angels," but many have wondered how beneficent beings can be thought of as ever trying to separate believers from Christ. For that reason, some commentators have taken the word to refer to fallen angels or demons, and the second term to refer to the "principalities" or earthly "authorities" they are sometimes said to control. The King James Bible and some other versions translate this second word as "principalities."

The problem with this is that Paul seems to be deliberately introducing contrasting pairs of terms in these verses: four pairs, with two single terms thrown in. If that is his pattern, the contrast in this pair must be between good and bad angels.

Can good angels ever try to separate us from Christ? No. But Paul may sometimes speak of them hypothetically as doing what we know they could never actually do, as in Galatians 1:8—"Even if we or an angel from heaven should preach a gospel other than the one we preached to you, let him be eternally condemned!" I favor this view and judge that here Paul is not thinking so much in rationally exclusive terms as he is simply sweeping over all creation to deny that anything or anyone anywhere could ever succeed in destroying our eternal security in Christ. In the first pair of possible separators Paul has looked at our most immediate experiences: life and death. In the second he looks to the realm of spirit beings and declares that not one of them, whatever that being may be like, can separate us from the love of God in Christ.

It is good for us to know this, because—although we do not fear the good angels (they are "ministering spirits sent to serve those who will inherit salvation," Heb. 1:14)—we are rightly on guard against the "spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly realms" (Eph. 6:12). These forces create havoc among all types of people. They produce separations, because evil divides. Indeed, the very name "devil" (Greek, diabolos) means "separator." But although the fallen angels can produce many kinds of divisions, there is nothing they can do that can ever separate us from Christ.

How do we know this? We know it because Jesus has defeated these evil forces at the cross. Paul told the Colossians, "When you were dead in your sins and in the uncircumcision of your sinful nature, God made you alive with Christ. He forgave us all our sins, having canceled the written code, with its regulations, that was against us and that stood opposed to us; he took it away, nailing it to the cross. And having disarmed the powers and authorities, he made a public spectacle of them, triumphing over them by the cross" (Col. 2:13-15).

The Tide of Time

Having addressed the experiences of life and death and expanded his circle of possible separators to include angelic forces, both good and evil, Paul now thinks in terms of time, arguing that neither present things nor future things can separate us from God's love in Christ. "Time is powerless against believers," says one commentator.

The fact that Paul speaks of "present" and "future" and not "past" and "future" (which we might expect) shows that he is still thinking carefully, even though casting about in the broadest possible fashion. He does not say "past," because nothing in the past has separated us from Christ. We are in Christ now. Ah, but what of the present? What about those hard things that are pressing in on us at this very moment? They cannot separate us from Christ, says Paul. Jesus is equal to them. What about the future? What about things to come? They cannot separate us from Christ either, Paul adds.

In my judgment, there are two equally valid ways to think of this pair of words, and both may be correct.

On the one hand, we might think solely of earthbound circumstances, what we regard as the flotsam and jetsam of history and our daily lives. We are buffeted by circumstances now, and we will be buffeted by circumstances in future days until we die. But none of these circumstances will separate us from the love of God in Christ, because the God who has loved us in his Son controls history. He is the God of circumstances. So there is nothing that has come into our lives, is already in our lives, or will come into our lives that has not been filtered through the perfect and loving will of our heavenly Father and been directed by him to our good. That is why Paul was able to say just verses earlier, "And we know that in all things God works for the good of those who love him..." (Rom. 8:28).

Joseph said the same thing, in spite of the terrible experiences God allowed him to pass through. He told his brothers, "Don't be afraid. Am I in the place of God? You intended to harm me, but God intended it for good to accomplish what is now being done, the saving of many lives" (Gen. 50:19-20).

On the other hand, Paul's use of the words present and future may refer to what we would call "this life" and "the life to come." Nothing here and nothing hereafter can separate us from God's love. We have talked about "here." What about "hereafter"? We remember a verse saying that "man is destined to die once, and after that to face judgment" (Heb. 9:27). Ah, judgment! That is what lies in our hereafter and what we indeed must fear, if we are not in Christ. Yet how can we fear it if we are "in him"? In that case, we know there is nothing to fear, for Jesus has borne the judgment in our place. There are still judgments to come, true enough. But even these cannot separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus.

Nor Any Powers

It is hard to know what Paul is thinking of when he speaks of "powers," particularly since he adds it as a freestanding term, without linking it to a matching word, as he has done with the other possible separators thus far. The word in Greek is dynameis, which can refer to miraculous signs or miracles, though here it would seem to mean heavenly or spiritual forces. The only problem is that we find it hard to think of spiritual powers that are not already included in the phrase "neither angels nor demons." I suspect that in this context "powers" probably looks back to those that have already been mentioned—powers of death and life, powers of angels and demons, powers of the present and of the future—and says in summary fashion that there are no powers anywhere that can divide us from Christ.

Can you think of any? Can any force anywhere separate you from the love of God in Christ Jesus, if neither death nor life, neither angels nor demons, neither the present nor the future can do so?

Neither Height Nor Depth

In the fourth (and last) of his matched pairs, Paul turns from human experience, spiritual powers, and time and considers space, saying that "neither height nor depth" will be able to separate us from the love of God in Christ Jesus.

What does this pair of terms mean? If the words merely describe space, the phrase means that nothing above us and nothing below us can separate us from Christ. Alexander Maclaren takes this view, expressing it well. He says, "The love of God is everywhere." If this is the meaning, it would be an expression of the thought found in the well-known verses of Psalm 139:7-10:

> Where can I go from your Spirit?
> Where can I flee from your presence?
> If I go up to the heavens, you are there; if I make my bed in the depths, you are there.
> If I rise on the wings of the dawn, if I settle on the far side of the sea, > even there your hand will guide me, your right hand will hold me fast.

On the other hand, it may be significant that the Greek words translated "height" (hypsoma) and "depth" (bathos) were used in the ancient world in astrology to describe a point directly overhead, above the horizon, and a point directly downward, below the horizon. These points were used in forecasting horoscopes. Some commentators find this to be their meaning. If this is correct, the teaching is that even so-called astrological powers cannot separate us from the love of God in Christ Jesus.

Nor Anything Else

After the sweeping terms of the first part of these verses the closing single item "nor anything else in all creation" is almost an anticlimax. But that is all right. In fact, it is effective precisely for that reason, for it is as if Paul has run out of words in his verbal search for possible

"separators" and ends up saying simply, "nor anything else, anything else at all."

What does "anything else in all creation" include? The answer is that it includes everything that exists except God, since God has created all these other things. Thus, if God is for us and if God controls everything else, since he has made it, then absolutely nothing anywhere will be able to separate us from his love for us in Christ Jesus.

That reminds me of the word we looked at briefly as we began this section, the word convinced. This is Paul's personal testimony, as I said, but it is a testimony based on the soundest evidence, evidence that had persuaded Paul and should persuade us also. What are the grounds of this persuasion? Paul's conviction is not based on the intensity of his feelings or a belief that the harsh circumstances of life are bound to improve or that any of these separating factors will somehow be dissolved or go away. Rather, it is based on the greatness of God's love for us in Christ, and that awesome love has been made known in that God sent his Son to die in our place.

There is nothing in all the universe greater or more steadfast than that love. Therefore, nothing in all the universe can separate us from it:

> Not death, not life
> Not angels, not demons
> Not the present, not even the future
> Not any power
> Not height, not depth
> Not anything else in all creation.

I do not know of anything greater than that. And I do not know of any better way of ending our studies of Romans 8 than to say again that this is Paul's testimony, born out of his own careful study of the Scriptures and his own personal experience of the love and grace of God.

So I ask of you: Is this your testimony? Have you been persuaded of these truths, as Paul was? Can you say, "I no longer have any doubts. I know that salvation is entirely of God and that he will keep me safe until the very end"? If you are not certain of these truths, it is because you are still looking at yourself. You are thinking of your own feeble powers and not of God and his omnipotence.

As far as I am concerned, I am persuaded and I am glad I am. There is nothing in all of heaven and earth to compare to this assurance.

Romans, Volume 3
God and History (Romans 9-11)

To HIM from whom,

through whom, and to whom are all things

Preface

I am writing the preface to the third volume on my studies of Romans the same week I have finished my studies of the magnificent doxology with which the apostle Paul ends the great eleventh chapter:

> Oh, the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable his judgments, and his paths beyond tracing out! "Who has known the mind of the Lord? Or who has been his counselor?" "Who has ever given to God, that God should repay him?" For from him and through him and to him are all things. To him be the glory forever! Amen.

I have been blessed as I studied this doxology. But I have also realized in a fresh way that it expresses the secret of Paul's extraordinary power as a teacher of the things of God. Paul did not begin with man, as we tend to do in our man-oriented, need-directed churches. Paul began with God! Moreover, he continued with God, knowing that anything of true spiritual value is accomplished only through God and by God's power. And he ended with God, too, in the sense that everything he did was for God's glory.

What a difference it would make if our churches could recapture the apostle's God-centered and God-directed orientation. But, of course, it is not likely to happen, not in the direction we are going. Instead of thinking about God more and coming to know him better, today's Christians spend most of their time thinking about themselves and are therefore bogged down in miserable self-contemplation and analysis, instead of being set free to love and serve God with all their heart, mind, soul, and strength.

This sad prevailing attitude has had its bearing on the study of Romans 9-11, or perhaps I should say on a neglect of a study of these chapters. I do not think it is too much to say that few Christians study them at all, and few preachers preach on them at all. Why? Because they are difficult, perhaps. But most of all because they are focused on the glory and ways of God, more than any other comparable section of the Bible, and because they pull us along in directions we find it uncomfortable to travel.

These themes will stretch our minds—and mind stretching, like any other kind of rigorous exercise, will be painful. But it will be good for us, and it is necessary for us if we are to be strong Christians, equipped by God to challenge the errors and evils of our age with a truly robust Christianity.

In each of my books I like to thank the Session and congregation of Tenth Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia for encouraging me in this kind of careful Bible study and exegetical, doctrinal preaching. I believe they have profited from it over the quarter-century I have been the senior minister of the church, and I know I have. To them and to some others, the material in this book will be somewhat familiar, since the chapters are essentially the sermons I preached to the Tenth Presbyterian congregation from September 1990 to July 1992. They were also aired over the internationally heard "Bible Study Hour" broadcast during 1991 and 1992.

No religion is stronger than its god, and in the case of Christianity, no Christians have ever been stronger than their knowledge of the true God and their desire to obey and glorify him. May God bless these studies to lead many to know more of the character and the greatness of our God, and may many be revitalized as a result. "For from him and through him and to him are all things. To him be the glory forever! Amen."

Part Eleven: Paul and His People

Chapter 122.
What in the World is God Doing?

Romans 9:1-5

In the ninth, tenth, and eleventh chapters of Romans, we are dealing with a Christian philosophy of history. It is a philosophy that we can ask as a question, namely: "What in the world is God doing?" Or we can be a bit more precise and ask: "What is God doing in world history?" Or even: "What is he doing with me? Where have I come from? Why am I here? Where am I going when I die?"

There has never been a more important moment in which to ask these questions, because people in our day have lost, not only the Christian answers to them but even the hope of finding them. The great art historian Erwin Panofsky, in a book called Studies in Iconology, has pointed out how the figure of Father Time has changed in western art history. In the ancient world, time was pictured positively. It was portrayed by symbols of speed, power, balance, and fertility. In our world, time is pictured as an aged man, accompanied by a scythe, representing death, and an hourglass. In other words, time is pictured negatively. Panofsky terms our view "Time the Destroyer" and traces it to our failure to find any genuine meaning either in world history or in our own personal histories.

Our view is that of the carnival barker's cry as the revolving wheel of fortune turns: "Round and round and round she goes, and where she stops, nobody knows."

Henry Ford said the same thing when, by a different use of language, he called history "bunk."

This is not the Christian view, nor is it the teaching of Romans. The Christian view is not negative, because it sees God at the beginning of history (taking charge of it), the cross of Jesus Christ at the center of history (giving it meaning), and the return of Christ at the end of history (bringing it to a triumphant conclusion). For the Christian, time and history are pregnant with eternal meaning.

The Place and Themes of Romans 9-11

In one sense that is the theme of the next great section of Paul's letter to the Romans, chapters 9 through 11. But these chapters are not introduced into a vacuum. They are linked to what has already been written.

Not every commentator has seen this. C. H. Dodd is impressed with the fact that the opening words of chapter 9 do not have any part of speech deliberately linking them to chapter 8. So he imagines that what we have in chapters 9 through 11 is a separate Pauline composition, a "kind of sermon," that "he kept by him... for use as occasion demanded." Well, it is true that Romans 911 can stand by itself. Even more significantly, it is easy to see how the last part of Romans, chapters 12 through 16, could follow easily from chapter 8. That would replicate a pattern often found in Paul's letters. But apart from the fact that it is difficult to imagine Paul carrying manuscripts of his sermons around with him and preaching from them, it is really only possible to understand these chapters by seeing their close connection to what has gone before.

For one thing, they are a necessary exposition of Paul's original thesis, stated in Romans 1:16. Paul wrote there that he was "not ashamed of the gospel, because it is the power of God for the salvation of everyone who believes: first for the Jew, then for the Gentile." That is an important statement, but until this point Paul has not shown how the gospel had been presented first to Judaism. In fact, this priority appears to have been contradicted by the large-scale unbelief of this people.

And that leads to the second matter linking the earlier portions of the letter with these chapters. Paul has completed a chapter in which the eternal security of the believer has been unfolded in glowing and profoundly moving terms. He has declared that "neither death nor life, neither angels nor demons, neither the present nor the future, nor any powers, neither height nor depth, nor anything else in all creation, will be able to separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom. 8:38-39). But can we really believe that if, as an observable fact, those upon whom God had previously set his electing love, the Jewish people, have been cast off? It is all very well to affirm that nothing can separate us from the love of God in Christ. But can we believe that if many Jews, who as a people have preceded us in the long, historical, unfolding plan of salvation, have been abandoned by God and are lost?

Recognizing this progression, one commentator has called chapters 9 through 11 the very "climax of Romans," believing that everything before this is intended to lead to its conclusions. This is probably an overstatement. But it is also equally an understatement to regard these chapters merely as "a kind of postscript," as another writer does.

Robert Haldane (along with others) has a good balance when he writes, "Paul... has discoursed largely on the justification and sanctification of believers, and now he proceeds to treat particularly of the doctrine of predestination, and to exhibit the sovereignty of God in his dealings both towards Jews and Gentiles. The way in which, in the ninth, tenth, and eleventh chapters, he so particularly adverts to the present state and future destination of the Jews, in connection with what regards the Gentiles, furnishes the most ample opportunity for the illustration of this highly important subject."

In following through on these themes, Paul introduces some of the most profound and mindstretching material to be found anywhere in the Bible. We will see, as we study these chapters:
(1) the historical advantages of Judaism; (2) the importance and biblical proof of election; (3) the doctrine of reprobation; (4) the justice of God in saving some and passing by others; (5) the glory of God displayed in his judgments; (6) the reason for Jewish failure to believe on Jesus of Nazareth as the Messiah; (7) the place and power of gospel preaching in God's plan; (8) the importance of Christian missions; (9) what God is doing in the present age, and why; (10) the eventual salvation of the Jews as a nation; and (11) the great and indescribable knowledge and wisdom of God that guides it all.

Has the Word of God Failed?

All those themes will occupy us in due course. But, as we begin, it is important to see the overall outline of these chapters as they apply to the central question Paul is raising, namely: Has God's saving purpose toward the Jewish nation failed? It is the question he raises implicitly in verse 6. Paul's answer is a firm "No," for the following seven reasons.

1. God's historical purpose toward the Jewish nation has not failed, because all whom God has elected to salvation are or will be saved (Rom. 9:6-24).

The apostle begins his discussion by distinguishing between national, visible Israel and spiritual Israel, consisting of those whom God has chosen to know Christ. He also speaks of Abraham's natural descendants and the children of promise, which makes the same distinction. The point is that membership in the outward, visible Jewish nation did not guarantee salvation, any more than outward, visible membership in a Christian denomination guarantees the salvation of church members today. What determines salvation is the electing grace of God in Christ, and that has always been a separate matter from any national or organizational distinctives.

Paul cites election in the earliest generations of descent from Abraham, showing that Isaac was chosen rather than Ishmael, and that Jacob was chosen rather than Esau. He proves his point by quoting Exodus 33:19:

> I will have mercy on whom I have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I have compassion.
>
> Romans 9:15

2. God's historical purpose toward the Jewish nation has not failed, because God had previously revealed that not all Israel would be saved and that some Gentiles would be (Rom. 9:25-29).

If God had promised in advance that all Jews would be saved and had then failed to save some of them, God would indeed have failed. But no one can claim failure on God's part if, as is the case, he foretold in advance that precisely what has happened would happen, namely, that many Jews would not believe and would be scattered and that, in their place, many of the scattered Gentiles would be gathered to Christ. As with the previous point, Paul proves his argument by citing Old Testament texts, in this case Hosea 2:23, Hosea 1:10, Isaiah 10:22-23, and Isaiah 1:9.

Though the number of the Israelites be like the sand by the sea, only the remnant will be saved.

Romans 9:27; cf. Isaiah 10:22

Hosea 2:23, which Paul applies to God's calling of the Gentiles to be a new spiritual people, articulates the other half of the argument.

I will call them "my people" who are not my people; and I will call her "my loved one" who is not my loved one.

Romans 9:25; cf. Hosea 2:23

3. God's historical purpose toward the Jewish nation has not failed, because the failure of the Jews to believe was their own fault, not God's (Rom. 9:30-10:21).

Why did the Jews fail to believe in Jesus Christ as their Messiah and Savior? Paul answers that it was because of the way they went about trying to earn their salvation themselves. The way of salvation, as he has shown in Romans 4 from a careful examination of key Old Testament passages, is by faith in God's provision in Christ. Abraham, David, and all the other Old Testament figures who were saved were saved through believing God. But this is precisely what the Jews of Paul's day would not do. They wanted to be approved by God on the basis of their own good deeds and righteousness, and, as a result, they would not submit to the righteousness of God that is received by faith.

Of course, this is also precisely why most Gentiles are not saved. They are self-righteous, which means that they think they deserve salvation and do not need grace. They do not understand the depth or horror of sin, which contaminates even the best of their imagined good works.

4. God's historical purpose toward the Jewish nation has not failed, because some Jews (Paul himself was an example) have believed and have been saved (Rom. 11:1).

Paul makes this point in one verse, asking, "Did God reject his people?" He answers, "By no means! I am an Israelite myself, a descendant of Abraham, from the tribe of Benjamin." As long as even one Jewish person has been saved, no one can claim that God has rejected his people utterly. But, in fact, the situation is not as grim as that scenario. On the contrary, as the next section shows, even in the worst times God has preserved a considerable remnant of the Jewish people.

5. God's historical purpose toward the Jewish nation has not failed, because it has always been the case that not all Jews but only a remnant has been saved (Rom. 11:2-10).

Paul's proof here is God's speech to Elijah after Elijah had achieved his victory over the priests of Baal at Mount Carmel, had fled exhausted to the wilderness and there, profoundly depressed and discouraged, had pleaded for death on the grounds that of all those who had been faithful to God only he was left, and it would be only a short time before King Ahab and Queen Jezebel discovered his hiding place and killed him, too. God replied that Elijah was only feeling sorry for himself, because, as a matter of fact, God still had seven thousand Israelites who had not abandoned the true faith in order to worship Baal.

The point God was trying to bring out for Elijah's benefit was that there was still a large number of believing Jews in Israel, seven thousand to be exact. Paul's point is that although there were only seven thousand, a small portion of the nation, this was still a sufficiently large number to diffuse the claim of anyone who might suppose that God had failed.

6. God's historical purpose toward the Jewish nation has not failed, because the salvation of the Gentiles, which is now occurring, is meant to arouse Israel to envy and thus be the means of saving some of them (Rom. 11:11-24).

The argument Paul develops in these middle verses of the eleventh chapter is one of the most profound in the Bible. This is because in it Paul is trying to explain why God has acted as he has. We can understand that God has a right to do anything he wants, particularly with sinners who have only opposed him. He can save whom he wants, since salvation is by grace. He can condemn whom he wants, since this is justice. But, still, rejection seems rather harsh treatment of his ancient and formerly "chosen people." Is God merely writing them off? Paul's answer is that this is not the case. Rather, God is using the day of Gentile salvation for the good of Israel, since it is through God's work among the Gentiles that Israel is being stirred from her selfrighteousness, self-complacency, and lethargy, as a result of which some are being saved.

Israel has indeed been rejected for a time, like branches being broken from an olive tree. But Paul turns this back on the Gentiles, warning them that although they have been brought into the covenant people in place of those numerous Jews who have been left out, they are not to think that they are beyond danger nationally. For if God has broken the Jewish branches from their own tree, what is to keep him from cutting off the ingrafted Gentile branches and then bringing the Jewish branches back again?

As a matter of fact, this is exactly what has happened to many Gentile nations. At one time there was a strong Christian church in North Africa, but it has been almost entirely destroyed. Formerly strong churches in Germany, France, England, and other countries have likewise ceased to thrive. No one must ever presume upon the grace of God.

7. Finally, God's historical purpose toward the Jewish nation has not failed, because in the end all Israel will be saved, and thus God will fulfill his promises to Israel nationally (Rom. 11:2532).

This last point has proved extremely controversial in the history of the exposition of Romans 911, because there are many who feel that a future day of national blessing for Israel would mean a regression in God's plan of redemption. The argument, a strong one, is theological. It is that the promises to Israel have been fulfilled in Christ and unfolded in the church. Therefore, it is inconceivable that God could again deal nationally with Israel.

I acknowledge that there may be aspects of prophetic interpretation that have over-literalized the day of future Jewish blessing. I am not willing to argue that the fulfillment of this promise necessarily means the reestablishment of a believing Jewish state, the state of Israel, though it seems to me that this is probably the case and may even be in the process of happening. I am not willing to argue for a necessary rebuilding of the temple, particularly if it should become a place where blood sacrifices for sin would be offered. I am willing to discuss many details of the coming endtimes, which seem to include a seven-year period of great suffering and tribulation, a great final worldwide battle known as Armageddon, a literal thousand-year reign of Christ on earth, and other things. I think many of these matters are debatable. But I do not see why a future day of national Jewish blessing is or should be debatable, since that is what Paul clearly says will happen: "And so all Israel will be saved..." (v. 26).

To say that this only means true Israel, or the church, seems to me to be an evasion of Paul's obvious teaching. True, this does not mean that every individual Jew who has ever lived will be saved, or even that every Jew living in the final days will be saved necessarily. But it must refer to some great time of national repentance and salvation. For, "as it is written:

'The deliverer will come from Zion; he will turn godlessness away from Jacob.
And this is my covenant with them when I take away their sins.'"

It is no wonder that at this point, having moved from the distress of the opening of chapter 9—"I have great sorrow and increasing anguish in my heart" for Israel—to the expectation of a glorious future deliverance of that people, Paul should turn to doxology and end the section with a hymn of praise to God for his wisdom.

We are going to be studying all these points in detail as we move through these great but sadly neglected chapters of Romans. Yet even here it is possible to see something of the vast scope of Paul's plan. The apostle is showing what God is doing in the flow of human history from the very earliest moments in which he began to save our fallen race, through the period in which he began to work in a special way through the nation of Israel, to the coming of the Messiah, the rejection of Jesus for the most part by his own people, the offer of the gospel to the Gentiles, and the eventual conversion of the masses of Israel so that the two great religious portions of the human race may be saved and joined together as one people in him. And, in all this, Paul is providing what theologians call a theodicy, a justification of the ways of God to human beings. In other words, he is not only showing what God is doing but also that he is right in so operating.

Fitting In

What I have just talked about is what God is doing in history. And the question before us, as we begin this section, is: "How do we fit in?" What is God doing with your life? If you are a Christian, he is forming Jesus Christ in you so that at the end of time there will be a vast host of believers who will stand before him as sisters and brothers of his beloved Son.

Our problem is that we forget that this is what God is doing. Or we do not think about this enough for it to matter. Instead, we are caught up in our own little plans, most of which have nothing to do with this purpose and will prove meaningless in the end. If you are a believer in Jesus Christ, you must know that you are here to be like Christ and to strive to win others to Christ, so that they as well as yourself might have a share in this great blessing. What is God doing in history? That is what he is doing. That is a true understanding of historical events.

Great Sorrow for a Great People

Romans 9:1-4

It is difficult for any of us to receive a hard truth, however necessary it may be to hear it. But there is always a much better chance of hearing it if it is told to us in love.

In the second volume of his study of Romans, Ray Stedman tells of a congregation that had dismissed its pastor. Someone asked a parishioner why they had done it.

"The pastor kept telling us we were going to hell," the church member answered.

"What does your new pastor say?"

"He keeps saying we're going to hell, too."

"So what's the difference?"

"Well," the churchgoer replied, "when our first pastor said we were going to hell, he sounded like he was glad. But when our new pastor says it, he sounds like it is breaking his heart." This is what is going on as we begin the ninth chapter of Romans.

We recall that at the end of chapter eight, Paul was riding an emotional high as he declared that there is nothing in all creation that can separate a believer from the love of God in Christ Jesus. We read that, and our souls, too, thrill to the ecstasy. But suddenly we come to chapter 9, and we find Paul exclaiming in a very different mood: "I speak the truth in Christ—I am not lying, my conscience confirms it in the Holy Spirit—I have great sorrow and unceasing anguish in my heart" (vv. 1-2). What has happened? The answer is that he is now suddenly thinking of the members of his own race, the Jewish people, and he is grieving because for the most part they have rejected the gospel of God's grace in Christ that he has been expounding.

Paul is in such anguish for them that he could wish—these are his very words—"that I myself were cursed and cut off from Christ for the sake of my brothers, those of my own race, the people of Israel" (vv. 3-4a).

An Enemy for Christ's Sake

This would be an unacceptable and nearly incomprehensible claim to most Jews who might hear him, for in their sight Paul was the worst of all possible enemies. He was a Jew himself, first of all. But he had become a believer in the one they would have called "that blaspheming imposter," and now he was going about trying to convert both Gentiles and Jews to this religion. From their perspective, Paul was not only dreadfully wrong; he was also a traitor, a man who was trying to destroy the Judaism he had once affirmed.

Paul was not doing that, of course, at least not according to his understanding of the prophets. He was proclaiming Jesus as Israel's true Messiah. But he was aware of the enmity that existed, which is why he is so anxious to declare his love for his people in this chapter.

The important thing in terms of Paul's own statement is not that the Jews perceived him to be their enemy, but that they were enemies of his, having set out to harass, hinder, and defeat him in everyway possible. As Paul traveled about the Roman world he had considerable success in gathering congregations of Gentiles to his message. He established churches everywhere. But wherever he did this, Jews stirred up mobs, which frequently drove him from those cities. And sometimes, after Paul had left a particular Gentile area, they sent teachers to subvert the newly established churches.

Later in his life, after he had returned to Jerusalem to try to bridge the widening gulf between the Jewish and Gentile churches and win more of the Jews to Christ, more than forty extremely zealous Jews bound themselves with an oath that they would neither eat nor drink until they had killed him (Acts 23:12-13).

But notice: The truly remarkable thing is not that the Jews hated Paul. That was natural, given what each believed and what each was trying to accomplish. The remarkable thing was Paul's overwhelming love for those who were his enemies. He tells us in one place, "Five times I received from the Jews the forty lashes minus one," adding that he was in constant "danger from my own countrymen" (2 Cor. 11:24, 26). Yet nowhere in his writings or anywhere else is there ever found (or is there ever imputed to him) the shadow of personal offense, matching retaliation, or lingering bitterness against the Jews for this abuse. Not once. Nowhere.

On the contrary, Paul's spirit was the spirit of his Master, who wept over the city of Jerusalem even though he knew he was about to be crucified by the nation's hostile leaders.

Jesus said, "If you, even you, had only known on this day what would bring you peace—but now it is hidden from your eyes. The days will come upon you when your enemies will build an embankment against you and encircle you and hem you in on every side.... They will not leave one stone on another, because you did not recognize the time of God's coming to you" (Luke 19:41-44).

It was the tragic contrast between the Jews' fierce unbelief and the joys of the gospel that brought tears to the eyes of both Jesus of Nazareth and the apostle Paul.

Cut Off from Christ

But we have not fully sounded the depths of Paul's great love and sorrow for his people even yet. For the fully remarkable thing is not merely his love for those who hated him—remarkable as that is—but what he actually says in this passage. He says that he could wish himself "cut off from Christ" for the sake of his Jewish brothers. Strictly speaking, the words cut off are not in the original text, though they convey the right idea. The text actually says that Paul would be willing to be "accursed from Christ" (that is, "damned") for the sake of the Jewish people.

Now that really is remarkable!

"Cut off from Christ"? From the very man who has reveled far beyond any of the other New Testament writers on the glories of being in Christ or being joined to him?

"Accursed"? From the very teacher who has so passionately affirmed that nothing in all creation can separate us from the love of God in Christ Jesus?

The presence of these astonishing words on Paul's lips has caused more than one commentator to try to understand them in some way other than what is obviously the sense, with a few suggesting that Paul was only speaking of what he had once thought of himself and Christ before becoming a Christian. But that will not do at all, as almost everyone recognizes. It is true that Paul knows he cannot actually be separated from Christ. That is what the previous chapter has proclaimed so forcefully. Paul's words in chapter 9 are only hypothetical. But they are genuine nevertheless. For he is saying that, if it were possible, he could wish himself accursed from Christ if only his condemnation could achieve the salvation of the people he so fervently loved.

The Example of Moses

Paul was a careful student of the Old Testament, of course. So although he does not say so explicitly, it is hard to imagine that he wrote these words without thinking of a similar statement made by Moses, the great lawgiver of Israel. In fact, Paul is probably deliberately echoing Moses' words in order to identify with Moses and thus add credibility to his own statement.

Moses' words occur in Exodus 32, in the context of one of the greatest stories in the Old Testament.

After their deliverance from Egypt, God had led the people of Israel to Mount Sinai, where Moses was called up into the mountain to receive the law. He was there for forty days. As the days stretched into weeks, the people who were waiting below grew restless and eventually prevailed on Moses' brother, Aaron, to make a substitute god for them. Aaron should have resisted indignantly. But Aaron was weak, as many prominent people are. So he asked for the people's gold, and when he had it he found that he had enough to make a little calf. The people had probably been thinking in terms of Apis, the great bull-god they had known in Egypt. They wanted a bull. But a calf was good enough, so they had a great celebration and orgy to mark their new allegiance to this god. As they danced around the idolatrous golden calf, they exclaimed, "These are your gods, O Israel, who brought you up out of Egypt" (Exod. 32:4).

Moses was up on the mountain and did not know what was going on in the camp. But God did, and God interrupted the giving of the law to tell Moses what was happening.

God said, "Go down, because your people, whom you brought up out of Egypt, have become corrupt. They have been quick to turn away from what I commanded them and have made themselves as idol cast in the shape of a calf. They have bowed down to it and sacrificed to it and have said, 'These are your gods, O Israel, who brought you out of Egypt'" (vv. 7-8).

It was a painfully ironic situation. God had just given the people the Ten Commandments, which begin: "I am the LORD your God, who brought you out of Egypt, out of the land of slavery. You shall have no other gods before me. You shall not make for yourself an idol in the form of anything in heaven above or on the earth beneath or in the waters below. You shall not bow down to them or worship them; for I, the LORD your God, am a jealous God, punishing the children for the sins of the fathers to the third and fourth generation of those who hate me, but showing love to a thousand generations of those who love me and keep my commandments" (Exod. 20:2-6).

But, while God had been giving these commands, the people whom he had freed from slavery were doing precisely what he was prohibiting. They were even ascribing their liberation to the idol. Besides, their idolatrous celebration was undoubtedly leading to transgressions of each of the other commandments, too. They were dishonoring their parents, committing adultery, coveting, and probably doing many other evil things.

God said, "Now leave me alone so that my anger may burn against them and that I may destroy them. Then I will make you into a great nation" (Exod. 32:10).

Instead, Moses interceded for the people, saying, "Why should your anger burn against your people, whom you brought out of Egypt...?" (v. 11). If the situation were not so grim, the words would be funny, because God had just spoken to Moses of "your people" and here Moses was speaking to God of "your people." It was as if neither wanted to be identified with the nation in its rebellious state.

Moses pleaded two arguments. First: "What will the Egyptians say if you destroy them? They will say, 'You brought them into the desert with evil intent, only to do them harm.'" Second: "What about your covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob? You promised to make their descendants numerous and to be their inheritance forever. You cannot break your covenant" (see vv. 12-13).

God heard, and the judgment was at least momentarily restrained.

Now Moses started down the mountain to deal with the people as best he knew how. First, Moses destroyed the golden calf. He burned it in the fire, ground it up, mixed it with water, and made the people drink it. Next, he rebuked Aaron publicly. This was the best he could do in Aaron's case, since Aaron had been anointed to the post of high priest by God. Finally, Moses called any who still remained on God's side to separate themselves from the others and stand by him. The tribe of Levi responded. At Moses' command, these were sent through the camp to execute those who had led the rebellion. About three thousand men died, that is, about one-half of one percent of the 600,000 who had left Egypt at the exodus.

From a human point of view, Moses had dealt with the sin. Aaron was rebuked, the leaders were punished, and the loyalty of the people was at least temporarily reclaimed. All seemed to be well.

But Moses did not only have a leader's relationship to the people. He also represented the people to God, and God still waited in wrath upon the mountain. What was Moses to do? For theologians writing in our day, the wrath of God may be no more than an interesting and (as some assume) outmoded concept. But not for Moses. He had been talking with God. He had received God's commandments. He had heard God say, "You shall have no other gods before me," and "[I will punish] the children for the sin of the fathers to the third and fourth generation of those who hate me." Who was he to think that the merely human measures he had taken would satisfy the righteous demands of such a holy God?

The night passed. The morning came, and Moses was to reascend the mountain. He had been thinking. Sometime during the night, a way that might possibly divert the wrath of God against the people had come to him. He had remembered the sacrifices of the Hebrew patriarchs and the newly instituted sacrifice of the Passover. God had shown by such sacrifices that he was prepared to accept an innocent substitute in place of the just death of the sinner. His wrath could sometimes fall on another.

Moses pondered, "Perhaps...." And then the great man turned to the mountain with determination.

Reaching the top, he began to speak to God. Moses must have been in deep anguish, an anguish almost matched by the apostle Paul's in our Romans passage, for the Hebrew text is uneven, and Moses' second sentence breaks off without ending, indicated by a dash in the middle of Exodus 32:32. It was a strangled cry, a sob welling up from the heart of a man who is asking to be sent to hell if his condemnation could mean the salvation of the people he loved.

The text says, "So Moses went back to the LORD and said 'Oh, what a great sin these people have committed! They have made themselves gods of gold. But now, please forgive their sin— [that is the point at which the sentence abruptly breaks off] but if not, then blot me out of the book you have written.'"

On the preceding day, before Moses had come down from the mountain to the camp, God had said something that could have been a temptation to a lesser man. If Moses would agree, God said, he would destroy the people for their sin and then begin to make a new Jewish nation from Moses (Exod. 32:10). Moses would become a new Abraham. Even then, Moses had rejected the offer, pleading for the people instead. But after he had been with them and had realized again how much he loved them, in spite of their stiff-necked rebellion and sin, his answer, still negative, rises to even greater heights.

God had said, "I will destroy them and made a great nation of you."

Moses replied, "No, rather destroy me and save them."

Moses lived in a relatively early stage of God's dealings with his people and probably did not know, as we know, that what he had prayed for could not be. Moses offered to give himself for his people to save them. But Moses could not save even himself, let alone them. He, too, was a sinner. On one occasion he had even committed murder. He could not be a substitute for his people. He could not die for them.

But there was one who could. Thus, "when the time had fully come, God sent his Son, born of a woman, born under law, to redeem those under law, that we might receive the full rights of sons" (Gal. 4:4-5). This was the only adequate substitute for sinners, the Son of God himself. And Jesus' future, yet foreseen death was the reason God did not destroy the people then and why he does not destroy people who believe on Jesus Christ today. Paul knew this, which is why he speaks hypothetically and not exactly as Moses did, though he echoes his words. He knew that Jesus died to receive the full outpouring of God's wrath against sin so that those who come to God through faith in him might not experience God's just wrath but rather grace. He knew it was the only way God saves anyone.

Let This Mind Be in You

The spirit that was in Jesus, Paul, and Moses should be in each of us—if we would be soulwinners. No one can die for another person's salvation. Jesus is the only one who could, and he did. But we can love as he loved, and we can point others to him.

Let me close this study with five thought-provoking questions.

1. Do you anguish over others? Do you sorrow for those who do not know Jesus Christ and who are therefore perishing without him? I am afraid that most of us do not. Why is that? Is it because we do not believe that they are perishing? Because we do not believe the gospel? Probably it is because we are not very much like Jesus Christ, do not spend much time with him, and do not think of spiritual things much at all.

2. Do you anguish over those closest to you, the members of your own family? Paul also grieved over the Gentiles, but the verses we have been studying deal with his own people and with his personal, special sorrow over them. If we were like him, husbands would grieve over unsaved wives, wives over unsaved husbands, parents over children, and children over parents. We would grieve for members of our extended families and for our neighborhoods.

Charles Spurgeon knew a story that is like this. A girl who was not in good health approached her pastor with thoughts about her coming funeral. She spoke of her father, who was an unbeliever and who had never accepted an invitation from her to go to church. "Pastor, you will bury me, won't you?" she asked. "My father will have to come to my funeral and hear you speak, and you will speak the gospel. Please speak it clearly. I have prayed for him a long time. I know God will save him." According to Spurgeon, the father came to her funeral and was converted. The girl did not die in her father's place, as Jesus died for us. But she had the spirit of Christ in that she was willing to die if her death might cause the conversion of one close to her whom she very much loved.

3. Do you anguish over those who are your enemies? Paul's sorrow was for those who were his avowed enemies. If you have enemies, you are to love them. In fact, you are to love most those who treat you worst. God loved us while we were "enemies" (Rom. 5:10). How are we to win others unless we love even our enemies in this way?

4. Do you anguish over those who are great sinners? The nation for whom Paul grieved was composed of great sinners, for they had rejected the love of God in Christ Jesus. Do you similarly grieve for sinners? If you do not, is it because you do not really consider yourself to be one of them?

5. Do you anguish over those who have great privileges? Finally, as the verses we are studying will go on to show, the Jews of Paul's day also possessed great privileges. So we are led to ask ourselves: "Do I anguish over those who are favored spiritually and in other ways, as well as over those who are openly sinners, downtrodden and unfortunate?" Those who are privileged need the gospel, too.

Paul was a great preacher of election. He will preach it again even in these verses. But his knowledge of the need for the electing grace of God in salvation did not prohibit him from sorrowing over those who were lost. I commend the heart of the great apostle to you. Let the sins of others grieve you. Let the fate that hangs over them like the sword of Damocles be often on your mind. For, if it is, you will work for their salvation in exactly the same proportion, and you will speak often of Jesus who actually was accursed for those who should afterward believe on him.

Chapter 124.
Great Advantages for a Great People

Romans 9:4-5

There is little doubt that the opening verses of Romans 9 reveal an intense love on the part of the apostle Paul for those of his own race and nation. He has been eloquent at other places in this letter. But nowhere has he spoken with such depth of feeling as he does here, saying that he would be willing to be "cursed and cut off from Christ" if his damnation could mean the salvation of those of his own race, whom he loves.

This is a wonderful sentiment, of course. But if Paul had said nothing more than this, it might be possible for us to dismiss his words as a mere chauvinistic boast, which might well be very wrong or even sinful. We know of people who have great pride in their nation, even when their nation has not been worthy of that pride or has embarked on some terrible course of action.

"Gott mit uns," said the Germans during World War II.

"My country, right or wrong," say countless others.

This is not what Paul is saying, however. So immediately after having expressed his great love for his people, he writes two sentences that explain the genuine and admirable advantages they possess. "Theirs is the adoption as sons; theirs the divine glory, the covenants, the receiving of the law, the temple worship and the promises. Theirs are the patriarchs, and from them is traced the human ancestry of Christ, who is God over all, forever praised! Amen."

In this chapter Paul is going to say that salvation is of God's grace entirely. But before he does, he reminds us that there are nevertheless very great advantages even to the outward forms of God's revealed religion.

The Advantages of Earthly Israel

There is a well-known story about Benjamin Disraeli, the conservative statesman who served as prime minister of England in 1868 and from 1874 to 1880. He was elected to Parliament at the age of thirty-three and shortly thereafter was attacked by Daniel O'Connell, the Irish Roman Catholic leader. In the course of his unrestrained invective, O'Connell referred to Disraeli's Jewish ancestry. Disraeli replied, "Yes, sir, I am a Jew. And I remind my illustrious opponent that when the ancestors of that right honorable gentleman were brutal savages eating nuts in a German forest, my ancestors were serving as priests in the temple of Solomon and were giving law and religion to the world."

Advantages? Indeed! It is those very real advantages that Paul points out in the verses we are to study. There are eight in all.

1. The adoption as sons. This is the only place in the New Testament where adoption is used of Israel. Normally it is used of believers in Jesus Christ, which is how Paul has used it thus far in Romans (Rom. 8:15, 23). When it is used of believers it refers to their new status before God as his spiritual sons and daughters resulting from redemption and the new birth. When it is used of Israel, as here, it refers to God's selection of the Jews as an elect nation through which he would bring salvation to the world.

The following terms spell out what this means. It means that Israel alone received the glory, the covenants, the law, the directions for the temple worship, and the promises. Theirs are the patriarchs, and at the end, it was from this people that the Messiah, the Lord Jesus Christ, came.

2. The divine glory. The word glory is not explained and could mean several things. It could be an adjective linked to adoption with the sense of "the glorious adoption." It could mean the glory of being God's special people. However, most commentators recognize that in the Old Testament "glory" usually refers to the visible symbol of the presence of God described by later Judaism as the Shekinah, and that this is what "glory" probably refers to here.

This visible symbol of God's presence seems to have taken a variety of forms. It appeared first at the time of the exodus from Egypt, when it was a great cloud separating the fleeing nation from the pursuing Egyptians. This cloud guided them during the years of their desert wandering, protecting them from the sun by day and turning into a pillar of fire by night to give both light and warmth to their encampment. Later the glory descended on Mount Sinai as a dark cloud accompanied by thunder and lightning when the law was given to Moses (Exod. 24:16-17). Later it filled the tabernacle (Exod. 40:34-38) and rested over the Ark of the Covenant within the Most Holy Place. Still later it settled down as an intense light above the Mercy Seat of the Ark between the wings of the cherubim (Lev. 16:2). From there, in the time of Ezekiel, it departed and returned to heaven in response to the escalating sins of the people (Ezek. 10; 11).

John Murray wrote, "This glory was the sign of God's presence with Israel and certified to Israel that God dwelt among them and met with them."

3. The covenants. Nothing is more characteristic of God's special relationship with the people than the covenants. The word is so rich that it is used in a wide variety of ways. Here it probably refers to the covenants established by God, first with the patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and then later with Moses and David.

The covenant with Abraham and his immediate descendants, Isaac and Jacob, was made and reinforced on several occasions. The first is in Genesis 12:2-3:

I will make you into a great nation and I will bless you;
I will make your name great,
and you will be a blessing.
I will bless those who bless you, and whoever curses you I will curse;
and all peoples on earth will be blessed through you.

The covenant with Abraham is elaborated in Genesis 15, 17, and 22. It was extended to Jacob at the place he called Bethel (Gen. 28; cf. Exod. 2:24; 6:3-5).

The covenant with the patriarchs was confirmed with the nation of Israel by Moses, as told in Exodus 24.

Finally, God elaborated upon it with David, promising him a descendant who would sit upon his throne forever: "When your days are over and you rest with your fathers, I will raise up your offspring to succeed you, who will come from your own body, and I will establish his kingdom. He is the one who will build a house for my Name, and I will establish the throne of his kingdom forever... Your throne will be established forever" (2 Sam. 7:12-13, 16; cf. 23:5). The idea of the covenant is so important in the Old Testament that the word appears 253 times in its pages.

4. The receiving of the law. One of the chief criticisms of Paul by his Jewish countrymen seems to have been his alleged disregard for the law, since he taught that salvation was by grace through the atoning work of Christ and not by law-keeping. But Paul does not discount the law's value. In fact, he has already affirmed its superlative value in Romans 3, where he first raised the matter of Jewish advantages. "What advantage, then, is there in being a Jew?" he asked. The answer: "Much in every way! First of all, they have been entrusted with the very words of God" (vv. 1-2). The phrase "the receiving of the law" means the same thing here.

This extraordinary advantage was possessed by no other nation until the Christian era, when the gospel of God's grace in Christ and the books that taught it were deliberately taken to the entire world by the apostles and early missionaries in obedience to Christ's express command.

5. The temple worship. This phrase refers to the extensive set of regulations for the religious rituals to be practiced first at the tabernacle and then at the temple in Jerusalem. It involves the construction of the temple itself, the laws governing the various sacrifices, and the times of the year for and nature of the specified holy days of Israel. The importance of these things is that they were designed to show the way in which a sinful human being could approach the thrice holy God. God must be approached by means of a blood sacrifice, which testified to the gravity of sin ("the wages of sin is death," Rom. 6:23) and to the way in which an innocent substitute could die in the sinner's place. Eventually all such sacrifices, which were only figures of the ultimate and true sacrifice, were brought to completion and fulfilled by Jesus Christ.

6. The promises. The Old Testament is filled with many promises of one sort or another, but in this context "promises" refers to the promises of redemption to be fulfilled by the Messiah, who is Jesus Christ. Paul talks about this at length in Galatians 3.

7. The patriarchs. The "patriarchs" are the three fathers of the Jewish nation, namely, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, though in a looser sense such distinguished ancestors as Moses and David should also be included. These were all illustrious men to whom God revealed himself in special ways and through whom he worked to call out and bless his ancient people. To have such devout, saintly, and influential men in one's past is rightly regarded by Paul as a significant national distinction of which Jewish people could all justly be proud.

8. The human ancestry of Christ. Everything Paul has said to this point would have been soundly echoed by his Jewish opponents, for they, too, regarded all these spiritual advantages highly, though they misunderstood and misused some of them. This is not the case with the last item Paul mentions, for they would have understood > at once that Paul is referring here to Jesus of Nazareth, and they had no intention of recognizing Jesus as their national Messiah. Yet Paul cannot leave this matter out, if for no other reason than that everything he has mentioned thus far leads up to Jesus.

This is not a random collection of items. There is actually a very close connection between these advantages, according to which each rightly leads to the one following and all lead to Christ. Adoption is the right starting point, for it places the source of salvation in God's electing grace, just as is the case also for believers in Christ. Having chosen to enter into a special relationship with his people, the next step was for God to reveal himself to them in a special way, which is what the word glory describes. God has done that for us in Christ, for he is where God's glory must be seen today (John 2:11; 2 Cor. 3:18). When God revealed himself to the people, as he did at Mount Sinai, it was to enter into special covenants or agreements with them, to give them the law by which they were to live, to show the way of salvation through the temple rituals, and to point forward the full realization of their spiritual inheritance when the Messiah should at last be revealed.

The flow of God's actions reaches back to the patriarchs, with which it began, and forward to the coming of Jesus, in whom it culminates (v. 5). These verses are as full and reasoned a statement of the blessings of God to Israel and the spiritual advantages of Old Testament religion as could possibly be given. Israel truly lacked nothing. The nation was enriched with every spiritual blessing and advantage.

Advantages Alone Do Not Save

And yet, the nation as a nation was not saved. It is true that certain Jews were. Paul is going to make that point repeatedly in the following chapters. But nationally—that is, speaking of Israel as a nation—it is nevertheless also true that these great advantages, the greatest spiritual advantages that could possibly be imagined for any people anywhere, did not in themselves guarantee salvation, which is the reason for the great sorrow that Paul has so intensely and poignantly expressed.

In spite of the adoption, in spite of the divine glory, in spite of the covenants, in spite of possessing the law, in spite of the temple worship with its important symbolism, in spite of the promises and the patriarchs—in spite of all these things—no one, not a nation, not an individual, is saved or can be saved apart from Jesus Christ.

This is what Paul himself had experienced. In his letter to the Philippians as well as here in Romans, he reminds us of his experiences in Judaism, saying that he put confidence in these external advantages in his early days. He uses the illustration of an asset and liability statement.

On the asset side he had placed seven items (Phil. 3:5-7).

There were four things that Paul had inherited: "circumcised on the eighth day" (which meant that he was a true Jew and not an Ishmaelite, who would have been circumcised later, or a proselyte, who would be circumcised as an adult), "of the people of Israel" (the covenant name of Israel embraces all the items listed at greater length in Romans), "of the tribe of Benjamin" (the only tribe that remained with Judah in the south at the time of the civil war and was later preserved with Judah, after the fall of the northern kingdom), and "a Hebrew of Hebrews" (that is, born of two Jewish parents).

There were three advantages that Paul has earned for himself. He had become "a Pharisee," the strictest sect of the Jews. He was zealous in his faith, which he proved by his persecution of the early Christian church. "As for legalistic righteousness," he was "faultless." That is, he kept the law as perfectly as he knew how.

What a tremendous set of advantages these were! Yet, when Paul met Jesus on the road to Damascus, he discovered at once that they were not enough. He had thought these items added up to salvation, that they made him a righteous person in God's sight. Instead, when he met Jesus and discovered what true righteousness was, he saw that they did not even begin to add up to righteousness, and he realized that, if he was going to be saved, it would have to be by a different means entirely. It would have to be by the righteousness of Jesus Christ imputed to him. It would have to be by grace.

And he also learned that the advantages he had thought were spiritual assets were, in fact, not assets. In reality those items were liabilities, for as long as he was trusting them, they were keeping him from Christ. What he had to do was move that entire list over into the column of liabilities, and in the column of assets write "Jesus Christ alone."

Nominal Christians

We must apply this to those who have been brought up in the Christian church and have benefited from its advantages. That may describe you, and if it does, the application of Romans 9:4 and 5 will be obvious. Here it is: Your spiritual advantages, however great they are or may have been, will not save you. You must be born again.

Some people think they are right with God simply because they have had Christian parents, like the Jews who boasted in the patriarchs or Paul, who took confidence from the fact that he was "a Hebrew of Hebrews." To be born into a Christian family and raised by Christian parents is a good thing, not to be despised. But if this has been your experience, you should realize that you will never be saved simply because you have had a believing father or a godly mother. They have imparted advantages to you. But you will not be saved by their lives or their faith. You must believe yourself. You must be following Jesus Christ. You must be born again.

Some people think they are right with God because they have been blessed by a Christian education, either in their home or in a good evangelical Sunday school or in a Christian high school or college. Their education has given them a great deal of sound theology and right answers to many important questions. But no one has ever been saved by head knowledge alone. The devils know more theology than any of us. They have had thousands of years to learn it. Yet they are not saved.

Perhaps you have been trusting in your membership in a Christian church. If you are a member of a sound, believing church, that is a great advantage, corresponding to Israel's adoption as a nation, her possession of the law, the rituals for the temple worship, and the promises. But membership in a church does not save anyone, any more than being a Jew has saved anyone. Today's churches are filled with people who are Christians in name only. There is nothing in their lives to give any indication that they have been touched by Jesus Christ or been drawn to him.

Even the sacraments will not save you, however valuable they are in pointing to the reality of our new life in Christ and the value of constantly feeding on him by faith.

Not long before I wrote this sermon, I was in Memphis, Tennessee, speaking on Christian discipleship, and I met a man who had corresponded with me some years before. He had sent me a book he had written, entitled Must Jesus Be Lord to Be Savior? Now he was reminding me of the testimony of his wife, which he had included in the book as an appendix. I remembered it at once because it was so helpful and vivid.

This woman—her name is Paula Webster—had been raised in a Christian home, had been given a Christian education, and was settled down in what seemed to be a Christian marriage. She was active in church, attended Bible conferences, and even had regular times of personal Bible study. She said that if anyone had asked her if she was a Christian, she would have said yes, immediately and emphatically. Yet something was missing. She knew about God, but she sensed that she did not actually know him. She felt frustrated and unhappy, and as far as her own spiritual life was concerned she knew she was getting nowhere.

As she studied the Bible she was particularly attracted to David and Paul, because each clearly had a heart for God. They knew about God. But in addition they each loved him and wanted to obey him as an expression of that love. As she studied their lives she realized that something was wrong with her own heart and asked God to change her.

God did! He taught her that she had never actually given herself to him and that the surrender of herself was necessary. She needed to become Jesus' genuine disciple.

Here, in her own words, is what happened: "At the moment I surrendered my life entirely to God, I knew that he had heard me and had accepted my surrender. I was conscious immediately that a great burden had been rolled away. I knew that I had been forgiven and cleansed. I knew that I had been changed. Peace, like a great calm following a storm at sea, and joy unspeakable filled my heart. I knew that the great war within had ceased. The sense that all had been made right replaced the agitation and restlessness I had felt only minutes before. I had finally been subdued and conquered by the Lord of Glory before whom I now gladly and gratefully bowed. And he no longer seemed distant or impersonal, nor I unclean and unsure before him.... I had been born again."

She confessed that her earlier faith had been a dead faith only, an intellectual acceptance of facts relating to Jesus, and that the advantages she had received in a Christian environment had not changed her heart.

I am sure that describes many hundreds of people who will read this study in book form. How am I sure? It is because there is so much nominal Christianity. You may be such a Christian, and if that is the case, this testimony should move you. Have you had spiritual advantages? If you have had them, thank God. But do not trust in those advantages. Seek God himself, and do not rest until you can say that the burden of your sin has been rolled away and that you are truly a new creature in Jesus Christ.

Chapter 125.
Jesus, Who Is God

Romans 9:5

The opening paragraph of Romans 9 lists the extraordinary privileges and advantages of the Jews, God's ancient people. In the words of Paul, they have been given "the adoption as sons... the divine glory, the covenants, the receiving of the law, the temple worship... the promises [and]... the patriarchs." But to this extraordinary list of privileges Paul now adds the greatest privilege of all, namely, that they are those through whom the Redeemer of the human race has come.

"... from them is traced the human ancestry of Christ, who is God over all, forever praised!
Amen."

This is a very striking statement. For Paul is not only saying that the Messiah was born of Israel, that is, that he was a Jew. He is also saying that this Jewish Messiah, born of Israel according to the flesh, is, in fact, God. And he is saying it in stark language. If we substitute the name Jesus for Christ, which we can do, since Paul is obviously writing about Jesus, we have the statement: "Jesus, who is God over all, forever praised!" Or, to simplify it even further, "Jesus... is God over all." The sentence means that Jesus is himself the only and most high God. A

Hotly Disputed Text

This is so extreme a statement—and, as some would say, a statement so uncharacteristic of the New Testament writers—that from the time of the Reformation forward numerous commentators and Bible teachers have attempted to understand it differently. This has made Romans 9:5 one of the most hotly disputed texts of the New Testament.

Basically, there are two main interpretations of this verse. The first is what we have in the New International Version: "Christ, who is God over all, forever praised!" This is what most other English versions of the New Testament also say essentially, and it is how nearly all the ancient writers also understood it.

The second interpretation is based on the fact that there are almost no marks of punctuation in the Greek texts of the New Testament and that the phrase may therefore, at least in theory, be broken up. This was proposed first by the Dutch humanist Erasmus of Rotterdam, who was a contemporary of Martin Luther. According to this interpretation, a period should be added to the verse, either after the word flesh (which follows "Christ" in the Greek text) or after the words over all.

In the first case the sentence would read, "... from them is traced the human ancestry of Christ. God who is over all be forever praised!"

In the second case the translation would be: "... from them is traced the human ancestry of Christ, who is over all. God be forever praised!" Each of these is essentially one interpretation, since each is designed to avoid calling Jesus "God" explicitly. These alternate translations are indicated in the footnote to the New International Version.

What should we say about this contested passage? The first thing we must say is that almost all arguments, especially grammatical arguments, favor the translation that calls Jesus "God" explicitly. Here are a few:

1. The word order favors it. In the Greek language, as in most other languages, including English, the relative pronoun follows the noun to which it refers. In this text the order of nouns and pronouns is: Christ, who, and God. "Who" should refer to Christ, which is the noun that comes immediately before, and the meaning should be "Christ, who is... God." To make the verse mean "God, who..."violates the word order. Of course, the period could be placed after the relative clause, which would solve the word order problem ("Christ, who is over all. God be forever praised!"). But in that case, the translation has the following difficulty.
2. A doxology should begin with the word blessed. The proper form for a doxology is "Blessed be God [or some person]...." But in order to separate God from Christ, which this interpretation tries to do, the order would be "God," followed by "blessed."

3. A doxology is out of place in this passage. It is appropriate to praise God in a passage that speaks of some great spiritual achievement or triumph, as Paul does at the end of Romans 11, for example. But why should God be praised here, in a passage in which Paul has been expressing acute personal sorrow for the Jews' rejection of Jesus? In Romans 11, quite differently, the doxology comes after Paul has explained that in spite of the overall rejection of God by Israel, God is nevertheless going to save the mass of the nation one day.

4. The reference to Christ being "after the flesh" requires a phrase pointing to his deity. We have this in Romans 1, where Paul writes of Jesus, "who as to his human nature was a descendant of David, and who through the Spirit of holiness was declared with power to be the Son of God by his resurrection from the dead" (vv. 3-4). If Jesus is not identified as God in Romans 9:5, the antithesis is lacking.

Affirmations of Christ's Deity

The one powerful argument for the interpretation that separates the words Christ and God by a period is that, according to its proponents, Paul nowhere else explicitly calls Jesus "God." This seems to have carried weight with the translators of the New International Version, since it is the only reason why they would have placed the alternative translations, which I mentioned above, in the footnote.

We have to admit at this point that there is an obvious reticence among the New Testament writers to say starkly that "Jesus is God." And for good reason. Without explanation, a statement like this might be understood as teaching that God left heaven in order to come to earth in the person of the human Jesus, leaving heaven without his presence. Each of the New Testament writers knew that this is not an accurate picture. Each was aware of the doctrine of the Trinity, according to which God is described as being one God but existing in three persons: Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. Since Jesus is the Son of God, it was customary for them to call him that, rather than simply "God," reserving the unembellished word God for God the Father.

This is why Jesus is not often called God explicitly.

Yet, although it is unusual to find Jesus called God for the reasons just given, it is not the case that he is never called God.

We think of the Gospel of John, for instance. At the very beginning of that Gospel, John writes: "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. He was with God in the beginning" (vv. 1-2, emphasis added). A bit later "the Word" is identified as Jesus (v. 14), so the text says that Jesus is God. True, the verses are written so as to distinguish the persons of the Father and Son within the Trinity. But they nevertheless identify Jesus as God explicitly.

Later in John's Gospel we find the same thing in Thomas's great confession, which is the Gospel's spiritual climax. "Thomas said to him, 'My Lord and my God!'" John 20:28).

Acts 20:28 is another relevant passage. Here Paul is speaking to elders of the church at Ephesus, telling them to, "be shepherds of the church of God, which he bought with his own blood." The blood that was the price of our redemption is the blood of Christ, but here it is called the blood of God. The only way Paul could make this identification is by thinking of Christ as being God so directly and naturally that what he posits of one can without any violence also be said of the other.

Hebrews 1:8 calls Jesus "God" by applying Psalm 45:6-7 to him: "Your throne, O God, will last for ever and ever...."

The best example of an identification of Jesus with God in Paul's writings, apart from our text, is Titus 2:13-14, where Paul writes, "We wait for the blessed hope—the glorious appearing of our great God and Savior, Jesus Christ...." Apart from the context, the words God and Savior could mean only "God the Father and God the Son." But since Paul is writing of the second coming and sudden appearance of Jesus, both words must refer to him, for it is not God the Father who is going to appear suddenly but rather "our great God and Savior," who is Jesus.

So it is not true that Paul never identifies Jesus with God explicitly. He does, as do other New Testament writers, in spite of the reticence and care with which they usually write. However, even if it were the case that Paul nowhere else explicitly identifies Jesus as God, that fact alone does not prove that he cannot do it here—which, in fact, he does.

I like what John Calvin says of the attempt to separate God from Christ by splitting up the text in the way I have described. He writes wisely, "To separate this clause from the rest of the context for the purpose of depriving Christ of this clear witness to his divinity is an audacious attempt to create darkness where there is full light."

Even better is the judgment of Robert Haldane: "The Scriptures have many real difficulties, which are calculated to try or to increase the faith and patience of the Christian, and are evidently designed to enlarge his acquaintance with the Word of God by obliging him more diligently to search into them [sic] and place his dependence on the Spirit of truth. But when language so clear as in the present passage is perverted to avoid recognizing the obvious truth contained in the divine testimony, it more fully manifests the depravity of human nature and the rooted enmity of the carnal mind against God, than the grossest works of the flesh."

Like many other commentators and Bible teachers, I find Romans 9:5 to be one of the most sublime testimonies to the full deity of the Lord Jesus Christ in all the Bible.

The Teaching of the Passage

Yet this is not all the passage teaches. It actually contains four very important teachings, including Jesus' deity.

1. The humanity of Jesus. The first heresy in church history was the denial of the true humanity of Christ. It was called docetism, from the Greek word dokeo, which means "to seem." It taught that Jesus only seemed to be a man. In some forms it taught that the Spirit of Christ came upon the man Jesus at the time of his baptism by John, but that it left him just before the crucifixion, since it was not possible for God to die, according to Greek thinking. There is none of this in the New Testament. For here in Romans 9:5, as in many other passages, the biblical writers are united in their insistence that Jesus was a true human being, a descendant of Abraham according to the flesh.

This has a number of important implications, for it means that God not only fully understands but has also himself likewise experienced all that we experience as human beings.

Do we hunger? Jesus hungered many times, specifically when he was in the wilderness being tempted of the devil.

Do we experience thirst? Jesus thirsted on the cross.

Do we experience rejection and misunderstanding by friends, hostility from enemies, pain, suffering, and even death? So did Jesus, and in a form and with an intensity far greater than anything we might experience.

Even more important perhaps, Jesus experienced temptation just as we do, so that he might be a helper to us when we go through it. The Book of Hebrews says, "For we do not have a high priest who is unable to sympathize with our weaknesses, but we have one who has been tempted in every way, just as we are—yet was without sin" (Heb. 4:15).

The doctrine of Christ's humanity is of great importance for us if we are to live a victorious Christian life.

2. The deity of Jesus. As I have said, the earliest heresy in the history of the church was the denial of Christ's humanity. But today the case is the exact opposite. Few would deny his humanity, since to our way of thinking Jesus was obviously a man, even an exemplary man. We do not deny this. Instead there are strong, numerous, and popular attempts to deny his deity. Countless numbers of our contemporaries regard Jesus as having been nothing but a man.

Far more is lost with this denial than in denying Christ's humanity. What is lost is the value of his atonement for sin, for no mere man, however good, would be able to pay the infinite price required for our redemption. In the Middle Ages there was a great English scholar named Anselm who saw this clearly and wrote about it in a book that has become a classic. It is called Cur Deus Homo?, which means "Why the God Man?" or, more naturally, "Why Did God Become Man?" Anselm answered that God became man in Christ because only one who was both God and man could achieve our salvation.

Here is his classic statement of this truth: "It would not have been right for the restoration of human nature to be left undone, and... it could not have been done unless man paid what was owing to God for sin. But the debt was so great that, while man alone owed it, only God could pay it, so that the same person must be both man and God. Thus it was necessary for God to take manhood into the unity of his Person, so that he who in his own nature ought to pay and could not should be in a person who could.... The life of this one man was so sublime, so precious, that it can suffice to pay what is owing for the sins of the whole world, and infinitely more."

This combination of Christ's humanity and deity, and the reason for it, makes Calvary the very center of the Christian faith. It is the reason the Son of God came to earth. There is no gospel without it.

3. The supremacy of Jesus. But Jesus did not only die, humbling himself for our salvation. He also rose again and has now ascended to heaven, where he is honored as God, having being given the name that is above every name, even the name of God (Jehovah) himself. This is Paul's teaching in Philippians 2, where he writes of Jesus:

> And being found in appearance as a man, he > humbled himself and became obedient to > death— even death on a cross!
> Therefore God exalted him to the highest place > and gave him the name that is above every name,

that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, in heaven and on earth and under the earth, and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.

Philippians 2:8-11

If Jesus Christ is Lord, as these passages say he is, the supremacy of Christ described in Romans 9:5 ("who is God over all") includes his rule over us, who are his people, and we are not his people if we fail to submit to that rule.

There is a great deal of bad thinking and even error in this area at the present time. It has become customary in some places to think of Christianity as a two-stage commitment. In the first stage we come to Jesus as Savior, simply believing on him as the one who died for sin. In the second we come to him as Lord, thereby becoming serious about our Christianity and about being Christ's disciples. But nothing like that is found in the New Testament. On the contrary, to become a Christian is to become a disciple and vice versa. In fact, that is the way Jesus himself spoke of evangelism in the Great Commission, since he sent his disciples to "make disciples of all nations" (Matt. 28:19, emphasis mine). Submitting to Christ's lordship is the very essence of true faith, or Christianity.

4. The rightness of praising Jesus. The fourth doctrine taught in Romans 9:5 is the rightness of praising Jesus, for the text reads, "Christ, who is God over all, forever praised!" It raises two questions: "Do we praise him?" and "Do we praise him as we should?"

The answer to the second question is obviously no, for no mere human or earthly words can be adequate for praising Christ properly. Yet we should do it, knowing that it will be our privilege, joy, and glory to praise Jesus Christ in heaven forever. The angels are doing it. They sing:

Worthy is the Lamb, who was slain, to receive power and wealth and wisdom and strength and honor and glory and praise!

Revelation 5:12

According to Revelation, one day we are going to join with them, crying,
To him who sits on the throne and to the Lamb be praise and honor and glory and power, for ever and ever!

Revelation 5:13

So let's do it now! Let us praise our Savior, who is God over all, as best we know how—and live for him until he comes again.

The Greatest Tragedy

I have one last thought as I return to the paragraph in Romans from which our text is taken. We have seen that Paul is expressing sorrow over the fact that the ancient nation of Israel had as a whole rejected Jesus and that, in that context, the ascription of deity to Jesus is appropriate as conveying the full tragedy of the Jews' rejection. It is bad enough that the nation should have missed the full value of the other privileges listed: the adoption, the divine glory, the covenants, the law, the temple worship, the promises, and the patriarchs. But it is a tragedy beyond description that they should have rejected Jesus as the Messiah whom God had promised.

Yet we also need to say more. However tragic the Jews' rejection of Jesus may have been (and is), the rejection of Jesus by others, both Jews and Gentiles, is equally tragic today, perhaps even more so, since the gospel has been so widely proclaimed and been so amply defended in the many centuries of subsequent church history.

It would be especially tragic if you yourself should reject him, either forcefully ("I will not have this man to rule over me") or by neglect ("Speak to me about it again, some other time"). If you are doing either of those two things, how can we who know Jesus have anything other than "great sorrow and unceasing anguish" in our hearts for you? To reject our words is nothing, but to reject him is a loss of cosmic proportions. So we say, "Do not reject him. Believe on him."

God is making his appeal through us as we say with Paul, "Be reconciled to God" (2 Cor. 5:20) and remind you that "God made him who had no sin to be sin for us, so that in him we might become the righteousness of God" (v. 21). That is the gospel. Do not allow the opportunity to respond to that wonderful message pass you by.

Part Twelve: The Justification of God

Chapter 126.
True Israel

Romans 9:6

Several years ago I read about a champion woodcarver from Bavaria who found a piece of wood in the mouth of a sack of grain. The wood was the same color as the grains of wheat, so he took it into his head to carve the wood into imitation grains. He carved a handful of them, mixed them with some real wheat, and then invited his friends to tell them apart. The woodcarver had done the work so well that no one could tell the difference. Even he was unable to tell the imitation grains from the true wheat. In the end the only way to distinguish the true from the false kernels was to place the grains in water. After a few days the real grain sprouted, while the imitation grain remained exactly what it was before: dead wood.

There is a parallel here to those who profess to be God's people. To human eyes there may be a time when some of the true children of God are almost indistinguishable from people who are merely behaving as believers or are circulating among believers. But the difference is there nevertheless. It has been put there by God. And in the end, since some of these people have the life of God within them and some do not, these who possess that life will show it by their spiritual growth.

Natural Israel and Spiritual Israel

The distinction between those who seem to be spiritual children and those who actually are is critical to understanding the next section of Romans. But in order to see it we have to step back a bit and review what Paul is saying.

Paul is dealing with a troublesome problem faced by himself and the other early preachers of the gospel. The original Christians were Jews. Thus they very naturally began obeying the Great Commission by witnessing to their Jewish family members, Jewish friends, and Jewish neighbors. Since the promises of the Messiah were to Israel and since Jesus of Nazareth was that Messiah, according to their belief and understanding, Israel should have been willing to embrace him. But Israel as a whole did not, and as time went on the people who were becoming Christians and the largest number of emerging Christian churches were overwhelmingly Gentile.

This was a severe disappointment to the early evangelists, even a great sorrow, as Paul's opening paragraph in Romans 9 makes clear. But even more than this, it was a theological dilemma. The promises of God were to Israel, and yet Israel as a whole was unresponsive. Did this mean that God's promises to Israel had failed, that is, that God had himself failed? That God was impotent in the face of unbelief? Or did it mean that the promises of God could not be trusted? That in the matter of salvation God was simply free to change his mind?

This is the problem Paul wrestles with in the middle section of Romans, chapters 9 through 11. He has a number of arguments, which I summarized in the initial study in this volume. But the first of these, introduced in Romans 9:6, is that the promises of God were not made to all the physical descendants of Abraham, but only to those whom God had elected to salvation and in whom he had therefore implanted or was implanting life.

Paul states this by saying, "It is not as though God's word had failed. For not all who are descended from Israel are Israel." A little later and in a similar way, he contrasts those who are Abraham's "descendants" with those who are his true "children" (v. 7).

At first glance this argument may seem to be merely a novel idea, perhaps even an "argument from desperation," as some would have it. But it is nothing of the sort. That not all Israel was true Israel was already an Old Testament perception. In the following verses, which we will explore in the next study, Paul shows that the distinction goes back to the patriarchs themselves. But even if this original distinction should be discounted, every Jew was aware of the contrast made by the prophets between the nation as a whole and the remnant. In the declining days of ancient Jewish history leading up to the overthrow of the northern kingdom by the Assyrians in 721 B.C. and the destruction of the southern kingdom by the Babylonians in 586 B.C., it was increasingly obvious that the nation as a whole was apostate and that only a few Jews gave any indication of being among God's genuine people.

It was the same at the coming of Christ. The nation as a whole was going about its business with little true faith at all, just as most people, both Jew and Gentile, do today. It was only a few individuals, like Joseph and Mary, Elizabeth and Zechariah, Simeon and Anna, "who were looking forward to the redemption of Jerusalem" (Luke 2:38).

When Jesus appeared on the scene to begin his public ministry, he, too, made the distinction. In fact, this is one of the earliest things recorded of him. In John 1:43-46, we are told how Jesus called Philip to be one of his disciples and how Philip immediately found his friend Nathanael and brought him to Jesus. When Jesus saw Nathanael he said, "Here is a true Israelite..." (v. 47). It was the precise distinction Paul is making in this chapter.

Nor should we overlook the fact that Paul has already made this contrast in Romans. In the second chapter he was trying to show that even highly moral and religious Jews need the gospel, like Gentiles, because neither the law, which they fail to keep, nor circumcision, the outward mark of the covenant people, can save them. Circumcision, like other religious ceremonies, has value only if it corresponds to an internal transformation. It is the heart that must be circumcised. Paul's summary says, "A man is not a Jew if he is only one outwardly, nor is circumcision merely outward and physical. No, a man is a Jew if he is one inwardly; and circumcision is circumcision of the heart, by the Spirit, not by the written code" (Rom. 2:28-29a).

How could it be otherwise, so long as we are dealing with spiritual matters and with God, who does not deal only with appearances but with reality? Clearly, God is not deceived by ceremonies.

What Is Required

What is required for one to be a true Israelite? We have already looked at a long list of things that are not required, at least things that do not in themselves make one a true child of God. They are the items Paul lists in verses 2 through 5: "the adoption... the divine glory... the receiving of the law... the temple worship... the promises... [and] the patriarchs." These are real privileges that impart important spiritual advantages. But they do not bring salvation themselves. Indeed, not even being in the line that produced the Messiah is advantageous for salvation.

What, then, is required?

There is only one answer, and Paul has already developed it fully in the earlier parts of the letter. It is faith, saving faith in Jesus of Nazareth as the Son of God and Savior. It is belief that Jesus died in our place, taking our sins upon himself, and that by faith in him we are delivered from the punishment due us for those transgressions and instead are counted as righteous through the righteousness of Christ. The "true Israel" of the Old Testament looked forward to Jesus' coming and believed on him whom they did not yet know. The "true Israel" of the New Testament looks backward in time, believing on him who has come and whom they do know.

Paul's chief example of such faith is Abraham, whose story is told in summary form in Romans 4. Abraham was not saved by circumcision, because he was declared to be righteous before God in Genesis 15:6, which was years before his later circumcision. Nor was he saved by keeping the law, because no one, not even Abraham, is able to keep the law perfectly. The law only brings wrath and condemnation. Besides, the law was not even given until the time of Moses, which was four hundred years after Abraham's time. How, then, was Abraham saved? It was by faith, which is what made Abraham a true Israelite.

Paul says that "the promise comes by faith, so that it may be by grace and may be guaranteed to all Abraham's offspring—not only to those who are of the law but also to those who are of the faith of Abraham. He is the father of us all. As it is written: 'I have made you a father of many nations.' He is our father in the sight of God, in whom he believed —the God who gives life to the dead and calls things that are not as though they were" (Rom. 4:16-17).

As Paul will show, it is that call of God followed by faith that makes one a true member of God's family.

Cultural Christians and True Christians

This is also true for those who call themselves Christians. That is, not all who call themselves Christians or who are thought of as Christians are true Christians.

Some years ago an English writer named Leslie Stephen said that the name "Christian has become one of the vaguest epithets in the language." This is true, perhaps even more so today than when those words were spoken. To many Jews, the name Christian is nearly synonymous with "goy" or "Gentile," so that for them the world is divided basically into two great parts: Jews and Christians. Other people speak of "Christian nations," by which they usually mean the western nations, those of Europe, the United States, Canada, and some others. They do this even though the cultural life of these nations is inconsistent with Christian teaching and only a small proportion of people in some of those countries ever attend a place of worship on Sunday.

What is happening? Obviously, it is a case of there being many who bear the name "Christian" but who are not actually Christians.

What is a true Christian?

The name itself gives us a clue, since it literally means "a Christ one." Let's approach it by its origins. The first time this name was used was in ancient Antioch of Syria in the early days of the expansion of the gospel beyond Palestine. Antioch was an immoral place. It had several great temples at which cultic prostitution was practiced, and the moral tone of the city was so bad that Antioch had become a byword for depravity in the ancient world. The city was on the Orontes River. So, on one occasion, when an orator in Rome wanted to describe the worsening moral conditions of his city, he observed that the Orontes had been diverted so as to flow into the Tiber. It was the equivalent of calling the Orontes a sewer that was carrying the filth of the eastern city into Rome.

In this degenerate city, God planted a body of genuine believers whom the pagans of Antioch began to call Christians. The Christians did not call themselves Christians. They had other names for themselves. They called themselves "people of The Way," "saints" (or separated ones), "disciples," "brothers," and other descriptive titles. Jews did not call them Christians, because Christ means "Messiah," and the Jews would never have called the sect of the Nazarene by that name.

No, the believers were first called Christians by the heathen, and for obvious reasons. The believers were enamored of Christ and followed so closely after Christ that the pagans could hardly think of a believer without thinking of the Jesus he or she was following. They were "Christ's people."

Theologically, this has several parts. It means that:

1. Christians believe in Christ. The Christ of the early Christian community, and of all true

Christians everywhere, is the Christ of the New Testament, which means that he is the Son of God who became a man for our salvation. This is the one on whom the Christians believed. Moreover, this belief was no mere intellectual conviction. I have often said that faith (or belief) has three elements. The first is its intellectual content: who Jesus is and what he has done for our salvation. The second is the warming of the heart: being moved by Jesus' sacrifice on our behalf. The third is personal commitment, the most important part of all. It means giving oneself to Jesus, becoming his, taking up his cross, being a disciple.

This is what the believers in Antioch had done. They had committed themselves to Jesus so thoroughly that the pagans who looked on said, "They are Christ ones, Christians."

2. Christians follow Christ. There was a second characteristic of these first Christians, which is also characteristic of all true Christians at all times. It is wrapped up in the matter of commitment, as I have just indicated: Christians are followers of Jesus. That is, if they have believed on him in a saving way and not merely by some mere abstract intellectual assent to his deity, then they are following after him on the path he sets before them. That path is the path of obedience, and as they walk along it they become increasingly like the one they are following and obeying.

This is an important dimension of what it means to be a Christian. To be a Christian means to believe on Jesus, surely. But it also means to be following after Jesus and thus becoming increasingly like him. A true Christian is someone who is becoming like Jesus Christ.

3. Christians witness to Christ. I think there must have been another reason why the early Christians were called Christians, and it is that they were apparently always talking about their Savior. The name of Jesus was constantly on their tongues, his gospel consistently on their hearts, and his glory uppermost in their minds. They were always looking for others whom they could tell about him, and they were always praying and working at their witness so that these others might be saved.

It is significant in this respect that the first great missionary movement of the church began in Antioch. We are told about it in Acts 13: "While they were worshiping the Lord and fasting, the Holy Spirit said, 'Set apart for me Barnabas and Saul for the work to which I have called them.'

So after they had fasted and prayed, they placed their hands on them and sent them off" (vv. 2-3). Paul undertook three missionary journeys at the direction of this church and with accountability to it, for at the end of each assignment he reported back to the congregation what God had done to save other Gentiles and some Jews through him.

We cannot forget that Jesus himself said that his followers would be witnesses: "You will receive power when the Holy Spirit comes on you; and you will be my witnesses in Jerusalem, and in all Judea and Samaria, and to the ends of the earth" (Acts 1:8).

4. Christians learn more and more about Christ. Here is a fourth thing that is characteristic of true Christians. They want to learn more about Jesus. We are told of the Christians at Antioch that after Barnabas had gone to their city to encourage the infant church in its faith, he then went to Tarsus in Turkey to look for Paul, whom he remembered from earlier days (Acts 11:22-25). When he found him, he brought him back to Antioch so that "for a whole year Barnabas and Saul met with the church and taught great numbers of people" (v. 26a). It is significant that it was immediately after this, after the Christians at Antioch had been carefully taught about Jesus, that they "were first called Christians" (v. 26b).

As they learn about Jesus Christ, Christians naturally become more like him, intensify their love for him, and witness about him to others.

A Time for Self-Examination

The point of all this is that each of us who calls himself or herself a Christian should be led to self-examination. And what we should ask ourselves is: "Am I a true Christian, or am I a Christian in name only?" This is a serious question and a necessary one. For if Israel—with all the spiritual advantages that Paul mentions in Romans 9—could be composed of thousands or even millions who were not true Israel, it is certain that the visible church of Jesus Christ in our day is filled with many who are actually unbelievers.

Paul told the Corinthians, "Examine yourselves to see whether you are in the faith; test yourselves" (2 Cor. 13:5a).

Peter told his readers, "Therefore, my brothers, be all the more eager to make your calling and election sure" (2 Peter 1:10a).

How can we test ourselves? How can we be sure we are Christians? There are a number of specific questions to be answered that pertain to the matters I have just been discussing.

1. Do I believe on Christ? The first requirement is faith, because faith is our point of contact with the gospel. Paul told the Philippian jailer, "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and you will be saved" (Acts 16:31a). Ask yourself, "Have I believed on Jesus?" Not, "Have I believed on him in broad cultural terms?"—like anyone in the western world might be expected to do, especially if he or she has been raised in a Christian home or has attended a Christian church. But rather, "Have I been touched by knowledge of Jesus' death for me, and have I committed myself to him?

Am I serious about following after Christ, obeying his commands, and pleasing him?"

2. Am I following after Christ? The first question leads to the next: "Am I actually Jesus' follower?" The way Jesus called his followers was by the words Follow me. And when they did follow him, their lives were inevitably redirected. Some had been fishermen, but when they began to follow Jesus they became fishers of men. One had been a tax collector, but after he had followed Jesus, he became concerned with the currency of heaven. Nobody who has begun to follow Jesus Christ has ever been entirely the same or walked in the same paths afterward.

So ask yourself: "Has my life been redirected? Is there anything I am doing now that I did not do before or would not be doing were I not committed to Jesus? And are there things I have stopped doing? Is Jesus my very own Lord and Savior?"

3. Do I testify to Christ? This is a harder point for true self-examination, because it is easier for some to talk about Jesus than for others. It is easier for some to talk about nearly anything than for others. Nevertheless, this is an important question and one worth asking. If you never speak to anyone about Jesus, how can you suppose that you really care about him and love him, not to mention caring about and loving the other person, who needs to receive the Savior?

Nominal Christians do not talk about Jesus. They are content to let everyone believe as he or she likes. They wouldn't think of trying to impose their beliefs on others. But not all who are Christians are true Christians, just as "not all who are descended from Israel are Israel."

Examine yourself. Do you testify of Jesus?

4. Am I learning about Christ? The last of the four questions I have posed for determining whether or not you are a genuine Christian is: "Am I trying to learn more and more about Jesus Christ? Do I know more about him today than I did at the time of my conversion? Or at this time last year?"

I know people who claim to be Christians who never go to a Bible study, never take notes of a sermon and, as far as I can determine, never seriously study the Bible on their own. If you are one of them how can you think of yourself as a Christian when you have no interest in learning about the one who gave himself for you? How can you consider yourself a believer when you really don't care about Jesus?

Over the last few years I have been talking with diverse Christian leaders, and the one thing most of them say is that they see no hope for the United States or for American Christianity apart from a revival. The drift is so obviously downward. But what is a revival? A revival is the reviving of the alleged people of God, and it is preceded by an awakening in which many who thought themselves to be Christians come to their right senses and recognize that they are not new creatures in Christ and that all is not well with their souls. Revival begins in the church, not in the world. It begins with people like you.

I, too, think we need a revival. But I do not see it happening. I want it to happen. I do not see it. But if it happens, why should it not begin with us? With you? May God grant it for his mercy's sake.

Chapter 127.
Three Generations of Election

Romans 9:7-12

I want to begin this study by saying that, in my judgment, we are now entering into the most difficult portion of the entire Bible, more difficult even than those very confusing sections in Daniel, Revelation, and other books that deal with prophecy. Romans 9-11 is concerned with election. But it is not this alone that makes these chapters difficult. What is really difficult is that these chapters, particularly chapter 9, also deal with the negative counterpart to election, the doctrine of reprobation (passing over of those who are not elected to salvation), and that they are written to prove that God is right in doing so.

The proper name for this kind of discussion is "theodicy." A theodicy is an attempt to vindicate the justice of God in his actions.

In this study we begin with the positive side of God's actions: election, which is the easiest place to start. But already we can hear objections. Some objections are pragmatic: "Why are Reformed people always harping on the doctrine of election?" We do not actually do this, of course; usually we speak of other doctrines. But election is so objectionable to most people that it sticks in their memories and makes them think that we are always talking about it.

A second class of objections is theological: "How can election be true? If election is true, free will is impossible, and we all know that we have free will." Or, "If election is true, why should we evangelize?" Election and free will are not incompatible, as we have seen before in these studies and will see again. But an explanation of why they are not incompatible takes time, and most people are not willing to wait for the explanation.

Other objections are belligerent: "If election is true, God is not just. I could never believe in a God like that." That, of course, is the question with which theodicy deals, and we will come to it.

A Basis in Fact

Where do we begin? I suggest that we begin exactly where the apostle begins in Romans, namely, with the fact of election itself. The reasons are obvious. First, there is no sense arguing over the justice of God in electing some to salvation and passing over others unless we are first convinced that he does. If we do not believe this, we will not waste our time puzzling over it. Second, if we are convinced that God elects to salvation, as Paul is going to insist he does, we will approach even the theodicy question differently. We will approach it to find understanding, rather than arrogantly trying to prove that God cannot do what the Bible clearly teaches.

To seek understanding is one thing. God encourages it. But to demand that God conform to our limited insights into what is just or right is another matter entirely.

So let me begin by saying that as long as we believe that God exercises any control over history or the lives of his people, then we must come to terms with election one way or another. It is inescapable.

Why? For this reason. When Jesus called his first disciples, he called twelve and not more. Others might very well have profited from having spent the following three years in close association with Jesus. But Jesus chose only twelve for this privilege. Moreover, when he sent his disciples into the world to tell others about him, by necessity each of these early preachers went in one direction rather than another. Philip went to Samaria. Barnabas went to Antioch. Later Paul and Barnabas went north to Asia Minor. Still later Paul and other companions went to Greece, then Italy, and eventually further west. In each case a choice was involved: north rather than south, west rather than east. If God was directing the movement of these servants of his at all, he was choosing that some should hear the gospel of grace rather than others, which is a form of election—even apart from the matter of a choice to call some to active faith by means of an internal call.

The same is true in our experience. If you believe that God is leading you to speak to someone about the gospel, it is an inescapable fact that you are speaking to that person rather than another. And even if a Christian friend should join you and speak to that other person, there are still millions who are inevitably passed by. Election is an inescapable fact of human history.

Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob

This is not the way Paul presents the doctrine, of course, though it is close enough to get us thinking along the right lines. What Paul does do is go back to the earliest moments in the history of the Jewish people, to the stories of the patriarchs—Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob—and show that election operated there. We remember, of course, that the apostle is trying to explain why not all Israel has been saved and why the fact that they have not been saved does not mean that God's purpose or promises have failed. In the case of these three fathers of the nation, he is going to show that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob became what they were by election and that others were not granted this privilege.

1. Abraham. Election is obvious in the case of Abraham, which is one reason why Paul does not discuss his case in detail, though he does mention him. Abraham had a pagan ancestry, having been born in the ancient city of Ur in Mesopotamia. He had no knowledge of the true God, because no one in Ur had knowledge of the true God. In fact, Abraham's family worshiped idols. Joshua said this explicitly in the sermon recorded in the twenty-fourth chapter of the book that bears his name: "This is what the LORD, the God of Israel, says: 'Long ago your forefathers, including Terah the father of Abraham and Nahor, lived beyond the River and worshiped other gods'" (Josh. 24:2). Years later, even after God had called Abraham out of this pagan environment and had taught him and through him had instructed Abraham's son and grandson about himself as the true God, idols were still possessed and cherished in this family, since Rachel, the wife of Jacob, hid them from her father when he came after them in the incident recorded in Genesis 31.

Abraham did not seek God. God sought Abraham. Since the call of Abraham is recorded in Genesis 12, every Jew would have to confess that Jewish history began with that election.

2. Isaac. But those to whom Paul is writing might argue that this is beside the point, which is probably also why Paul does not deal with Abraham's story at great length. They would admit that God had to start somewhere, after all. Besides, they might say, the matter being discussed is not whether God has elected the nation of Israel to some specific destiny apart from other nations. That much had been conceded by everyone. Paul himself has spoken of the adoption as sons, the divine glory, the covenants, the receiving of the law, and other privileges that were granted to Israel alone. No one disputed the election of the nation. The real issue was whether all the descendants of Abraham, that is, all Jews, were thereby saved, or whether the principle of choice and rejection also applies after the initial choice of Abraham.

In other words, does God continue to choose some but not all, some Jews and some Gentiles but not all from either category?

Since this is the issue, Paul begins his actual argument in verse 7 with the case of Abraham's son Isaac. His argument reads: "Not because they are his descendants are they all Abraham's children. On the contrary, 'It is through Isaac that your offspring will be reckoned.' In other words, it is not the natural children who are God's children, but it is the children of the promise who are regarded as Abraham's offspring. For this was how the promise was stated: 'At the appointed time I will return, and Sarah will have a son'" (vv. 7-9).

The point of this statement is that Abraham had another son. He had begotten Ishmael of Hagar, thirteen years before Isaac was born. Yet Ishmael was not chosen. He was Abraham's physical descendant, but he was not a child of promise as Isaac was.

There is something else in this example: the contrast between "natural" in the phrase "natural children" and "children of the promise" (v. 8). That contrast, plus the quotation from Genesis 18:10, 14 in verse 9, shows that the difference between Isaac and Ishmael was not merely that God elected Isaac and passed over the other son, but also that the choice of God involved a supernatural intervention in the case of Isaac's conception. Ishmael was born of Abraham's natural powers. But Isaac was conceived when Abraham was past the age of engendering children and when Sarah was past the age of conceiving and giving birth.

It is the same with our spiritual conception and new birth, which is the inevitable outworking of God's electing choice and is likewise supernatural. We cannot engender spiritual life in ourselves, for, according to Ephesians 2:1, we are spiritually dead. For us to become spiritually alive, God must do a miracle.

3. Jacob. Yet there is still an objection. Paul's readers could argue that Ishmael was not a pureblooded Jew. "It is true," they might say, "that Ishmael was the son of Abraham. Yet he was not the son of Sarah. He was the son of Hagar, and Hagar was only Sarah's servant. That is why Ishmael was not chosen."

In order to answer this point, Paul passes to the third generation of election, to the case of Rebekah's twin children, the sons Jacob and Esau. The words "not only that" in verse 10 show that he is continuing the argument. "Not only that, but Rebekah's children had one and the same father, our father Isaac. Yet, before the twins were born or had done anything good or bad—in order that God's purpose in election might stand: not by works but by him who calls—she was told, 'The older will serve the younger'" (vv. 10-12).

This is a remarkably effective example, since it proves everything that Paul needed or wanted to make his point.

First, Jacob and Esau were born of the same Jewish parents. That is, each was "a Hebrew of the Hebrews," the phrase Paul used to describe his own Jewish ancestry in Philippians 3:5. Each was a pure-blooded Jew. So there is no case of one having been chosen on the basis of a better ancestry and the other having been rejected on the basis of a lesser one. The supposed reason for the choice of Isaac over Ishmael is eliminated in the case of Jacob and Esau.

Second, the choice of Jacob rather than Esau went against the normal standards of primogeniture, according to which the elder should have received the greater blessing. True, the boys were twins. But Esau actually emerged from Rebekah's womb first, though Jacob was chosen. There is nothing to explain this except God's sovereign right to dispose of the destinies of human beings as he pleases, entirely apart from any rights thought to belong to us due to our age or other factors.

Third—and this is the most important point of all—the choice of Jacob instead of Esau was made before either child had opportunity to do either good or evil. It was made while the children were still in the womb. This means—we cannot miss it—that election is not on the basis of anything done by the individual chosen.

Moreover, the choice was made, at least in the case of Jacob, to teach the doctrine of election. That is what verses 11 and 12 say. "Yet, before the twins were born or had done anything good or bad—in order that God's purpose in election might stand: not by works but by him who calls..." (emphasis added). This means that God made his choice before the birth of Rebekah's sons to show that his choices are unrelated to anything a human being might or might not do. It is a case, as Paul will say just a few verses further on, that "God has mercy on whom he wants to have mercy" (v. 18).

Individuals or Nations?

I am aware that at this point many will already be saying, "But that's not fair. It is wrong for God to choose one and not another. To be fair, God has to give everyone a chance." We are going to come back to that question later and answer it. We are going to show that not only is salvation by election fair, it is the only thing that is fair. Besides, it is the only chance we have. It is election or nothing.

But before we get to that, there is another matter.

I have been writing about three generations of election in the cases of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. But there are people who admit Paul's teaching about election in these verses and yet regard it as the election of nations rather than of individuals. They say that it is an election of the Jewish nation only and that, if this is so, these verses have little, if anything, to say about election as it is commonly understood.

Is Romans 9 dealing with the election of Israel only? We need to think through the arguments carefully.

First, there are a few reasons to think that Paul is dealing with nations rather than individuals. For one thing, the Bible speaks elsewhere of Israel as an elect nation. So the idea of an election of a specific people to some predetermined destiny is not strange to Scripture.

Again, there is no question that the oracle spoken to Rebekah before the birth of Jacob and Esau did involve more than individuals. The Genesis 25:23 text says—though Paul does not quote this part, and the omission may itself be significant—that "two nations are in your womb, and two peoples from within you will be separated; one people will be stronger than the other..." (emphasis added). Later in Genesis a good bit of space is given to the nation that Esau founded, and the remainder is about Israel.

Again, it might be argued that Paul's overall argument in Romans 9-11 concerns the future place of Israel in God's plan. In fact, this is where he ends up: "And so all Israel will be saved, as it is written: 'The deliverer will come from Zion; he will turn godlessness away from Jacob. And

Good arguments, and yet not sufficient. For, in spite of the fact that Paul's overall argument in these chapters concerns the future of Israel as a nation, that is not the point he is making at the start of chapter 9. At this point he is distinguishing between individual Jews, some of whom have been elected to salvation and are therefore "true Israel," in contrast to others who have not been and are therefore Israel by physical descent alone. These latter may be the natural children of Abraham, but they are not his spiritual children. They are not children of the promise.

Of the more recent commentators, it is John Murray who works through these arguments most carefully, concluding like this: "The thesis that Paul is dealing with the election of Israel collectively and applying the clause in question [that "God's purpose in election might stand"] only to this feature of redemptive history would not meet the precise situation. The question posed for the apostle is: How can the covenant promise of God be regarded as inviolate when the mass of those who belong to Israel, who are comprised in the elect nation in terms of the Old Testament passages cited above (Deut. 4:37 et al.), have remained in unbelief and come short of the covenant passages?... Paul's answer is not the collective election of Israel but rather 'they are not all Israel, who are of Israel.' And this means, in terms of the stage of discussion at which we have now arrived, 'they are not all elect, who are of elect Israel.' As we found above, there is the distinction between Israel and the true Israel, between children and true children, between the seed and the true seed. In such a distinction resides Paul's answer to Israel's unbelief." What does this mean?

It means that although the biblical doctrine of election does not exclude the choice of nations for specific purposes in history, the doctrine does nevertheless also and more fundamentally refer to the choice of individuals—and that it is on this basis alone, not on any supposed right of birth or by the doing of works, that a person is brought into the covenant of salvation.

Radical Depravity and Election

How could it be otherwise, if the condition of fallen humanity is as bad as the Bible declares it to be? When we were studying the third chapter of Romans we saw that Paul's summary of the fall was expressed in these words:

> There is no one righteous, not even one; there is no one who understands, no one who seeks God.

This is an expression of what Reformed thinkers refer to as total or radical depravity. It means that there is not a portion of our being that has not been ruined by sin. Sin pervades all our actions and darkens all our natural understanding, with the result that, rather than fleeing to God, who is our only reasonable object of worship and our only hope of blessing, we flee from him.

How could a creature as depraved as that possibly come to God unless God should first set his saving choice upon him, regenerate him, and then call him to faith? How could a sinner like that believe the gospel unless God should first determine that he or she should believe it and then actually enable him or her to believe?

Of course, that is exactly what God does. In fact, we have already seen this action explained at length in Romans 8, where Paul spoke of a five-step process involving foreknowledge (or election), predestination, calling, justification, and glorification. Those five terms describe the very essence of salvation, and the significant thing is that God is the author of each one. It is he who foreknows, he who predestines, he who calls, he who justifies, and he who glorifies.

The only thing Paul is adding in Romans 9 is that this is entirely apart from any supposed right of birth or good works. It is due entirely to the will and mercy of the sovereign God.

Do you still have questions about this? If you do, I am not surprised. I have questions myself. It is why I have called Romans 9-11 the most difficult portion of the Bible. I also have questions about the doctrine of the Trinity and other matters. But although I have questions, I nevertheless believe these doctrines and rejoice in them. I am suggesting that you do, too. Why? Because election means that salvation is of God. It is his idea and his work, and therefore it is as solid as God himself is.

If salvation were up to me, I would blow it. Even if I could choose God savingly, which I cannot, I would soon unchoose him and so fall away and be lost. But because God chooses me, I can know that I am secure because of his eternal and sovereign determination. God began this good work. And "he who began [this] good work... will carry it on to completion until the day of Christ Jesus" (Phil. 1:6).

Did you know that the doctrine of election was the chief factor in the conversion of Charles Haddon Spurgeon, the great Baptist preacher of the nineteenth century? Spurgeon believed it and was blessed by it, because he knew his own spiritual inability. Apart from election, he knew he would be lost. Be like him. The more you are, the more you will rejoice in election, however puzzling parts of it may be.

Double Predestination

Romans 9:13-18

When I began the last study I pointed out that, in my judgment, we are examining the most difficult portion of the entire Bible. Not only because it deals with election, which troubles many, but even more because it deals with reprobation, the doctrine that God rejects or repudiates some persons to eternal condemnation in a way parallel but opposite to the way he ordains others to salvation. Reprobation is the teaching we come to specifically in Romans 9:13-18, which makes these verses an excessively difficult passage for many, if not most, people.

The doctrine is brought into our text by two Old Testament quotations: Malachi 1:2-3 ("Jacob I loved, but Esau I hated," cited in v. 13) and Exodus 9:16 ("I raised you [Pharaoh] up for this very purpose, that I might display my power in you and that my name might be proclaimed in all the earth," cited in v. 17).

Paul summarizes the teaching in these texts by concluding, "Therefore God has mercy on whom he wants to have mercy, and he hardens whom he wants to harden" (v. 18).

In the view of many people, the doctrine these verses express is a "monstrous doctrine" that turns God into an indifferent deity who sits in heaven arbitrarily assigning human destinies, saying, as it were, "This one to heaven, and I don't care. This one to hell, and I don't care."

This is a caricature, of course. But it is something we must deal with, since no one can seriously attempt to study or teach the Bible, as I am doing, without confronting it. More to the point, it is impossible to study election without also dealing with its negative counterpart. Some years ago the theme of the Philadelphia Conference on Reformed Theology, which I began in 1974, was "predestination," and the subject of reprobation was assigned to Dr. W. Robert Godfrey, professor of church history at Westminster Theological Seminary, Escondido, California. He had been talking to his wife about his subject and asked her what she thought he should call it.

She said, "Call it: 'Double or Nothing.'"

That may be a bit frivolous, but it is accurate, since it is impossible to have election, the positive side of predestination, without reprobation, which is the negative side. John Calvin recognized this, as have many others in the course of church history. He wrote, "Election [cannot] stand except as set over against reprobation."

It is easy to distort this doctrine, of course, as the caricature shows. We must proceed slowly and humbly, recognizing our own limited understanding. Still we must try to see what the Bible does teach about reprobation, since the subject cannot be avoided.

Proof from Scripture

The place to begin is with the fact of reprobation, as taught in the Bible, regardless of the questions we may have. In other words, we must follow the same procedure with reprobation as we followed in the last study with its positive counterpart, election.

There are many texts that teach reprobation. Here are a few:

Proverbs 16:4. "The LORD works out everything for his own ends—even the wicked for a day of disaster."

John 12:39-40. "They [the people of Jesus' day] could not believe, because, as Isaiah says elsewhere: 'He has blinded their eyes / and deadened their hearts, / so they can neither see with their eyes, / nor understand with their hearts, / nor turn—and I would heal them.'"

John 13:18. [Jesus said,] "... I know those I have chosen. But this [Jesus' betrayal by Judas] is to fulfill the scripture: 'He who shares my bread has lifted up his heel against me.'"

John 17:12. [Jesus prayed,] "While I was with them [the disciples], I protected them and kept them safe by that name you gave me. None has been lost except the one doomed to destruction so that Scripture would be fulfilled."

1 Peter 2:7-8. "Now to you who believe, this stone [Jesus Christ] is precious. But to those who do not believe, 'The stone the builders rejected has become the capstone,' and, 'A stone that causes men to stumble and a rock that makes them fall.' They stumble because they disobey the message—which is also what they were destined for."

There are many other texts along these lines, but the clearest are those in Romans 9, which we are studying, since they use the word hate of Esau ("Jacob I loved, but Esau I hated") and "harden" of Pharaoh ("Therefore God has mercy on whom he wants to have mercy, and he hardens whom he wants to harden"). In fact, verses 1-29 are the most forceful statement of double predestination in the Bible.

"Hated" or "Loved Less"?

The language of this chapter is so strong that quite a few writers have tried to soften it.

1. The word hate. There are people who, quite understandably, have found themselves unhappy with the word hate and who have therefore tried to interpret it in the sense, not of outright hatred but of merely "loving less." The great Charles Hodge has done this, writing, "It is evident that in this case the word hate means to love less, to regard and treat with less favor."

Here is where we have to begin to tread very carefully, for there is something to be said for Hodge's view. For one thing, "hate" is used this way in Scripture. For example, in Genesis 29:32-33 it is used of Jacob's feelings for Leah, his less-favored wife, where the New International Version rightly has Leah saying, "I am not loved." Or again, in Luke 14:26 Jesus says, "If anyone comes to me and does not hate his father and mother, his wife and children, his brothers and sisters—yes, even his own life—he cannot be my disciple." It is generally felt that Jesus is not speaking of a literal hatred here but of priorities.

Another very telling argument for Hodge's view is that nowhere else in the Bible is God said to hate any specific individual, though he does hate the deeds of evildoers and is even said to hate "all who do wrong" in Psalm 5:5. God hates sin.

What shall we say about this interpretation? Two things. First, even if the word hate should be understood to mean "love less," this loving less is nevertheless of a sufficiently negative nature to account for Esau's being rejected by God rather that being chosen, as Jacob was. For that is the point of the citation. Paul is using the example to illustrate how God chooses one and not another, call the rejection what you will.

Second, it is hard to escape seeing that although hatred in God is of a different character than hatred in sinful human beings—his is a holy hatred—hate in God nevertheless does imply disapproval. John Murray is at pains to explain this in his commentary, replying to Hodge, where he concludes rightly that "Esau was not merely excluded from what Jacob enjoyed but was the object of a displeasure which love would have excluded and of which Jacob was not the object because he was loved." Since the selection involved in the words love and hate was made before either of the children was born, the words must involve a double predestination in which, on the one hand, Jacob was destined to salvation and, on the other hand, Esau was destined to be passed over and thus to perish.

2. The word harden. The second term commentators have tried to soften is the word harden, usually pointing out that, in Exodus, Pharaoh is also said to have hardened himself (Exod. 8:32; 9:34). The argument is that God hardened Pharaoh's heart only in the sense that he allowed Pharaoh to harden it himself, or hardened him judicially as a punishment for his prior unbelief or self-hardening.

There is no question but that Pharaoh hardened his own heart, of course. The verses say so. But here are a few observations. First, there are many more texts that say that God hardened him than say that he hardened himself. Second, in Exodus, the first references are to God's hardening of Pharaoh (cf. 4:21; 7:3, etc.) and not to Pharaoh's self-hardening. Third, even if Pharaoh's selfhardening is given the strongest possible meaning, it is still in the category of "secondary causes" for which God always assumes primary responsibility. In other words, just as in the case of prayer or witnessing by Christians, what we do matters but is effective only because God has determined beforehand that it should be, so also here. Though human beings have responsibility for what they do or do not do, God nevertheless is in control of his universe. It is he (and not we) who rules history.

Two Important Distinctions

But now it is time to make a few important distinctions between election and reprobation. The question we must ask is: Are the actions involved in these two doctrines to be thought of in exactly the same way? Specifically, to use the proper language for this theological differentiation, are they equally ultimate?

What is meant by that question is this: Does God determine the destinies of individuals in exactly the same way so that, without any consideration of what they do or might do, he assigns one to heaven and the other to hell? We know he does that in the case of those who are being saved, because we have been told that election has no basis in any good seen or foreseen in those who are elected. In fact, we are told that in Romans, for Paul's point is that salvation is due entirely to God's mercy and not to any good that could be imagined to reside in us. The question is whether this can be said of the reprobate, too, that God has consigned them to hell apart from anything they have done, apart from their deserving it.

Here, I think, there is an important distinction to be made between election and reprobation. Nor am I the only one who thinks so. This has been the view of the majority of Reformed thinkers and is the teaching embodied in the great Reformed creeds.

Take the Westminster Confession of Faith, for example. Here are the two paragraphs concerning election and reprobation:

Those of mankind that are predestinated unto life, God, before the foundation of the world was laid, according to his eternal and immutable purpose, and the secret counsel and good pleasure of his will, hath chosen, in Christ, unto everlasting glory, out of his mere free grace and love, without any foresight of faith, or good works, or perseverance in either of them, or any other thing in the creature, as conditions, or causes moving him thereunto: and all to the praise of his glorious grace. (Chap. 3, Sec. 5)

The rest of mankind God was pleased, according to the unsearchable counsel of his own will, whereby he extendeth or withholdeth mercy as he pleaseth, for the glory of his sovereign power over his creatures, to pass by: and to ordain them to dishonor and wrath for their sin, to the praise of his glorious justice. (Chap. 3, Sec. 7)

Those two statements concerning election and reprobation teach that in some respects they are the same: both flow from the eternal counsels or will of God, rather than the will of man, and both are for the end of making the glory of God known. In that respect we can speak of equal ultimacy.

But there are two important points of difference.

First, the confession speaks of the reprobate being "passed by." Some will argue that in its ultimate effect there is no difference between passing by and actively ordaining an individual to condemnation. But while that is true of the ultimate effect, there is nevertheless a major difference in the cause. The reason why some believe the gospel and are saved by it is that God intervenes in their lives to bring them to faith. He does it by the new birth or regeneration. But those who are lost are not made to disbelieve by God. They do that by themselves. To ordain their end, God needs only to withhold the special grace of regeneration.

Second, the confession speaks of God ordaining the lost "to dishonor and wrath for their sin" (emphasis added). That is a very important observation, for it makes reprobation the exact opposite of an arbitrary action. The lost are not lost because God willy-nilly consigns them to it, but rather as a just judgment upon them for their sins.

In these two respects election and reprobation are dissimilar.

Infralapsarian or Supralapsarian?

That leads me to two of the longest theological terms you will ever hear me utter. In fact, with the exception of "antidisestablishmentarianism," which has nothing to do with theology, these are the longest and most confusing words I know: supralapsarianism and infralapsarianism. I mention them here only because they describe a matter about reprobation that we need to touch on briefly.

Here is why we have to think about it. I have distinguished between election, which is unrelated to anything the elect might do or not do, and reprobation, which is, according to the Westminster Confession of Faith, "for their sin." But the question then is: When does God determine this in the case of the non-elect? If he ordains them to be punished for their sin, does he wait for them to sin before he makes this determination? That can't be right, because we know that election (as well as the passing over of the reprobate) has been determined by God before the foundation of the world. What, then, is the relationship of his preordination of the lost to their sin? Did God foresee their sin and then ordain them to be lost because of it? Or did he first ordain, after which sin inevitably entered into the world, and the lost are punished for it.

That is what these two terms deal with. Infralapsarianism means that in the timeless mind of God, this decision was made in view of the fall (the Latin word lapsus means "fall").
Supralapsarianism means that in the mind of God, this decision was made without any prior reference to it.

I am not sure this matter is of great importance or even if it is a true alternative, since it requires us to think in time categories, and God is clearly above or beyond time. Who are we to force time sequences on God? For what it is worth, however, it should be said that all the Reformed creeds are infralapsarian, simply because they want to keep from suggesting even for a moment that God consigns innocents to hell. They want to insist that God does nothing inconsistent with righteousness when he determines human destinies.

A Useful Doctrine

I suppose at this point some will be wondering, "If the doctrine of reprobation is as difficult as it seems to be, why should we speak about it at all?" The first answer to that is that the Bible itself does. It is part of the revelation given to us. This is also the primary answer to a person who says, "I could never love a God like that." Fair enough, we may say, but that is nevertheless the God with whom you have to deal. Nothing is to be gained by opposing reprobation.

But this is not a very satisfying answer, and there are satisfying and meaningful things to say about reprobation. It is a doctrine that, like all other parts of Scripture, has its "useful" aspects (cf. 2 Tim. 3:16).

1. Reprobation assures us that God's purpose has not failed. The first benefit of this doctrine is the very thing Paul is teaching in Romans 9, namely, that God's word has not failed (v. 6). We might ask the question in a personal way, wondering, "Will God fail me?" But the answer is that God has determined the outcome of all things from the beginning, and his word does not fail either in regard to the elect or to the reprobate. God does not begin a work he does not finish. He does not make promises he does not keep. So if you have heard his promises and believed his word, you can be sure he will be faithful to you. If others are lost, it is because God has determined that they should be. It does not mean that you will follow them.

"But am I one of the elect?" you ask. It is easy to know the answer to that question: Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and begin to obey him. Those who do are the elect. That is how we determine who those persons are.

2. Reprobation helps us deal with apostasy. We all know people who have seemed to believe at one time, but who have then fallen away. Does this mean that God has failed them? No. It means that if they continue in their unbelieving state, they are not among God's elect people. Apostasy does not show that the plan of God has failed. Reprobation helps us understand it.

3. Reprobation keeps before us the important truth that salvation is entirely of grace and that no works of man contribute to it. If none were lost, we would assume that all are being saved because somehow God owes us salvation, that he must save us either because of who we are or because of who he is. This is not the situation. All are not saved. Therefore, the salvation of the elect is due to divine mercy only. We must never forget that. Indeed, as we will see over the next few studies, this is the dominant note of these important texts in Romans.

4. Reprobation glorifies God. As soon as we begin to think that God owes us something or that God must do something, we limit him and reduce his glory. Election and its twin, reprobation, glorify God, for they remind us that God is absolutely free and sovereign. We have no power over him. On the contrary, "God has mercy on whom he wants to have mercy, and he hardens whom he wants to harden" (Rom. 9:18). God does as he wants in his universe.

One final question: Is reprobation an evangelical doctrine? That is, Is it part of the gospel? I believe it is, for this reason: Because reprobation stresses the glory of the sovereign God in his election, it inevitably highlights mercy and reduces those who hear and accept the doctrine to a position of suppliancy. It forces us to cry, "Jesus, thou Son of David, have mercy on me." As long as we believe we are in control of our own destinies, we will never assume this posture. But when we understand that we are in the hands of a just and holy God and that we are without any hope of salvation apart from his free and utterly sovereign intervention, we will call out for mercy, which is the only right response.

"I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy," says the Almighty. If we believe that, our cry will be the cry of the tax collector: "God, have mercy on me, a sinner" (Luke 18:13). And who can fault that doctrine?

Chapter 129.

But Is God Just?

Romans 9:14-15

Ever since the fall, human beings have been trying to blame God for his actions or (which is almost the same thing) to call him to account. Adam did it in the Garden of Eden, saying, "The woman you put here with me—she gave me some fruit from the tree, and I ate it" (Gen. 3:12). The people of Malachi's day, at the very end of the Old Testament period, were doing the same thing, asking God: "How have you loved us?... How have we shown contempt for your name?... How have we defiled you?... How do we rob you?... What have we said against you?" (Mal. 1:2, 6-7; 3:8, 13). They "wearied the LORD" with their words (2:17), yet were demanding that God give them an explanation for his actions.

It is the same today. In most discussions about spiritual things, our contemporaries are asking God to leave heaven, come down to earth, stand before the bar of our justice, and give an account of himself according to our small standards. C. S. Lewis even wrote an article about this characteristic, which he called "God in the Dock."

"If God is good, how could he let my mother die?" "What about cancer? Why doesn't God do something about it?" "It's not my fault. I would have done better if only God had given me a nicer disposition, more energy, kinder parents, better looks, a more advanced education, or something else."

We have all heard those accusations. But in no area of theology is the demand that God justify himself more insistent or accompanied by more shrill accusations of injustice than in regard to the predestination of some persons to salvation and the passing by of others. Even if we can be convinced that God does operate in this way, which most are not, we nevertheless scream out fiercely that it is not right for him to be selective.

The Second of Two Questions

Well, is it? "What then shall we say? Is God unjust?" That is the way Paul puts the question in Romans 9:14, as he sets out to answer it.

As we begin, we should remember that this is the second of two important questions in this chapter. The first question, which we have already studied, is whether God has broken his word in passing over some Jews, who had not responded to the gospel, and by saving some Gentiles. The Old Testament is filled with promises to Israel. Does the fact that not all Jews are being saved not mean that God has broken those promises? Paul answered the question by explaining that the promises were never intended for those who are mere physical descendants of Abraham, that is, all ethnic Jews. Rather, as he says, the promise is to spiritual Israel, which means those out of ethnic Israel (as well as from the Gentile nations) whom God had elected to salvation.

Paul proved this by showing how God elected one person rather than another in the first three generations of Jewish history: Abraham rather than others who lived in Ur; Isaac rather than Abraham's other son, Ishmael; and Jacob rather than Esau. The last case was particularly telling, because in this generation the choice was made between twin boys and was announced to Rebekah, the mother, even before the sons were born, and thus before either had had opportunity to do either good or evil.

Clearly, God acts by the principle of election, choosing one and passing by another—whether or not we like it or agree with the justice of his actions in doing so.

But that brings us to the second question, the one I described in an earlier study as the question of theodicy: Is God just in his actions? Paul has shown that God discriminates between one individual and another. Indeed, no one who thinks deeply at all can readily deny it. All are not equal. Nor do all have equal opportunities, even in secular matters, not to mention religious ones. But is God just in allowing such situations? That is the question. Is it right for God to operate in this fashion?

Point of Departure

As soon as Paul asks the question, "What then shall we say? Is God unjust?" he answers by an emphatic denial: "Not at all!" It is the strongest denial he can muster. The King James Bible has

"God forbid!"

That answer is not calculated to satisfy most people today, of course, and it is true that Paul goes on to give reasons for his answer in the following paragraphs. Nevertheless, the answer even in this form is important and is far more profound than most people might imagine. Besides, it is the only proper starting place.

Why? Because it puts us, fallen human beings, in our proper place, which is the only position from which we can begin to learn about spiritual things. The very nature of sin is wanting to be in God's place. But as long as we are trying to be in God's place, we will never be able to hear what God is saying to us. We will be arguing with him instead. In order to learn, we must begin by confessing that God is God and that he is therefore right and just in his actions, even though we may not understand what he is doing.

That is the only rational thing to do anyway, for two reasons. First, if there were injustice in God, the universe would fly apart. Paul is far more reasonable than our contemporaries when he begins with God's justice, for he knows that the righteous character of God must be the basis of everything that is. It is inconceivable to any right thinking mind that God should act wrongly. As Leon Morris writes, "To say that God is unjust is for Paul self-contradictory."

Second, it is only on the basis of some fundamental awareness of what justice is, an awareness of right and wrong, that we can ask the question we are asking. And where do we get that awareness of right and wrong but from God? In other words, if God were not just, we would not even be able to ask, "Is God just?" We would not be able even to conceive of the question. The fact that we can ask it does not mean that by ourselves we can find the explanation of how God is acting justly. That is why we have Romans 9. But it does mean that even in asking the question we are admitting in advance that God is just, rather than the opposite.

The Justification of God

So how are we to understand God's justice? We can start with the fact that God is just, as well as with the fact that he does elect some persons to salvation and does pass by others. But how are we to think about his justice in doing so? This is the theodicy question.

Here are the essential elements of the answer.

1. All human beings deserve hell, not heaven. No one who has followed Paul's argument in the earlier chapters of Romans can doubt this, and we do not need to restate those arguments now. It is enough to say that

> There is no one righteous, not even one there is no one who understands, no one who seeks God.
> All have turned away, they have together become worthless;
> there is no one who does good, not even one.
> Romans 3:10-12

But we are talking about the justification of God here, and for that purpose the key word in what I have just said is "deserve." All human beings deserve hell, not heaven. We are not talking about whether all actually end up in hell or whether only some end up in hell and some in heaven. We are talking about what all deserve, and what they deserve is condemnation. That is justice. The justice of God, if it were to operate without regard to any other factor, could do nothing other than to send every human being to hell. Apart from those other factors, namely the electing grace of God and the death of Christ that makes it possible, this is what happens.

2. If any individual is to be saved, it must be by mercy only, and mercy is in an entirely different category from justice. Just as the key word in my first point was "deserve," so the key word in this second essential statement is "mercy."

Deserving is based upon what people have done. Mercy has nothing to do with what people have done but is something that finds its source in the will of God only. In the text that Paul cites to make his point, the words "mercy" and "compassion" are used almost synonymously: "I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion" (Exod. 33:19b). But there is this slight difference. Compassion has to do with recognizing the poor or helpless state of a person and stooping to help that person. Mercy does the same, but its unique quality is that it is shown to people not only who do not deserve it but who in fact deserve the opposite. In this case, mercy describes the giving of salvation to people who actually deserve to perish. It is providing heaven for those who merit hell.

God shows mercy on the basis of Christ's work in taking the punishment due sinners upon himself. Even in this sense, the showing of mercy by God is according to justice. But this is not the theodicy question. The theodicy question has to do only with why God saves some in this way and not others.

3. Even if God should save people on the basis of something in them —faith, good works, or whatever—this would actually be injustice, since people's backgrounds are unequal.

Think it through. If God saved some people and not others on the basis of good works, which is what most people would like God to do, there would never be justice, because some inherit kinder or more serving temperaments than others and because environmental factors play a part. It is easy for a person who has been raised by two loving and moral parents to follow in their way and do good. Not all do, of course. But that truth is irrelevant to my argument. My point is only that it is easier for such persons to do good than it is for one who has been neglected by his or her parents or has been raised in a vicious or immoral environment.

Or take faith. Isn't it true that some persons simply are born more trusting than others, and others are instinctively more skeptical? Or, if we think of their environments, isn't it true that some receive the advantages of biblical teaching or moral instruction that others lack? If God's election were based on the ability of some to respond to him, by faith or whatever, God would not be just in his selection. Some would be profoundly disadvantaged, and others inevitably would be privileged.

So election is not only just. It is just, and God is right in choosing some and passing by others. But—and here is the important thing—election is the only thing that is just. Election alone starts with all people at the same point and on the same level, all of whom deserve hell. Then it saves some and passes by others, all entirely apart from anything whatever in these elect or reprobate persons.

Two Irrepressible Objections

The answer to the theodicy question is in the points I just made, though we will go into it further as our studies of Romans 9 continue. But I know that it is not as easy as that to satisfy the objections that come to our rebellious (or perhaps merely questioning) minds.

There are two particularly.

1. Shouldn't God show mercy to everyone? This is the first question asked by a person who has followed the argument to this point and yet is unsatisfied. The person will agree that all deserve hell and that God does not have to save anyone. He will agree that if any are saved it is by mercy only, apart from anything anyone may have done or may do. "But," he will ask, "shouldn't God show mercy to everyone? Is it right for him to restrict his mercy to one group of people rather than showing it to all?"

If you are asking that question, and I suppose many are, let me say gently that you have still not grasped the situation. The operative word in the question is "should." It means "ought," "must," or "necessary" if justice is to be done. But as soon as we use that word, we are back in the realm of justice, and we are no longer dealing with mercy. "Should" implies obligation, and obligation has to do with justice. If there is any "should" in the matter, the issue is no longer mercy. We are talking about justice, and justice, as we have already seen, can do nothing but send every human being to hell.

It is not justice we need from God. It is grace.

2. Why doesn't God show mercy to everyone? The second objection sounds like the first one, but it is really quite different. It is the question raised by a person who understands the difference between justice and mercy but is still wondering why God is selective. "Forget the word 'should,'" this person replies. "My question is simply: Why doesn't God save everyone?"

Let me begin by saying two things. First, this is a proper question to ask, because it is asking for understanding rather than demanding that God come down from heaven and submit to our standards of right and wrong. It is a matter of faith in search of enlightenment. Second, it is more difficult than the questions we have asked so far, because it is asking about God's reasons for doing something, and there is no way we can know what those reasons are unless God reveals them to us. Does he?

Romans 9:15 seems to say merely that this is the way God operates: "I will have mercy on whom I have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I have compassion." In other words, a perfectly legitimate answer to our question is that the "why" of it is God's business. God does not owe us an answer. What is more, there are undoubtedly parts of the answer, if not all, that are not revealed. God has reasons that may forever be unknown.

Yet there is one revealed answer, though not all persons will like it. A Baptist professor and pastor named John Piper has written a detailed study of Romans 9:1-23 in which he argues that Paul's quotation from Exodus 33:19 in Romans 9:15 has to do with the character of God and with God's proper determination to make his nature known. In a careful study of Exodus 33, which we will also begin to look at carefully in our next study, Piper shows that the verse Paul quotes "is not merely a description of how God acted in any particular instance toward Moses in granting him a theophany or toward Israel in renewing the covenant. Rather it is a solemn declaration of the nature of God, or (which is the same thing) a proclamation of his name and glory."

I admit that Piper's point is not easily seen in verse 15, the quotation from Exodus. It takes some hard technical study of the Old Testament context to realize it. But it is seen in the rest of this chapter.

First, Paul's quotation of Exodus 9:16 in verse 17: "For the Scripture says to Pharaoh: 'I raised you up for this very purpose, that I might display my power in you and that my name might be proclaimed in all the earth.'" This deals with reprobation, the matter we were studying in the last chapter, and it explains at least one purpose of God in passing over some. It is to display his "power" in order that his powerful or sovereign name might be proclaimed throughout the earth. In other words, God thinks it is important that the created order should know that he is allpowerful, especially in overcoming and judging some who stand against him, as Pharaoh did. God shows this by judging them.

Second, Paul argues a few verses further on that God's "wrath," "power," "patience," "glory," and "mercy" are displayed in election, on the one hand, and in reprobation, on the other: "What if God, choosing to show his wrath and make his power known, bore with great patience the objects of his wrath—prepared for destruction? What if he did this to make the riches of his glory known to the objects of his mercy, whom he prepared in advance for glory—even us, whom he also called, not only from the Jews but also from the Gentiles?" (vv. 22-24).

What this means is that God considers the display of his attributes in human history to be worth the whole drama, to be worth the creation, fall, redemption, election, reprobation, and everything else. From God's point of view, the revelation of his glory is the great priority. Why Is It Necessary?

You will remember that I wrote a bit earlier that I am not at all sure this will satisfy all people. In fact, I know it will not. It may not satisfy you.

If you do not find it satisfying, even though it is what we find in Romans 9, you will probably be asking at this point, "But why should it be necessary for God's name to be glorified?"

There is only one answer I know, and it is this: Because it is right that his name be glorified. God is glorious. He should be glorified, and because this is a universe run by God, and not by us, that which is right will in the end be done. God will be honored, and all will bow before him.

But do you see how this is going? We began with the theodicy question: Is God right to act as he does? We were asking it because it did not seem right to us for God to select some for salvation and to pass by and judge others for their sin. But when we examine the question, as we have, we find that the matter is exactly the opposite of what we first imagined it to be. We have found that God acts as he does precisely because he is just. He glorifies his name in displaying wrath toward sinners and the riches of his glory toward those who are being saved because this is the only right thing for God to do. It is his very justice, not his injustice, that causes him to operate in this fashion.

If we object to this, our objection only shows that we are operating by a different and, therefore, a sinful standard. What we mean is that we want to compel God to save everybody, regardless of what they have done or not done or even whether they want his salvation.

The real wonder, of course, is that God displays his mercy. For by its very nature mercy is undeserved and unrequired. Yet God has done so. He has done so in saving sinners like you and me.

I like the way John Piper closes his exegetical study, for it is along the very line I have been following. Piper is aware that many will find these truths unpalatable. But, he says:

For those who, like myself, confess Romans 9 as Holy Scripture and accord it an authority over our lives, the implications of this exegesis are profound. We will surely not fall prey to the naive and usually polemical suggestions that we cease to pray or that we abandon evangelism. If we did that we would only betray our failure to be grasped by this theology, as Paul was, who "prayed without ceasing" (1 Thess. 5:17) and who labored in evangelism "harder than any of the other apostles" (1 Cor. 15:10).

On the contrary we will be deeply sobered by the awful severity of God, humbled to the dust by the absoluteness of our dependence on his unconditional mercy, and irresistibly allured by the infinite treasury of his glory ready to be revealed to the vessels of glory. Thus we will be moved to forsake all confidence in human distinctives or achievements and we will entrust ourselves to mercy alone. In the hope of glory we will extend this mercy to others that they may see our good deeds and give glory to our Father in heaven.

"Mercy" Is His Name

I hope you have noticed that in the last three of our studies of Romans 9—on election, reprobation, and the justice of God—we have ended by stressing God's "mercy." In the first study we saw that election is grounded in mercy. In the second we discovered that reprobation forces us back upon mercy, rather than causing us to appeal to any supposed rights we may have. In the third study we argued that the justice of God is established precisely upon his right to show and to withhold mercy as he wills.

I suppose there are people who might object to this procedure on the grounds that Christians simply like mercy and so stress it, passing by the much less attractive doctrine of wrath. But that is not the case. We stress mercy because the Bible stresses mercy, and because it is the most remarkable and unexpected of God's attributes.

There is nothing unexpected about condemnation, wrath, or reprobation. We deserve those. But that God should extend mercy to sinners and so save some of them from his wrath is extraordinary.

Mercy is what Paul himself has been emphasizing throughout this section, and it is what he comes to again in verse 15, which we need to study now. The text says, "For he [that is, God] says to Moses, 'I will have mercy on whom I have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I have compassion.'" In this text the words hate, harden, or pass by are not even mentioned. Instead, the emphasis is on the word mercy and its near equivalent, the word compassion.

Mercy in Election

The quotation comes from Exodus 33:19, which means that it has an Old Testament context. So, before we go on with Romans 9, we need to explore the context to better understand this key verse. In fact, from this point on we are going to have to go back into the Old Testament more than once, since Paul gives a number of Old Testament quotations in the latter half of Romans 9, all of which are intended to direct our minds to the ways in which God has operated by mercy in past days. Before we are done we are going to examine the mercy of God as it is revealed in the minor prophets Jonah and Hosea and in the major prophet Isaiah.

We begin by going back to what we have seen earlier in Romans 9. That is, we go back to the mercy of God shown in the choice of Israel to be a special people to whom he would thereafter continue to show grace.

We remember that the history of these people began with God's choice of Abraham, and later of Abraham's son Isaac and Isaac's son Jacob, entirely apart from any good that might be imagined to be in them. Abraham was just like the rest of his contemporaries, a worshiper of false gods. But God set his love upon Abraham and called him out of Ur of the Chaldeans to be the father of a new nation through whom he would eventually send the Savior.

In the second generation God chose Isaac rather than Abraham's other son, Ishmael, and in the third generation he chose Jacob rather than Esau.

Those choices alone demonstrate the truth of the text Paul is quoting, for they prove that God had mercy on whom he would have had mercy and that he had compassion on whom he had compassion.

"Mercy" is God's name.

Mercy in Israel's Deliverance

Coming a bit closer to Exodus 33, we find that the opening chapters of Exodus deal with the deliverance from Egypt, climaxing in the Passover.

Moses had been sent to the powerful Egyptian ruler with the command to let the people go, and Pharaoh had refused, saying, "Who is the LORD, that I should obey him and let Israel go? I do not know the LORD and I will not let Israel go" (Exod. 5:2). As a result, God unleashed a series of plagues on Egypt in which: (1) the waters of the land were turned to blood; (2) frogs were multiplied in huge quantities; (3) gnats infested everyone; (4) flies followed the gnats; (5) the animals were killed; (6) painful boils came upon the Egyptians; (7) hail destroyed the crops; (8) followed by locusts; and (9) darkness blotted out the sun for three days. These were demonstrations of the power of God over the Egyptian gods, who were associated with the water, crops, fields, and sky. The greatest god was Ra, the sun god, who was subdued in judgment number nine. By the time the plagues were over, the country was destroyed, but still Pharaoh would not release the people.

God told Moses that the last plague was to be the death of the firstborn children of the land, as well as the firstborn of the animals, and that after this Pharaoh would let the people go. The plague would be unleashed by an angel of death who would pass through Egypt by night.

The Israelites were to prepare for the Passover by killing a lamb and spreading its blood upon the sides and tops of the door frames of the houses in which they were living, so that when the angel of death came through the land he might see the blood and pass over the Israelite houses. This is where the word Passover comes from.

The Lord said, "The blood will be a sign for you on the houses where you are; and when I see the blood, I will pass over you. No destructive plague will touch you when I strike Egypt" (Exod. 12:13).

This is what happened. That night the angel of death passed through the land, the firstborn of all the Egyptians were killed, the Jews were spared, and the next morning Pharaoh gave word that the people were to leave the country—though he later reversed his decision, pursued the people to destroy them, and was himself destroyed.

But here is the point of the story.

The people were not very spiritual, as the sequel will show, and there were undoubtedly many among the nation who would have thought for one reason or another that they merited special treatment by God and should therefore have been saved at the time of the exodus simply because they were Jews and deserved saving. Some would have pointed to their ancestry, as Jews did later. "We are Abraham's seed," they might have said. "That is why God delivered us." Many would have thought that they were better or more moral than the oppressive Egyptians. Everyone thinks that he or she is more moral than someone else, particularly someone he or she dislikes. Still others might have pointed to their years of bondage and suffering: "If God is just, surely we should be rewarded for our suffering and the Egyptians should be punished."

The way in which God actually delivered the people dispelled any such mistaken notions. It showed that they were saved by the mercy and grace of God only.

How? In this way. What would have happened if a Jew had decided that his ancestry or morality or suffering or anything else was sufficient to guarantee his deliverance and had therefore refused to spread the blood of the lamb upon the door frame of his or her house? The answer is that the angel of death would have struck down the firstborn in that house just as if it were the house of an Egyptian, for "there is no difference, for all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God" (Rom. 3:23). The Jews were a sinful people, "stiff-necked," as God would later describe them. They, too, deserved to die. But God set his love upon them and saved them for his mercy's sake.

Later Moses would write, "The LORD did not set his affection on you and choose you because you were more numerous than other peoples [or for any other human reason], for you were the fewest of all peoples. But it was because the LORD loved you and kept the oath he swore to your forefathers that he brought you out with a mighty hand and redeemed you from the land of slavery, from the power of Pharaoh king of Egypt" (Deut. 7:7-8).

"Mercy" is God's name.

Mercy at Mount Sinai

We come next to Exodus 32, the chapter immediately preceding the one in which Paul's quotation in Romans 9 is found. In doing so, we come to one of the most moving stories in the Old Testament. (We have already looked at it carefully in study 123 of this series, "Great Sorrow for a Great People.")

The people had left Egypt behind and had now arrived at Mount Sinai, where Moses was called up into the mountain to receive the law from God. While he was there the people whom he had left behind grew tired of waiting (he was there for forty days), and they got Aaron to make a little calf of gold, which they began to worship, calling it the god that had delivered them from Egypt. It was a terrible moment in their history, and God interrupted the giving of the law to Moses to tell Moses what was happening and threaten the destruction of that generation of the people, saying that he would begin again and make a new nation from Moses.

We remember from our earlier study how Moses pleaded for the people and eventually offered himself for judgment in their place, saying, "Oh, what a great sin these people have committed! They have made themselves gods of gold. But now, please forgive their sin—but if not, then blot me out of the book you have written" (Exod. 32:31-32).

Moses did not know that he could not give himself for another. He, too, was a sinner and deserved—there is that word again, "deserved"—to die for his transgressions as much as they deserved to die for theirs. But God was aware that from the beginning he had planned to send his Son, the Lord Jesus Christ, to be a sin offering in their place, to suffer hell for those he had chosen beforehand and would eventually draw to faith, and it was on the basis of that anticipated atonement by Christ that God extended mercy to them. In other words, the mercy shown to the people at Sinai had exactly the same basis as the mercy shown to the people on the night of the Passover, for the blood spread upon the door frames of the houses pointed forward to the coming substitutionary death of Jesus Christ.

"Mercy" is God's name.

The Merciful God

This brings us to Exodus 33 and to the text Paul is quoting, which is a continuation of the story. God had spared the people following their apostasy at Sinai and had promised to send an angel to lead them into the Promised Land. But Moses was not satisfied with this arrangement. In his judgment, to be led by an angel was less than being led by God, and he did not want any lessening of the special relationship between God and the people that he and they had enjoyed previously. They were sinners, and any special relationship between themselves and God would have to be on the basis of the mercy of God and not their deserving. Still, they must be led by God or not at all. Moses did not want to lead the people, even with the help of an angel, unless God himself were with them.

In this moment of acute distress, Moses went out of the camp to the "tent of meeting" to speak with God and present his requests. There were three of them, all closely related.

First, Moses asked to be taught God's ways "so I may know you and continue to find favor with you" (v. 13). This means that he recognized that he was a sinner himself and so needed to be taught and kept by God if he was not to fall into the same sins the people had committed.

God promised to be with him and teach him.

Second, Moses pleaded for God's personal and continued presence: "If your Presence does not go with us, do not send us up from here. How will anyone know that you are pleased with me and with your people unless you go with us? What else will distinguish me and your people from all the other people on the face of the earth?" (vv. 15-16). He meant that the people could never be distinguished from other people by anything in them, but only on the basis of God's undeserved presence with them.

God promised Moses that he would do what he had asked.

Then Moses made the boldest request of all: "Now show me your glory" (v. 18). God replied that he would not be able to show his face to Moses, because no human being can see the face of God and live. But he would reveal his goodness and proclaim his name to Moses, which he did by placing him in the cleft of a rock, covering the opening with his hand, and then causing his goodness to pass before him.

It is in this context, in the midst of God's answer to Moses' third question, that the quotation by Paul in Romans occurs. The text says, "I will cause all my goodness to pass in front of you, and I will proclaim my name, the LORD, in your presence. I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion" (v. 19). This verse is the climax of the story, and its point is that the very name or character of God is bound up in his mercy. The display of his name is the proclamation of his compassion.

The record of God's dealings with Israel in her election, deliverance, and preservation, even when the people had sinned against grace, as well as this climactic revelation of glory, show that "mercy" is God's name.

God's Name and God's Glory

When I was writing in the previous study about the justice of God in saving some persons and passing by others, I referred to a study of Romans 9:1-23 by a Baptist professor and pastor whose name is John Piper. Part of his study is an examination of Exodus 33:19 in its context, and his conclusions are what I present here.

Commentators on Romans 9:15 have done all manner of strange things with this verse in an attempt to weaken the doctrine of God's rightful sovereignty in the matters of election and reprobation. Some have referred it only to God's mercy to Moses in granting him a theophany. Others have limited it to God's renewal of the covenant with Israel following the people's sin. But the verse surely means more than this, as Piper and indeed the entire context of God's electing choice, deliverance, and preservation of Israel make clear.

What is involved is no less than the revelation in history of God's true name or character. In other words, election and the corresponding doctrine of reprobation are the means by which God's compassion and mercy (as well as his power and wrath) are made known.

As Piper puts it, "In its Old Testament context, Exodus 33:19 is not merely a description of how God acted in any particular instance toward Moses in granting him a theophany or toward Israel in renewing the covenant. Rather it is a solemn declaration of the nature of God, or (which is the same thing) a proclamation of his name and glory."

Mercy with the Lord

We are going to be coming back to this theme again, as I said when we started, because mercy is the dominant note in this chapter. But we need a few conclusions here before we go on.

1. We need mercy if we are to be saved. I have said this before, but it can never be said enough, simply because we do not think this way naturally. We think in terms of justice, because we suppose ourselves to be deserving. But we are not deserving, at least not of anything but eternal punishment. If we are to be saved, we must not come to God pleading our deserts but on the basis of his mercy. We need mercy. Apart from it we will perish.

2. God is a God of mercy. Here is the good news. God is a God of mercy. True, he is also God of justice and wrath. Sin will be punished. The wrath of God will be made known along with his other great attributes. But God emphasizes mercy. He offers mercy. To find mercy we must come to God on the basis of the shed blood of his Son, the Lord Jesus Christ, who died to be our Savior. The mercy of God is seen at the cross of the Savior. That is the ultimate expression of mercy and the basis for God's election of some to salvation.

3. We can appeal to mercy. We have been speaking about election and therefore of the sovereign right of God to show mercy to whom he will show mercy and compassion to whom he will show compassion. The display of mercy by God is not compelled in any way. Otherwise it is not mercy, as we saw in the previous study. But that does not mean that we cannot appeal to it. We can. Indeed, the Scriptures are full of such appeals. They even tell us that it is through appeals to mercy that mercy may be found.

Remember the tax collector in Jesus' story.

And remember the Pharisee in the same story, the one who was so highly regarded by those who knew him. The Pharisee was moral. He did not steal. He was not an adulterer. He tried to obey the law, even fasting twice a week and tithing all he possessed. But he was not moral enough to please God, and he had no sense of needing God's mercy. His prayer was not heard. He was not justified.

It was altogether different with the tax collector. He was a sinner, but even more important than that, he knew he was a sinner. So he did not come to God to remind God of his ethical attainments. He stood at a distance and would not even look up to heaven. Instead he beat his breast, a sign of genuine remorse or repentance, and prayed, "God, have mercy on me, a sinner." Jesus' judgment was that "this man, rather than the other, went home justified before God. For everyone who exalts himself will be humbled, and he who humbles himself will be exalted" (Luke 18:13-14). It is a judgment each of us needs very much to hear.

Do not try to catch me at this point, saying, "But if mercy has its basis in God's sovereign will, what good does it do to appeal to mercy? Doesn't the text say, 'I will have mercy on whom I have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I have compassion'?" That is absolutely true. Mercy is God's unique prerogative. But I will tell you who those are upon whom God has set his mercy. They are those who appeal to him on the basis of it. And I will tell you who those are who are elect. They are those who turn from their own self-sufficiency and trust Jesus.

How else can anyone know who God's elect are? In what way other than by faith are the children of God made known?

4. We can proclaim God's mercy to others. Can we proclaim him as sovereign? To be sure. As one who passes by those he has not chosen for salvation? That, too. But also as one who has mercy on whom he wills to have mercy and who has compassion on whom he wills to have compassion. God is a merciful God. There is nothing in the Bible that hinders me from saying that as clearly and as forcefully as I can. His very name is Mercy. And because his name is Mercy, I can assure you that if you will come believing on Jesus Christ, which is how he has made his mercy possible as well as known, you will find it. God has never turned a deaf ear to someone who asked for mercy. He has never rejected any person who has trusted in Christ Jesus.

> Come, every soul by sin oppressed, There's mercy with the Lord,
> And he will surely give you rest, By trusting in his Word.

Only trust him, only trust him, Only trust him now.
He will save you, he will save you, He will save you now.

Do you believe that? Will you come? If you believe it and if you will come, you will find God to be exactly what the Bible declares him to be: the merciful God who has reached out to save many through Jesus Christ. And you will be saved.

Chapter 131.
Salvation Is of the Lord

We are in a section of the Bible in which every sentence has exceptional importance. Because of this, we have been moving very slowly. In the last study we looked at Romans 9:15. In this study we look at verse 16.

Verse 16 can be considered an inference drawn from the truth in verse 15, which is a quotation from the Old Testament. If that is the case, the thought would be: If God has mercy on whom he wills to have mercy and shows compassion to whom he wills to show compassion, then salvation is of God who shows mercy and not of man. That is true enough. But it is probably better to see verse 16 as a statement of the truth behind the quotation. If this is the case, it means that salvation is not of man but of God; therefore, God shows mercy on whom he wills to show mercy and has compassion on whom he wills to have compassion.

This is better, because the chief point of verse 16 is the exclusion of any human role in salvation. The verse says, "It does not, therefore, depend on man's desire or effort, but on God's mercy." Or as the King Tames Version has it, "So then it is not of him that willeth, not of him that runneth, but of God that sheweth mercy."

Today's Evangelism

This text has enormous implications for the way we do evangelism. In fact, it is a rebuke of most popular evangelism in our day.

You may recall from our studies of Romans 6 that when I was writing about sanctification in that context, I said that we tend to approach it in either of two wrong ways. Either we introduce a formula: "Follow these three [or four] steps to sound spiritual growth." Or we recommend an experience: "What you need is the baptism of the Holy Spirit [or meaningful worship or whatever]." I pointed out that neither of these is introduced by Paul. Rather, he bases his approach to sanctification on sound teaching. He tells us that we are to go on in the Christian life for the simple reason that we have become new creatures as the result of God's work in us, and we cannot go back to what we were.

The situation is exactly the same in most of our current approaches to evangelism. We choose either a formula or a feeling.

The formula represents something we must do: "Give your heart to Jesus," "Pray the sinner's prayer," "Hold up your hand and come forward," "Fill out this card." The feeling is something we try to work up in evangelistic services by certain kinds of music, moving stories, and emotional appeals.

Let me say that I do not doubt for a moment that God has sometimes used these methods and that he has sometimes worked through feelings, just as he has also sometimes used quite different things. The problem with these ways of doing evangelism is not that God has not occasionally been gracious enough to use them, but that they distort the truth about salvation by making it something we do or to which we can contribute and thus, to that degree, detract from the glory of God.

Besides, these approaches contradict our text, which says that salvation "does not, therefore, depend on man's desire or effort, but on God's mercy."

These approaches are also ineffective, as we would expect them to be, for they have filled our churches with thousands of people who think they are saved because they have made a profession or come forward at a meeting, but who are not born again. In many cases, those who have done these things are not even any longer present in the churches.

The Negative Teaching

Romans 9:16 contains both negative and positive teaching, each of which is meant to be comprehensive. Negatively, we are told that salvation does not come by man's desire or effort, that is, neither by his will nor by his personal attainments. Positively, we are told that salvation comes from God.

The words desire and effort are meant to include everything of which a human being may be capable, and they thus reduce everyone to the position of being saved by the mercy of God or not saved. The first word concerns volition. The second refers to active exertion. Specifically they deny that we are saved by "seeking God" or "wanting to be saved" or, to run with the other term, by "choosing Jesus," "surrendering our lives to Jesus," "taking Jesus into our hearts," or doing anything else of which we may think ourselves to be capable. It is true that there is a faith to be exercised, a choice to be made, a life to be surrendered, and seeking to be done. But those are the result of God's working in us according to his mercy, and not the conditions on which he does.

Robert Haldane wrote rightly, "It is true, indeed, that believers both will and run, but this is the effect, not the cause, of the grace of God being vouchsafed to them." I know there are objections, some of them scriptural.

"What about John 1:12?" says someone. "Doesn't that verse say, 'To all who received him, to those who believed in his name, he gave the right to become children of God'?" It does, of course. But the answer to the implied objection—that we become born again as the result of our receiving Jesus—is found in the next verse, which describes those who are saved as "children born not of natural descent, nor of human decision or a husband's will, but born of God" (v. 13). That fixes the sequence rightly, just as Paul has expressed it in Romans 8, Ephesians 1 and 2, and elsewhere: first, election; then, rebirth; third, faith accompanied by repentance; and lastly, adoption into the family of God along with other benefits.

Together, John 1:12 and 13 actually teach that "it does not... depend on man's desire or effort, but on God's mercy" (Rom. 9:16).

Another verse that some people will quote is Romans 10:9: "If you confess with your mouth, Jesus is Lord,' and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, you will be saved." Then they ask, "Doesn't that teach that we have to give our hearts to Jesus and then confess him as Lord to be saved? Doesn't it mean that we are the ones who ultimately determine whether or not we will be saved? If we are saved, isn't it because we want to be saved? If we are lost, isn't it because we choose to be?"

Well, we know the mouth speaks what is in the heart. Jesus said, "For out of the overflow of the heart the mouth speaks" (Matt. 12:34b). So the critical question is: What kind of a heart is it that confesses, "Jesus is Lord"? Is this the new heart, which is given to us by God,—or the old, Adamic heart, which is enmity against God? It cannot be the latter, because the Bible everywhere teaches that the old heart is thoroughly corrupt. Jeremiah wrote, "The heart is deceitful above all things and beyond cure" (Jer. 17:9). Ezekiel called it a "heart of stone" (Ezek. 11:19). Can a stony heart repent of its sin and come to God? Can a heart as wicked as this "choose" Jesus? Impossible! We can no more change our hearts than a leopard can change its spots.

Therefore, if we are to repent and believe the gospel, we must be given a new heart. A "heart of flesh" is Ezekiel's term for it. This heart is given to us by the new birth. It is this heart only that believes on Jesus.

The Positive Teaching

This brings us to the positive teaching of this verse, namely, that salvation is entirely of God. God has mercy on whom he wills to have mercy, and he shows compassion on whom he wills to show compassion.

I have titled this study "Salvation Is of the Lord," which comes, as I am sure you realize, from the Old Testament. It is from the story of Jonah, from chapter 2, and I refer to this now because Jonah is a good illustration of our text in Romans, namely, that salvation "does not... depend on man's desire or effort, but on God's mercy." The story of Jonah is a story of God's mercy from beginning to end: mercy to the sailors, mercy to the people of Nineveh, and, above all, mercy to Jonah. Moreover, as far as man's desire or effort is concerned, not only did Jonah not desire God's will or strive to do it, he actually willed and tried to do the opposite. He tried to run away from God as deliberately as he could.

Jonah was a prophet, and God came to him with a command to proclaim a message of judgment on Nineveh, the capital of Assyria: "Go to the great city of Nineveh and preach against it, because its wickedness has come up before me" (Jonah 1:2). We would have expected Jonah to be responsive to such a call at once. Instead, "Jonah ran away from the LORD and headed for Tarshish" (v. 3a). Scholars debate the location of this ancient city, but most believe it was on the far coast of Spain beyond the Rock of Gibraltar. This fits the story, of course, for it means that Jonah was so determined to resist God's sovereign call that he set out in precisely the opposite direction and for a destination as far away as possible. God said, "Go east. "Jonah went west, as far west as anyone knew to go. If he went farther than that, he would presumably have fallen off the edge of the world, which is, in a sense, what happened to him.

Why did Jonah disobey God? Strangely, at the end of the story, we find him explaining that it was because he suspected that God was going to be merciful to these people (Jonah 4:2)—and he did not want that, because they were the enemies of his people. No one can successfully run away from God, however. So, although Jonah went west instead of east, God went after him and brought him back. The text says that God hurled a great storm after Jonah.

At this point the mariners come into the story, for the judgment on the disobedient prophet affected them, too, and they were soon in as much danger of drowning from the fierce gale as Jonah was. They were pagans, but they had some spiritual perception and understood that the storm was unusually fierce, supernaturally so, in fact; they reasoned that some powerful god was angry with one or more of them. When they drew straws to find out who it was, the lot fell on Jonah.

Jonah understood that God had found him out and was now exposing his disobedience. He confessed what he was doing. But he was still unrepentant. He had that "heart of stone" Ezekiel had written about. So, when the sailors asked what they should do to him to make the sea calm down for them, Jonah replied, "Pick me up and throw me into the sea, and it will become calm. I know that it is my fault that this great storm has come upon you" (v. 12).

I like to point out that Jonah did not know that God had prepared a great fish to swallow him and eventually return him back to land. So, if he was asking to be thrown overboard in the middle of the Mediterranean Sea, it meant that he was willing to be drowned. It meant that in his heart he was still unrepentant, for he was saying, "I would rather die than submit to God's will." That is what it means to have a hard heart. It is what every one of us has until God replaces it.

Was Jonah a genuine believer at this point? Good question! I used to say he was. We would expect it of a prophet. If he was, he is an example of how stubbornly disobedient some Christians are with God, at least for a time. Today, however, I am not so sure. It is clear that Jonah was not right with God, and his is more an example of an unregenerate heart than a regenerate one. At any rate, Jonah seems to have experienced what we would call a conversion inside the great fish, which is where the verse "Salvation comes from the LORD" occurs (Jonah 2:9). What happened inside Jonah while he was inside the fish is the heart of this great story.

Prayer from the Depths

When Jonah was turning his back on God to go to Tarshish, it did not bother him at all that he was abandoning God. But suddenly, when he was thrown overboard to his death and found himself in the position of apparently being abandoned by God, and Jonah actually calls his condition hellish, saying, "From the depths of the grave [that is, from Sheol] I called for help" (Jonah 2:2). As the story shows, God had not abandoned Jonah. But Jonah thought he had, and his despair was the very first step in his conversion.

What Jonah did in that great fish was to pray. God brought him to that point. As he prayed, he discovered that God was using the very depths of his misery to show him mercy.

Jonah's prayer has four characteristics of all true prayer, and these have bearing on the question of correct biblical evangelism, which is where we started.

1. He was honest. The first thing we notice about Jonah's prayer is that it was honest. That is, his disobedience had gotten him into a mess, and he acknowledged it. Before we get to this point, when God is working in our lives, we tend to explain away the hard hand of God's judgments. We tell ourselves that we are only having a temporary setback, that things will get better, that they are not as bad as they seem. But when God begins to get through to us, the first thing that happens is that we admit our misery and desperate circumstances for what they are. Moreover, we admit that God has caused them. This is what Jonah does. You hear it in his prayer.

You hurled me into the deep, into the very heart of the seas, and the currents swirled about me;
all your waves and breakers swept over me.
I said, "I have been banished from your sight;
yet I will look again toward your holy temple."

Jonah 2:3-4

To acknowledge that God was behind his misfortune increased his terror, for it was not the sailors or even mere circumstances he was fighting. It was God. God had summoned Jonah to trial, cast a verdict of "guilty" against his sinful prophet, and sentenced him to death. This is a terror almost beyond words! But, in another sense, the acknowledgement of God's hand in his misery also provided comfort. For God is merciful, and it is always better to fall into the hands of God, even the angry God, than of men.

It is often in judgment that mercy may be found.

2. He repented. The second characteristic of Jonah's prayer is a spirit of repentance. We see it in two ways. First, he acknowledged that what had happened to him, while caused by God, was nevertheless his own fault. This is the meaning of verse 8, where Jonah says, "Those who cling to worthless idols forfeit the grace that could be theirs." An idol is anything that takes the place of God. So Jonah is confessing that he had rejected God, just as surely as those who literally worship idols. Therefore, he had renounced the source of all mercy.

The second way we know Jonah was genuinely repentant is that he does not ask God for anything. If he had, we might suspect that he was repenting only to get something from God. That is, he would have been treating his repentance as a good work that somehow was supposed to put God in his debt. Salvation does not come that way. Remember: Deserving something and receiving mercy are two entirely different things. Jonah knew now that all he deserved was damnation. Therefore, he was willing to wait upon the mercy of God, if it should come, without demanding anything.

3. He was thankful. "Thankful?" we might ask. "From the belly of a fish? Only a few hours or days away from death? What could Jonah possibly be thankful about?" Well, if we continue to think of his plight in physical terms, there probably is no good answer. But it is vastly different if we think spiritually. True, Jonah had no hope of any bodily deliverance. But he had found the grace of God. His entire prayer shows he had. His word for what he had found is "salvation" (v.

This is the greatest miracle of the book. Not the great fish. Not the storm. The greatest miracle is Jonah's salvation.

4. He was willing to take his position alongside the ungodly, all of whom need salvation by the mercy of God only. The final characteristic of this prayer is likewise significant. For when Jonah prayed, as he did at the end, "But I, with a song of thanksgiving, will sacrifice to you. What I have vowed I will make good" (v. 9, emphasis added), he was promising to do exactly what the pagan mariners had been willing to do, and did do, in the previous chapter. When they saw the power and holiness of Jonah's God, "They offered a sacrifice to the LORD and made vows to him" (Jonah 1:16). It was right that they should. But here, in the second chapter, Jonah is taking his place alongside of them.

Earlier he had said, "I don't want to preach to pagans. I am a Jew. I want God to judge the pagans." But now, after he had discovered how much he deserved God's judgment himself, he was willing to come to God as the mariners came—as a suppliant seeking mercy.

"Jesus Saves"

I have two final points. The first is a restatement of the truth that salvation is by the mercy of God and is without conditions.

What conditions could there be? Robert Haldane asks that question and answers with a telling paragraph:

Is it faith? Faith is the gift of God. Is it repentance? Christ is exalted as a Prince and a Savior to give repentance. Is it love? God promises to circumcise the heart in order to love him. Are they good works? His people are the workmanship of God created unto good works. Is it perseverance to the end? They are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation.... "Thy people," saith Jehovah to the Messiah, "shall be willing in the day of thy power." Thus the believer, in running his race, and working out his salvation, is actuated by God and animated by the consideration of his all-powerful operation in the beginning of his course, of the continuation of his support during its progress, and by the assurances that it shall be effectual in enabling him to overcome all obstacles and to arrive in safety at the termination.

Second, what does this say about the proper way to do evangelism, the point with which I started?

Well, the weaknesses of our contemporary evangelism have been recognized and critiqued by many, among them Walter J. Chantry, Ernest C. Reisinger, and Gordon H. Clark, all of whom have written things that have been helpful to me. As I have read their books, I have found that there is a common bottom line. Evangelism is to teach the Word of God. Not just a certain evangelistic core, or only certain doctrines, or only truths that will move or motivate the ungodly.

It is to teach the Bible and to do this as carefully, consistently, and comprehensively as possible, while looking to God (and praying to God) to give new life. Gordon Clark expressed it by saying quite succinctly, "Evangelism is the exposition of the Scripture. God will do the regenerating." "Just preach Jesus!" someone says.

Did I hear, "Just preach Jesus"?

Let's do it. But remember what Jesus means. Jesus means "Salvation is of the Lord," the very words uttered by Jonah from the belly of the fish. To preach Jesus is to preach a Calvinistic gospel.

Chapter 132.

God's Power Displayed in Judgment

Romans 9:17-18

We have been swimming through some deep doctrinal waters in the last few studies of Romans 9, but we have also had a few mild ripples of application. In the previous study, much of what we examined had bearing on some of the ways we do evangelism.

So, let me pick up at that point and ask a question about evangelism that will be a bridge to what we are to look at now, namely, the display of God's power and justice in his judgments. The question is: What is the ultimate goal of evangelism? We all know what evangelism is. It is telling others about Jesus. Or, if we want to fill that out a bit, evangelism is the proclamation of the good news of salvation in Jesus Christ, through the power of the Holy Spirit, so that those who hear might respond in faith, join with God's other children in the fellowship of the church, and continue growing in Christ as his disciples. But is that the ultimate goal of evangelism? Is it merely to get people saved?

To take another line of thought, at the end of the last study I defined evangelism as the exposition of Scripture. Is that the ultimate goal? Simply to teach the Word of God?

Of course, the important word in my question is the word ultimate. For, although the other goals I mentioned are legitimate goals—to teach the Word of God and to see people converted—what I am trying to point out here is that those goals are not ultimate. The ultimate goal is to glorify God, and the reason for that is that the glorification of God is the chief goal of everything, of life, history, creation, and our own existence. The first question of The Westminster Shorter Catechism asks, "What is the chief end of man?" It answers, "Man's chief end is to glorify God, and to enjoy him forever." The goal of life is God's glory. So that is evangelism's chief end, too.

Let's ask it as a question: "What is the chief end of evangelism?" The answer would be:

"Evangelism's chief end is to glorify God."

But, in the case of evangelism, that happens in two ways: (1) The grace and mercy of God are glorified in the saving of those who will be saved, and (2) The justice and power of God are glorified in the case of those who are not saved, but are instead judged for their sins.

And that is what brings us to our text: "For the Scripture says to Pharaoh: 'I raised you up for this very purpose, that I might display my power in you and that my name might be proclaimed in all the earth.' Therefore God has mercy on whom he wants to have mercy, and he hardens whom he wants to harden" (Rom. 9:17-18). These verses teach that the power of God is made known in his judgments, just as his mercy is made known in saving those to whom he wills to show mercy.

"The Scripture Says"

Before we tackle that, however, we need to look at the unusual way in which Paul's quotation from the Old Testament is introduced. The quotation is from Exodus 9:16, and God is speaking. God tells Moses to tell Pharaoh, "I have raised you up for this very purpose, that I might show you my power and that my name might be proclaimed in all the earth." But Paul did not write, "God said...." He wrote, "The Scripture says to Pharaoh...." This is particularly unusual because the Scriptures did not even exist at that time.

Why did Paul write, "The Scripture says..."?

One of the great theological works of this century is a book by former Princeton Theological Seminary Professor of Theology Benjamin B. Warfield (died 1921), titled The Inspiration and Authority of the Bible. It contains ten classic studies on the Bible's nature and authority, and one of them is on the phrase "Scripture says" and others like it. The chapter is entitled, "'It says:' 'Scripture says:' 'God says.'" In this chapter Warfield looked at a number of Bible passages in which, on the one hand, the Scriptures are spoken of as if they are God and, on the other hand, God is spoken of as if he is the Scriptures. I quote Warfield:

Examples of the first class of passages are such as these: Galatians 3:8, "The Scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the heathen through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all the nations be blessed" (Gen. 12:1-3); Romans 9:17, "The Scripture saith unto Pharaoh, Even for this same purpose have I raised thee up" (Exod. 9:16). It was not, however, the Scripture (which did not exist at the time) that, foreseeing God's purposes of grace in the future, spoke these precious words to Abraham, but God himself in his own person. It was not the not yet existent Scripture that made this announcement to Pharaoh, but God himself through the mouth of his prophet Moses. These acts could be attributed to "Scripture" only as the result of such a habitual identification, in the mind of the writer, of the text of Scripture with God as speaking, that it became natural to use the term "Scripture says," when what was really intended was "God, as recorded in Scripture, said."

Examples of the other class of passages are such as these: Matthew 19:4, 5, "And he answered and said, Have ye not read that he which made them from the beginning made them male and female, and said, For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife, and the twain shall become one flesh?" (Gen. 2:24); Hebrews 3:7, "Wherefore, even as the Holy Ghost saith, Today if ye shall hear his voice," etc. (Ps. 95:7).... It is not God, however, in whose mouth these sayings are placed in the text of the Old Testament: they are the words of others, recorded in the text of Scripture as spoken to or of God. They could be attributed to God only through such habitual identification, in the minds of the writers, of the text of Scripture with the utterances of God that it had become natural to use the term "God says" when what was really intended was "Scripture, the Word of God, says."

The two sets of passages, together, thus show an absolute identification, in the minds of these writers, of "Scripture" with the speaking God.

In that volume Warfield was trying to counter modern attempts to lower the authority of Scripture, making it a mere word of man about God rather than God's inerrant word to man. As he showed, the words Scripture says, which begin our text, are an important part of the argument leading to a right view. But this is also important for what Paul is saying in Romans. For, in my judgment, this is not just an unconscious way of mixing God and Scripture, though Warfield's handling of the text for his purpose might suggest it. It is actually Paul's way of calling attention to the authority of Scripture on the point he is making.

Robert Haldane says, "By the manner in which the apostle begins this verse, we are taught that whatever the Scriptures declare on any subject is to be considered decisive on the point." And that is important, because what Paul is saying in Romans 9 is authoritative, though it is hard for many people to accept it.

This brings us back to the thought of Romans 9:17-18, which we must now examine briefly. We remember that Paul has been arguing the fact of God's election, that he chose some out of Israel to be saved and that he chose some not to be. He proved it in the case of Abraham, Abraham's son Isaac, and Isaac's son Esau. Paul then raised this question: Is God unjust in so operating? He answered: "Not at all!? Then, in verse 15, he proved his denial by quoting from the Old Testament, the acknowledged authority. The quotation is from Exodus 33:19, in which God said, "I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion." That led to the conclusion: "It does not, therefore, depend on man's desire or effort, but on God's mercy" (Rom. 9:16).

The verses we are studying are exactly parallel to that first quotation and conclusion, only they are illustrating the negative side of God's action, namely, wrath and judgment, instead of the positive side. Romans 9:15 began with the word for: "For he [that is, God] says to Moses...." So also does verse 17: "For the Scripture says...." Then, after the Old Testament proof is cited, our section also gives a conclusion, which is parallel to verse 16: "Therefore God has mercy on whom he wants to have mercy, and he hardens whom he wants to harden" (v. 18).

So, on the one hand, we have God making his mercy known through saving some, like Moses, and, on the other hand, making his power known by judging others. In the latter case, Pharaoh is the Old Testament example.

The exact sense of this emerges when we turn to Exodus. The first six plagues on Egypt have already taken place, and God is now sending Moses back to Pharaoh to say that the seventh, an even more terrible plague, is coming. The first six plagues have been as mild as they have been not because God was unable to deal more harshly. He could have destroyed Pharaoh and all the Egyptians from the start. Rather, God says, he has spared Pharaoh this long so the full range of his power might be known. Here is how it reads: "For by now I could have stretched out my hand and struck you and your people with a plague that would have wiped you off the earth. But I have raised you up for this very purpose, that I might show you my power and that my name might be proclaimed in all the earth" (Exod. 9:15-16).

That is exactly what happened, of course. With each phase of the king's resistance, the force of the judgments increased; and with each raising of the ante, God's power became more visible and his powerful and sovereign name was more widely blazed forth.

The point of these chapters is that God raised Pharaoh to his high position of prominence and sustained him in it through the earlier plagues, so God might be glorified in his power. Paul's point in quoting the text is that God both acts this way and is right in so doing.

We need to remember from our earlier discussion of reprobation that God's raising Pharaoh to this position does not mean that he made him sin. Pharaoh sinned because he chose to sin, and he resisted God and hardened his heart because it is the nature of sinners to resist God and the nature of sin to harden hearts. But, having noted that, we must not deny that the text also says that God chose to deal with Pharaoh this way because he wished to show his power in judgment to the world through him. God was under no obligation to save Pharaoh, as he saved the Israelites, and he was not unjust in choosing him as the one in whom his justice and power would be known. I summarize this in three statements:

1. God is not responsible for the sin of men and women, and he passes by those he has chosen not to save, after the fact of their sin rather than before.
2. God retains the freedom to save whom he will and judge whom he will.
3. In both cases his name is glorified.

Jonathan Edwards on Romans 9:18

I know that this does not sound very much like evangelism to most people. In fact, although I have said that evangelism is expounding Scripture, even sections of the Bible like Romans 9, many will wonder how it is possible to find a gospel message in such doctrines. I remind you, however, that the most powerful time of gospel preaching this country has ever seen was during the Great Awakening under such preachers as Jonathan Edwards, and that it was carried forward precisely by such teachings.

As you might expect, Jonathan Edwards himself had a sermon on this text. It was one of his great ones. Would you like to know how he handled it?

Most Puritan sermons were in three parts: (1) exposition, (2) doctrine, and (3) application. Edwards follows this pattern, though here, as in many of his other sermons, he does not spend much time on exposition, treating it rather as his introduction. He simply traces Paul's argument in this chapter, showing that God deals with people in different ways, showing mercy to some and hardening others, and that the basis of this is nothing other than his sovereign will and pleasure.

The doctrine section is much longer. It has four parts:

1. What is God's sovereignty? Edwards describes God's sovereignty as "his absolute, independent right of disposing of all creatures according to his own pleasure." His explanation of what this means is that God is under no constraints from any source, under no obligation to conform to another's will, and without any obligation to anyone for anything.

2. What God's sovereignty in the salvation of men implies. It implies, Edwards says, that "God can either bestow salvation on any of the children of men, or refuse it, without any prejudice to the glory of any of his attributes." In particular, his saving of some does no dishonor to his holiness, majesty, justice, or truth, for he saves them through the work of Christ, whose death for sinners upholds these attributes. God's condemnation of others does no dishonor to his righteousness, goodness, or faithfulness, because he is under no obligation to them.

3. God actually does exercise his sovereignty in men's salvation. This is the chief point I have been making in my exposition, but Edwards elaborates by showing the many ways God does this: in choosing one nation or individual rather than another; in giving some great spiritual advantages not given to others; in sometimes saving the low and disadvantaged and denying salvation to the wise and great; in bestowing salvation upon some who have had few advantages; in calling to salvation some who have been particularly wicked and passing by the righteous and moral; in saving some who have sought salvation but not others who also seem to have sought it.

4. The reason for this exercise. The reason Edwards gives is the chief point of Romans 9:17-18, namely, to display his glory in each of his many attributes. "It is the will of God to manifest his > sovereignty. And his sovereignty, like his other attributes, is manifested in the exercise of it. He glorifies his power in the exercise of his power. He glorifies his mercy in the exercise of his mercy. So he glorifies his sovereignty in the exercise of his sovereignty."

He closes the doctrinal section by quoting verse 18: "Therefore God has mercy on whom he wants to have mercy, and he hardens whom he wants to harden."

The last part of Jonathan Edwards's sermon is the application section, and it is for this that I have chiefly summarized his message. Edwards gives five points of application:

1. From this we learn how absolutely we are dependent on God in this great matter of the eternal salvation of our souls. We are not only dependent on God's wisdom and power in being able to devise a way to save us and then actually doing so. We are also dependent on his will to save us, for it is only due to the sheer good pleasure of his will that he saves anyone. Why should he save human beings and not the fallen angels? Why should some people be saved and not others? Why is it that some should have the advantages of possessing the Bible, being exposed to the ordinances of religion and being able to hear fine preaching, while others have none of these things?

2. We should adore the absolute sovereignty of God with great humility. This divine freedom to choose some and pass by others is the very essence of the divine glory. So we should give him that glory. "It is impossible that we should go to excess in lowliness and reverence of that Being who may dispose of us to all eternity, as he pleases."

3. If you are saved, you are to attribute it to sovereign grace alone and give all praise to God who alone makes you differ from another. When you hear of another's open sin, you should think of how wicked you once were, how you provoked God by your rejection of his grace, and how he saved you in spite of your sin, according to his own good pleasure.

4. Learn how much cause you have to admire the grace of God, which has stooped to save you. Specifically, the utterly, unbound, unconstrained, free and sovereign God has stooped to bind himself to you by a covenant, expressed in solemn promises.

God insists that his sovereignty be acknowledged by us. He will not have it any other way. Yet "this is the stumbling-block on which thousands fall and perish; and if we go on contending with God about his sovereignty, it will be our eternal ruin. It is absolutely necessary that we should submit to God, as our absolute sovereign and the sovereign over our souls, as one who may have mercy on whom he will have mercy, and harden whom he will."

5. We may make use of this doctrine to guard those who seek salvation from two opposing extremes—presumption and discouragement. Says Edwards:

Do not presume upon the mercy of God, and so encourage yourself in sin. Many hear that God's mercy is infinite and therefore think that, if they delay seeking salvation for the present and seek it hereafter, that God will bestow his grace upon them. But consider that, though God's grace is sufficient, yet he is sovereign and will use his own pleasure whether to save you or not. If you put off salvation till hereafter [later], salvation will not be in your power. It will be as a sovereign God pleases, whether you shall obtain it or not. Seeing, therefore, that in this affair you are absolutely dependent on God, it is best to follow his direction in seeking it, which is to hear his voice today: "Today if ye will hear his voice, harden not your heart."

Beware also of discouragement. Take heed of despairing thoughts, because you are a great sinner, because you have persevered so long in sin, have backslidden, and resisted the Holy Ghost. Remember that, let your case be what it may and you ever so great a sinner,... God can bestow mercy upon you without the least prejudice to the honor of his holiness, which you have offended, or to the honor of his majesty, which you have insulted, or of his justice, which you have made your enemy, or of his truth, or any of his attributes. Let you be what sinner you may, God can, if he pleases, greatly glorify himself in your salvation.

Brothers and sisters, that is the way to do evangelism. It is not what the hard hearts of sinners want to hear. They want to be told that God owes them something, or at least that their destinies are in their own hands. But even if they hate and heap scorn on these doctrines, that in itself may be a beginning in the matter of their salvation. For it shows that they have at least understood the truth, though they may still be rejecting it. And they cannot accept it until they understand it.

Fight against it as you wish, it is still truth: God will be glorified in your destiny one way or another, in your salvation or in your eternal damnation. But if you have begun to see that, it may be an important first step in the surrender of your own will and great pride, and the discovery of God's mercy in Christ, which is the only thing that has ever saved anyone.

Chapter 133.
The Potter and the Clay

Romans 9:19-21

The human heart is a deceitful but very resourceful thing, and two ways it expresses these characteristics are by dismissing God, on the one hand, or blaming him, on the other.

Quite a few years ago, my wife and I had a neighbor who seemed to have no interest in God. She had very little morality, was unfaithful to her husband and often boasted about it, explaining to me on one occasion how she was able to squeeze some of her affairs into her lunch hour. But then one day she discovered that her husband was having an affair, too, and she was devastated. The marriage ended in divorce. This woman came to me when she found out about her husband's affair because I was a pastor, probably the only one she knew. She had not been thinking of God before this, but now she abruptly brought God into the picture.

"Why is God doing this to me?" was her question. She considered God to be terribly unfair.

Who's to Blame?

This is the kind of thinking Paul is dealing with in Romans 9:19-21, as he continues to teach about the sovereignty of God in salvation. In the first half of the chapter, he has been arguing that in the matter of salvation God operates by the principles of election and reprobation, and he has answered the question: Is God just in so operating? He has shown that God is just, since God owes mankind nothing, salvation is by grace, and God rightly demonstrates all aspects of his glory, including his wrath and power as well as his mercy and grace, by so doing. But now the wicked resourcefulness of the human heart, which I mentioned, comes in. For, if a person cannot deny God's sovereignty over human affairs and human destinies or even God's right to save some and pass by others, as God does, the person will at least try to deny his or her own responsibility in the matter.

So a new question arises: "Then why does God still blame us? For who resists his will?" (v. 19).

This, of course, is a major theological question: the relationship between the sovereignty of God and free will. It is a question that can be answered and has been, particularly by Jonathan Edwards in his treatise on "The Freedom of the Will." But Paul does not answer the question here, at least not directly. And the reason he does not answer it is that he already has.

For this objection to have weight, the person making it must assume that God determines to condemn some persons without reference to what they are or do as sinners. It assumes that he creates some people only to damn them, to send them to hell, and that they are passive in the matter. But that is not what Paul has been saying. Nor is it what I have been saying as I have tried to trace out his teaching. Reprobation means "passing by" or "choosing not to save." And those whom God passes by or chooses not to save are not innocent persons but sinners who are in rebellion against him. God does not condemn innocent people. He condemns sinners only. But God does have the right to save or not to save sinners, as he chooses.

So the question is really an objection to God's right to do what he does, which is what has been under consideration all along and which is why I have said that Paul has already answered it.

Not all commentators have seen this. J. C. O'Neill writes that "The objection is entirely warranted, and the reply does nothing to answer it." C. H. Dodd calls this "the weakest point in the whole epistle." But Paul has given answers, and he knows that the objection really rises out of the rebellion of the heart against God's sovereignty. In fact, the very question is rebellion. For the query "Who resists his will?" is itself resistance. Human beings are sinners, are guilty, and they prove it even by the way they ask their questions. Therefore, Paul answers by reiterating once more that God has a right to do with his (sinful) creatures as he will.

The outline of these three verses is straightforward. Verse 19 states the question. Verse 20 provides the answer. Verse 21 illustrates the answer by a picture drawn from the Old Testament.

Three Humbling Contrasts

We have already looked at the question. The answer (v. 20) and the illustration (v. 21) provide contrasts that are intended to put the question in its proper perspective and ourselves in our proper place. There are three of them.

1. Man and God. The first contrast is more apparent in the Greek text than in English, for the verse begins with the words "O man" and ends with the words "the God." Yet it is apparent enough in English. You and I are mere men and women set over against the God who made not only us but all things. It is ludicrous for creatures as small, ignorant, impotent, and sinful as we are to question the propriety of God's moral acts. We may not understand what God is doing in any particular case. In fact, most of the time we will not, because "'my thoughts are not your thoughts, / neither are your ways my ways,' / declares the LORD" (Isa. 55:8). We can ask God to explain what he is doing, if he will. But for us to suggest that he is wrong in what he does is patently absurd.

2. What is formed and he who formed it. The contrast between man and God, the first, stresses the insignificance of one and the greatness of the other. This second contrast brings in another matter, namely, that we are mere creatures—God is the Creator—and therefore everything we are and have comes from him, including even our ability to ask such questions.

Robert Haldane is particularly wise in the way he deals with this matter. "Any wisdom the creature possesses must have been received from the Creator; and if the Creator has the power of forming rational beings, must he not himself be infinite in wisdom? And does it not insult the Creator to pretend to find imperfection in his proceedings?... The reason and discernment between right and wrong which he [man] possesses is the gift of God; it must, then, be the greatest abuse of these faculties to employ them to question the conduct of him who gave them."

Once again, we must stress that "Paul does not here speak of the right of God over his creatures as creatures, but as sinful creatures, as he himself clearly intimates in the next verses."

3. The clay and the potter. Each of these three contrasts says the same thing. But each also adds a new element, and the new element here is the authority of the Old Testament, since the illustration of the potter and clay is drawn from the Old Testament and shows that the principle involved is a point of revelation. There are four main passages in which the illustration of the potter and the clay is found in the Old Testament, three in Isaiah and one in Jeremiah. It is good to have them before us.

You turn things upside down, as if the potter were thought to be like the clay!
Shall what is formed say to him who formed it, "He did not make me"?
Can the pot say of the potter, "He knows nothing"?

Isaiah 29:16

Woe to him who quarrels with his Maker, to him who is but a potsherd among the potsherds on the ground.
Does the clay say to the potter,
"What are you making?"

Isaiah 45:9a

Yet, O LORD, you are our Father. We are the clay, you are the potter; we are all the work of your hand.

Isaiah 64:8 The best-known passage is in Jeremiah:

This is the word that came to Jeremiah from the LORD: "Go down to the potter's house, and there I will give you my message." So I went down to the potter's house, and I saw him working at the wheel. But the pot he was shaping from the clay was marred in his hands; so the potter formed it into another pot, shaping it as seemed best to him.

Then the word of the LORD came to me: "O house of Israel, can I not do with you as this potter does?" declares the LORD. "Like clay in the hand of the potter, so are you in my hand, O house of Israel. If at any time I announce that a nation or kingdom is to be uprooted, torn down and destroyed, and if that nation I warned repents of its evil, then I will relent and not inflict on it the disaster I had planned. And if at another time I announce that a nation or kingdom is to be built up and planted, and if it does evil in my sight and does not obey me, then I will reconsider the good I had intended to do for it.

"Now therefore say to the people of Judah and those living in Jerusalem, 'This is what the LORD says: Look! I am preparing a disaster for you and devising a plan against you. So turn from your evil ways, each one of you, and reform your ways and your actions.'"

As far as anyone can tell, Paul does not seem to be quoting specifically from any one of these texts. But the points in Romans are exactly what these verses in the Old Testament also say: (1) It is absurd for a mere man or woman to fault God. (2) God has absolute sovereignty over his creatures, saving whom he will and condemning whom he will. (3) This is not an arbitrary selection, since his judgments are based on his justice in condemning sin. (4) Therefore, "turn from your evil ways... and reform your ways and your actions."

What could be more reasonable than that? Thus, instead of objecting to God's actions, we should fear them and allow our fear of judgment to drive us to the repentance we need.

A Plea for Sound Thinking

In the previous study I included a summary of Jonathan Edwards's untitled sermon on Romans 9:18, showing how he preached evangelistically even from such an apparently harsh text. At this point I want to follow the "application" portion of another sermon of Edwards, though in this case the text he is treating is not from Romans 9 but from Romans 3:19: "That every mouth may be stopped" (KJV). I introduce it here, because silencing the objections of sinners to the justice of God in condemning them for their sin is precisely what Paul is getting at in our text. Edwards's sermon is entitled, "The Justice of God in the Damnation of Sinners."

The application is an appeal to right thinking. It asks: If God should reject and destroy you, would that not be appropriate, considering how you have behaved toward both God and others?

1. "If God should forever cast you off, it would be exactly agreeable to your treatment of him."

Instead of using the brains God gave you to try to fault God, which is the most foolish of all things to do, you should apply them to right thinking, and the first point of right thinking is to examine how you have treated God. You do not stand up very well under such a direct examination.

To begin with, you have not shown any particular affection or love toward God. When people are in love, they think of the loved one constantly and want to be with that person and are always thinking of what they can do for the object of their love. But you have not done that. You do not think often of God. In fact, you think of him hardly at all, except to blame him when things do not go exactly as you would like. You do not want to be with God. You do not go to church often or spend much time in prayer or Bible study. You do not try always to be doing something for God. If you have not shown any particular affection or love toward God, why should God be obliged to love you? Why should he be obliged to show you any favor whatsoever?

Again, you have slighted God in thousands of ways throughout your entire life. Everything you are and have comes from God. But you have not been thankful for it. Nor have you made any serious effort to find out why God has given you the abilities, advantages, and opportunities you have been given. You have used these things for yourself, trying to accumulate as much money or pleasure or praise as possible, without any thought of him. Why should God pay attention to you in any saving way when you are negligent of his bountiful gifts and favors?

You have also refused to hear God's calls to you, even though they have come to you many times and in a variety of ways. You have heard the gospel preached. You have read the Good News. You possess a Bible. You have even seen dramatic tellings of the gospel story. Has God never spoken to you, calling you from sin to Christ by these means? Have you never felt your heart moved, your will challenged by these truths? Some in some parts of the world have not received these calls, but you have received them again and again, and still you turn a deaf ear in God's direction. You will not hear him. Why should he hear you, even if you should cry out to him in grief and desperation at the last day?

2. "If you should forever be cast off by God, it would be agreeable to your treatment of Jesus Christ."

But it is not only God the Father whom you have rejected. You have also despised the work of the Son of God, the Lord Jesus Christ. It would have been just of God if he had rejected you outright without ever having offered you a Savior. But God has not done that. He has provided a Savior, even Jesus Christ, the most wonderful, the most holy, the most merciful, the most gracious person who has ever walked on the surface of this earth. The Father offered him up to death in the place of sinners such as yourself. But you don't care for that. You care only for your own pleasure. You ignore Jesus completely, at least in all practical ways. If he were here in person to confront you in your sinful behavior and tell you to repent of it, you would, if the truth be told, easily find yourself in a crowd, like that of his own day, crying out to Pilate for his blood.

If God should cast you off forever, wouldn't that be the most just and reasonable thing in the world in light of your treatment of Jesus Christ?

3. "If God should forever cast you off and destroy you, it would be agreeable to your treatment of others."

The one thing even sinful human beings find it easy to believe in is fair play, doing to others as they have done to you. And we acknowledge a certain poetic justice when a person who cheats another gets cheated or a bully gets beaten or a thief gets put in jail. You think like that, and you are even so arrogant as to believe that this is how you would like to be treated by Almighty God. But what if he should treat you as you have treated others? You know that sin hurts and destroys, yet you have not been content to sin alone. You have involved others in your sins. And if you have been unable to do that with some particular person—if he or she has resisted your advances or disagreed with your lies or disengaged from your evil schemes—you have been quick to speak against the person for possessing the morality you despise.

And even in that you are harming others. For your example is harmful, even when you do not think about it much, as you probably do not. Fathers, your examples have harmed your children. Mothers, your sins have left their dark stains on your offspring. Young people, your immorality and your lack of any true seeking after God have damaged your friends and peers.

Why does God owe you the favor of salvation when you have been so evil, irresponsible, and harmful in your treatment of other people? If you want justice, would it not be just for God to treat you as you have treated them?

4. "If God should eternally cast you off, it would but be agreeable to your own behavior toward yourself"

I will not say that you are able to save yourself. You cannot. But you have failed to do even what you can do. There are many sins from which you could have refrained but have embraced instead. There are many steps toward God that you could have taken, but you have turned away. Indeed, like Jonah, you have run in the opposite direction. You cannot convert yourself, but you can place yourself where a conversion is most likely to happen, if God should be pleased to do it. You can read his Word; you can pursue it diligently. You can seek the company of those who know God and speak often of him.

Is God obliged to take better care of you than you are willing to take of yourself? Neither your responsibility toward God nor your legitimate interest in your eternal welfare has been enough for you to put God and spiritual things before your passing pleasures. Is God obliged to do any differently for you? Why should he seek your welfare, when you yourself will not seek it and, in fact, actually pursue your own destruction willingly?

After presenting a lengthy application of his text along these lines, Edwards concludes, "Thus I have proposed some things to your consideration which, if you are not exceeding blind, senseless, and perverse, will stop your mouth and convince you that you stand justly condemned before God."

The Day of Grace

Yet God's purpose is not solely to condemn. The demonstration of his power and justice in judging sinners is a true part of what God is doing in human history, but it is not the whole thing. God is also making known the riches of his glory in the salvation of some, as these verses, particularly the next verses, show. Why should you not be among those who are saved? Particularly since you are hearing these very truths proclaimed?

If all God wanted to do was send people to hell, he would not have needed to tell us these things or anything else. There would have been no need for a Bible, no need for preachers to preach or messengers to explain and teach it, no need for a Savior to be held forth as the heart of the Bible's message. If all God wanted to do was let us go to hell, all he would have needed to have done is nothing. We are capable of rushing off to hell, like lemmings running down a hillside, entirely by ourselves. But God has not done that. He has provided a Savior. He has given us a Bible. He has sent messengers, and their message, like that of all true prophets sent by God is: "Repent, and believe on the Lord Jesus Christ. Turn from your sin now. Today God is setting the way of salvation before you."

You cannot bring God under obligation to save you by anything you might do, and indeed you have not done anything significant. But the way he saves people is by the preaching and teaching of his Word, which is what you have just received, and by the power of his Spirit working through it.

If what you have heard has made sense to you, if you know that God does not owe you anything, that you have actually spurned what good he has shown you, and that all you actually deserve from him is judgment, then God is already using his Word to bring about the needed transformation of your heart. Now, instead of trying to tell him that what he does is unjust, you will wisely and rationally seek his mercy through faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, where alone it may be found.

Chapter 134.
The Patience of God

Romans 9:22-24

What is the chief end of man?" "Man's chief end is to glorify God," answers The Westminster Shorter Catechism. But we might also say that the chief end of God is to glorify God, that is, to be God. In an earlier chapter we saw that it is right or just for God to do this. In Romans 9:22-24, we are to study how he does it.

These verses speak of five of God's attributes: wrath, power, patience, glory, and mercy (vv. 22-23). Two of these have just been mentioned: power in verse 16 and mercy in verses 15, 16, and 18. Two others, wrath and glory, were introduced earlier in the letter. The new and unexpected attribute in these verses is patience, which Paul declares has been shown to "the objects of his [God's] wrath—prepared for destruction." The verses teach that God's treatment of the wicked is neither arbitrary nor meaningless, but is intended rather to make his wrath, power, and patience known, just as, on the other hand, his treatment of those who are chosen to be saved displays his mercy.

In both cases the glory of God is achieved by God's exercising or making known these attributes.

Some Grammatical Problems

These verses are a bit difficult, however. So we begin by looking at the difficulties. They are grammatical.

The first difficulty is that the passage begins with the word if. "If always introduces a dependent clause, which should be followed by a major or independent clause. But in this case there is none. So the first part of the sentence, which extends as far as verse 24, is left hanging. The technical term for this situation is an anacoluthon. Probably we are to provide an ending mentally. Since the next word is "but," we might be supposed to think of the verse as saying, "But if God, choosing to show his wrath and make his power known, bore with great patience the objects of his wrath,... what objection can you possibly have?" Or "... why complain about injustice?"

The New International Version seems to encourage this kind of mental addition by translating the opening words "What if...?" But still, this is a bit conjectural.

The next word is also a problem. It is translated "choosing" by the NIV, but it is the normal word for "willing" (thelon). So the question is: Does the verse mean "although God was willing to reveal his wrath, he nevertheless endured the objects of his wrath with great patience," that is, choosing not to display wrath, at least for a time? Or does it mean "because God wanted to reveal his wrath, he endured the objects of his wrath with patience," that is, in order to have an even greater demonstration of his wrath when at last he did or does show it?

As a follow-up to verses 19-21, the second of these possibilities seems best. That is, the verses seem to be saying again that God is right to show mercy to whom he wills to show mercy and harden whom he wants to harden. And they ask, "Who are we to say we do not like it? Or that God is unjust?"

If this is the meaning of these verses, I would apply them in the following way. God's chief end is to glorify God. Therefore, since God is all-powerful, this end will certainly be achieved. It will be achieved in every detail of history and in the destiny of every individual. Every person who has ever lived or will ever live must glorify God, either actively or passively, either willingly or unwillingly, either in heaven or in hell. You will glorify God. Either you will glorify him as the object of his mercy and glory, which will be seen in you. Or you will glorify him in your rebellion and unbelief by being made the object of his wrath and power at the final judgment. In fact, if you are rebelling, you are glorifying him even now, because even now his patience is displayed in you by his enduring your sin for a time, rather than sending you to hell immediately, which you deserve.

In my judgment, verses 22-24 are to be interpreted this way and as teaching that the patience of God is seen in his toleration of the wicked for a time.

A Time for Repentance

Yet there is more to the idea of God's patience than this. The word patience is not used a great deal in Paul's writings, and most of the time, when it is used, it refers to a human virtue that is one of the fruits of the Holy Spirit in our lives (cf. Gal. 5:22). Still, we can hardly overlook the fact that it has already been used of God once in Romans 2.

In that chapter, Paul is writing of God's righteous judgment on those who consider themselves to be better than other people but who actually do the same things and are guilty of the same sins. "Do you think you will escape God's judgment?" Paul asks (v. 3), particularly when you thus "show contempt for the riches of his kindness, tolerance and patience?" (v. 4). At this point Paul adds an interesting phrase: "not realizing that God's kindness leads you toward repentance." This is an indirect purpose clause, showing what God's kindness, tolerance, and patience are for— they are intended to lead sinful men and women to repentance.

This is important, because on the basis of Romans 9:22 alone, we might think that God shows patience to the wicked only to allow the sins of such persons to accumulate so that he might more fully display his wrath and power in judging them at last. True, that is one purpose. It is what has been said of Pharaoh. God raised him up (even hardened his heart) so that the full measure of the divine power might be displayed in him and God's name might be proclaimed in all the earth.

But that is not the only purpose. The patience of God is also displayed so that those whom God is calling to faith might have space to repent. Both purposes are good. The second purpose is gracious.

We also need to look at 2 Peter 3, which is the most important chapter in the Bible for learning about the patience of God. In that chapter Peter is dealing with the problem posed by the delayed return of Jesus Christ. He is warning that it will not be long before scoffers appear, saying, "Where is this 'coming' he promised? Ever since our fathers died, everything goes on as it has since the beginning of creation" (v. 4). Peter then gives the answer to their taunt in three parts.

First, there has already been a judgment of the world by water in the days of Noah. Scoffers willingly forget this, not wanting to be troubled by it, but it is a warning of a greater judgment by fire yet to come (vv. 6-7).

Second, God's sense of time is not like ours. For us a day seems short, and a thousand years seems a long time. But for God "a day is like a thousand years, and a thousand years are like a day" (v. 8).

Then Peter comes to his third and most important argument: "The Lord is not slow in keeping his promise, as some understand slowness. He is patient with you, not wanting anyone to perish, but everyone to come to repentance" (v. 9, emphasis added). Some people have understood this in an Arminian or anti-Calvinistic fashion, as if it were denying the doctrine of election. But that is not its meaning at all. Peter is speaking of the elect in this passage—"patient with you." So those God is not willing to have perish are the elect, and the reason God seems to be delaying the return of Jesus Christ is to give time for all those whom he has elected to belong to Jesus Christ to be born, to hear the gospel, to repent of sin, and come to faith.

This is what Peter also means later in the chapter where he writes, "Bear in mind that our Lord's patience means salvation, just as our dear brother Paul also wrote you with the wisdom that God gave him" (v.

15). It is because God is patient with us, not hastening to judgment, that we are saved.

I find it interesting, too, that Peter refers to Paul as having written the same thing. Where did Paul do that? Well, there are only two places in his writings where Paul speaks this way of God's patience: Romans 2:4 and Romans 9:22. Since Peter follows this comment with the observation that Paul's "letters contain some things that are hard to understand" and since Romans 9 is a particularly difficult chapter (Romans 2 is not), I would suppose that Peter is referring to the very verses we are studying, that is, Romans 9:22-24. Moreover, he is confessing that he himself found them to be difficult. If Peter, the apostle of the Lord, found them to be difficult, it should not be too disturbing to us if we find them difficult, too.

On the other hand, Peter does tell us what they mean. They teach that "the Lord's patience means salvation." In other words, they reinforce what I have been saying. The verses do not say only that God tolerates the wicked so that he may judge them more severely in the end and thus display both his wrath and power. They also teach that God is patient with sinners so they might repent of their sin and come to faith.

In fact, that is the direction in which Romans 9-11 is moving. The very next verse in Romans 9, verse 25, speaks of God's calling out a new people to himself, and in Romans 11 Paul is going to speak of the final salvation of "all Israel" (v. 26).

A Personal Testimony

There is one more text that needs to be drawn into this composite picture of God's patience as discussed in Paul's writings, and that is 1 Timothy 1:15-16, in which Paul speaks in a very moving way of God's unlimited patience to himself. He calls it a trustworthy saying. "Here is a trustworthy saying that deserves full acceptance: Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners—of whom I am the worst. But for that very reason I was shown mercy so that in me, the worst of sinners, Christ Jesus might display his unlimited patience as an example for those who would believe on him and receive eternal life."

What Paul is giving in these verses is a personal illustration of what he discusses doctrinally in Romans. Paul was aware that he had been chosen by God in Christ from before the foundation of the world. But he also remembered with sadness how he had been allowed to go his own selfrighteous and wicked way for years until God called him. He was a Pharisee who had displayed his religious zeal by persecuting Christians, even hounding them to death. When the first Christian martyr, Stephen, was stoned by the people of Jerusalem with the Sanhedrin's sanction, Paul was holding the garments of those who were throwing stones. Paul hated Christians and the Jesus they worshiped.

Yet God was patient with Paul. Instead of striking him down, God suffered him to march along his own self-righteous path, heaping sin upon sin, until at last God called him to faith in the Jesus he was persecuting. God did it so the horror of Paul's earlier conduct might form a more striking contrast to the grace, mercy, and glory of God that he afterward received.

Every Christian's Story

This is not just Paul's story, of course. It is the story of believers throughout history.

When Adam and Eve rebelled against God in the Garden of Eden, God was not rash in his judgments, hastening to consign them. Even though God had warned them that on the day they ate the forbidden fruit they would die, God did not execute the judgment of physical death upon them. Instead he came to them in the garden, not in wrath but calling quietly, just as he had come to them on earlier occasions. And although he dealt with their sin and pronounced some mild judgments, he also promised a deliverer. He told them of Jesus who would be wounded by Satan but who would one day destroy both Satan and his works.

How patient God was with Adam! How patient with Eve! Surely God was not willing for our first parents to perish but rather that they might come to repentance and find eternal life.

God was patient with Abraham. Abraham was seventy-five years old when he set out from Haran for the land God promised to him. Before this, for many years, he had lived in Ur of the Chaldeans, blinded by the spiritual ignorance and evil of the times, even to the point of bowing down to false gods or idols (cf. Josh. 24:2). God suffered long with Abraham's sin, knowing that the time was coming when he would reveal himself to him and cause him to become the father of a great nation and a believing people.

How patient God was with Abraham!

And with Sarah! When God visited Abraham by the trees of Mamre and renewed the promise of a son, even though Abraham and Sarah were past the age of having children, Sarah laughed, saying, "Will I really have a child, now that I am old?" (Gen. 18:13). But God did not judge Sarah for her unbelief. He was patient with her, and the next year, when Sarah was ninety years old and Abraham was a hundred years old, Isaac was born.

God was patient with Moses, a man who was himself so impatient. When Moses was forty years old he took it into his head that he should be the deliverer of his people from Egypt. So he killed an Egyptian, no doubt hoping to start a rebellion. Instead, he had to flee. He fled to the far side of the great Sinai desert, where God trained him for an additional forty years. When God finally called him to go to Egypt to tell Pharaoh to let the people go, Moses was reluctant and made many excuses. But God was patient with Moses, just as he was patient with the people at the time of the exodus and throughout their forty years of wandering before actually entering Canaan.

How many were the times when Israel blatantly sinned against God! God had delivered the people from Pharaoh. But when they came to Sinai and Moses delayed in coming down from the mountain, they made a golden calf and danced around it saying, "These are your gods, O Israel, who brought you up out of Egypt" (Exod. 32:4).

One writer says, "God might, without any impeachment of his justice, have executed the threatened judgment of destroying instantly that rebellious nation and raising up another from the loins of Moses. But he saw fit to exercise mercy toward them and to impart to them yet more abundant communications of his grace and favor.... By his patience and forbearance, his mercy was displayed. "

How patient God was with Israel! He was not willing that any of those whom he was calling to faith in Jesus Christ should perish, but that all should come to repentance.

I pass to the New Testament and think of the believing thief who died on a cross at the time of Jesus' crucifixion. The man was a murderer as well as a thief. He deserved to be in hell along with all other sinners. But God was patient with him, sparing him throughout a very long life of sin so that in the very last hours of his life he might demonstrate that grace can come even to the worst of men and in their final moments.

Surely, "our Lord's patience means salvation" (2 Peter 3:15), and "God's kindness leads you toward repentance" (Rom. 2:4).

Patient, But Not Forever

Has it led you toward repentance? Is it doing so now? Let me help you think the matter through by these observations.

1. God is patient for a reason. If you are not in hell today, which you are not though you deserve to be, it is because God has been patient with you, and the purpose of his patience is to lead you to repentance. God's patience is a great thing. We have explored some of its greatness in this study. But you must not abuse it. It is meant to do you good. The day of God's patience is the day of his grace.

Think how patient God has been with you.

You have sinned against knowledge, and he has been exceedingly patient. You are not like the heathen who know nothing of God or his salvation. You live in a country where the Scriptures are known, the doctrines of the Bible are taught, the way of salvation is proclaimed, and the path of godliness is held up for all to see. But you have spurned that knowledge. You are like those described in Romans 1:32 who "know God's righteous decree" but who not only continue to sin but even approve of those who do it.

You may also have sinned against grace, and still God has been patient. You may have been born into a Christian home, belong to a good church, have Christian friends who care for you, witness to you, and pray for you. But you have not profited from those gracious acts and circumstances.

You have even sinned against patience, and yet God has been exceedingly patient with you. You know that "love so amazing, so divine," demands your all. You have refused to give it, and still God has been patient with you.

2. God will not be patient forever. Although God's patience is great, it is not eternal. We are warned in Scripture that God's wrath has been withheld by his patience, but that it is building up like waters behind a great dam and that it will one day be poured forth. God was patient with Pharaoh, but God judged him in the end. God was patient with Israel, but many perished in the desert. God was patient with the believing thief, but the other thief died in his sin and was condemned.

God's patience leads to repentance, but you must still repent. You must believe on Jesus. If you do not, you will face God's judgment in the end, however much you may scoff at it now.

Remember the story of the farmer. He was an unbelieving man and his farm was directly across the street from a church. Each Sunday the Christians would worship in church, but the farmer would display his scorn for them by plowing his fields up and down with his tractor during the worship services. Everyone could hear the noise and all were very conscious of what he was doing. He did this all summer. In October, when the crops were harvested, the farmer wrote a letter to the town's newspaper, pointing out that he had worked every Sunday of the summer and that God had not struck him down for it. Instead his crops were in, and he had prospered as well as, if not better than, the Christian farmers. The newspaper printed his letter. But underneath it the editor of the paper added: "The Lord does not settle his accounts in October."

God is patient. His patience means salvation. But God's patience is not unending. One day the accounts will be settled and judgment will come.

3. Because God is patient, we should be patient. I mentioned earlier in this study that the word patience is not found in Paul with any special frequency. In fact, it is found in reference to God only three times. But here is the interesting thing: It is found as a virtue to be cultivated by Christians six times, that is, twice as often as in reference to God. It is a fruit of the Spirit, as I said earlier (Gal. 5:22; cf. Col. 1:11; 3:12), and it is commended as a virtue in the Christian ministry (cf. 2 Cor. 6:6; 2 Tim. 3:10; 4:2).

If you are a believer in Jesus Christ, perhaps this is the application for you. We tend to be impatient with other people, especially with those we are trying to win to Christ. But God is patient, and we should be also.

There are four other attributes of God in Romans 9:22-24. Wrath is one, but we are not called upon to show wrath. "'It is mine to avenge; I will repay,' says the Lord" (Rom. 12:19). Power is another, but it is God and not ourselves who must show power. Even glory is not for us to demonstrate. But we can show mercy. We are to be merciful people, remembering how God has been merciful to us. And, above all, we can be patient. It is not easy to be patient, but let us try to be. And the God who is himself patient may use our patience to draw many hurting people to the Savior.

Chapter 135.
"Children of the Living God"

Romans 9:25-26

There are times in a study of Paul's writings when it seems that the apostle has lost track of his argument. It is because his thought is so rich and because he has the habit of moving on quickly from one connected thought to another. We have found this in chapters 5 through 8 of this letter, and we see it in Paul's other writings too.

That seems to be the case in the verses we have been studying from Romans 9. You will recall from our initial studies that Paul is dealing with the question of Israel's apparent rejection by God and the problem raised by that rejection, namely, that if God has not been faithful to Israel in saving all Jews, but rather has abandoned some to perish in their sins, what is to make us think that he will be faithful to Gentile believers, in spite of the great statements Paul has made to that effect in Romans 8? Paul answered that God never elected all Jews to salvation, any more than he has elected all Gentiles to salvation, but that all those whom he did elect from both Jews and Gentiles will be saved.

That led Paul into a discussion of election and its counterpart, which theologians refer to as reprobation. And this led him into a discussion of theodicy, namely, the justification of the ways of God with men and women. He ended by speaking of the attributes of God displayed in the electing and reprobating process: love, wrath, hatred, power, glory, mercy, and patience. We have been following these digressions and therefore pursued the subject of God's patience in the last study.

Has Paul lost track of his argument? We are wrong if we think so. For at the very end of this section, in verse 24, Paul in a masterful way comes back to the point from which he started out, stating that salvation is for those whom God has chosen and called, "not only from the Jews but also from the Gentiles."

In this verse Paul is showing who the "objects of mercy" are whom he has referred to in the preceding verses. They are the elect from among both Jews and Gentiles. As Robert Haldane says, "They are not only Jews but also Gentiles, and none of either Jews or Gentiles but those who are called by the Spirit and word of God." Among other things, this verse also shows that all along Paul has been speaking about the election of individuals and not merely the election of peoples or nations, as some have argued.

A New Beginning

Verse 24 is not only a return to the point at which Paul began, however. It is also a wrap-up of his first main argument showing why God has not been unfaithful to Israel or, to use the language he himself uses, why the word or purposes of God have not failed. That means that verse 25, to which we come now, is beginning a new section of the argument.

Let me go back to the point at which I started in the first study in this volume. There I asked Paul's question, "Has the word of God failed?" I answered, "No." For seven reasons. The reasons are the outline of Romans 9-11, as I understand them. God's purposes have not failed, because:

1. All whom God has elected to salvation are or will be saved (Rom. 9:6-24).
2. God had previously revealed that not all Israel would be saved and that some Gentiles would be (Rom. 9:25-29).
3. The failure of the Jews to believe was their own fault, not God's (Rom. 9:30-10:21).
4. Some Jews (Paul himself was an example) have believed and have been saved (Rom. 11:1).
5. It has always been the case that not all Jews but only a remnant has been saved (Rom. 11:2-10).
6. The salvation of the Gentiles, which is now occurring, is intended by God to arouse Israel to envy and thus be the means of saving some of them (Rom. 11:11-24).

7. In the end all Israel will be saved, and thus God will fulfill his promises to Israel nationally (Rom. 11:25-32).

That is the overall outline of these chapters, and you will see from this review that we are now at point two, namely, the argument that God's purposes toward the Jews (and Gentiles) have not failed, because God had previously revealed that not all Israel would be saved and that some Gentiles would be. If God had promised in advance that every individual Jew would be saved and then had failed to save all Jews, we could rightly accuse God of having broken his word and complain that his purposes have failed. But that is not the case, as the quotations from the Old Testament found in this next section of Romans 9 prove.

There are four quotations in verses 25-29, two from the minor prophet Hosea and two from the major prophet Isaiah. The passages from Hosea show the acceptability of the Gentiles. The passages from Isaiah show that the call to salvation has never included all Israel.

Jezreel, Lo-Ruhamah, Lo-Ammi

The Hosea quotations occur in the context of a story. So we need to review the story in order to understand them. Hosea had been told to marry a woman who was going to prove unfaithful to him, because God wanted him to provide a visible illustration of how the people of Israel had been unfaithful to God, but how God had remained faithful to them and loved them in spite of their infidelities. Although the woman would eventually leave Hosea in order to go after her lovers, Hosea would continue to love her and in the end would draw her back to himself.

So Hosea married the woman, as the early verses tell us: "When the Lord began to speak through Hosea, the LORD said to him, 'Go, take to yourself an adulterous wife and children of unfaithfulness, because the land is guilty of the vilest adultery in departing from the LORD.' So he married Gomer daughter of Diblaim..." (Hos. 1:2-3).

At this point Gomer began to have children, and God intervened to give the children symbolic names, which is the point of the quotations picked up by Paul in Romans 9.

The first child was a son. God said, "Name the son Jezreel."

Jezreel is a Hebrew word that has to do with the motion of the hand used in scattering something to the winds, or throwing it away. It was a strange name to give a child. But God gave Hosea and Gomer's son this name because the time was coming when God would scatter the people of the northern kingdom among the Gentile nations as punishment for their sins. Hosea prophesied into the reign of Hezekiah, king of Judah (1:1), which was within six years of the fall of Samaria to the Assyrians. So this first prophecy was fulfilled almost immediately following his death.

The second child was a daughter. God said, "Name your daughter Lo-Ruhamah."

Lo-Ruhamah is composed of two Hebrew words, Lo, meaning "no" or "not" (the Hebrew negative), and Ruhamah, meaning "loved" or "pitied." God called the daughter "Not-Loved" or "Not-Pitied" because during the ages in which the Jews would be scattered among the Gentiles, God would show them no pity and would seem to have ceased loving them at all.

Finally another son was born. God said, "Call this third child Lo-Ammi."

This name also begins with the Hebrew negative "no" or "not," but the rest of it is a word meaning "my people." So Lo-Ammi means "Not-My-People." People who continue to think of the Jews as God's specially chosen people might wonder how this could be, but God was saying that the time would come when the Jews would cease to be his people in any special sense. As we are going to see, today the true people of God are neither the Jews as a nation nor any Gentile nation, but rather the church of Jesus Christ, which is composed of Jews and Gentiles according to the principle of election.

At this point a person might wonder how the story of Hosea can illustrate the unfailing love of God. Clearly, it illustrates the unfaithfulness of mankind and the way God judges sin. But love? Unfailing love? How is the unfailing love of God illustrated by the words Jezreel, Lo-Ruhamah, Lo-Ammi?

The answer is in the verses Paul quotes in Romans 9. He quotes two verses. The first is from the second chapter of Hosea, verse 23, though Paul uses only the second half. The full verse says,

> I will plant her for myself in the land;
> I will show my love to the one I called
> "Not my loved one."
> I will say to those called "Not my people,"
> "You are my people"; and they will say, "You are my God."

Each of the children's names is discussed in that verse, and the point is that the names will be changed, thus indicating the outcome of the story.

The first name is changed only in its meaning. It remains Jezreel, but the meaning is no longer "scattered" but "planted," because the same motion that would be used to throw something away was also used by farmers to scatter and thus plant grain. God refers to this change when he says, "I will plant her for myself in the land."

The second name is changed by eliminating the negative. Lo-Ruhamah will become Ruhamah, because God is going to love or have pity on the people once again. "I will show my love to the one I called 'Not my loved one.'"

In the same way, Lo-Ammi will become Ammi, because, as God says, "I will say to those called 'Not my people,' 'You are my people'; and they will say, 'You are my God.'"

The second verse Paul quotes in Romans 9 comes from the end of Hosea 1 and has the same effect as Hosea 2:23, though it deals only with the change in the name Lo-Ammi: "In the place where it was said to them, 'You are not my people,' they will be called 'sons of the living God'" (Hosea 1:10). That is, Lo-Ammi will become Ammi, "My People."

Jews or Gentiles?

There is a difficulty at this point, however, and you may have noticed it if you have been comparing Hosea 1:10 and 2:23 with Romans 9:25-26 closely. In Hosea, the prophet is talking about the rejection and eventual restoration of the Jews of the ten northern tribes, whose capital was Samaria. But, in Romans, Paul is writing about Gentiles.

This problem is sometimes handled by saying that Paul is actually writing about the restoration of the Jews, which he does write about in Romans 11: "And so all Israel will be saved" (v. 26). But this view is clearly out of step with the Romans 9 context. Verse 24 is speaking of a new people, the elect people of God, which is the church of Jesus Christ, composed of Jews and Gentiles. And the verses that follow obviously teach that the Gentiles, which were not a people, have now become the people of God along with believing Jews, and that the Jews as a nation continue to be rejected, although a remnant is saved.

This is also the case in 1 Peter, where Peter uses Hosea 2:23 of Gentiles in exactly this way: "Once you were not a people, but now you are the people of God; once you had not received mercy, but now you have received mercy" (1 Peter 2:10).

Is Paul misusing Scripture, then? There are some who would say so, but this is not actually the case. What Paul's quotation does show is the way he understood the words spoken to Israel when God called the nation Jezreel, Lo-Ruhamah, Lo-Ammi.

Particularly Lo-Ammi, which is the name he focuses on in his quotations. According to Paul's thinking, Lo-Ammi is not to be understood merely in the sense that the people were going to be treated as if they were no longer God's people when, in fact, they were. Rather it means that they actually ceased to be God's people in a special sense. That is, they became "Gentiles" so far as their relationship to God was concerned. So it is not actually of Jews that the words "I will call them 'my people' who are not my people" are spoken but of those who have become "Gentiles" by their rejection of God. It is from these Gentiles, both ethnic Gentiles and ethnic Jews who have thus actually become "Gentiles," that the new people of God is formed.

Using other words, Charles Hodge put it like this: "The ten tribes were in a heathenish state, relapsed into idolatry, and, therefore, what was said of them is, of course, applicable to others in like circumstances or of like character."

Likewise Calvin: "When the Jews were banished from the family of God, they were thereby reduced to a common level with the Gentiles. The distinction between Jew and Gentile has been removed, and the mercy of God now extends indiscriminately to all the Gentiles."

Here is another point. You will notice from a careful comparison of Hosea 1:10 and Romans 9:26 that there is an emphasis in Romans on the words "in the very place." In this context the words do not refer to Samaria, which fell to the Assyrians in 721 B.C., or to Jerusalem, which fell in 586 B.C., but to Gentile lands, the very places where it was said of the scattered nation, "You are not my people." So it is among the Gentiles that men and women were to be called to faith and be designated "sons of the living God." You and I are those people, whether Jews or Gentiles, if we have been called to faith in Jesus Christ and trust him as our Savior.

By Grace Alone

All of this makes Paul's chief point, of course, namely, that God's rejection of Israel as Israel and his election of the Gentiles should have taken nobody by surprise, particularly the Jews, since it was prophesied clearly in the Jewish Scriptures. He is going to make the same point by the quotations from Isaiah, which come next. But before we go on to those texts we need to make a few applications from what we have observed so far.

1. Salvation is of grace. It seems strange that we should have to make this point again and again, but we do simply because our sinful natures always try to claim some credit with God and put him in our debt. That is exactly what the Jews of Paul's day were attempting to do. They were claiming that they had a special status before God simply because they were Jews and that God was therefore in lasting debt to them. Paul's use of the texts from Hosea shows that this is not the case. God declared the Jews no longer to be "his people." He had no special relationship to them and therefore no obligation to them. So, if they were to be saved, it would only be because God has chosen to be gracious, precisely the way he saves Gentiles.

I need to say that if a Jew thinks differently, supposing himself to have some special relationship to God apart from Jesus Christ, this is at least understandable, since most of the Old Testament does indeed assume a special relationship between God and Israel. The Jew needs to be taught more perfectly from his own Scriptures, as Paul is doing in this chapter. But although a Jew might be excused for his mistake and merely need to be instructed better, there is no excuse for your making this mistake, if you are a Gentile. Why? It is because Gentiles never did have a special relationship to God.

Paul wrote to the Ephesians, saying that before they were called to faith they were "foreigners to the covenants of the promise, without hope and without God in the world" (Eph. 2:12).

If salvation has come to you, it is by grace alone. And if it has not yet come, you should know that it will never be found by any achievement on your part but only by the mercy of God. All you can do is throw yourself and all hope for your salvation on him.

2. Salvation is all of God. The first point leads to the second. For if salvation is all of grace, then salvation is all of God. For only God is in a position to be gracious, and only God has power to do what is necessary to save us.

I think this is the reason for the words "sons of the living God" in verse 26 (emphasis added). "Living God" does not only refer to the fact that God is real and alive, as opposed to the dead or nonexistent gods of the heathen, but also to the fact that he is the source of life. It was he who gave life to Adam in the Garden of Eden when Adam was only a form shaped out of clay. Likewise, it is he who breathes life into our dead souls today, imparting the Holy Spirit by which alone we live spiritually. No one can save himself. That is what we have been seeing repeatedly in our study of these chapters. So, if salvation is to happen, it must be by God who alone can regenerate the dead soul.

3. If you are saved, your salvation demands the greatest measure of devotion and love from you to God. For the last point I go back to the story of Hosea and its ending, which Paul does not mention but which would have been in the minds of everyone who read his words and was also familiar with the Old Testament.

Earlier in this study I took time to explain the symbolism of the names of Hosea and Gomer's children and indicate how the names would be changed, but I did not say much about Gomer. According to the story, the time came when Gomer left Hosea, as God had warned the prophet would happen. She sank lower and lower in the social scale of the times, and the day came when she fell into slavery, probably because of debt, and was sold on an auction block in the city of Samaria. Hosea was told to go and buy her. He bid a high price, fifteen shekels of silver and a homer and a lethek of barley. But at last she was his once more.

If he had hated her, he could have killed her for the pain she had caused him. She was his property. But it was at this point that Hosea's love shone brightest, since it was a reflection of the unfailing love of God, which he was illustrating. Hosea promised to be a faithful husband to Gomer, which he had been, while at the same time demanding faithfulness from her in return.

This is a picture of what Jesus Christ has done for us, for he has purchased us from the slavery of sin by his own blood. It is what the word redemption means. Now we belong to him, and we are called on to give him the fullest measure of love of which we are capable. If God did not love us and had not moved to redeem us by the death of Jesus Christ, we might be excused for our failure to love him. But since he has loved us and has saved us, our only proper response is to give him our all. Isaac Watts wrote, > Love so amazing, so divine, demands my soul, my life, my all.

Nothing else is an adequate response to him who died for us.

Chapter 136.
The Testimony of Isaiah

Romans 9:27-29

In our study of Romans we have already had several occasions to observe how Paul develops a theological argument, as contrasted to the way Peter does it, for example. In Peter's great sermon on Pentecost, recorded in Acts 2, the pattern Peter used was to quote a text from the Old Testament and then explain it. He did this three times in that one sermon, explaining Joel 2:2832, Psalm 16:8-11, and Psalm 110:1. Paul's procedure is the opposite. His way is to develop his argument first and then support it in closing by a few choice scriptural citations.

We saw this first in Romans 3:10-18, where Paul introduced a long string of quotations to nail down the argument he had previously unfolded in chapters 1 and 2. We are finding exactly the same thing in Romans 9.

Paul began this chapter by asking whether God's purposes in regard to the Jewish people had failed, which seemed to be the case, since not all Jews—in fact, very few—were believing in Christ. Paul answered that the purposes of God had not failed, because God had never intended to save every individual Jew any more than he intends to save every Gentile. Instead, God has always operated by the principle of election, according to which some out of the great number of both Jews and Gentiles are brought to Christ. This led him to speak also of reprobation and then of the attributes of God displayed in his actions toward the saved and lost. At last Paul returned to the point at which he started out, concluding that God has been calling his elect "not only from the Jews but also from the Gentiles" (v. 24).

At this point the apostle brings in his quotations, two from Hosea and two from Isaiah. The point of the Hosea quotations is that God had announced in advance that he would save Gentiles. The point of the Isaiah quotations is that he had likewise announced that not all Jews, but only a remnant of Israel, would be converted.

There is an interesting tie-in between Isaiah 10:22-23, the first of Paul's quotations from Isaiah (v. 27), and Hosea 1:10, the second of his two quotations from the lesser prophet, which has just been given (v. 26).

In chapter 1 of Hosea, verse 10 begins with the words "Yet the Israelites will be like the sand of the seashore, which cannot be measured or counted." Paul does not quote those words in Romans 9:26, though he quotes the second half of the verse, because the words are about Israel explicitly and Paul wants to use the verse as a promise of God's future blessing on the Gentiles. I explained how he does this in the previous study. But Paul has not forgotten the words, and it is those words that remind him of the verse from Isaiah, which he cites next, since they begin that verse. It says, "Though the number of the Israelites be like the sand by the sea, only the remnant will be saved."

Do you see what is happening? The first verse is saying that even though the Jewish people of Samaria would be overthrown and scattered, God would bring them back to their land and cause them to grow into a great people once again. But lest someone throw that verse up in Paul's face, saying, "But in Hosea 1:10 God says that he is going to save a vast multitude of Jews," Paul quotes the same words in Isaiah to show that even though there might be a vast number belonging to the reconstituted Jewish nation, only a small portion or remnant of those persons will be saved from sin.

Isn't that exactly what we see? Leaving the unbelief of the Gentiles aside for a moment, isn't it true that Isaiah 10:22 describes the generally poor results and great difficulties of Jewish evangelism?

A Remnant Chosen by Grace

The most important words in verse 27 are "the remnant." This is a very significant term in the Old Testament, and it has importance for the theology of the New Testament, too. Yet, surprisingly, I have not found a great deal written about it even in textbooks of Old Testament theology.

Several Hebrew words are translated "remnant" in our Bibles, but the most significant is the verb *sha*ʾ*ar* (over 130 occurrences) and the noun forms of the same word, *she*ʾ*ar* (26 occurrences) and *she*ʾ*erit* (66 occurrences). Altogether, these words are found hundreds of times in the Old Testament, chiefly in the Prophets. In the New International Bible the English word "remnant" occurs sixty-three times.

Initially the words seem to have had a military meaning. For instance, in Deuteronomy 3 there is a description of a battle between the Israelites, who were passing through the desert after leaving Mount Horeb, and the Rephaites, commanded by King Og of Bashan. The Rephaites were so thoroughly defeated that the text reports, "Only Og king of Bashan was left of the remnant of the Rephaites" (Deut. 3:11a). Similarly, in 2 Kings 19, King Hezekiah, who was besieged and mocked by the Assyrians, sent to Isaiah to ask him to pray for the Jewish "remnant that still survives" (v. 4), and Isaiah responded with an oracle in which God promised that the remnant would not only be spared destruction by Sennacherib but would even prosper for a time like a fruitful tree.

Once more a remnant of the house of Judah will take root below and bear fruit above.
For out of Jerusalem will come a remnant, and out of Mount Zion a band of survivors.

2 Kings 19:30-31

A large number of these passages refer to little more than the physical survival of a small number of Jews following a military catastrophe, such as the fall of Jerusalem to the Babylonians. But, increasingly, particularly in the later Prophets, the remnant becomes, not merely a group of survivors but a chastened, regenerated, and converted people whom we would describe as the elect or "saved" within Israel.

One important example of this is in 1 Kings 19, though the word remnant does not occur in that chapter. I refer to it because Paul refers to it himself in Romans 11, applying the word remnant to the situation. It is the story of Elijah at Horeb after his great victory over the prophets of Baal on Mount Carmel. Elijah had achieved a stunning victory that resulted in the overthrow and death of the prophets of Baal. The battle had taken an enormous emotional toll on him, so that, when Queen Jezebel threatened to have him killed, Elijah fled to the wilderness discouraged, despondent, and content to die. In fact, that is what he told God.

God asked him, "What are you doing here?" (1 Kings 19:13).

Elijah answered, "I have been very zealous for the Lord God Almighty. The Israelites have rejected your covenant, broken down your altars, and put your prophets to death with the sword. I am the only one left, and now they are trying to kill me too" (v. 14).

God replied that he still had work for Elijah to do, that he would appoint a helper for him in his eventual successor Elisha, and that Elijah was wrong in thinking that he was the only faithful person left in Israel. "Yet I reserve seven thousand in Israel—all whose knees have not bowed down to Baal and all whose mouths have not kissed him" (v. 18). When Paul gets around to referring to this story in Romans 11, he concludes, "So too, at the present time there is a remnant chosen by grace" (v. 5).

This is exactly what we find in Romans 9. And it is the meaning of the bulk of the other Old Testament references. Lawrence O. Richards says that the regenerated remnant referred to in the later Prophets is "made up of those in Israel who will experience conversion and receive the promised covenant blessings." According to my count, the English word remnant is used of this new entity six times in Isaiah, three times in Jeremiah, five times in Micah, and three times each in Zephaniah and Zechariah.

This remnant will be saved.

The actual words in Romans 9:27 are "the remnant," that is, the remnant of God's electing choice. As for the rest, "The Lord will carry out his sentence on earth with speed and finality" (v. 28). That is, the rest will perish in God's final judgments.

The Second Quotation: Isaiah 1:9

Verse 29, the second of Paul's two quotations from Isaiah, picks up from the second half of the first quotation, also referring to judgment:

> Unless the Lord Almighty had left us descendants, > we would have become like Sodom, and we would have been > like Gomorrah.

But this is a different kind of reference. The first Old Testament quotation describes what is surely going to happen: "God will carry out his sentence on earth with speed and finality." This verse describes what is sometimes called "a condition contrary to fact." It teaches that unless the Lord had left a remnant, the people would have been like those of Sodom and Gomorrah, that is, entirely wiped out. They would have ceased to exist. Yet this is not the case. In fact, God has left a remnant, which, as Paul is going to say in Romans 11, he has "chosen by grace" (v. 5).

Apart from the grace of God, destruction! Fire from heaven! The only thing that keeps this from happening to all of us is the mercy and kindness of God. It is only because of the inexplicable grace of God that any of us are spared the fate of Sodom and its sister city.

A Summary

In the next study, beginning with Romans 9:30, we will be going on to the next section of Paul's seven-point argument in Romans 9-11, in which Paul is going to show that God's purposes have not failed, because the failure of the Jews to believe on Christ is their own fault and not God's. Before we do that, however, we need to summarize and apply what we have seen in this section.

1. God's word can be trusted. We begin by reminding ourselves that the apostle's main point in this section is that the Bible foretells exactly what has happened through the proclamation of the gospel: (1) Gentiles have been included in what seemed at one time to have been an exclusive privilege of Israel, that is, to be God's elect or saved people, and (2) only a small remnant of Israel has been or is presently being saved. What God foretold has been fulfilled.

We need to learn that truth, and we need to apply it in many areas of our lives. We need it because we all naturally try to outguess or improve on the Bible.

I speak here to professing Christians, who know the Word of God. You know what God says about following him: for example, about seeking "first his kingdom and his righteousness," knowing that "all these things"—food, clothing, the necessities of life, and other good things—"will be given to you" (Matt. 6:33). But you do not do that. You put other things first, leaving God until last, if indeed he gets even that position. You do not think often of him. You do not study his Word. You do not spend time with other Christians. You do not give your money to Christian work or causes. Then you are surprised when life does not go well for you and you run into difficulties. Why should you be surprised?

God does not lie, and he has told you in advance how the Christian life is to be lived and what will happen to you if you neglect him.

The Bible says, "Fear the LORD, you his saints, / for those who fear him lack nothing" (Ps. 34:9).

God declares, "Those who honor me I will honor, but those who despise me will be disdained" (1 Sam. 2:30b).

Above all, the Bible says, "God cannot be mocked. A man reaps what he sows. The one who sows to please his sinful nature, from that nature will reap destruction; the one who sows to please the Spirit, from the Spirit will reap eternal life" (Gal. 6:7-8).

I encourage you to learn the important lesson of taking God's Word at face value and not try to explain it away as applying to someone else or to another time or to different circumstances. The Word of God is inerrant, it is everlasting, and it is speaking about you. The psalmist says,

> Who knows the power of your anger?
> For your wrath is as great as the fear that is due you.
> Teach us to number our days aright, that we may gain a heart of wisdom.
> Psalm 90:11-12

2. All are not saved. The second obvious point of these four citations from the Old Testament is that not all people will be saved.

We have a rather fond notion floating around the Christian church today, even in evangelical churches, that this is not true, and that somehow everybody will be brought to heaven because— this is the way it is usually expressed—God is a God of love, and he could not possibly condemn anyone. I do not know anything else to call this notion but the devil's lie. And what a lie it is! If God is so loving that he will never see his way clear to judge me, well then, I can live my life as I please, even doing the worst possible things, and I will still be rewarded for it. I can be an utter scoundrel. I can cheat, rob, lie, and murder, and it will still turn out right. God cannot possibly condemn me. His character forbids it.

What could be more character-destroying than that? What could be more mind-numbing, more soporific? What could be more demonic?

What could be more wrong?

These verses tell us that God is as much a God of justice as he is a God of love, and that he will eventually display the attributes of his justice on the wicked, namely, his wrath and his power. They tell us that God did not save all people in the Old Testament period, not even all the Jewish people, who are called God's "chosen" ones. If God did not do it then, there is no reason to suppose he will do it now or in the future, especially when he has told us the contrary, which he does in these verses. The remnant will be saved, but for the rest "the Lord will carry out his sentence... with speed and finality" (v. 28).

With speed! That means before long, with no delays. With finality! That means for good. The judgment will be one from which there will be no appeal and no escape.

So I encourage you to abandon the false notion that God will not condemn you. I can understand why you think that way. No one wants to face hard truths. I do not like them myself. But the fact that judgment will come is nevertheless true, and nothing is to be gained by denying or dodging it. On the contrary, God tells us that judgment is coming so we will flee from sin to Jesus, where alone salvation from God's judgment may be found.

3. Formal membership in the covenant body does not save anyone. The third point is that merely formal membership either in the synagogue or in the church does not save anyone. If it could have saved anyone, it would have been the Jews who possessed, according to Romans 9:4-5, "the adoption as sons,... the covenants, the receiving of the law, the temple worship and the promises.... the patriarchs" and even the "human ancestry" leading to the coming of Jesus Christ. But this did not save them. Only personal faith in Jesus Christ saves anyone. If it did not save them, why should you think that mere membership in a church, even an evangelical church, will save you?

Even less, why should you think that you are on your way to heaven merely because your parents are saved people or other members of your family believe on Christ and take his teaching seriously?

For my part, I cannot understand this delusion. I can understand people rejecting Christianity entirely, believing it simply is not true. I can understand them fighting it, not wanting to surrender to the claims of Jesus Christ on their lives. That does not come easy for anyone. But what I cannot understand is people, particularly young people, believing that everything is well with their souls simply because their parents or friends are Christians, when for their own part they are not following Jesus Christ in any significant way whatsoever.

Is this your delusion? If so, let me ask this—Can you think of one significant thing in your life, for which you are yourself personally responsible—not something that was decided for you— which is different because of your supposed relationship to Jesus Christ?

One thing?

Is there a sin you have left because you love Christ and know that he would want you to leave it?

Is there a commitment you have made because it is something you know a Christian should do?

Have you ever chosen something that is right simply because it is right and not because it was expedient or because of what someone else might think of you if you had chosen differently?

Think carefully. If you do not have a pattern of life along those lines—rejection of sin, Christian commitments, and righteous choices—how can you possibly suppose you are a Christian? You are merely a member of a Christian family or a member of a Christian church, and that does not make you one of God's true people, any more than mere membership in the nation of Israel made a Jew one of God's elect.

Of course, none of this would matter if all we are speaking about is having a good or slightly better life or avoiding certain temporal problems. But that is not the case. That is "a condition contrary to fact." What we are talking about are issues of life and death, salvation and judgment, faith and rebellion, heaven and hell, truth and falsehood, reality and the bubble of mere human speculation. Judgment is certain. I urge you to turn from your fantasies and surrender your life to Jesus Christ now.

And I emphasize "now." You are moved now. You are willing to face the possibility that all this may indeed be true now. The Holy Spirit is speaking to you now. But you are going to move back into the world, and when you do the devil will be there again with his seductive suggestions. The world will close in upon you with its lies. Will you find it easier to commit yourself to Christ then? You know the answer to that. You will not. The time to settle the matter is right now. Right now is the only proper time to trust your life to Jesus Christ.

Part Thirteen: Jewish Unbelief

Chapter 137.

Righteousness Wrongly Sought by Works

Romans 9:30-32

If anyone could ever have achieved salvation by his own efforts, it was Martin Luther. In 1505, when he was twenty-one years old, Luther abandoned a promising career in law and entered the monastery of the Augustine hermits at Erfurt. As he later said, this was not to study academic theology but to save his soul.

In those days the monastic orders prescribed ways by which the seeking soul could find God, and Luther, with the determination and strength that characterized his entire life, gave himself rigorously to these tasks. He fasted and prayed. He devoted himself to menial work. Above all, he practiced penance, confessing his sins, even the most trivial, for hours on end until his superiors wearied of his exercise and ordered him to stop until he had committed some sin worth confessing. Luther's piety gained him a reputation for being the most exemplary of monks.

Later he wrote to the Duke of Saxony, "I was indeed a pious monk and followed the rules of my order more strictly than I can express. If ever a monk could obtain heaven by his monkish works, I should certainly have been entitled to it. Of this all the friars who have known me can testify. If it had continued much longer, I should have carried my mortification even to death, by means of my watchings, prayers, reading and other labors."

Yet Luther found no peace through these exercises.

The monkish wisdom of the day instructed him to satisfy God's demand for righteousness by doing good works. "But what works?" thought Luther. "What works can come from a heart like mine? How can I stand before the holiness of my Judge with works polluted in their very source?"

It was not until John Staupitz, the Vicar-General of the Congregation and Luther's wise spiritual father, set him to studying the Bible that Luther realized what the difficulty was. He was trying to earn salvation by works of human righteousness, when the righteousness we need is not human righteousness at all. It is divine righteousness, and this can become ours only if God gives it to us, which he does in the gospel.

Luther had been seeking righteousness by means of human works, when what he needed was to accept God's righteousness by simple faith and therefore stop trying to work for it.

Election and Human Responsibility

It is not often that I have received objections to a sermon even before I have preached it. But that happened when I was about to preach the sermon that has become this chapter of my studies in Romans. The objection came up because I had already announced the point of this sermon while giving an overall outline of Romans 9-11.

I had said that the third reason why the purposes of God have not failed in regard to Israel, the reason Paul develops in these verses, is that the failure of the Jews to believe the gospel was their fault and not God's. The people who objected felt that, on the one hand, I was unfairly attacking Jewish people and, on the other hand, that I was blaming Israel for unbelief when the Scriptures plainly say that it is God himself who hardened Israel's heart. Paul says this in Romans 11:7-10, quoting several Old Testament texts to prove it.

As far as the first criticism goes, it may be that what I said earlier was not balanced well enough. I have been trying to say that the unbelief of Israel is typical of all human unbelief. I have constantly made links between Jews and Gentiles, stressing that all are equal before God and that all must be saved in precisely the same way, through faith in Jesus Christ, because "God does not show favoritism" (Acts 10:34). Nevertheless, Paul is discussing Jewish unbelief particularly, and it is hard to explain Paul's teaching, which I am trying to do, without a great many comments on the Jewish side of the Jewish-Gentile combination.

If I failed to treat that in a clearly evenhanded way, I am sorry.

The second criticism is more substantial and more important, because it suggests that if God hardens hearts, then those he hardens must be excused of the sin of unbelief. That is, the unbelief is not their fault. Or, to put it in the larger categories of election and reprobation that Paul has been treating in these chapters, if God elects some to salvation and passes by others, then those who have been passed by cannot be blamed for failing to have responded to the gospel. At least, that is the argument that was given.

However, anyone who has been closely following these studies of Romans 9 already knows the answer to that objection, because Paul has been dealing with it directly for many verses. The extreme case is that of Pharaoh, whose heart is said many times in Exodus to have been hardened. It is true that God hardened Pharaoh's heart. Exodus says so. But it is also true that Pharaoh had already hardened his own heart. In any case, the hardening of Pharaoh's heart by God was a proper judicial hardening because of Pharaoh's many other sins.

When I discussed this same matter in terms of election and reprobation, I pointed out that the two are alike in some respects but dissimilar in others. They are alike in that both flow from the eternal counsels or will of God and are designed to make the attributes of God known. But they are also different, and one of the ways they are different is that election is due to the special and gracious intervention of God in an individual's life to save that person, while reprobation is merely God's passing by a person, thereby allowing him to continue in his own way and eventually be judged for his sin. That is a very important point.

God never condemns innocent people. Therefore, regardless of what we may or may not understand about the process of election, we can know that if we are judged by God, it must be for the sake of our own sin. And that means that unbelief must be our own fault.

If it is not, whose fault can it be?

You can't blame it on God.

This is the point of Paul's teaching in Romans 9:30-32, because, as I said when providing an overview of chapters 9 through 11, what he is showing is that the unbelief of Israel is not to be blamed on God. And, let me add, the unbelief of the Gentiles is not to be blamed on God either. All human beings instinctively want to do that, both Jews and Gentiles. We do not like the doctrine of election, because it throws us upon the mercy of God. But assuming that we do nevertheless accept the truth of the doctrine, the next evasion is to try to deny our own responsibility.

We are not mere puppets in God's hands. We are responsible human beings, in spite of what we might wrongly deduce from Paul's earlier discussion of election and reprobation.

Romans 9:30-32 could be taken as summing up the preceding verses, which they do in a sense. But they are actually a new section of the argument, as I have been saying. In fact, they introduce a major new portion of the argument, because the matters they raise continue to be discussed throughout the remainder of chapters 9 and 10, and it is not until Romans 11:1 that Paul brings in an entirely new observation.

These verses have a very simple outline. Verse 30 says that the Gentiles as a whole are being saved. Verse 31 says that the Jews as a whole were not being saved. Verse 32 explains why.

Gentile Salvation: By Grace Alone

The critical word in these three verses is "righteousness," which we see at once when we read them. In the New International Version, righteousness is found three times, but it actually occurs four times in the Greek text, one of those instances being translated by the pronoun "it" in our versions. Righteousness is a dominant word in Romans, occurring (in the NIV text) thirty-two times in all. Yet the treatment in these verses and as far as verse 6 in chapter 10, is the first extensive discussion of the idea since chapter 6.

What does righteousness mean? In these verses it is the equivalent of salvation or, to be more precise, justification, which is the same word as righteousness in Greek. Verses 30 and 31 tell us that the Gentiles were not seeking salvation, yet found it, while the Jews, who were seeking salvation, did not find it.

And yet, righteousness is the proper word to use, because it more fully describes the kind of salvation being sought. Salvation is a broad term. There can be many kinds of salvation. But righteousness refers to the righteous requirements of the law of God and therefore has to do with a right standing before him. What we are told in verse 30 is that the Gentiles were not seeking this right standing before God by serious attempts to fulfill God's law, and yet they found that right standing anyhow.

How did they do that?

The first part of the verse is not hard to explain. It is a simple observation along the lines of Romans 1. Far from seeking the righteousness of God by obedience to the law of God, the Gentiles had actually rejected God and were in the process of running away from him and his law as rigorously and rapidly as possible. This placed them on that downward slippery path that Paul describes so well. It is a slope on which they began to sin in greater and greater ways until in the end they had lost the ability to distinguish between right and wrong. In fact, they called the wrong, right and the right, wrong—evil, good and good, evil. They had inverted the moral order of God's true righteousness entirely.

The surprising thing is that they were finding righteousness anyhow. Why? Because that righteousness is in Christ, and they were finding it in Christ because they were believing on him as their Savior. If we should ask how this can be, seeing that they were not even seeking it, the answer is that this was due entirely to the seeking grace of God.

Take a moment and circle two words in these verses: "obtained" in verse 30 and "attained" in verse 31. If you have an Authorized or King

James Version, you will not be able to do this, because you will find the word attained in both places, which is unfortunate, because it suggests that the two situations are alike in nature and differ only in that one was successful and the other was not. Actually, there are two entirely different words in the Greek text, and it is this right and proper distinction that the New International Version and some other versions capture.

Let me illustrate the difference between these words by a cartoon that Donald Grey Barnhouse tells about in his commentary. It showed a boardroom of a large company, with the president standing before his subordinates. Behind him on the wall was a portrait of the company's founder, who was obviously the man's father. The president was scowling at his subordinates, and the caption said, "The trouble with you people is that you have no initiative. Why, by the time I was thirty years old, I had inherited my first five million dollars."

There is a big difference between inheriting a million dollars and earning it. So, to use this illustration, what this verse tells us is that the Gentiles, who did not set out to earn their righteousness, nevertheless inherited it or, as the NIV says, "obtained" it as a free gift.

Jewish Failure: A Surprising Fact

Verse 30, then, has introduced us to a surprising situation: the fact that the Gentiles, who had not sought salvation, were nevertheless finding it. The only possible explanation of this mystery is God's grace. But now we come to verse 31, and we find an even greater puzzle. We find that the Jews, who were trying to earn their salvation, did not attain it.

We will not appreciate the surprising nature of this situation unless we take Paul's words at full value and acknowledge that the Jews had indeed "pursued a law of righteousness." This takes us back to Romans 2, where Paul described his countrymen as relying on the law, knowing the will of God and then choosing what is superior because of that knowledge (vv. 17-18). He wrote, "You are convinced that you are a guide for the blind, a light for those who are in the dark, an instructor of the foolish, a teacher of infants, because you have in the law the embodiment of knowledge and truth" (vv. 17-20). That was absolutely true. The Jews did have the law, and devout Jews did pursue acceptance before God by that means. Like Paul himself during his years as a Pharisee, they labored earnestly to keep the law in all its many minute particulars, thinking that they would be saved by so doing.

But what those verses from Romans 2 also show is that their trying to keep the law was doomed to failure. What the Jews had not reckoned on was their own sinful natures, which made it as impossible for them to keep the law of God perfectly as it would have been for Gentiles to keep it, had they possessed the law and tried to keep it.

The Jews—Paul himself was one—thought they were closer to salvation than the Gentiles, because they were at least trying to keep God's law. But what they failed to see is that they were still failing. And because they refused to see that, they also failed to see what the law was actually given for: to show that we cannot achieve salvation by our works and to point us to the only way salvation can come, which is through faith in Jesus Christ.

Instead of becoming self-righteous, we should become aware of our radical unrighteousness and turn to Christ. We should see what the hymnwriter Augustus Toplady saw clearly when he wrote:

> Not the labors of my hands
> Can fulfill thy law's demands;
> Could my zeal no respite know,
> Could my tears forever flow,
> All for sin could not atone;
> Thou must save, and thou alone.

Many labor and have zeal, perhaps even tears. But none of this is enough. The hymn rightly says that only God can save us, and—if that is the case—salvation must be received on God's terms, which means through faith in the work of Jesus Christ.

By Works or Through Faith?

What I have just said anticipates the point of verse 32. For, having observed how the Gentiles, who had not sought righteousness, found it and how the Jews, who sought righteousness, had not found it, the apostle now adds an explanation of the second case. "Why did the Jews fail to attain salvation?" he asks. The answer is, "Because they pursued it not by faith but as if it were by works." That is, they sought it in the wrong way.

And so do we all, until God shows us our many stubborn errors and turns our minds and hearts to Jesus Christ.

During the last century, in the worst slum district of London, there was a social worker whose name was Henry Moorehouse. One evening as Moorehouse was walking along the street, he saw a little girl come out of a basement store carrying a pitcher of milk. She was taking it home. When she was a few yards from Moorehouse, she suddenly slipped and fell. Her hands relaxed their grip on the pitcher and it dropped on the sidewalk and broke. The milk ran down into the gutter, and the little girl began to cry as if her heart would break. Moorehouse quickly stepped up to see if she was hurt. He helped her to her feet, saying, "Don't cry, little girl."

But she kept crying, repeating through her tears, "My mommy'll whip me; my mommy'll whip me."

Moorehouse said, "No, little girl, your mother won't whip you. I'll see to that. Look, the pitcher isn't broken in many pieces." As he stooped down beside her, picked up the pieces, and began to work as if he were putting the pitcher back together, the little girl stopped crying. She had hope. She came from a family in which pitchers had been mended before. Maybe this stranger could repair the damage. She watched as Moorehouse fitted several of the pieces together until, working too roughly, he knocked it apart again. Once more she began to cry, and Moorehouse had to repeat, "Don't cry, little girl. I promise you that your mother won't whip you."

Again they began the task of restoration, this time getting it all together except for the handle. Moorehouse gave it to the little girl, and she tried to attach it. But, naturally, all she did was knock it down again. This time there was no stopping her tears. She would not even look at the broken pieces lying on the sidewalk.

Finally Moorehouse picked the little girl up in his arms, carried her down the street to a shop that sold crockery, and bought her a new pitcher. Then, still carrying her, he went back to where the girl had bought the milk and had the new pitcher filled. He asked her where she lived. When he was told, he carried her to the house, set her down on the step, and placed the full pitcher of milk in her hands. Then he opened the door for her. As she stepped in, he asked one more question, "Now, do you think your mother will whip you?"

He was rewarded for his trouble by a bright smile as she said to him, "Oh, no, sir, 'cause it's a lot better pitcher 'an we had before."

That is a wonderful illustration of what we do in trying to earn our salvation, and what God does.

When Adam and Eve fell in the Garden of Eden, it was as if the pitcher of human life and morality fell and was forever broken, while all the goodness it contained began to run out. This is not to say that there is no value at all to the broken pieces. I have seen works of art made from broken pieces of pottery, and archaeologists use pottery shards to date ancient civilizations. In an analogous way, there is some limited value to human character, especially in mere secular affairs. But, as far as establishing a right relationship to God is concerned, human character is as worthless as the broken pitcher.

And it does not matter how much effort we spend trying to fit the pieces back together. "All the king's horses and all the king's men, can never put Humpty Dumpty together again." In fact, not even God tries to put it back together.

Instead, like Henry Moorehouse, God holds out a new pitcher filled with the new life of Jesus Christ and places it in our empty hands. And he assures us that he won't judge us now, because "it's a much better pitcher than we had before." In fact, it is a perfect one. It is the very righteousness of God's Son.

What do you need to do?

There is only thing you can do, and that is also what you need to do. You can accept it. You need to open up your hands and receive it. You need to wrap your fingers around it and clutch it to your heart. And stop trying to think that you have earned salvation or can earn it, because you cannot. Righteousness is wrongly sought by human works. It is only rightly found by the faith that receives God's gift.

Chapter 138.
Stumbling over Christ

Romans 9:32-33

One of the most important principles of biblical interpretation is that Scripture interprets Scripture. This means that the best way to discover what a problem passage means is to see what other verses dealing with the same theme say. The related passages may, and usually do, speak more clearly. Scripture always illuminates Scripture, and the comparison of Scripture with Scripture is the only sure way to study the Bible accurately.

This is true of the subject we come to in this study. In the last two verses of Romans 9 the apostle Paul introduces an image to illustrate what he has been saying in the earlier half of the paragraph, namely, that Israel had not obtained salvation because the people as a whole had been offended by Jesus, rather than believing him or placing their faith in him. His image is of a "stumbling stone," which is what he calls Jesus, drawing on two passages in Isaiah for the illustration.

Yet these are not the only places in the Bible where we find this image, and a careful study of the many passages there are shows how rich a theme this was, not only for Paul but for many of the New Testament figures, including Jesus. I want to explore its richness in this study.

The Quotations from Isaiah

The place to begin is with the quotations from Isaiah. There are two of them, Isaiah 8:14 and 28:16, even though Paul has combined them into what seems to be a single quotation in Romans 9:33. Isaiah 28:16 says, "See, I lay a stone in Zion, / a tested stone, / a precious cornerstone for a sure foundation; / the one who trusts will never be dismayed." Isaiah 8:14 says that "for both houses of Israel he [that is, Jehovah] will be / a stone that causes men to stumble / and a rock that makes them fall...."In his citation Paul has used the first and last part of Isaiah 28:16, but has substituted Isaiah 8:14 for what comes between.

Why does he make this alteration? Does this mean that Paul has no real respect for Scripture and therefore quotes it any way he likes, distorting it if necessary?

The answer is exactly the opposite. Instead of distorting Scripture, Paul is doing what I was referring to earlier when I spoke of the manner in which one verse of the Bible interprets another. In Isaiah 8:14, the prophet seems to be saying that Jehovah is the stone that causes people to stumble, the idea that Paul wants to emphasize. But the later verse, Isaiah 28:16, makes clear that the stumbling stone is another individual whom God is going to set "in Zion." This means that the latter passage explains the earlier one, showing that the stumbling stone is actually the Lord Jesus Christ whom the Father sent into the world.

Robert Haldane summarizes many of the implications of this image when he writes:

The designations of a stone and a rock are given to Jesus Christ, both presenting the idea that the great work of redemption rests solely on him. He is its author, the foundation on which it rests, the center in which all its lines meet, and the origin from which they proceed. He is to that work what the foundation stone and the rock on which it is erected are to the building, sustaining it and imparting to it form and stability. In another sense, he is a stone of stumbling, occasioning his rejection by those who, not believing in him, are cut off from communion with God.

It works the other way, too—for the passages in Isaiah not only identify Jesus as the rock, they also identify him with Jehovah, on the mathematical principle that "things equal to the same thing are equal to each other." By establishing Jesus as a rock in Zion, God also proclaims him as the divine rock upon which his people are to build. Texts identifying God as "the Rock" or "my rock" are frequent in the Old Testament. So Paul's use of the image is evidence of his belief in the deity of Jesus Christ.

This was an offense to Israel, of course. In fact, it was the root or foundational offense they found in Paul's teaching.

Paul spoke about this in an autobiographical way in 1 Corinthians, saying that the gospel of Jesus and his cross was "weakness" to the Romans, "foolishness" to the Greeks, but a cause of "stumbling" to the Jews:

Jews demand miraculous signs and Greeks look for wisdom, but we preach Christ crucified, a stumbling block to Jews and foolishness to Gentiles, but to those whom God has called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God. For the foolishness of God is wiser than man's wisdom, and the weakness of God is stronger than man's strength.... God chose the foolish things of the world to shame the wise; God chose the weak things of the world to shame the strong. He chose the lowly things of this world and the despised things —and the things that are not—to nullify the things that are, so that no one may boast before him.

29

I find those three problems in preaching the gospel today. I am not dealing with Greeks, Romans, and Jews specifically. But I do find that some people reject Christianity because they consider it a religion for weaklings; they don't need "religion." Others reject it because it seems foolish; it doesn't conform to the "wisdom" of our secular, scientific age. Still others reject it because the idea of a divine Son of God is an offense to them; they do not understand why they cannot "save" themselves.

Three More Causes of Offense

However, it is not only the deity of Jesus Christ that was and is offensive—to Israel and other peoples. There are other matters, too, and the passage in 1 Corinthians suggests at least three more of them.

1. A stone is a "lowly" thing. As an illustration, it points to Jesus' humanity and low estate. Most people enjoy getting to know other people they consider important, and they are often delighted to be seen with them or to be a part of their cause. If Jesus had come in the splendor of his divine glory accompanied by legions of angels, the people would have rallied to his side. But this is not how he came. He came as a helpless baby, born of poor parents in a distant region of the Roman Empire, and during his lifetime he moved among the poorest of the poor and was pleased to be one of them. The only "important" people he ever met were Pilate and Herod, and that was only when he was on trial before them. Jesus seemed to be insignificant.

It was as Isaiah said elsewhere: "He had no beauty or majesty to attract us to him, / nothing in his appearance that we should desire him. / He was despised and rejected by men, / a man of sorrows, and familiar with suffering..." (Isa. 53:2-3).

A "stone that causes men to stumble" is not one that is placed in some high position in a cathedral tower. It is one that is neglected, one that is lying inconspicuously on the ground.

2. The gospel must be received by faith. This is the point Paul makes in the first half of verse 32, in which he introduces the image of the "stumbling stone." He asked why Israel, which was pursuing righteousness, had not attained it, and he answered, "Because they pursued it not by faith but as it were by works." Salvation is God's gift. So salvation must be received as a gift from God or not at all. If we think we can earn it (or if we insist on earning it), it cannot be ours.

Robert Haldane says, "A free salvation becomes an offense to men on account of their pride.
They cannot bear the idea of being indebted for it to sovereign grace, which implies that in themselves they are guilty and ruined by sin. They desire to do something, were it ever so little, to merit salvation, at least in part."

3. God saves whom he will. The third offense is the one Paul has been elaborating in this chapter as a whole: God's sovereignty in election. God saves whom he will, and he rejects whom he will. Of all the doctrines in the Bible, there is none, in my opinion, so offensive to normal human beings as this, which is probably why even pastors and serious Bible teachers often avoid teaching from this chapter.

I have already quoted Robert Haldane several times, because he is particularly good on this section. Here is a third and final quote:

There is nothing which more clearly manifests the natural opposition of the mind of man to the ways of God, than the rooted aversion naturally entertained to the obvious view of the doctrine of the sovereignty of God held forth in this ninth chapter of the epistle to the Romans.

Self-righteous people, as is not to be wondered at, hold this doctrine in the utmost abhorrence; and many even of those, who are in some measure taught of God to value [this] great salvation, are reluctant to come to the serious study of this part of his Word. Even when they are not able plausibly to pervert it, and when their consciences will not allow them directly to oppose it, with the Pharisees they say that they do not know what to make of this chapter. But why are they at a loss on this subject? What is the difficulty which they find here? If it be "hard to be understood," does this arise from anything but the innate aversion of the mind to its humbling truths? Can anything be more palpably obvious than the meaning of the apostle? Is there any chapter in the Bible more plain in its grammatical meaning? It is not in this that they find a difficulty. Their great difficulty is that it is too obvious in its import to be perverted. Their conscience will not allow them to do violence to its language, and their own wisdom will not suffer them to submit to its dictation....

... ought not believers to renounce their own wisdom and look up to God in the spirit of him who said, "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth."

I have spoken thus far of four great offenses of the gospel: (1) the deity of Jesus Christ; (2) his humanity and humble estate; (3) that the gospel must be received by faith rather than being earned by works; and (4) that salvation is according to God's sovereign election and calling.

Four great stones for stumbling!

But now I ask, "Why should God create a gospel that is so offensive?"

This is not the way a modern advertising executive would do it. He would try to make the gospel as attractive as possible. He would try to make it fit "felt needs." That is the way to get a hearing. That is the way to sell a product. Doesn't God understand the techniques of good marketing? The answer, of course, is that God knows exactly what he is doing. And what he is doing is to humble human pride, which is absolutely necessary if you or I or anybody else is to be saved. It is our pride that has gotten us into trouble in the first place. Pride is the very root of sin. There can be no salvation unless our pride is cut down, torn up by the roots, and cast out, which is what the gospel does. When pride is destroyed, then, and only then, are we ready to believe in Jesus and begin to build upon him.

Capstone of Biblical Religion

This leads us to the next step in understanding this important Scripture illustration. According to Scripture, the "stumbling stone" is meant to be the capstone of biblical religion and thus the foundation on which to build any stable life. To see this we need to trace a few other uses of the image of the stone in the Bible.

The starting point is Psalm 118:22, which says, "The stone the builders rejected has become the capstone."

There is a story behind this verse, though it is not in the Bible. It is a two-thousand-year-old tradition that has come down to us from the time of the building of Solomon's temple in Jerusalem. The stones for that temple were quarried away from the temple site, according to detailed plans supplied by the temple architects, and they were transported to the temple site and assembled there without the noise of stonecutting tools. Early in the construction a stone was sent that did not seem to fit the temple. Since the builders did not know what to do with it, they laid it aside and forgot it. Later, when they were ready to place a large capstone on the now nearly completed structure and sent to the quarry for it, they were told that it is was not there, that it had already been sent up. The builders searched for it and eventually found the stone that had been laid aside. When they lifted it to its proper place in the building, it fit perfectly.

Thus, "the stone the builders rejected [became] the capstone." Jesus quoted this verse from Psalm 118 once when he was speaking to the religious leaders who were looking for ways to arrest him. He had told two stories meant to expose their hardhearted rejection of him. In the first they were portrayed as a son who said he would work in the father's vineyard but did not do it. In the second they were portrayed as wicked tenants of a rich man's field, who plotted to steal it and eventually killed the heir. When he had finished these stories, Jesus said, "Have you never read in the Scriptures: / 'The stone the builders rejected / has become the capstone; / the Lord has done this, / and it is marvelous in our eyes'?" (Matt. 21:42; pars. Mark 12:10-11; Luke 20:17).

The disciples seem to have heard this, because later Peter quoted the verse in the same way and with the same application when he and John were put on trial before the Sanhedrin following Jesus' resurrection and ascension. Peter told the religious leaders, "Jesus Christ of Nazareth... is 'the stone you builders rejected, which has become the capstone'" (Acts 4:10-11).

The Living Stone and God's Temple

We come now to what I regard as the definitive treatment of this image in the Bible, namely,
Peter's handling of it in his first letter. We have seen how Paul quoted Isaiah 8:14 and 28:16 in Romans 9, and how Jesus and Peter himself quoted Psalm 118:22 in Matthew 21:42 (with parallels) and Acts 4:11. In this great passage—1 Peter 2:4-8—Peter draws all three texts together to show how those who believe on Jesus build their lives on him and are made part of a spiritual temple, the church, which God is constructing:

As you come to him, the living Stone—rejected by men but chosen by God and precious to him—you also, like living stones, are being built into a spiritual house to be a holy priesthood, offering spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God through Jesus Christ. For in Scripture it says:

> "See, I lay a stone in Zion, a chosen and precious cornerstone, > and the one who trusts in him will never be put to shame."

Now to you who believe, this stone is precious. But to those who do not believe,

> "The stone the builders rejected has become the capstone,"
>
> and,
>
> "A stone that causes men to stumble and a rock that makes them fall."

They stumble because they disobey the message—which is also what they were destined for.

In view of this passage, I cannot see how anyone can imagine that when Jesus told Peter that "you are Peter, and on this rock I will build my church" (Matt. 16:18), he was teaching that Peter was to be the foundation on which he would build his church. The errors of the supremacy of the Roman pontiff and the infallibility of the pope when speaking ex cathedra are constructed on this text. But these are terrible errors, and they are certainly not what Peter himself understood the Lord's words to mean.

In the Greek language in which the New Testament is written, there is a pun on the word Peter. The Greek word for Peter is petros, which means a piece of rock and can mean something as small as a slingshot stone or pebble. But when Jesus said, "On this rock I will build my church," the word he used was petra (a feminine form of the same root word), which means "bed rock." It was as if he were saying, "You are a little pebble, Petros, but I am going to build my church on myself, because I am the bed rock, petra. I am the only foundation on which anyone can securely build."

It was the same thing Jesus was getting at toward the end of the Sermon on the Mount in his illustration of a house built on a solid foundation. He said, "Everyone who hears these words of mine and puts them into practice is like a wise man who built his house on the rock. The rain came down, the streams rose, and the winds blew and beat against that house; yet it did not fall, because it had its foundation on the rock" (Matt. 7:24-25). Those who do not build their lives on Jesus and his teaching are like houses built on sand, which are washed away by any sudden tempest.

I suppose there were people even in Peter's day who imagined that Jesus was going to build his church on Peter, which is why Peter, rather than some other New Testament writer, gives us this definitive explanation of the image of Christ as the rock. I suppose he is saying, "Don't think of me as the rock. I am as unstable as a pebble. Haven't you read my story? Build your life on Jesus Christ."

Building on the Rock

Which is my conclusion, as well as the conclusion of the ninth chapter of Romans. If you will not have Jesus Christ, he will become a stumbling stone to you that will cause you to fall spiritually. That fall will mean your eternal destruction. But if you trust in him, you will find him to be the foundation stone that God has himself established, and you will learn, as you live the Christian life, that "the one who trusts in him will never be put to shame." Barnhouse sums up the situation wisely:

Men look for something big. God put Christ into this world as a low-lying stone, hid away among the long grass of a distant Roman province. Men held their eyes too high and walked across the world, not seeing Christ as God's only answer to their problems, and they tripped over him and stumbled when they came upon him suddenly. They were offended by a scheme of salvation which brings man to nothingness, and they refused God's way.

But, Barnhouse says, there are some who have accepted God's way:

They have come through the tangled grass of this world with their eyes low upon their own bleeding feet, scarred with their walk on the road of sin. When they have come to this stone, they have been willing to stand on it and ask for nothing further. They have believed God's word about the Lord Jesus Christ as being the only way of salvation. They have abandoned their goal, their road, their strength, their pride, and have taken their stand squarely on the Lord Jesus Christ. To them comes the trumpeted promise from the God of the universe: "Whoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed."

To be "ashamed" means to be utterly confounded in the day of God's final judgment of the world and all persons. It means standing before God with your mouth firmly shut, with nothing to say in your defense as your deeds are read out, their evil judged by the standard of the perfect holiness of God, and your condemnation pronounced in terms so terrible that you will wish to have the mountains fall on you to protect you from the wrath of God or a flood to sweep you from his presence. On that day, your condemnation will be certain unless you are in Jesus Christ. Before it comes, be sure your feet are planted firmly on the Rock.

Chapter 139.
A Prayer for Israel

Romans 10:1-2

Have you ever worked with someone for a long time and been so frustrated with his or her lack of response to your help or teaching that eventually you have just written the person off, saying,
"I've done the best I can. He is going to have to learn the hard way." Or perhaps you said, "Whatever she has coming to her is her own fault."

I am sure all of us have reacted that way at some time about someone. So we should not be surprised in our reading of Romans 9-11 if we should find the apostle Paul doing the same thing, due to the unbelief of his countrymen. In fact, far from being surprised, we would be understanding and sympathetic, especially knowing how badly he had been treated by some of them.

But this is not what we find Paul doing.

Instead of dismissing his countrymen and consigning them to some bad end, we find that Paul is praying for them, which is what each of us should do for those who are unbelieving or who try to create problems for Christians who are witnessing to them about Jesus.

The Flow of Paul's Argument

If you have been studying Romans 9-11 closely, you may have noticed something interesting about each of these three chapters. Each one begins with an expression of intense concern by Paul for his own people. In Romans 9 he says that he has "great sorrow and increasing anguish" in his heart for Israel. In Romans 11 he declares that "God did not reject his people," even though, on their part, the rejection of Jesus by the majority might suggest it. In the chapter we are now studying, Romans 10, he protests that his "heart's desire and prayer to God for the Israelites is that they might be saved."

Paul is grieving because of widespread Jewish unbelief, and it is probably because of this feature that the ancient Bible editors divided the chapters as they did.

Yet the first verse of Romans 10 is not actually the beginning of a new section, which you will realize if you remember the outline I gave for these chapters earlier. As I pointed out at the start of this volume, Paul is responding to the erroneous assumption that the promises of God have failed, because the Jews as a whole have not believed on Jesus. He is giving seven reasons why that assumption is wrong, and Romans 10 is part of the third of these responses, which begins with Romans 9:30. The third response is that the promises of God have not failed in regard to Israel, because the failure of the Jews to believe is their own fault, not God's, just as the failure of a Gentile or anybody else to believe is his or her own fault and not God's. The reason people do not believe is that they are trying to earn salvation by their own good works. And they are proud of their efforts, which is why they refuse to receive salvation as God's gift.

This argument continues in one form or another throughout Romans 10, and a new argument does not start until Romans 11.

This means that the first two verses of Romans 10, which we are starting to study now, are linked to the last verses of Romans 9, and it is exactly this that makes the first two verses of Romans 10 so compelling. Paul has just said that the failure of the Jews to believe was due to the mistaken notion that they could earn their own salvation by good works. But, instead of writing them off at this point, as we might have done, Paul immediately goes on to show that he is concerned about them and is continuing to pray for them.

The word translated "desire" by the New International Version is a rare word that actually suggests the idea of "good pleasure" or "delight." So what Paul is saying is that what would really please or delight him would be the salvation of his countrymen.

Therefore, he does what he can, which is to pray for them. His "prayer to God for the Israelites is that they might be saved" (v. 1).

Praying Always

This is a very simple prayer, but like most Bible prayers it suggests a number of important truths. The first is that prayer is always worthwhile.

The previous chapter of Romans has been on election, and this one is on the fact that the failure of Israel to believe on Jesus is their fault rather than God's, as I have said. Each of these points would seem to be a legitimate reason not to pray. But apparently neither one is a good reason, since Paul is praying. The fact that God elects some to salvation and passes by others does not stop him from praying, and the fact that failure to believe is a human failure rather than a divine failure does not stop him from praying. If he doesn't stop praying because of God and doesn't stop because of man, obviously he doesn't stop at all, which means that he was always accustomed to be praying for the salvation of other people.

He said exactly this when he was writing to the Thessalonians, telling them to "pray continually" (1 Thess. 5:17).

I suppose the problem does not seem to be so great on the human side, since most of us really do believe in prayer. Hudson Taylor, the founder of the China Inland Mission, now the Overseas Missionary Fellowship, said that "it is possible to move men, through God, by prayer alone." We agree on the human side. But what about the divine side? If God has made his decision to save some and pass by others, isn't it useless or even foolish to pray, not to mention presumptuous?

Paul did not seem to think so.

Here is the way John Murray highlights and then resolves the issue:

In the preceding chapter the emphasis is upon the sovereign and determinative will of God in the differentiation that exists among men. God has mercy on whom he will and whom he wills he hardens. Some are vessels for wrath, others for mercy. And ultimate destiny is envisioned in destruction and glory. But this differentiation is God's action and prerogative, not man's. And, because [it is] so, our attitude to men is not to be governed by God's secret counsel concerning them. It is this lesson and the distinction involved that are so eloquently inscribed on the apostle's passion for the salvation of his kinsmen. We violate the order of human thought and trespass the boundary between God's prerogative and man's when the truth of God's sovereign counsel constrains despair or abandonment of concern for the eternal interests of men.

There is even more that can be said. Murray is saying that we cannot know the mind of God in regard to the salvation of sinners. Therefore, we should always pray for them. But we can also add that one way in which God works to call sinners to repentance is through prayer. So, when we pray, God answers our prayers and saves those for whom he moves us to pray.

The theological way of expressing this is to say that God always ordains the means to some goal as well as the ends. So, if he has ordained to save a certain individual through our prayers, it is as necessary that we pray for that individual as it is that the individual be saved. Indeed, we must pray, since the individual will not be saved apart from the ordained intercession.

This should encourage us to pray.

George Müller of Bristol, England, the founder of the great faith orphanages, was a man of outstanding prayer. In his youth he had two friends for whom he began to pray. He kept notes on his prayers, and his notes show that he prayed for them for more than sixty years. One of these men was converted just before Müller's death at one of the last services Müller held. The other became a Christian within a year of Müller's funeral. Toward the end of his life, but before his friends' conversions, someone asked Müller why he was still praying for them after such a long time, since they had shown no response. He answered, "Do you think God would have kept me praying all these years if he did not intend to save them?" It was a point Paul would easily have understood.

The Greatest Prayer of All

The second truth we can see in Paul's prayer for his countrymen in Romans 10 is that the most important of all prayers are that those for whom we are praying might "be saved."

We are to pray about all sorts of things. Jesus himself said, "My Father will give you whatever you ask in my name" (John 16:23b). He instructed us to ask God for "our daily bread" (Matt. 6:11). He said, "Pray for those who persecute you" (Matt. 5:44). The apostle Paul added, "I urge, then, first of all, that requests, prayers, intercession and thanksgiving be made for everyone—for kings and all those in authority, that we may live peaceful and quiet lives in all godliness and holiness" (1 Tim. 2:1-2). I assume this means that we are to pray for peace, national prosperity, and for wisdom and righteousness on the part of those who rule over us. The items for which we are invited to pray are innumerable.

But Jesus also said something we need to think about carefully. "What good will it be for a man if he gains the whole world, yet forfeits his soul?" (Matt. 16:26a). This means that, however good it is to have peace and enjoy a reasonable measure of prosperity, these and countless other things count as next to nothing (or worse than nothing) if we acquire them and yet fail to receive God's salvation.

Remember that, when you are praying for other people. When you pray for your children, pray that they might do well in school, that they might be kept from sin, that they will develop winsome personalities and make worthwhile contributions in life. But do not fail to entreat God for their salvation. They can gain all these other things. Yet, if they are not saved, they will lose it all, and these other things by themselves may even be a hindrance to their turning from faith in themselves to trust Jesus. Learn to think biblically, and then pray biblically, too. And do that, not only for your children but for your parents, friends, and whomever else God puts it upon your mind to pray for.

The third truth in Paul's prayer for his countrymen is found in the verse that follows it, where he says, "I can testify about them that they are zealous for God, but their zeal is not based on knowledge" (v. 2). This means that zeal is no substitute for conversion. Even the zealous must be saved.

When Paul speaks of Jewish zeal in the matter of religion, he was speaking from experience and of something well known to everyone, which means that this statement was not flattery but an honest admission of a great Jewish strength. No doubt there were numbers of secular-minded Jews in that day, as in ours. But for the most part the Jews took their religion very seriously. Paul had done so himself. He had come to Jerusalem from Tarsus in modern-day Turkey, had studied under the great Jewish rabbi Gamaliel, and had thrown himself into the propagation and defense of Judaism with a zeal few even among the Pharisees could match. Years later, in writing to the Philippians, he claimed that he had proved his zeal for God by persecuting the Christians (Phil. 3:6). As far as zeal went, Paul knew whereof he spoke.

But all of his zeal could not save him. And, in fact, his zeal was so misdirected that for a long time it actually kept him from Christ. It was only when Jesus revealed himself to him on the road to Damascus that Paul realized what he had been doing and committed himself to follow Christ from that time forward. In itself, zeal is a neutral thing. Before this, Paul had used it to attempt to destroy the work of God, though in ignorance. After he had met Jesus, he used it to proclaim the gospel and advance Christ's kingdom.

Paul acknowledged the zeal of his countrymen. Yet he still regarded them as lost, prayed for them fervently, and worked tirelessly for their salvation.

This is extremely relevant in our mindless, pluralistic, all-accepting society. For there is a common error that says that as long as a person is sincere, it does not really matter what he or she believes. In our day we are supposed to be open to everyone's version of the truth. Not long ago I got a letter expressing exactly this view and criticizing me because I had said that unbelieving Jews (as well as unbelieving Gentiles) are lost and need to repent of their sin and believe on Jesus. The writer wondered how anyone could preach such a "narrow, hateful" gospel in this age.

That is quite understandable, given the mind-set of most people today. But it only shows how far our culture has moved from Christianity. Why? Because the religion of Jesus is not "allaccepting," except in the sense that anyone may repent of his sin and come to Jesus. On the contrary, Christianity teaches that all are lost and that even the religiously zealous are not saved by zeal alone.

We are saved by Christ alone, received by faith alone. Anything else is not true Christianity.

The Path to Conversion

The fourth and last truth expressed in Paul's prayer for his countrymen is that the necessary first step to conversion, which all persons need, is knowledge. I say this because of the very last phrase of verse 2, which notes that the problem of the Jews was not their zeal itself. In itself zeal can be a very good thing. It was rather that "their zeal is not based on knowledge."

What was the problem? The next verse, which we will come to in the following study, explains it. It was their ignorance of the righteousness of God. Like Luther, many centuries later, they thought that the righteousness God requires of us is human righteousness, that is, a development of character or a collection of good works of which we ourselves are capable. What they did not understand is that the righteousness God requires is divine righteousness. And since it is divine and not human, the only way it can be obtained is from God himself as a free gift. It is what Paul was writing about earlier in Romans, in the chapters in which he was explaining the gospel.

Which is why he was writing it. If the problem was the Jews' lack of knowledge, the solution was to share or communicate that knowledge. To put it in other language, the task is to teach the Word of God.

This means that Christianity is primarily a teaching religion. It is and always has been. In fact, this was the primary thrust of Jesus' three-year ministry. You say, "But didn't Jesus come to be good to people, to heal them of their diseases?" No. He did that, but his primary ministry was to teach them the way of salvation, and to provide for it by himself dying for sin and then rising from the dead.

There is an excellent example of this in the first two chapters of Mark's Gospel. The first chapter of that Gospel tells us that John the Baptist came preaching a baptism of repentance and that after John was put in prison, Jesus picked up the teaching ministry by "proclaiming the good news of God" (v. 14). This theme carries on throughout the chapter. Verse 21 tells us that Jesus and his disciples went to Capernaum, where "Jesus went into the synagogue and began to teach. The next verse says that "the people were amazed at his teaching because he taught them as one who had authority...." Later we find the people exclaiming, "What is this? A new teaching—and with authority!" (v. 27). Teaching is prominent in the chapter.

Now notice what follows. Verse 29 says that Jesus was brought to the home of Peter, whose mother-in-law was sick, and Jesus healed her. The word of the healing soon spread, and before long a large crowd of diseased people had gathered at the door, and Jesus healed them. Night came. Everyone went to sleep. But early in the morning, while everyone else was sleeping, Jesus got up and went out to a solitary place where he prayed.

Soon the disciples also got up, and by this time the crowd of sick people had regathered at Peter's house. The crowd was probably even larger than the night before. So when his disciples realized that Jesus was not in the house, they went looking for him, and when they found him they protested, "Everyone is looking for you!" (v. 37). They meant, "What are you doing out here? This is your great opportunity. Your healing of the sick has been a huge success."

Jesus didn't return to Capernaum. Instead he replied, "Let us go somewhere else—to the nearby villages—so I can preach there also. That is why I have come" (v. 38).

Wasn't it important to heal the sick? Perhaps. It was certainly a good thing to heal them. But it was not as important to heal as it was to teach, and in this case the pressure to heal the sick was beginning to detract from Jesus' teaching ministry. Jesus abandoned the former in order to pursue the latter. He had come to teach, and he was determined that nothing would keep him from that all-important work.

It was the same with the apostles in the early days of the church. In those days there was a problem with the administration of money for the widows. But rather than dealing with it themselves, the apostles asked the church to elect deacons to oversee the work because, they said, "It would not be right for us to neglect the ministry of the word of God in order to wait on tables" (Acts 6:2).

Paul did miracles. We are told about some of them in Acts. He also spoke in tongues (1 Cor. 14:18). But he said, "In the church I would rather speak five intelligible words to instruct others than ten thousand words in [an unknown] tongue" (v. 19).

Why did Jesus, the apostles, and Paul think along these lines? Why did they concentrate on teaching? Clearly, because Christianity must be according to right knowledge, and they knew that proper teaching was the necessary first step in any individual's conversion.

Prayer and the Ministry of the Word

And yet, proper teaching is not the only step. In the Greek text of these verses it is significant that the word Paul uses for "knowledge" is not the simple Greek word gnosis, which gave its name to the Gnostic movement and means "factual knowledge" pure and simple. The word he used is the compound word epignosis, which adds the idea of "knowledge that is according to godliness or with understanding." According to Paul, the Jews had gnosis. What they lacked was epignosis, which is why he was praying for them.

Don't miss the importance of that. Paul dedicated his life to bringing the knowledge of the gospel to both Jews and Gentiles. But he recognized, even as he did so, that no one, either among the Jews or among the Gentiles, would believe on Jesus as his or her Savior unless God opened the person's mind to understand the gospel and regenerated the person's soul to believe and receive salvation. So Paul prayed that God would do the necessary work, even as he did his part preaching and praying for them.

Remember that is what Jesus did, too. He left Capernaum to spend time alone in prayer, and it was after such a time that he determined to keep on teaching, rather than redirecting his ministry to become a miracle worker.

And so did the apostles. They told the early church, "We will turn this responsibility over to [the deacons] and will give our attention to prayer and the ministry of the word" (Acts 6:3-4). Prayer and preaching. The teaching of the Word of God plus intercession for those who are to hear it!

This must be our pattern, too.

Chapter 140.
Two Kinds of Righteousness

Romans 10:3

Most people today are impatient with precise definitions, especially theological definitions or definitions of biblical words, which do not mean much to them in any case. I have had people tell me, "I tune out whenever you start talking about words." This is because they are impatient with precision about almost anything. Yet some things require precision.

You cannot send a satellite into orbit, wire a house, diagnose an illness, prepare an accurate financial balance sheet, nor do hundreds of other important things without being precise. In the same way, you cannot make much progress in learning about God without precision, since God is himself precise and is the source of all precision. One of the words we have to be precise about is "righteousness," which Paul uses twice in Romans 10:3 and many times more in the verses that come immediately before and after it. This is because, as one writer says, "the issues of life and death, of time and eternity, hang upon a proper understanding of the righteousness of God and our relationship to it."

We have difficulty with this, however, and the biggest difficulty is that our ideas of righteousness are completely different from God's idea of righteousness. This is what Romans 10:3 is saying, of course. It is saying that there are two kinds of righteousness, ours and God's, and that the basic spiritual failure of human beings is that they are so pleased with their own righteousness that they will not have the righteousness of God, which they need if they are to be saved from sin.

The opening word of the text is "since." It introduces the reason for the charge made in the preceding verse, namely, that the zeal of Paul's countrymen was "not based on knowledge." It was a zeal that was ignorant of the precise, accurate meaning of this word.

"Righteousness" in Romans

It would be a fair statement to say that one cannot understand the Bible without understanding what it has to say about righteousness. To be sure, there are books of the Bible that do not use that word. But the pivotal books do, and Romans in particular uses the word a great deal. "Righteousness" is found thirty-three times in Romans, as compared with seven times each in Matthew and 2 Corinthians, which are the books using it most frequently except for Romans. The word occurs eight times alone in Romans 9:30 through 10:6. The longer phrase, "the righteousness of God," is found eight times, one of these also being in our text.

Righteousness is prominent in the Old Testament, too, being linked with the name of God hundreds of times. In a valuable note on "the righteousness of God" in his Romans commentary, the Australian scholar Leon Morris points out how with us righteousness is an ethical virtue, but that with the ancient Hebrews righteousness was first and foremost a legal standing. God is righteous, so righteousness in man is that which enables us to stand before him: "The man who is ultimately righteous is the one who is acquitted when tried at the bar of God's justice."

Yet here is the problem. God is the only righteous one. We are not righteous. So who is able to stand before God or be acquitted in his court? The answer is: No one, unless God provides his own righteousness for us as a free gift.

This is what Paul has been explaining in Romans and will continue to explain in this important tenth chapter.

Our Righteousness and God's

A few paragraphs ago I wrote that it is hard for us to understand the meaning of righteousness, because our ideas of it are so completely different from God's. But one thing we should be able to understand clearly is the meaning of our text when it distinguishes sharply between our righteousness (human righteousness) and God's. It is saying that although we use the same word when we are talking about God's righteousness and our righteousness, we are actually speaking about two entirely different things.

God's righteousness is his very nature, for God is righteous, just as God is love. It is associated with his holiness and is perhaps better discussed as that word. Holiness is what sets God apart. It is what makes him utterly unlike us. Human righteousness is merely a social quality achieved by the avoidance of certain gross forms of depravity and the contrary accumulation of outwardly good deeds. It is what enables people to live with each other in partial peace, when each person actually wants everything in life, as well as all other persons, to focus on himself.

Because they are two different things, the accumulation of human righteousness through avoiding evil and performing good deeds can never add up to the true, divine righteousness that God requires of us if we are to be saved from sin and have fellowship with himself.

Let me give a few illustrations.

When I was thinking about this theme during the week I was preparing this material, I remembered when I was in college and my roommate and I were talking. He was a music major. He had been playing a violin concerto on the stereo, and I was humming along, making a noise to mimic the violin. He found my noise offensive and asked whether that was really the way a violin sounded to me. It was a put-down. I told him I was doing the best I could and asked him to make a noise like he thought a violin should sound. I am not competent to judge whether his noise was more like a violin than my noise. I suppose, because he was the music major, that his noise was closer, though I don't know that for sure. But one thing I do know: No sound that either of us made was anything like a real violin. Our noise and the sound of a violin are in two entirely different categories and will remain so.

Here is an illustration I have used before. I have imagined a situation in which a platoon of American soldiers is captured by soldiers from the north during the Vietnam War and put in a prisoner-of-war camp. The American soldiers have no money and have to barter for whatever one soldier has and another soldier wants, which is a not very satisfactory arrangement. But one day a CARE package arrives, and in it is a game of Monopoly. The soldiers are delighted, not because of the game but because of the money. They divide it up, each man getting an equal number of white, pink, green, blue, beige, and gold bills (except for the sergeant, who gets an extra $500). Now, whenever one soldier has an extra cigarette and a second soldier wants it, the first can sell it to him for $100, or whatever. The money is very useful.

In any group of Americans there is always one who is a born capitalist, and this group is no exception. The capitalistic solider knows how to buy low and sell high, and as a result of his dealing it is not long before he has accumulated nearly all the money in the camp.

About this time there is a prisoner-of-war exchange, and this platoon of soldiers is air-lifted to Danang and then to a base in the Hawaiian Islands. Not long after this, our capitalistic soldier arrives home in San Francisco. The first thing he does after greeting his family is go downtown to the Wells Fargo Bank, make his way to the clerk dealing with new accounts, and tell her that he wants to open an account in the bank. "That's good," the teller says. "We like to see servicemen coming to the Wells Fargo. How much money would you like to start your account with?"

The soldier responds by pushing his Monopoly money across the counter. "$1,534,281," he says. The teller takes one look at it and calls the manager, because it is obvious to her that the soldier is suffering brain damage from his confinement.

The Monopoly money might have helped this man get along very well in the prisoner-of-war camp, and even in America it could be used to play games. But it is no use at all in the world of American commerce. In that world you need genuine American greenbacks from the U.S. Treasury.

My third illustration is from Paul's description of his conversion in Philippians 3. He writes there how he had spent the early years of his life trying to accumulate righteousness, which he thought would make him acceptable to God, and he lists the things in which he had confidence:
"circumcised on the eighth day, of the people of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin, a Hebrew of the Hebrews; in regard to the law, a Pharisee; as for zeal, persecuting the church; as for legalistic righteousness, faultless" (Phil. 3:5-6). These items had to do with his birth, religious traditions, affiliations, personal zeal, and outward morality. He thought that was all he needed to attain heaven.

But then Jesus appeared to Paul when he was on his way to Damascus to arrest Christians, and when he saw Jesus in his heavenly glory, a glory that blinded him, all his own righteousness faded away into darkness and seemed to him to be nothing.

I have sometimes said it was as if Paul had been considering himself a 100-watt light bulb, surrounded by people who were only 75-, 60-, and 25-watt light bulbs. But, when Jesus appeared to him, the righteousness of Jesus was like the brightness of the sun. When Paul realized that, he gave up trying to create his own righteousness and instead placed his faith in Jesus, which was the only sensible thing to do.

A Fatal Error

I have used three illustrations of how the righteousness of God and the righteousness of human beings are different things, because this is an important point and I hope to have driven it home by repetition. Yet I admit that I worry about one thing as I do. Illustrations like this tend to trivialize the issue. They even make the distinction seem fun, when actually the matter is deadly serious, and the failure to distinguish our righteousness from divine righteousness has fatal consequences.

A feeling for the seriousness of the issue can be seen from Charles Hodge's observation on Romans 10:3. He wrote that the Jews' "ignorance on this point implied ignorance of the character of God, of the requirements of the law, and of themselves," obviously three important matters. He added rightly, "Those who err essentially here, err fatally; and those who are right here, cannot be wrong as to other necessary truths."

What Paul actually says is that those who failed to see the distinction I am making sought salvation in the wrong way. But that needs to be spelled out more fully. There are five fatal consequences of this error.

1. Those who make it are satisfied with their own righteousness. This is like a woman dying of some disease saying that she is sure everything is all right with her because her face looks good when she puts on her makeup. I have no doubt that a dying woman might look a great deal better with some makeup, particularly if she is very sick. But it is utter folly to trust the makeup and fail to see a doctor, if there is any chance that the doctor can detect the disease and cure it.

Yet this is exactly our folly. Millions of spiritually dying people are willfully ignorant of their true condition and instead trust their efforts to paint over the surface of their lives with human morality. Some do it with sacraments. They suppose that if they have been baptized or take communion regularly, they must be all right with God—since God himself proscribed these things—failing to see that these are meant to be signs of an inward change, not the reality itself, and that in any case they are not something that adds up to God's righteousness. Other people try the same approach by charitable giving, or by giving their time to volunteer causes. They suppose these acts of righteousness add up to God's righteousness. Because they are satisfied with what they have done, they suppose that God must be satisfied, too. They fail to see that they are spiritually dying men and women.

2. They look down on other people. People who fail to distinguish between God's righteousness and human righteousness, and who are therefore satisfied with their own righteousness, inevitably look down on other people—whom they suppose to have achieved less. Because they have no high, absolute standard by which to judge themselves, they assume that they are somewhere near the top.

This is one reason why, in our natural sinful condition, we refuse to look up to God and his righteousness. If we were to look up, as Paul was forced to do on the road to Damascus, what we should be most conscious of is how far short we are of the divine requirements. In fact, we should realize that we are but light bulbs compared with the sun, and it would be foolish to boast of being brighter because we are a few watts above someone else. Seeing the righteousness of God humbles us and takes away all grounds for proud comparison. So we avoid it. We refuse to look up. Instead, we keep our eyes focused on other people and pat ourselves on the back because we imagine ourselves to be superior to them.

3. They resent Jesus and his gospel. This explains the next point, too, because when Jesus came to earth it was as if God brought down to our level the righteousness we in our fallen state refused to look up to or acknowledge.

It explains the fierce hatred of the leaders of Israel for Jesus when he was among them. Even people who do not trust Jesus as their own Lord and Savior generally acknowledge that he was a good man. He was gentle, kind, loving, and active in good works. Why is it that such a person should be as hated as Jesus was, hated even to the point of a trial and execution? The only explanation is that he was too good, too kind, too loving, too active in doing good works. In fact, his good was of such a high quality that anyone with any perception at all saw that it was otherworldly. That is, it was a divine righteousness rather than being merely a human righteousness. It was unattainable and—this is the rub—an intolerable offense to people who before Jesus' coming considered themselves to be quite good and clearly better than others.

This is why Jesus had a much better reception among social outcasts than among the model members of the community. The outcasts had no illusions about themselves. They knew they were sinners. They were merely overwhelmed and happy to find that Jesus loved them. But the self-styled righteous people felt offended by Jesus, someone whose true righteousness exposed the limits and falseness of their own.

4. They misunderstand and mishandle the law. God gave the law to show that we are sinners, not for us to be saved by it. Paul has already made this point in Romans, and we studied it in some detail earlier. If we reject the revelation of God's true righteousness in Christ and suppose that we are doing well in our efforts to achieve our own righteousness, we will then use the law wrongly, misinterpreting it to require what we feel able to do and then praising ourselves for our achievement.

There is no better illustration of this than how differently the Pharisees and Jesus thought about the law. The Pharisees spent a great deal of effort defining what the particulars of the law meant. When the law said, "Remember the Sabbath day by keeping it holy" (Exod. 20:8), they asked,
"What does it mean to keep it holy?" The law said, "On [the Sabbath] you shall not do any work" (v. 10). "But what is work?" they responded. Out of this type of thinking came an elaborate system of rules that proscribed how far you could walk on Saturday, what you could carry with you when you did walk, and the kind of activities you could pursue. It was the same way with each of the other commandments and with the many additional ordinances found in the first five books of the Old Testament. Following these regulations was a daunting task, an enormous burden, but this is precisely what the orthodox set out to do and believed they had accomplished. Paul was one of them himself before his conversion on the road to Damascus. He said of himself, "as for legalistic righteousness, [I was] faultless" (Phil 3:6).

But how did Jesus think about the law? He got to the heart of the law's teaching in Matthew 5, saying, "You have heard that it was said to the people long ago, 'Do not murder, and anyone who murders will be subject to judgment.' But I tell you that anyone who is angry with his brother will be subject to judgment..." (vv. 21-22).

Jesus also argued, "You have heard that it was said, 'Do not commit adultery.' But I tell you that anyone who looks at a woman lustfully has already committed adultery with her in his heart" (vv. 27-28).

And Jesus taught, "You have heard that it was said, 'Love your neighbor and hate your enemy.' But I tell you: Love your enemies and pray for those who persecute you" (vv. 43-44).

Jesus understood the law rightly. Therefore, if we, following his example, also use it rightly, which we refuse to do if we are satisfied with our own deficient righteousness, we will see that we can never measure up to this or any right standard and will turn to the mercy of God to save us from our sins, rather than plead our own corrupt morality as grounds for God's approval. If we see this clearly, we will acknowledge that we are condemned by whatever standard we choose, ours or God's, since at the deepest level we have all broken every right standard and will continue to do so.

5. They will not submit to God's righteousness. The final consequence of failing to see the difference between the righteousness of God and our own righteousness is that we will not submit to God's righteousness, which means acknowledging that we need it and seeking it in Christ, where alone it may be found. This is the point at which Paul closes his argument (Rom. 10:4), for everything else leads up to it.

Let me summarize. Paul says that the people of his day pursued a law of human righteousness but failed to achieve God's true righteousness because they sought it in the wrong way. They thought they could attain it by works, when it can be received only as a gift of God though faith. The reason they sought it in the wrong way is that they were ignorant of these two types of righteousness. They trusted in their own righteousness and thought that, if they had enough of it, their righteousness would add up to the righteousness of God. Therefore, they did not abandon their own efforts and submit to God's righteousness.

"Cannot" or "Will Not"?

"Abandon" and "submit"!

That is exactly the problem. Although God tells us that our own good works will not save us, we love them too much to abandon faith in them. He tells us that we must submit to the gift of his righteousness in Jesus Christ, but we will not submit to righteousness. We say we cannot do it. We "cannot believe." We "cannot understand." We don't even like the distinctions. But God tells us that it is not a question of "cannot." The real problem is that we w*ill not,* and the reason we will not submit is our sin. One commentator says, "If we are not to be ignorant of God's righteousness, if we are to turn away from any attempt to establish our own righteousness, we must come to the place where we submit ourselves to the righteousness of God—as it is seen in... Jesus Christ."

Won't you do that?

As a minister of the gospel of Jesus Christ, I urge you to bow your proud head and put your whole trust in Christ alone. There is no other way of salvation, not by knowledge, not by sacraments, not even by good works. The Bible says that he, that is, Jesus, "has become for us wisdom from God—that is, our righteousness, holiness and redemption" (1 Cor. 1:30).

Chapter 141.
Christ: The Fulfillment of the Law

Romans 10:4

I have learned many lessons in more than twenty years of Bible study and preaching, and one of the lessons is that things that seem simple often are not. Our text is an example. Romans 10:4 seems to be a very simple verse. After all, what could be more straightforward than the words "Christ is the end of the law so that there may be righteousness for everyone who believes"? The verse has only seventeen words, less in Greek (nine words), and all but three of the English words have only one syllable.

Yet Romans 10:4 is a difficult verse to interpret.

And here is the interesting thing: It is the simple words (not the polysyllabics) that are the problem.

The two most problematic words are "end" and "law."

In his excellent commentary on Romans, the great Princeton Theological Seminary scholar Charles Hodge probably reduced the possible meanings of "end" as much as can reasonably be done, but he still speaks of three possible interpretations: (1) "the object to which any thing leads," (2) the "completion or fulfillment" of something, or (3) an "end or termination." In terms of our text, if the first meaning is the right one, the verse means that Jesus is that to which the law points so that, if it is properly used, the law will carry the one using it to him. If the second meaning is correct, the idea is that Jesus has himself perfectly fulfilled the law. If the third meaning is chosen, the verse means that Jesus has brought the dispensation of law to an end by dying for sin, rising again, and inaugurating the Christian Era. Obviously, something can be said for each interpretation.

Then, if you add to these difficulties the possible meanings of "law"—the law of Moses, a principle of conduct, the ceremonial law, or moral law—you can see how the difficulties of interpreting this verse proliferate.

How should we proceed?

I am convinced that in this case the most helpful procedure is not to argue the merits of the various possibilities, but to back off from the text itself and instead ask, "How does Jesus Christ fulfill the law?" He does it in a variety of ways. After we have explored those answers, we can then come back to the text, interpret it, and apply it practically.

To Fulfill All Righteousness

The first way in which Jesus fulfilled the law, and thus became the end of the law, is that he kept it perfectly himself. In books written about Jesus' work, theologians usually distinguish between what they call Christ's "active" and "passive" obedience. Jesus' passive obedience refers to his willingness to accept death in conformity to his Father's will, according to Philippians 2:8:

> And being found in appearance as a man, he humbled himself and became obedient to death— even death on a cross!

[emphasis added] Christ's active obedience refers to the way he carefully and deliberately kept the law of Moses in all respects.

This has several dimensions. It is usually said that Jesus fulfilled the moral law by obeying it perfectly; he was a perfect man. He fulfilled the types and ceremonies of the law by being the reality to which they pointed and by accomplishing in his death what they symbolized; thus, he was himself the perfect sacrifice for sins to which the daily sacrifices and the great sacrifices on the Day of Atonement pointed. Jesus fulfilled the prophecies by living them out to the letter.

In the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus referred explicitly to two of these areas (and probably the third) when he said, "Do not think that I have come to abolish the Law or the Prophets; I have not come to abolish them but to fulfill them" (Matt. 5:17).

In the story of Jesus' baptism, according to Matthew, there is a sentence that has bearing on Jesus' fulfillment of the law. John the Baptist had been alerted by God as to who Jesus was. So, when Jesus came to John to be baptized, John demurred, saying, "I need to be baptized by you, and do you come to me?" (Matt. 3:14). John had been teaching about the Messiah's work in baptizing with the Holy Spirit in contrast to his own merely preparatory water baptism. So he meant that he needed to receive a baptism of the Holy Spirit from Jesus, rather than Jesus receiving any benefit from him.

But Jesus responded, "Let it be so now; it is proper for us to do this to fulfill all righteousness" (v. 15).

This has been a puzzling statement to many people, since John's was a baptism for repentance and Jesus had committed no sin for which he needed to repent. But the reason for it seems clear enough.

On the one hand, since baptism signifies identification, it was by his baptism that Jesus willingly identified himself with all the other Israelites who were responding to John's preaching by turning from their sin to faith in the Messiah. That is, it was a symbol of the union of Jesus with the believer, a doctrine basic to Paul's theology. We looked at this earlier in these studies.

On the other hand, since Jesus speaks of fulfilling "all righteousness," it is clear that he also considered this act to be part of his conscious obedience to all that God required. Through John, God had commanded his believing people to be baptized. So Jesus was baptized.

However, the word that I think is most important in the exchange between Jesus and John the Baptist is "all." For by it Jesus was declaring his intention to fulfill all that God had required. He did this so well that his enemies were unable to accuse him of any wrongdoing, as much as they would have liked to. And God himself affirmed Jesus' perfect obedience to the law by declaring, just two verses later, "This is my Son, whom I love; with him I am well pleased" (Matt. 3:17). This divine evaluation was repeated at the time of the transfiguration (see Matt. 17:5 and parallels).

It was because Jesus fulfilled the law perfectly that he was able to be our substitute in dying for us on the cross, truly "a lamb without blemish or defect" (1 Peter 1:19).

This is the first part of the meaning of Paul's statement in Romans 10:4. It teaches that Christ is "the end of the law" in the sense that he fulfilled or satisfied the demands of the law completely.

Christ Our Righteousness

The second way Jesus became the end of the law is that he fulfilled the law on our behalf, so that now he is not only the source but is himself the righteousness of all who are joined to him by faith. This is what Paul says in 1 Corinthians 1:30 and 2 Corinthians 5:21: "Christ Jesus... has become for us wisdom from God—that is, our righteousness, holiness and redemption," and "God made him who had no sin to be sin for us, so that in him we might become the righteousness of God."

This is what justification is about, and it is what Paul seems chiefly to be talking about in this section of Romans 9 and 10.

We know what Paul teaches about righteousness, of course. But if we can lay that knowledge aside for a moment and go back to look at the end of Romans 9 and the verses that come before our text in Romans 10, we can see at a glance that a major question is unanswered. Paul has contrasted a righteousness that is "by works" with a righteousness that is "by faith" (Rom. 9:32). He has defined the righteousness he is talking about as "God's righteousness," showing that it comes "from God" as opposed to righteousness that comes from ourselves (Rom. 10:3). But he has not said in so many words where this righteousness that is "by faith" can be found. Or, to put it in other terms, if righteousness is to be received "by faith" and faith has content, as it must if it is true faith, what is faith's object?

Those questions are answered by verse 4, which introduces the name of Christ for the first time since the opening paragraph of Romans 9. Jesus is faith's object. He is the one in whom is located the righteousness we need to be saved.

This justification, by which we stand or fall in the sight of the holy God, involves two corresponding transactions. On the one hand, if we are believers, our sin has been transferred to Jesus Christ and was punished in him when he died in our place on the cross. That is why we sing:

My sin—O the bliss of this glorious thought!—
My sin, not in part, but the whole,
Is nailed to the cross and I bear it no more;
Praise the Lord, praise the Lord, O my soul!

On the other hand, his righteousness was transferred to us, with the result that we are now counted as being righteous in him.

Jesus, thy blood and righteousness
My beauty are, my glorious dress;
'Midst flaming worlds, in these arrayed,
With joy shall I lift up my head.

Both belong to justification, and both are true for anyone who has turned from sin and committed his or her life to Jesus Christ. It is what Paul has been writing about in much of the earlier portion of Romans and is reiterating in this passage.

So justification is another meaning of our text: "Christ is the end of the law so that there may be righteousness for everyone who believes."

Free at Last

Thus far we have been thinking of the word end as "fulfillment," or the "culmination" to which something tends. But "end" also sometimes means "termination," and this, too, is involved in Paul's statement. It teaches that Christ has ended the law as a system by which we are supposed to attain to righteousness. Or, to put it in other language, he has freed us from the law's bondage.

I have to be very careful how I say this, because nothing in this study is more apt to be misunderstood—and that from either of two perspectives.

First, I do not mean, as one commentator has written, that "Christ put a stop to the law as a means of salvation." The reason it cannot mean this is that the law never was a means of salvation. Paul has spoken of the true purpose of the law in Romans 7, showing that the law was given to reveal the nature and extent of our sin and to point us to Jesus Christ as the only place salvation can be found. So, whatever "the end of the law" means, it clearly does not mean that Christ terminated it as a way of getting saved.

But neither does it mean the end of any continuing value for the law, for the law is part of Scripture, and "all Scripture is God-breathed and is useful for teaching, rebuking, correcting and training in righteousness" (2 Tim. 3:16). In fact, in Romans 3 Paul asked, "Do we, then, nullify the law by this faith?" and answered, "Not at all! Rather, we uphold the law" (v. 31). In Romans 7 he said, "So then, the law is holy, and the commandment is holy, righteous and good" (v. 12).

The best way of understanding this point is by something the apostle Peter said at the Council of Jerusalem described in Acts 15. Representatives of the expanding church had gathered in Jerusalem to decide the question of whether or not the Gentiles needed to submit to the law of Moses, which the Jewish church at that time upheld. It involved the ceremonial laws of Israel as well as the moral law, and the focal point of the debate was circumcision. Was it necessary for Gentile males to be circumcised to be Christians?

As you know, the council decided that it was not necessary. But the reason I refer to this debate is for something Peter said in the midst of it. He argued that God had saved the Gentiles without their becoming Jews, giving the Holy Spirit to them just as to Jewish converts. "Now then," he said, "why do you try to test God by putting on the necks of the disciples a yoke that neither we nor our fathers have been able to bear?" (Acts 15:10). The "yoke" was the law. So Peter was admitting that the law had been a burden for the Jews in the past and was arguing that it should not be imposed on the Gentiles, since even the Jews had been unable to sustain that harsh burden.

Does that mean that he was encouraging lawlessness, then? Not at all. He was encouraging righteousness, which is my next point. The council's decree reiterated some of the law's moral absolutes, but Peter was acknowledging that righteousness is not attained by legalism. That is, you do not become a better follower of Jesus Christ or a more holy person by adhering to a list of rules. The moral end of the law is attained by Christians, but it is attained by a different principle. It is by the life of Jesus Christ within the believer.

We need to remember that an entire book of the New Testament, Paul's letter to the Galatians, was written to combat the notion that Christians are to make their lives better or advance their discipleship by legalism. The Galatians were not saved by keeping the law but through faith, as Paul repeatedly points out. Therefore, why should they fall back into legalism? They should continue as they had started out. The main point of Galatians is summarized at the start of chapter 5: "It is for freedom that Christ has set us free. Stand firm, then, and do not let yourselves be burdened again by a yoke of slavery" (Gal. 5:1).

Righteousness in Us

This leads to my final point, because, whenever we speak of Jesus, the law, and righteousness, we need to say that Jesus has as his ultimate goal in saving us that we are to be a holy people. I need to add that I do not believe that is what this verse teaches. I think it is primarily teaching about justification—from the context and because Paul says that Jesus is the end of the law "so that there may be righteousness for everyone who believes." A righteousness for us is a righteousness imparted to us by God for Christ's sake. That is what Paul says.

But Paul also could have said, "... so that there may be righteousness in [or practiced by] everyone who believes," which would mean an actual righteousness to be attained by us.

How can I say this?

It is because Paul says it himself:

Therefore, there is now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus, because through Christ Jesus the law of the Spirit of life set me free from the law of sin and death. For what the law was powerless to do in that it was weakened by the sinful nature, God did by sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful man to be a sin offering. And so he condemned sin in sinful man, in order that the righteous requirements of the law might be fully met in us, who do not live according to the sinful nature but according to the Spirit.

Romans 8:1-4, emphasis added

We are neither justified nor sanctified by the law. But those who are justified will also be progressively sanctified by the Spirit of Christ who lives within them, and this means that they will inevitably and increasingly live righteous lives. If they do not, they are not Christians.

Three Applications

I said at the start of this study that I wanted to return to some practical applications of our text, and I do that now. There are many, but I want to mention three.

1. Christ is everything. It is hard for us to imagine how important the law of Moses was for Jewish people living in Paul's day. The law is important for Jews today, of course, even though tradition has tended to replace a thorough knowledge of it. But it was more so then. The law was the very essence of Jewish religion. Yet Paul, who was himself a Jew, is telling us that Christ is the culmination, fulfillment, and (in a sense) termination of the law. For he "is the end of the law." It is a way of saying that everything that matters in salvation and religion is in him.

One commentator writes, "Instead of the temple it is to be Christ; instead of Moses, Christ; instead of Aaron, Christ; instead of the law, Christ; instead of ceremonies, Christ; instead of worship localized in a building, there is to be the eternal, omnipotent Christ." It is impossible to exalt the nature and place of the Lord Jesus Christ too much.

2. If I am in Christ, I will never be condemned for breaking the law or be rejected by God. How could I be, since Jesus has fulfilled the law on my behalf and has borne the punishment due to me for breaking it? He has become my righteousness.

3. To be "in him" I must believe on him. For the verse also tells me, "Christ is the end of the law... for everyone who believes." For everyone? Yes, but for everyone who believes. The promise is universal and specific.

In one of his books, Harry Ironside tells of a young woman he led to the Lord on one occasion. She had received a Christian upbringing, but she had thrown her heritage to the wind and had lived a worldly life. Now she was dying of tuberculosis and had sent for Ironside. She had been given three weeks to live. "Do you think there is any hope for a sinner like me?" she asked when she saw Ironside.

Ironside led her through the gospel, coming at last to John 3:16: "For God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son, that whoever believes in him shall not perish but have eternal life."

"Are you included in that 'whoever'?" he asked the woman.

By this point she was ready to commit herself to Christ and did so, and Ironside assured her that if she was truly in Christ there was no condemnation for her, even though she had lived a sinful life and was coming to Jesus at what was apparently the very end of it. John 3:18 said: "Whoever believes in him is not condemned, but whoever does not believe stands condemned already...."

A month or so later, after Ironside had finished his meetings in that area and had gone elsewhere, he was told of her passing. Her minister had been with her. "Can you hear me?" he had asked.

"Yes," she said.

"Do you believe on the Lord Jesus Christ?" he continued.

"Yes."

"What does he say about you?"

"Not condemned," she replied. And then, uttering her last words, "If you see Mr. Ironside, tell him it's all right."

It is all right, and will be. "For Christ is the end of the law so that there may be righteousness for everyone who believes."

Chapter 142.
How Faith Speaks

Romans 10:5-9

We live in such a mindlessly pluralistic society that it is considered uncouth, if not wickedly immoral, to suggest that some religions may be better than others or, even worse, that some religions may be wrong. But some are wrong. In fact, all are wrong that do not call us out of our own inadequate self-righteousness to faith in Jesus Christ.

That is what Paul is saying in the extremely important paragraph to which our study of Romans has now brought us (Rom. 10:5-13). This paragraph is part of a longer section beginning with Romans 9:30 and running to the end of Romans 10, a section in which Paul is explaining that the unbelief of his countrymen is not God's fault but theirs, since the gospel had been communicated to them. The paragraph develops that analysis by contrasting what Paul calls "a righteousness that is by law" with "a righteousness that is by faith." But the verses we are studying (vv. 5-9) do more than this. They also describe three kinds of religion, pointing us away from the two wrong kinds of religion to the true religion that confesses Jesus Christ as Lord.

These three religions are: (1) the religion of works, (2) the religion of signs, and (3) the religion of faith. Paul develops them by telling us: (1) how legalism speaks, (2) how faith does not speak, and (3) how faith does speak.

How Legalism Speaks

The first religion is the religion of works. We already know a great deal about it because it is what Paul has been chiefly refuting all along. What is different about his treatment of the religion of works in this section is his confirming quotation from the law of Moses.

The quotation is from Leviticus 18:5, in which God is speaking to the Israelites through Moses, saying, "Keep my decrees and laws, for the man who obeys them will live by them. I am the LORD." This verse seems to have meant a great deal to Paul, for in addition to our text he also uses it in the letter to the Galatians. In Romans he says, "Moses describes in this way the righteousness that is by the law: 'The man who does these things will live by them.'" The Galatians passage reads, "The law is not based on faith; on the contrary, 'The man who does these things will live by them'" (Gal. 3:12). In both passages he contrasts the way of works with the way of faith and shows that they are mutually exclusive.

This point is all that is necessary for his argument. We need to keep that in mind, because without it we will get mixed up in our comparison of Moses' words with Paul's use of them.

In Leviticus, Moses seems to be telling the people that they need to keep the law and that, if they keep it, they will enjoy abundant life. That is true, of course. On the simplest level it is true that any person will be blessed to the extent that he or she lives according to the revealed law of God. That is only a way of saying that people who love God, keep the Sabbath, honor their parents, tell the truth, are faithful in their marriages, and do not steal or covet things that are not theirs will be happy. People who dishonor God, break faith, cheat, lie, and live for material possessions are miserable.

In addition, the text can be taken as saying that if the Jews would keep God's law to the extent that people can keep God's law, God would prosper the nation. This is also true. God will do the same at any time with any nation, ours included. He said, "If my people, who are called by my name, will humble themselves and pray and seek my face and turn from their wicked ways, then will I hear from heaven and will forgive their sin and will heal their land" (2 Chron. 7:14).

But Paul is not drawing these points from the quotation, and some who have noticed the difference have supposed that he is misusing it. That is not the case. Paul would readily acknowledge what I just said, namely, that morality is better than immorality and brings blessing. But he would add two important truths:

First, in religion we are talking about more than mere morality. We are talking about how a person can become right with God. If we approach the text at that level, allowing the word live to speak not merely of a happy life here but of eternal life, then we need to acknowledge that no one is able to keep the law of God well enough to reap this great benefit. It is true that anyone who is able to keep the law perfectly will be rewarded by God with eternal life. But nobody does keep the law perfectly. Therefore, salvation is beyond the grasp of those who are merely lawkeepers. Right standing before God must be sought in a different way entirely, and that is by faith in Jesus Christ as the Savior.

Second, Paul would add that the way of works and the way of faith cannot be mixed, which in my judgment is how he uses the text from Leviticus here. The way of works is the way of law, he says. If you think you are going to be saved by law, it is by keeping the law that you must try to be saved. But you cannot make up for your deficiencies by adding faith to it, just as it is also impossible to begin by faith and then add law.

The Galatians had been trying to add works to faith, which is why Paul cites the same Leviticus passage in his letter to them. He tells them that if they tried to add works to faith as a way of salvation, Christ and his work would be of no value to them (Gal. 5:2).

No one can be saved by a religion of works, however hard he or she tries. Many are trying. Most of the world's religions are works religions. But the Bible says that if you would be saved, you must give up any thought of contributing to your salvation by what you do and instead trust Jesus Christ and his work completely. As one commentator says, Christ "charged himself with the doing." He has left us "only the believing."

How Faith Does Not Speak

The second religion Paul writes about in these verses is the religion of signs and wonders, which he introduces as a way the religion of faith does not speak. The text reads, "But the righteousness that is by faith says: 'Do not say in your heart, "Who will ascend into heaven?"' (that is, to bring Christ down) 'or "Who will descend into the deep?"' (that is, to bring Christ up from the dead)" (vv. 6-7).

These verses introduce a second reference to the Old Testament. But they are not an exact quotation, which Paul seems to acknowledge by the way he brings the words in. In the earlier reference (to Leviticus) he said, "Moses describes in this way...." That means "Moses wrote" or even "God, through the hand of Moses, says." In this case, because he is handling the words loosely, Paul writes instead, "The righteousness that is by faith says...." This looser reference is to Deuteronomy 30:12-14.

In that passage Moses is speaking to the people, assuring them that God will bless the nation if they obey his commands and decrees:

Now what I am commanding you today is not too difficult for you or beyond your reach. It is not up in heaven, so that you have to ask, "Who will ascend into heaven to get it and proclaim it to us so we may obey it?" Nor is it beyond the sea, so that you have to ask, "Who will cross the sea to get it and proclaim it to us so we may obey it?" No, the word is very near you; it is in your mouth and in your heart so you may obey it.

The point is that Israel had the law and that the law was all they needed. They were not to seek out an additional revelation but rather were to occupy themselves with obeying what they had already been given.

This is the passage Paul refers to, but he throws in an additional twist, explaining Moses' reference to ascending into heaven by adding "that is, to bring Christ down" and his reference to going beyond the sea (or descending into the abyss) by adding "that is, to bring Christ up from the dead." To most people those explanations do not do much to explain anything, not even Deuteronomy, and they even introduce confusion as to what Paul himself is saying.

What is Paul saying? What do those strange explanations mean?

In my opinion, this is not a case in which one explanation rather than others should be chosen, but rather a situation in which there are several overlapping or unfolding meanings. That is, a basic meaning is seen to contain additional meanings, and all are important. Each has bearing on what Paul wants to say in this passage.

Meaning number 1: Israel did not need an additional word from God. This is the literal meaning of the words in Deuteronomy, and although Paul adds specifically Christian interpretations to them, this meaning alone is true both for Israel and for the Christian community. As far as Israel is concerned, the people did not need an additional word from God, because, as Paul teaches elsewhere, the law itself contained announcements of the gospel. This was the point of Romans 4, where Paul showed that the doctrine of justification by faith was known to Abraham and David and was taught to Israel through their stories, as well as in other places.

As far as Christians are concerned, the same meaning holds. For neither do Christians need an additional word from God. They have what they need already, and it is the gospel message being proclaimed by the apostles: "That if you confess with your mouth, 'Jesus is Lord,' and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, you will be saved" (Rom. 10:9).

Meaning number 2: Israel did not need to do something in order to bring the Messiah to them. This is the unique sense of what Moses said to the people. For we notice that he did not speak merely of waiting for a new word from heaven or from beyond the sea but rather of "ascending" into heaven or "crossing" the sea to get it.

In his short but valuable book on Romans 9-11, the Danish Professor of New Testament Johannes Munck argues from rabbinical texts that "the Jews held that it would require an effort to bring the Messiah down from heaven. Israel must repent before the Messianic era can begin. " It is hard to say with certainty that this is exactly what Paul is thinking of, but the idea of doing something certainly fits this context. The Jews wanted to do something to earn their salvation. Yet even before the Messiah came they were not expected to do anything, only to believe God's word and look forward to him in faith, as Abraham, David, and the other Old Testament believers had done. Now it is even more apparent that this is the case. The Messiah has come. So there is no need to ascend into heaven to bring him down. He died for sin and has been resurrected. So there is no need to descend into the world of the dead to bring him back. All that is needed is to believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and the gospel.

Meaning number 3: Neither Israel nor Christians today are to look for miracles. It is because of this meaning that I have spoken of "the religion of signs." It is part of this passage because, as nearly all commentators recognize, the expressions about ascending into heaven to bring Christ down and descending into the abyss to bring Christ up are proverbial expressions for what is clearly impossible. If someone could produce Christ or his power on demand, bringing him down from above or up from below, that person would be a miracle worker. But we are not to look for that, any more than we are to look for an additional revelation.

This matter is so important that I will return to it in the next study of what I call "The False Religion of Signs and Wonders." I am going to look at its contemporary manifestations.

Here I want to notice the evidence for this same false religion in Israel. Moses had been used by God to do miracles, just as Jesus had done miracles in his lifetime. But at the end of Deuteronomy, which is where these words come from, Moses is about to be taken away from the people, and they were understandably filled with anxiety about this. "Who is going to lead us when Moses, the miracle worker, is gone?" they would have been asking. What Moses tells them is that they do not need another miracle worker, since they have the law of God (which contains the gospel). What they need is very near them; in fact, it is already in their mouths and hearts (Deut. 30:14).

They were not satisfied with this, of course. They wanted miracles, and by the time of Jesus Christ they were actually demanding them. "Teacher, we want to see a miraculous sign from you," the unbelieving Pharisees and hostile teachers of the law brazenly demanded of Jesus (Matt. 12:38). He replied,

A wicked and adulterous generation asks for a miraculous sign! But none will be given it except the sign of the prophet Jonah. For as Jonah was three days and three nights in the belly of a huge fish, so the Son of Man will be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth. The men of Nineveh will stand up at the judgment with this generation and condemn it; for they repented at the preaching of Jonah, and now one greater than Jonah is here. The Queen of the South will rise at the judgment with this generation and condemn it; for she came from the ends of the earth to listen to Solomon's wisdom, and now one greater than Solomon is here.

Matthew 12:39-42
Jonah did no miracles in Nineveh, yet Nineveh repented. Solomon did no miracles in Israel, yet the Queen of the South came to hear him speak. So the Jews' demand that Jesus give them a sign was actually an evasion, since their real problem was that they did not like what he was teaching. However, just as the "preaching" of Jonah reached the people of Nineveh and the "wisdom" of Solomon reached the Queen of the South, so the word of the gospel is the means by which God saves sinners today.

Do miracles occur today? There are differences of opinion on this question. I believe they do at times, for God is not bound by anything, and he is obviously as able to do miraculous things today as he ever was. But we are not to seek miracles as part of the gospel presentation. For a religion of signs and wonders is as false a gospel as the religion of works. Both are attempts to do something that God has declared outside true Christian proclamation, and signs, as well as works, detract fatally from the message of Christ's atonement.

Faith's Confession

That brings us to the third of these religious systems, the one Paul has been urging all along. We have seen how faith does not speak. It does not call for signs. How, then, does faith speak? Paul gives the confession of true faith in verses 8 and 9: "But what does [faith] say? 'The word is near you; it is in your mouth and in your heart,' that is, the word of faith we are proclaiming: That if you confess with your mouth, Jesus is Lord,' and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, you will be saved."

I have said that in the next study we are going to go back and look at verses 6 and 7 for what they have to say about "The False Religion of Signs and Wonders." In the study after that we will come back to verses 8 and 9, studying them for the proper content of genuine "Christian preaching."

But we are studying three kinds of religion in this chapter: the religion of works, the religion of signs, and the religion of faith, and it is important even here to see the essence of this third, true religion.

First, it is a religion based on Jesus and his work alone. When we were looking at verse 4, one of the applications of that study was that "Christ is everything." He is "the end of the law so that there may be righteousness for everyone who believes." It is the same here. For the message that is near us, in our mouths and hearts, is Jesus, and the confession of faith through which we are saved is that "Jesus is Lord" and that God raised him from the dead. Those are not simplistic items, as we will see. They involve a great amount of biblical theology. But they are all about the Savior. That is my point. Christianity is Jesus Christ. So anything that detracts from him or his work is a false religion.

Second, faith is essential. We are not saved by works or miracles, but this does not mean that salvation is somehow extraneous to us in the sense that it happens mechanically. On the contrary, it is as intimate and life-transforming as anything could possibly be. It finds us as dead men and women, under the curse of God, and it changes us into spiritually regenerated people who now live under God's protecting love and blessing.

How does that happen? It happens through faith, which is what Paul has been saying all along.

Notice what happens to the language of the passage in verse 9. In verse 5 Paul has been quoting Moses. He tells us what Moses said. Verses 6 through 8 have been quoting "the righteousness that is by faith." They tell us how faith speaks. But what happens in verse 9? For the first time in many verses, the language shifts from the third person to the second person, emphasizing the word you. "That if you confess with your mouth, 'Jesus is Lord,' and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, you will be saved."

Isn't that striking? It is the clearest means Paul could possibly have chosen to use in the context of explaining the nature of true religion and the essence of the true gospel: "You must believe it." It is not of works, and it is not in response to miracles. But it is of faith! Therefore, it is only those who believe on the Son of God who are saved.

This kind of religion is not calculated to stroke the fallen, Adamic ego, and it is not "spectacular" in a worldly sense. It will not win the attention of the world as would jumping unharmed from the pinnacle of the temple or casting out demons or predicting the future or healing the sick or turning hurricanes aside. But it is God's true religion. And what is most important, it is the teaching God honors in accomplishing the most important miracle of all, namely, the regeneration of a dead soul, so that one who was formerly bound for hell is thereafter bound for heaven.

Are other things important? Some are, though to different degrees.

Not long ago I was speaking to a group of seminary students, and I was able to point out how a decade or two ago the preaching of biblical theology was pushed aside by psychology and how in our day the preaching of biblical theology is being pushed aside by sociology. Psychology has a place, I said. So does sociology. But what is most important—the one thing we absolutely cannot do without—is an exposition of the Bible that lifts up Jesus Christ as Savior and Lord and calls upon all persons everywhere to turn from their sin and trust this risen Lord for their salvation.

Why? "For it is with your heart that you believe and are justified, and it is with your mouth that you confess and are saved. As the Scripture says, 'Anyone who trusts in him will never be put to shame'" (Rom. 10:10-11).

Have you believed on Christ and confessed him before other people, as he commands you to do? Have you called on his name?

Remember, works will not save you. You cannot keep the law even if you want to, and deep in your heart you do not even want to keep it. And God is not going to give you miracles to titillate your religious appetite. Christ has already descended from heaven. He has already told us who God is and what he requires of us. Jesus has given his life for his people. He has already been raised from the dead. Therefore, the gospel is not far off. It is right here. It is in our mouths and in our hearts. All that remains is for you to embrace it personally and so pass from a false religion to the true one and thus from death to life.

Chapter 143.

The False Religion of Signs and Wonders

Romans 10:6-7

We are studying an important paragraph in Romans in which the apostle Paul: (1) compares three types of religion, (2) describes true religion as faith in "Jesus as Lord" and (3) explains how this true religion of faith is to be communicated. In other words, he is talking about the content of the gospel and how to do evangelism.

In our last study we looked at this paragraph in a general way in order to get an overview of the whole. But now, as I indicated then, we need to return to specific parts of it and examine each in detail. In this study we return to the religion of signs and wonders, as suggested by Paul's use of Deuteronomy 30:12-14, which he quotes with his own explanatory additions: "The righteousness that is by faith says: 'Do not say in your heart, "Who will ascend into heaven?"' (that is, to bring Christ down) 'or "Who will descend into the deep?"' (that is, to bring Christ up from the dead).
[It says,] 'The word is near you; it is in your mouth and in your heart....'" (vv. 6-8).

If a person could ascend into heaven to bring Christ and his power down or into the deep to bring him up, that person would be a miracle worker. So Paul is saying, among other things, that miracles are not the way to do evangelism.

The Vineyard Movement

The reason I need to return to this mistaken notion is twofold. First, because people have a fascination with "signs and wonders," it is easy for anyone to get off the right track in this area. Second, there is a powerful movement within so-called evangelical Christianity that embraces and actively promotes this approach. It is called the Vineyard Movement, and it is associated with the name of John Wimber, founder and pastor of the Vineyard Christian Fellowship in Pasadena, California, a church that started in his home in 1977 but has expanded today to more than two hundred congregations scattered throughout the English-speaking world.

For a short time John Wimber taught as an adjunct professor at the School of World Missions at Fuller Theological Seminary, which he refers to often to establish credibility. The course was called MC:510, "The Miraculous and Church Growth." From the material of this course Wimber produced a book, actually written by a man named Kevin Springer, titled Power Evangelism. This has been followed by another, titled Power Healing.

These books contain endorsements by such evangelical leaders as C. Peter Wagner of the Fuller Seminary School of World Missions, Michael Green of Regent College, and the popular evangelical authors Richard J. Foster and John White. So John Wimber's views are not to be taken lightly.

What, then, does Wimber teach? He has several points of emphasis.

1. Spiritual warfare. The starting point of John Wimber's theology is that Christians are involved in a spiritual battle against the devil and demonic forces. This is because the kingdom of God has come into the world as a result of Jesus' coming but is opposed by Satan's kingdom. Christians are Jesus' soldiers in this conflict, and they have been given authority to oppose Satan and cast him out. Wimber calls clashes between the kingdom of God, represented by Christians, and the kingdom of Satan "power encounters." They are tests of strength. Who is stronger? Who will win?

2. Power evangelism. It follows from this premise, according to Wimber, that the way to do evangelism is by miraculous demonstrations of the superior power of God, which he calls "signs and wonders." These involve such things as casting out demons, healing the sick, and receiving and acting upon special personal revelations from God about what another individual has done or is thinking, facts otherwise unknown to the evangelist. Wimber calls these revelations "words of knowledge."

It is important to realize that Wimber distinguishes at this point between what he is recommending and what he calls "programmatic evangelism." Programmatic evangelism is traditional evangelism. It is "message-oriented" and appeals to "rational arguments." It "attempts to reach the minds and hearts of people without the aid of charismatic gifts." It is evangelism, but because its goal is "decisions for Christ" instead of making disciples, the people reached by it "do not move on to a mature faith.... There is something inadequate about their conversion experience."

By contrast, "power evangelism" is dependent upon the moment-by-moment leading of the Holy Spirit and by his revelation of what is going on in other persons' lives. "In power evangelism key obstacles—an adulterous affair, bitterness, a physical ailment, demon possession—are exposed and overcome, striking deeply into the hearts of people. This frees new believers from major obstacles so that they may experience future spiritual growth. Further, power encounters authenticate conversion experiences in a way that mere intellectual assents do not. This gives new Christians confidence about their conversions, a solid foundation for the rest of their lives."

In short, the best and most effective evangelism, strong and rapid growth in the Christian life, and lasting assurance of salvation are attained only by miracles.

This is a long way from what Christians used to believe when they sang, "My hope is built on nothing less / Than Jesus' blood and righteousness" or "How firm a foundation, ye saints of the Lord, / Is laid for your faith in his excellent word!" It is a long way from Romans 10.

John Wimber: An Evaluation

I think this movement is mistaken and dangerous, as anyone can tell from what I have said so far. But before pressing my critique, I want to acknowledge that there are nevertheless points in Wimber's teaching with which all true Christians should agree.

First, we can agree that spiritual warfare is a reality, and a serious matter at that. We cannot forget that Ephesians 6 (and comparable passages) are in the Bible, nor that we are often warned against Satan. However, we will also remember that Ephesians 6 does not promote miracle working as the way to do battle against Satan, but instead admonishes us to be clothed with the armor of Christian character and armed with the "sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God" (v. 17).

Second, we can acknowledge that much traditional Christianity is weak, including its evangelism. It often is a religion of the intellect only, not a religion of the heart. It is frequently formal and even dull. In large sections of the church, very little evangelism takes place.

Third, we can be open to the claim that God can (and does) do miracles. In the last study I acknowledged that there is a difference of opinion on this point. The best and best-known denial of the view that miracles are for today is B. B. Warfield's classic study of the alleged miraculous events in church history titled Counterfeit Miracles. It is a devastating exposure of many bogus claims of miracles from the patristic age to the twentieth century. But although Warfield begins from the perspective that miracles were given by God to authenticate the office of the apostles and ceased with them and their immediate successors (those on whom they laid their hands and passed on their gift), this great Princeton theologian nevertheless believes, as do most Christians, that God answers prayer and sometimes heals and does other humanly inexplicable things in answer to it. "We believe in a wonder-working God; but not in a wonder-working church," says Warfield.

Don't you agree with that?

I believe that a Christian can pray for the sick, even, in some cases, praying for the casting out of demons. But this does not mean that we have to believe in the vast majority of alleged miracles or be blinded to the deception of many who pretend to do them. Above all, it does not mean that we should alter Bible-taught ways of doing evangelism by mistakenly claiming special revelations or wrongly aspiring to do miracles.

"Signs and Wonders" in the Bible

The only reliable basis on which to evaluate the views of John Wimber, or anyone else for that matter, is the Bible's teaching, and in this case what we have to ask is: "What does the Bible itself say about 'signs and wonders'?" A "sign," of course, is an event that points to something greater than itself, and a "wonder" is an event that causes wonder or evokes amazement on the part of those who see it. Together, the terms refer to unusual events we might call "significant wonders."

In 1987 John Wimber paid a much-publicized visit to Australia, in response to which pastors in the Evangelical Fellowship in the Anglican Communion (the EFAC of Sydney) prepared a helpful study of Wimber's teaching, which they distributed to their parishes by way of pastoral guidance. The book was titled Signs & Wonders and Evangelicals: A Response to the Teaching of John Wimber, and it was written by professors Paul Barnett, Robert Doyle, and John Woodhouse and by the Bishop of South Sydney, John Reid. One chapter by John Woodhouse surveys the various ways "signs and wonders" are referred to in the Bible. He observes correctly that the phrase is used in four areas.

1. Signs accompanying the historical redemptive acts of God. This is the most common use of the term "signs and wonders," and it is localized at two points of the biblical revelation: the deliverance of the people of Israel from Egypt and the earthly ministry of Jesus Christ.

In the first category are such texts as Exodus 7:3-4 ("I will harden Pharaoh's heart, and though I multiply my miraculous signs and wonders in Egypt, he will not listen to you..."), Deuteronomy 26:8 ("The LORD brought us out of Egypt with a mighty hand and an outstretched arm, with great terror and with miraculous signs and wonders"), and Acts 7:36 ("He led them out of Egypt and did wonders and miraculous signs in Egypt, at the Red Sea and for forty years in the desert"). There are also texts saying that God will unleash the same judgment signs against Israel if the people depart from God and do not repent of their sin (cf. Deut. 28:45-46). In the second category are such texts as Acts 2:19, which quotes Joel 2:30 ("I will show wonders in the heaven above and signs on the earth below..."), and Acts 2:22 ("Jesus of Nazareth was a man accredited by God to you by miracles, wonders and signs, which God did among you through him...").

This comparison suggests that the signs accompanying the redemptive work of Jesus parallel the signs accompanying the redemption of Israel from Egypt. But here is the important thing: Neither the Old Testament signs nor the New Testament signs are put forward as examples of corresponding contemporary miracles but as redemptive events that it is the work of faith to remember.

John Woodhouse writes correctly, "Faith involves remembering the signs and wonders by which God redeemed his people.... Unbelief is precisely a failure to remember those wonders.... A consequence of this is the fact that a desire for further signs and wonders is sinful and unbelieving."

This is exactly what Jesus said to the Pharisees. "A wicked and adulterous generation asks for a miraculous sign! But none will be given it except the sign of the prophet Jonah" (Matt. 12:39).

We might also note that signs do not in themselves create faith in the hearts of observers and can even harden hearts, as was the case with Pharaoh. In other words, even such spectacular signs as the plagues against Egypt and the miracles of Christ do not in themselves promote faith. Why? Woodhouse answers, "Because the power of God which saves sinners is not seen in any contemporary miracle, but only in the death of Christ on the cross."

That is why Paul told the Corinthians, "Jews demand miraculous signs and Greeks look for wisdom, but we preach Christ crucified: a stumbling block to Jews and foolishness to Gentiles, but to those whom God has called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God" (1 Cor. 1:22-24).

2. Deceptive signs and wonders. John Wimber does not talk about this second class of miracles, but it, too, is a prominent strain in the Bible.

For example, in Deuteronomy the people are warned against prophets who do signs and wonders yet proclaim other gods. "You must not listen to the words of that prophet or dreamer. The LORD your God is testing you to find out whether you love him with all your heart and with all your soul" (Deut. 13:3). In the same way, Jesus warned against "false Christs and false prophets [who] will appear and perform great signs and miracles to deceive even the elect—if that were possible" (Matt. 24:24). In Revelation 13 we have a culmination of these utterly deceptive miracles in "the beast" who serves Satan and Antichrist.

I am not suggesting, by reviewing this evidence, that John Wimber and his followers do miracles by the power of Satan. I am far more inclined to think that they are not real miracles but only self-induced "mind cures." But that is not my point. My point is that miracles alone prove nothing. They may be false and deceptive as well as true and instructive, and we are never told that they are God's means for converting unbelievers.

3. "Signs" done by God's prophets. There are a few scattered "signs" done by God's prophets, but these are not usually what we would call miracles. They are usually only symbolic or significant things or actions (cf. Isa. 8:18; 20:3; Ezek. 12:1-11; 24:15-27).

4. The signs of the apostles. The final category of biblical signs are those miracles done by the apostles, the effect of which was to authenticate their unique office and ministry. They are referred to in such texts as Acts 2:43 ("Everyone was filled with awe, and many wonders and miraculous signs were done by the apostles"), Acts 5:12 ("The apostles performed many miraculous signs and wonders among the people..."), and 2 Corinthians 12:12 ("The things that mark an apostle—signs, wonders and miracles—were done among you with great perseverance").

These, of course, are the miracles that mean so much to the Vineyard congregations. But in their rush to take them over into the present time and perpetuate them, the pastors of the movement make a fundamental error of interpretation. One great principle of hermeneutics (the science of Bible interpretation) is that narrative events are to be interpreted by didactic or teaching events, rather than the other way around. In other words, that something has happened once or even more than once does not mean that it is to be taken as normative for us. What is normative is to be determined by the New Testament's explicit teaching, and, as we have seen, the New Testament does not teach that evangelism is to be done by cultivating miracles.

The bottom line of this investigation is that "signs and wonders" are not to be sought for today and that it is a mistake to understand such phenomena, whether truly miraculous or not, as biblical "signs."

Weakness Rather Than Power

I come now to the last of the arguments I want to develop in this study, which is that the "signs and wonders" movement is not only wrong, according to the Bible's teaching, which any movement that departs from strict biblical teaching must necessarily be, but also that it is harmful. There can be errors that are not harmful—we probably make them all the time—but this is not one of them. How is it harmful?

First, it cheapens the miraculous. Let me explain by speaking of my own convictions. I believe in miracles. I cannot say that I have ever seen anything I would accurately call a miracle, but I do believe in them. I do not stand with those who say that God does not (still less, cannot) work in miraculous ways today. I believe that God answers prayer in healing the sick. I believe that there are such things as demon possession and exorcisms, particularly in extremely pagan areas of the world, like those targeted by pioneer missionaries.

But if I believed that casting out demons (with healings) was the way to do evangelism, which I do not, what would I do? Well, either I would go around looking for a lot of demons to cast out, or I would begin to interpret demonism as including a lot of other things that I have already encountered.

It is this second approach that describes what Wimber does. It is true that he writes about what seems to be genuine demon possession—people who are taken over by other personalities, speak in other voices, fall down and thrash about, and spew out obscenities and hatred, particularly against Jesus Christ. But these accounts quickly slide over into descriptions of demonization and exorcism of a very different order, descriptions involving demons of bondage, temptation, fear, pain, and even physical ailments like itching. In fact, Wimber explains how he prefers the word "demonized" rather than "demon possession" for the purpose of including these phenomena.

In my opinion, this trivializes Satan and cheapens exorcism. It cheapens what is truly miraculous.

Second, the "signs and wonders" movement cheapens the gospel. It cheapens it by reducing the gospel to shrinking people's goiters, straightening backs, lengthening legs, and other such things, all of which are described in Power Healing. In fact, one of the striking things about Wimber's books, especially Power Evangelism, is that the message of the gospel is virtually unmentioned. There is much about miracles, but we are never told what Jesus accomplished on the cross or by his resurrection.

Indeed, if we are to take Wimber's illustrative material literally, it would seem that it is possible to become converted without hearing the gospel at all. He writes at one point, "One day a group of our young people approached a stranger in a parking lot. Soon they were praying over him, and he fell to the ground. By the time he got up, the stranger was converted. He is now a member of our church (emphasis added)."

Third, the "signs and wonders" movement cheapens suffering. Suffering has various causes, some arising within ourselves. But there is suffering that is given to Christians by God that is intended for their growth and God's glory. Such were the trials of Job, the suffering of the man who had been born blind, the thorn in the flesh endured by the apostle Paul, and the hurts, disappointments, and physical anguish endured by countless numbers of God's people today. The religion of signs reduces all these to unnecessary affliction and further burdens us with lacking faith if the demon of suffering cannot be quickly cast out. That is a cruel gospel to impose on God's people. It is, writes Woodhouse, "a version of Christianity in which the gospel is not sufficiently powerful to produce mature Christian faith, the Scriptures are not sufficiently revealing for the life of faithful obedience to God, the finished work of Christ is not sufficiently relevant for effective evangelism, and the hope of Christ's coming is not sufficiently comforting for those who are suffering."

There is a better, biblical way to do evangelism. It is indicated in Revelation, where we are told that the saints overcame Satan "by the blood of the Lamb and by the word of their testimony" (Rev. 12:11).

Chapter 144.
Christian Preaching

Romans 10:8-9

In Luke 16:19-31 there is a story that would have been a good addition to the previous study, but which I have held for this one, because it is both a summary of what I wrote about earlier as well as an introduction to the themes I want to develop now.

Jesus was speaking about a rich man, who ate well every day, and a poor beggar named Lazarus. Both men died. Lazarus was carried into the presence of Abraham in paradise, and the rich man went to hell. At first the rich man asked Abraham to send Lazarus to provide him with some comfort. But when that was declared to be impossible, he asked that Lazarus be sent back to earth to warn his five brothers of their impending judgment, since they were as wicked as himself: "I beg you, father, send Lazarus to my father's house, for I have five brothers. Let him warn them, so that they will not also come to this place of torment."

Abraham answered, "They have Moses and the Prophets; let them listen to them."

The rich man persisted, "No, father Abraham, but if someone from the dead goes to them, they will repent."

Abraham's final word and the climactic point of the parable was this: "If they do not listen to Moses and the Prophets, they will not be convinced even if someone rises from the dead" (v. 31).

This is exactly what Paul has been saying in Romans, of course. And it is exactly what Moses was saying before him in the verses from Deuteronomy 30 that Paul is quoting. The people did have "Moses and the Prophets." That is the word that, according to Moses, was "near" them, in their mouths and hearts (Deut. 30:14). That was sufficient for them. If they did not heed that written word and repent of their sin and turn to God in faith on the basis of that revelation, they would not be changed, even by a religion of miracles. No number of "signs and wonders," however great, would save them.

Today, says Paul, in exactly the same way, people have the Christian gospel, which is "the word of faith we are proclaiming: That if you confess with your mouth, 'Jesus is Lord,' and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, you will be saved." Because the gospel is here today and because it is being proclaimed, all possible excuses for failing to believe in Christ and be saved from the coming judgment are cut off.

This text leads us into the heart of the content of the gospel and thus of all true Christian proclamation.

The Text Itself

However, at first glance there seems to be a minor problem with the text: the order of the two main items seems to be wrong. The first matter mentioned is mouth confession, followed by heart belief. But, we might ask, isn't it the case that we first believe with our hearts and then, second, confess Jesus Christ as Lord? This can be explained in a number of ways.

One explanation might be that Paul begins with what can be observed, that is, a person's public confession of Christ, then moves backward to the cause behind it, namely, his belief. Another explanation is that Paul deals first with the content of faith, as expressed by the mouth, then with the assent to it by the heart. However, in my judgment, the best explanation is that Paul is simply following the order found in the text from Deuteronomy, which he is quoting. Deuteronomy says, "The word is very near you; it is in your mouth and in your heart so you may obey it" (Deut. 30:14). Paul repeats that order accurately, adding specific Christian content for each part.

We cannot make too much of the order, of course, because the apostle turns it around again in verse 10, giving what we think of as the correct sequence: "For it is with your heart that you believe and are justified, and it is with your mouth that you confess and are saved."

Yet this leads to an important observation, namely, that Paul is not providing an ordered listing of steps to salvation or contrasting some items of belief that are internal with other items of belief that are external. Those kinds of distinctions are misleading at this point. Rather, taken together, the verses indicate that the items Paul is speaking of are actually all of one package. The confession that "Jesus is Lord" and the belief that God raised him from the dead are both parts of faith's content. That is, they are equally parts of the gospel. They are both truths that we are to believe and then, second, confess to other people.

In other words, preaching should contain both truths, and a Christian is to be defined as one who both believes them and confesses them openly.

"Jesus Is Lord"

The first truth is that "Jesus is Lord." What a tremendous statement! It is impossible to overestimate the significance of these three words (only two in Greek), for this was not only the first essential element of the gospel proclamation as well as of the first Christian confession. It was also a confession of their faith for which believers of the first Christian centuries were willing to die.

How can those three words be that important? The answer, as we know, is that they are literally crammed with meaning. They testify to: (1) the person of Christ, (2) the unique work of Christ, and (3) the ongoing all-embracing rule of Christ over his people and church.

1. The person of Christ. The first of these implications is due to the fact that in the Greek version of the Old Testament (the Septuagint), which was well known to the Jewish community of the first century and from which most of the New Testament writers quoted when citing Scripture, the word kyrios ("Lord") is used to translate the great Hebrew name for God: Yahweh, or Jehovah. It is used this way over 6,000 times. This is why most of our English Bibles do not use the name Yahweh but have the word LORD instead. The disciples of Christ knew that this word was repeatedly used to translate this great name for God. Yet, knowing this, they did not hesitate to transfer the title to Jesus, thereby indicating that in their view Jesus is Jehovah.

This is the meaning of kyrios in the great Christological passages of the New Testament. Here are some examples:

1 Corinthians 8:4-6. "...We know that an idol is nothing in all the world and that there is no God but one. For even if there are so-called gods, whether in heaven or on earth (as indeed there are many 'gods' and many 'lords'), yet for us there is but one God, the Father, from whom all things came and for whom we live; and there is but one Lord, Jesus Christ, through whom all things came and through whom we live."

Luke 2:11. "Today in the town of David a Savior has been born to you; he is Christ the Lord," that is, Jehovah.

Psalm 110:1. Applied to himself by Jesus in Matthew 22:41-46. "The Lord said to my Lord: 'Sit at my right hand until I put your enemies under your feet'" (v. 44). Peter had this text in mind when he told the Sanhedrin, "God exalted him [Jesus] to his own right hand as Prince and Savior..." (Acts 5:31). Philippians 2:5-11. "Your attitude should be the same as that of Christ Jesus:

> Who, being in very nature God, did not consider equality with God something to be grasped,
> but made himself nothing, taking the very nature of a servant, being made in human likeness.
> And being found in appearance as a man, he humbled himself and became obedient to death—even death on a cross!
> Therefore God exalted him to the highest place and gave him the name that is above every name, > that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, in heaven and on earth and under the earth, and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.

As far as Romans itself goes, a study of "Lord" shows that Paul uses it forty-four times in this book. In thirty cases it is used of Jesus Christ. In eight cases it is used of God the Father. In the remaining cases it could refer either to the Father or to Jesus referred to as God. In other words, the term is used interchangeably for both Jesus and the Father and is a clear evidence of Paul's belief in Jesus' complete deity.

This first meaning of the title shows why the early Christians would not apply the term "Lord" to any other. They understood that if they had done so, they would have repudiated Christ.

2. The work of Christ. The second implication of the tide "Lord" is that Jesus is the Savior. This is linked to his lordship, because, as John R. W. Stott writes, "The title 'Lord' is a symbol of Christ's victory over the forces of evil. If Jesus has been exalted over all the principalities and powers of evil, as indeed he has, this is the reason why he has been called Lord. If Jesus has been proclaimed Lord, as he has, it is because these powers are under his feet. He has conquered them on the cross, and therefore our salvation—that is to say, our rescue from sin, Satan, fear and death—is due to that victory."

3. The rule of Christ over his people and church. The third important implication of the words

"Jesus is Lord" is that Jesus rules over his people and church, which he must do if he truly is "the Lord." Does he? That is a personal question. In what areas does Jesus exercise this rule? That is a practical one. In the excellent study of Christ's lordship by John Stott from which I quoted earlier, six areas of Jesus' rule are suggested.

Our minds. If Jesus is our Lord, then one thing he must be Lord of is our thinking. He must be Lord of our minds. On one occasion, when the Lord called disciples, he said, "Take my yoke upon you and learn from me..." (Matt. 11:29), meaning that he was to be the disciples' teacher. He is to be our teacher today through the Scriptures, which he caused to be inspired. That is why we must be men and women of the Book, students of the Word, if we really are Christ's followers.

Our ethics. In the study I referred to earlier, Stott points out that Jesus is not just Lord of our minds. He is Lord of our wills and of our moral standards also. "It is not only what we believe that is to come under the lordship of Jesus but also how we behave. Discipleship implies obedience, and obedience implies that there are absolute moral commands that we are required to obey. To refer to Jesus politely as 'our Lord' is not enough. He still says to us, 'Why do you call me Lord and do not the things that I say?'"

Our careers. If Jesus is Lord, then he is not only Lord of our minds, wills, and morals. He is Lord of our time, and this means that he is Lord of our professions, jobs, careers, and ambitions. We cannot plan our lives as if our relationship to Jesus is somehow detached from those plans and irrelevant to them. Like Paul on the road to Damascus, one of our very first questions to Jesus must be, "What shall I do, Lord?" (Acts 22:10).

Our churches. Jesus is also head of the church. This truth delivers us from two banes. One is disorder. It occurs when those who are members of the church pursue their own courses— including what they wish their church to be—without regard to the guidelines for church life laid down in the Bible or without proper consideration for those who are their brothers and sisters in the Lord. The second is clericalism. It occurs when laypeople abandon their God-given responsibilities in the church or when pastors tyrannize the church without acknowledging that they are servants of the people as well as servants of Christ and that they are called to serve the church as Jesus served it.

Our relation to the world. Jesus is not only our own personal Lord and not only Lord of the church, which he founded. He is also Lord of all life, the life of nations included. That is, he is the "King of kings and Lord of lords" (Rev. 19:16). We who are Christians stand as his representatives in the midst of history and cultures to call this world to account. We are here to remind the world that this same Jesus Christ whom we serve has spoken from heaven to reveal what true righteousness is, both for individuals and nations, and that those who disregard him do so at their peril. They will have to give an accounting before him at the final judgment.

Missions. A final implication flows from the Great Commission by which, on the basis of his own authority, the Lord sent disciples into the world to make disciples everywhere (Matt. 28:1820). The lordship of Jesus is the most powerful of missionary incentives. It is as Lord of our lives that Jesus tells us to go into the world, and because we acknowledge him as Lord, this is exactly what we do. The Duke of Wellington called the Great Commission Christ's "marching orders" for the church. Because we love him we want everyone to become his disciples.

As soon as we explore these implications of the confession "Jesus is Lord" we see why it was so important to the early Christians and why so many were willing to die rather than renounce it.

A Risen and Living Savior

The second proposition in the summary of the gospel and the confession of faith provided by our text is that "God raised him [that is, Jesus] from the dead." This statement has two great implications.

1. The resurrection is proof of Christ's claims. The resurrection proves a great many things. It proves: that there is a God and that the God of the Bible is the true God; that Jesus was a teacher sent from God and that Jesus was inerrant in his teachings and spoke the very words of God; that Jesus is the Son of God; that there is a day of judgment coming; that every believer in Christ is justified from all sin; that all who are united to Christ by faith will live again; and that Christians can have victory over sin.

But chiefly the resurrection proves that every believer in Christ is justified from sin, as Romans 4:25 flatly declares: "He [that is, Jesus] was delivered over to death for our sins and was raised to life for our justification." The resurrection is God's proof that the penalty for our transgressions has been fully paid by Jesus.

When Jesus was on earth, he said that he would die for the sins of others. The time for the crucifixion came, and he did die. But the question remained: Was his death fully adequate for others' sins? Did God accept his atonement? We know that if Jesus had sinned, however slightly, his death could not atone even for his own sin, let alone the sin of others. For three days the question remained unanswered. The body of Jesus lay in the cold Judean tomb. Then the long anticipated hour came. The breath of God swept through the sepulcher, and Jesus rose to appear to his followers and later to ascend to the right hand of the Father. By this means God declared to the entire universe, "I have accepted the atonement Jesus made." Reuben A. Torrey writes:

When Jesus died, he died as my representative, and I died in him; when he arose, he rose as my representative, and I arose in him.... I look at the cross of Christ, and I know that atonement has been made for my sins; I look at the open sepulcher and the risen and ascended Lord, and I know that the atonement has been accepted. There no longer remains a single sin on me, no matter how many or how great my sins may have been. My sins may have been as high as the mountains, but in the light of the resurrection the atonement that covers them is as high as heaven. My sins may have been as deep as the ocean, but in the light of the resurrection the atonement that swallows them up is as deep as eternity.

D. Martyn Lloyd-Jones says, "The resurrection is the proclamation of the fact that God is fully and completely satisfied with the work that his Son did upon the Cross."

2. The resurrection shows we do not serve a dead but rather a living Savior. Leon Morris writes, "It is at the cross that God did his saving work, but Paul does not believe in a dead martyr but in a living Savior. Not only did Jesus die for our sins but God raised him, triumphant over all the forces of evil. If Christ is not raised, Paul holds, our faith is futile and we are yet in our sins (1 Cor. 15:17)." Jesus was raised and now lives to lead, bless, strengthen, and eventually reward those who love and serve him.

"My King Who Saved Me"

The very last part of Paul's summary of the Christian proclamation is that if we believe these things and confess Jesus as Lord before other people, we will "be saved." That is, we will be saved from the wrath of God about which so much of the Book of Romans has been speaking. That is why the word saved is in the future tense. We have been saved. We are being saved. But in this verse Paul teaches that we will also be saved from wrath if our faith is truly in Jesus as our Lord and Savior.

What is more, we will stand firm in that confession to the very end, if we are genuinely converted. This is what the aged Bishop of Smyrna, Polycarp, did. He stood firm in his confession even when his life was on the line. He was martyred on February 22, A.D. 156. As Polycarp was being driven to the arena two of the city officials, who had respect for him because of his age and reputation, tried to persuade him to comply with the demand to honor Caesar. "What harm is there in saying, 'Caesar is Lord,' and burning incense... and saving yourself?" they asked.

Polycarp refused.

Later, in the arena, he explained his position, saying, "For eighty-six years I have been [Christ's] slave, and he has done me no wrong; how can I blaspheme my king who saved me?" Polycarp refused to call Caesar "Lord," because "Lord" meant "God" and there can only be one God. If Polycarp had called Caesar "Lord," then Jesus could not have been "Lord" for Polycarp, and Polycarp could not have been a Christian.

Those who recorded Polycarp's story shared his convictions, for they concluded by saying: "He [Polycarp] was arrested by Herod, when Philip of Tralles was high priest, and Statius Quadratus was governor, but our Lord Jesus Christ was reigning forever. To him be glory, honor, majesty and eternal dominion from generation to generation. Amen."

Polycarp had heard genuine Christian preaching, had believed the gospel as it had been faithfully proclaimed, had lived for Jesus Christ for eighty-six years, and he eventually accepted martyrdom rather than retract his confession. He is an example of how one becomes and remains a genuine Christian.

Chapter 145.
Lordship Salvation

Romans 10:9

In the last study I tried to spell out the content of Christian preaching as it is summarized in Romans 10:9. In particular, I tried to show the full meaning of the words that were the first great Christian confession: "Jesus is Lord." I pointed out that those three words, simple as they seem, are actually overflowing with meaning, for they affirm: (1) that Jesus is fully divine, (2) that he is the Savior, and (3) that he rules over his people and church. I elaborated that last point by showing that if we are Christians, Jesus must be Lord of our minds, morals, careers, churches, relation to the secular world without, and missionary outreach.

But there is a segment of the evangelical church that disagrees with all that. It restricts the confession "Jesus is Lord" to the belief that Jesus is a divine Savior and explicitly eliminates any idea that Jesus must be Lord of our lives for us to be Christians.

Even more. It teaches that a person can be a Christian without being a follower of Jesus Christ. It reduces the gospel to the mere fact of Christ's having died for sinners, requires of sinners only that they acknowledge this by the barest intellectual assent, quite apart from any repentance or turning from sin, and then assures them of their eternal security when they may very well not be born again. This view bends faith beyond recognition and promises a false peace to thousands who have given verbal assent to this reductionist Christianity, but who are not in God's family.

Those who take this position call what I have explained as the gospel in the last study "Lordship salvation," and they dismiss it as heresy.

An Old Error in New Wineskins

Few theological positions, orthodox or not, are without precedent. And in this case, the view I am talking about is that of the eighteenth-century Scottish eccentric Robert Sandeman, who taught that everyone who is persuaded that Jesus actually died for sin as testified by the apostles is justified, regardless of any change in his or her life. The view is known by his name, Sandemanianism. However, this old error has appeared in new form in our day, largely through the influence of professors at Dallas Theological Seminary. I do not know anything to call it except "the Dallas doctrine."

The contemporary roots of this teaching lie in the works of Lewis Sperry Chafer, one of the founders of that seminary, who believed that Scripture speaks of two classes of Christians: those that are carnal and those that are spiritual. He wrote, "'The 'carnal' Christian is... characterized by a 'walk' that is on the same plane as that of the 'natural man.'"

The idea was a novel one when Chafer first expounded it, but it is well known and widely accepted today. It has even been added to and embellished. If a Christian can behave exactly like a natural or unsaved man, then what is it that makes him a Christian? The answer is "simple assent to the fact that Jesus died to be his or her Savior." Nothing else is necessary—in particular: no repentance, no discipleship, no change of behavior, not even any true perseverance in faith. In fact, to insist on any of these additional things is to propound a false gospel. Chafer did not say all this, of course, but since it is a logical extension of the idea of the carnal Christian, his followers eventually did.

One who has done so is Charles Caldwell Ryrie, editor of the popular Ryrie Study Bible. The most extreme proponent of this view is professor Zane C. Hodges, who has defended it in three works titled The Gospel Under Siege, Dead Faith: What Is It?, and Absolutely Free!

What has made this a major issue today is that the Dallas view has been challenged by pastor John MacArthur in a book called The Gospel According to Jesus, to which J. I. Packer and myself provided forewords. It is an attempt by a reformed dispensationalist to turn his fellow dispensationalists from their error.

I want to show why the Dallas doctrine is mistaken at this important point, just as I tried to show the error of the "signs and wonders" approach to evangelism. But, as with the "signs and wonders" movement, I want to state what can be said in favor of this view first.

The chief thing is that Charles Ryrie and Zane Hodges, and those who think as they do, want to preserve the purity of the gospel. That is to their credit. In my opinion, they are actually destroying the true gospel by what they teach, but that is not their intention. They are sons of the Reformation in this respect at least: they believe in justification by faith apart from works and want to guard that gospel from anything that might contaminate its purity. The reason they oppose a demand for repentance, discipleship, or a walk that gives evidence of an inward spiritual change is that they regard this demand as adding works to faith, and that, as we all know, is a false gospel. They want none of it.

Again, they want to affirm the doctrine of eternal security, since that, too, is a Reformation distinctive. They argue that if salvation depends in any way on repenting of sin, commitment, following Jesus as Lord, or a behavioral change, then assurance is destroyed, because we all sin. In fact, one of the reasons the Dallas doctrine eliminates obedience from the essence of saving faith is to include as Christians professing believers whose lives are filled with sin. "If only committed people are saved people," writes Charles Ryrie, "then where is there room for carnal Christians?"

Where indeed?

Clearly there is an error at this point. But seeing the error does not mean that we should miss the rightful concern these men have to uphold and teach the doctrines of grace and eternal security.

Must Jesus Be Lord to Be Savior?

One very lucid statement of the non-lordship position is by Charles Ryrie in the chapter from Balancing the Christian Life to which I have already alluded and from which I quoted. Ryrie asks the question: "Must Christ be Lord to be Savior?" He answers negatively for the following three reasons.

1. There are many examples of Christians who have not surrendered to Jesus Christ as Lord.

Ryrie cites Peter, who rebuked Jesus on one occasion ("Surely not, Lord!" Acts 10:14); Barnabas and Paul, who quarreled over taking John Mark with them on a second missionary journey (Acts 15:39); and the Ephesian Christians, who did not destroy their magic scrolls and charms until sometime after they had believed on Christ (Acts 19:19). In my opinion, the case of the Ephesians proves the exact opposite of what Ryrie thinks it does. It proves that when the Ephesians believed on Christ, the inevitable outcome was the destruction of all rivals to his lordship. But that is not the main point.

The main answer to Ryrie's argument is that he is equating commitment with perfection, which is obviously wrong. Christians sin, but that does not mean that they are not committed to Christ. If they lie down in their sin and do nothing about it, they are indeed uncommitted. They are not Christians. But if they are Christians, the way they show it is by getting up out of the sin— "repenting" is the right word for what they must do —and beginning to follow Christ again.

I have said elsewhere in these studies that there is all the difference in the world between falling down on the path and getting up and going on, and not being on the path at all. It is only those who are on the path who are Christians.

2. "Jesus is Lord" only means "Jesus is God." Specifically, it does not mean "Jesus is my Master."

In developing this point, Ryrie rightly states, as I did in the last chapter, that "Lord" means "God" in all the important Christological passages. I said that it is the word used to translate the great name for God, Jehovah, in the Greek Old Testament, so that its application to Jesus by the New Testament writers indicates their belief in Christ's full deity. But Ryrie goes on from that truth to argue wrongly that because "Lord" means "God" it cannot mean anything else. Amazingly, he fails to see that the reason the word Lord, which on the human level does mean "master," as he admits, is used of God is that God is the supreme Master over all other masters. It is a case similar to our use of the word Sovereign with a capital S. There are many sovereigns, but God can be called the Sovereign because he is sovereign over all others.

In his zeal to divest "Lord" of all meanings that do not suit his purpose, Ryrie even says, "If the gospel of the Lord Jesus includes lordship over my life, it might as well also include the necessity of believing he is my Creator, Judge, coming King, Example, Teacher, and so forth..." But, of course, that is exactly what it does include. What is the meaning of "Jesus is divine" if the statement does not mean that Jesus is the Creator, Judge, Example, Teacher, and other obvious functions of divinity? What does the word God mean if it does not include these matters?

When you begin to strip away the implications of this word, instead of adding to them and developing them, even the minimum amount you want to affirm becomes meaningless.

3. To add anything to faith, even commitment, is to turn the gospel of salvation by faith into a gospel of works, which is a false gospel.

Ryrie says, "The message of faith only and the message of faith plus commitment of life cannot both be the gospel; therefore, one of them is a false gospel and comes under the curse of perverting the gospel or preaching another gospel (Gal. 1:6-9)." But this argument fudges on the definition of faith. If true faith includes commitment, as the greatest theologians of the church have always claimed it does, then to insist on commitment is not to add anything to faith but only to insist that faith be true faith. And that is an important point, because a false faith, an imitation faith, or a dead faith saves no one.

Four Costly Errors

It is evident from my response to Ryrie's arguments that I believe the Dallas doctrine goes astray in a number of critical areas. But my remarks have only begun to touch on them. There are four areas in which this faulty understanding of the gospel is mistaken.

1. The meaning of faith. This is the chief error, and I have already touched on it in my response to Ryrie's views. According to the Bible, a saving faith is a living faith that inevitably leads to right conduct. It involves substantial content, personal heart response, and commitment to Jesus Christ as Lord. According to the Dallas doctrine, faith is mere intellectual assent to the barest truths of the gospel.

2. The need for repentance. The Dallas school speaks of the need for repentance, but because it does not want to acknowledge the corresponding need for behavioral change it redefines repentance to mean only "a change of mind" concerning who Jesus Christ is, irrespective of any reference to sin. G. Michael Cocoris, a Dallas product, writes, "The Bible requires repentance for salvation, but repentance does not mean to turn from sin, nor a change in one's conduct. Those are the fruits of repentance. Biblical repentance is a change of mind or attitude concerning either God, Christ, dead works or sin."

That is not what the Bible means by repentance. The Bible's use of this word always implies a change of life direction, specifically a turning from sin. It is the flip side of faith, its corresponding member. In conversion we turn from sin, which is repentance, on the one hand, and on the other, we turn to Jesus, which is faith.

3. The demand for discipleship. The Dallas doctrine divorces salvation from discipleship, thus preserving the school's doctrine of the "carnal Christian." But Jesus defined salvation as discipleship. That is, he did not call people to mere intellectual assent to who he was but rather to become his disciples. His call was, "Follow me."

Several years ago I wrote a book to explore the meaning of Christ's call to discipleship, and in it I examined the matter of cost. I found that Jesus always stressed the cost of coming to him. He never said anything to suggest even remotely that a person could come to him as Savior and remain unchanged. That insight changed me. I said in the book that if I had been asked earlier what minimum amount of doctrine a person needed to know in order to become a Christian or what minimum price he would have to pay to follow Jesus, I would probably have replied as many others still do, stressing very little demand. But now I say, "The minimum amount a person must believe to be a Christian is everything, and the minimum amount a person must give is all.

You cannot hold back even a fraction of a percentage of yourself. Every sin must be abandoned. Every false thought must be repudiated. You must be the Lord's entirely."

Students of the Bible can decide for themselves whether this or the minimal demands of the Dallas school come closest to Christ's definition of what it means to be a Christian.

4. The place of regeneration. The fourth costly error of the Dallas doctrine is its failure to see the unbreakable link between justification and regeneration. The exponents of the Dallas view speak as if the only thing involved in the salvation of a sinner is justification. But Jesus also said, "You must be born again" (John 3:7). Clearly, there can be no justification without regeneration, just as there is no regeneration without justification. But regeneration means the creation of a new nature by God. Therefore, if one is justified, he is also regenerated; and if he is regenerated, he will have a new nature and will begin to act differently. Indeed, the first evidences of this new nature are the person's turning from sin in repentance and turning to Jesus Christ as Savior in faith.

That is why we say that if there is no evidence of the new life, there is no new life. And if there is no new life, the person is not a true Christian regardless of his or her profession.

Even Worse Errors Than These

I have been speaking of the errors that have been linked to the Dallas doctrine, but at this point I need to say something more. Sometimes an error is not very serious, because it does not touch on matters of great importance. Sometimes an error is serious, but the implications are not worked out and so it does little damage. This is not the case here. As the Dallas school has been challenged in this area, the opponents of "Lordship salvation" have dug in their heels and (in the person of Zane Hodges at least) have affirmed in their defense that: (1) a person can be saved and eternally secure even though he or she has a dying (or dead) faith, and (2) the person can be saved even if he or she apostatizes, denying Jesus.

The first of these terrible and nearly unbelievable assertions comes as a result of Zane Hodges's attempt to deal with James 2:14-16, which distinguishes between a saving faith and a dead one. In Hodges's handling of this text, the passage is said to have nothing to do with spiritual salvation in the life to come but only with how one can preserve one's life now, here on earth.

According to Hodges, without works faith will wither. In fact, it can even die. "A body dies when it loses the spirit which keeps it alive. In the same way, a person's faith dies when it loses the animating factor of good works." Does that mean that salvation can be lost, then? That we must abandon the doctrine of eternal security? Not at all, according to this writer. The very fact that faith can die means that it was alive once, and on the basis of that once-alive faith we can confidently say, "Once saved, always saved." Writes Hodges, "The dangers of a dying faith are real. But they do not include hell."

That is terrible teaching. But here is a second terrible assertion, based on Hodges's handling of Hebrews 6:4-6. Hodges says that this is a description of real apostasy experienced by real Christians. That is, it is possible for Christians to "fall away." But we do not need to worry, since "we should not construe... 'falling away' here as though it meant the loss of eternal life."

The bottom line of this pernicious exegesis is that a person can profess to believe in Christ early in life, live without works and thus see his or her faith wither, and at last die, so that the person no longer professes even the meager intellectual assent possessed at the beginning, and then can even deny Jesus as the divine Savior—that is, be utterly indistinguishable from a pagan, not only in external appearance but in internal conviction as well—and still be a Christian, that is, be saved eternally.

It is inconceivable to me how anyone can seriously regard that as the Bible's teaching. Yet it is where the Dallas doctrine leads, even though not all who oppose "Lordship salvation" follow it to Hodges's incredible extremes. That this is the end of the line should be ample warning to anyone that the teaching is unstable at the core.

Historic Christianity

At the end of his critique of these errors in The Gospel According to Jesus, John MacArthur has a substantial appendix in which he shows by many quotations from the preachers and theologians of the past that "Lordship salvation" has always been the teaching of the church. In that section he cites thirty-one writers and offers forty-one quotations.

I cannot reproduce them all here, of course. But here is an important one, a series of comments by W. H. Griffith Thomas, one of the founders of Dallas Seminary before its present doctrinal decline. He wrote, "Our relation to Christ is based on his death and resurrection, and this means his Lordship. Indeed, the Lordship of Christ over the lives of his people was the very purpose for which he died and rose again.... We have to acknowledge Christ as our Lord. Sin is rebellion, and it is only as we surrender to him as Lord that we receive pardon from him as our Savior." Here is another. A. W. Tozer wrote:

[Years ago] no one would ever dare to rise in a meeting and say, "I am a Christian" if he had not surrendered his whole being to God and had taken Jesus Christ as his Lord as well as his Savior and had brought himself under obedience to the will of the Lord. It was only then that he could say, "I am saved." Today we let them say they are saved no matter how imperfect and incomplete the transaction, with the proviso that the deeper Christian life can be tacked on at some time in the future. Can it be that we really think that we do not owe Jesus Christ our obedience?

This is bad teaching brethren.

Indeed it is! But unfortunately, it is all too common in our time.

Chapter 146.

Heart Belief and Mouth Confession

Romans 10:10

In the last few studies I have been dealing with the nature of Christian preaching and therefore with the nature of the Christian gospel, based on the second paragraph of Romans 10. I want to carry that study further in this chapter, focusing on an important question: Is there such a thing as secret discipleship?

The Dallas doctrine would answer "Yes" since, according to that mistaken view, it is possible to be a Christian without any outward evidence of justification or regeneration at all. If you do not even have to repent of sin to be a Christian, you certainly do not have to confess Christ openly. In fact, you can even deny him. You can turn your back on him altogether. In the previous study I tried to show why that view is wrong, fatally wrong, in fact. Now I want to show that it is not only necessary to repent of sin, trust Jesus Christ as Lord and Savior, and follow him in faithful discipleship throughout life, but that it is also necessary to confess him openly before other men and women.

That is the teaching of our text: "For it is with your heart that you believe and are justified, and it is with your mouth that you confess and are saved" (Rom. 10:10). I want to explore the exact meaning of that clear statement.

Secret Discipleship?

As I prepared this study I remembered doing a sermon on this subject sixteen years earlier in which I asked two questions: "Is it possible for a person to be a secret believer in the Lord Jesus Christ? Is it possible to believe in Jesus with our whole hearts and not confess him openly?" was asking those questions because I had come to a passage in my study of the Gospel of John in which many of the Jewish leaders are said to have believed on Jesus even though "because of the Pharisees they would not confess their faith for fear they would be put out of the synagogue" (John 12:42).

It was a puzzling text to me, because on the surface it seemed to say that silent belief is possible, while, at the same time, the language was such that I naturally wondered if the belief spoken of in the case of these religious leaders was genuine. After all, the passage goes on to say, "for they loved praise from men more than praise from God" (v. 43)—and that does not sound like genuine Christianity.

I finally concluded that, whatever the case may have been, these men were trying to do something that ultimately is impossible. For this reason: Either the secrecy kills the discipleship, or else the discipleship kills the secrecy. In the end, secret discipleship is a contradiction in terms, and this means that we must confess Jesus openly if we are to be (and remain) true Christians.

Today I am not so hesitant. And one of the reasons I am not so hesitant is our text, which indissolubly links heart belief and mouth confession. You will recall from our earlier studies that we are not to find some prescribed sequence of events in these verses, as if we first believe and then confess, or even some supposed ordering of priorities, as if one item were essential and the other good but not essential. That is not how Paul is speaking. He is describing what it means to be a Christian, and his point is that all must believe the truth about Jesus, receive it into the heart, and then confess him openly before others.

When Paul says we must believe with our hearts and confess with our mouths, he is saying that we must do both and that it is the presence of both together—faith leading to confession and confession proving the reality of faith—that leads to "righteousness" and "salvation."

This is the way all the major commentators handle Romans 10:10. Robert Haldane, the Scottish

Bible teacher responsible for the Swiss revival of the early nineteenth century (sometimes called Haldane's Revival), wrote, "Confession of Christ is as necessary as faith in him, but necessary for a different purpose. Faith is necessary to obtain the gift of righteousness. Confession is necessary to prove that this gift is received. If a man does not confess Christ at the hazard of life, character, property, liberty, and everything dear to him, he has not the faith of Christ."

Charles Haddon Spurgeon, the great Baptist preacher of London who was responsible for a revival of a different sort only a generation later, said, "Faith and confession... are joined together; let not man put them asunder."

Leon Morris, a scholar of our own day, writes, "These are but two parts of the same saving experience."

What a great verse this is! It is a preacher's verse. Some verses are for scholars; they are to be probed, analyzed, and fathomed. Some are for devotional reading; our hearts are warmed by them. Others, like this one, are to be declared boldly and joyfully. This is averse that, together with the one before it, assures us that if we believe in our hearts that Jesus is the Son of God, that he is both Lord and Savior and that God has raised him from the dead, and that if we confess him as Lord before other people, we will be justified by God, being forgiven of all sin, and will be saved, not only now or in future days but at the final judgment.

There is no greater message in all the world than that message. There is nothing so important in life as to believe on and confess Jesus. There is no greater result than the salvation to be gained by receiving and acting upon that gospel.

Heart Belief

The verse is in two parts, of course, and the first of these two parts concerns faith. It is what Paul is talking about when he says, "It is with your heart that you believe and are justified."

At this point we do not need to take a great deal of time to speak about the object of faith, for this is what the passage and our study have been exploring all along. The object of faith is "Jesus as Lord." This means, Jesus as: (1) the divine Son of God, (2) the Savior who died to rescue us from sin, and (3) the Lord who rules over his people and church. Some have argued that a person does not have to believe on Jesus as his or her Lord to be a Christian, maintaining that we need only to believe on him as our Savior. But a Savior who is not also Lord is another Jesus, a counterfeit Jesus, and a counterfeit Jesus will save no one. It is only by believing on the Lord Jesus Christ that we are saved.

What is new about this section of the verse is the phrase "with your heart." It is striking because it deals with the nature of true faith or belief. Without these words we might suppose, as the Dallas doctrine teaches, that faith is a matter of the intellect only. But lest we make that mistake, Paul tells us by these words that faith is a matter of the whole being—intellect, will, and emotions—which is what the word heart in the Bible signifies. The faith that saves is a faith that takes all we are and commits it to all that Jesus Christ is.

Moreover, "with the heart" implies two other important truths.

1. It implies sincerity. In one of her books and in many of her public talks, Corrie ten Boom describes a time in which, years after her deliverance from the Nazi death camps, she was confronted by one of the brutal German guards who had been responsible for the death of her sister Betsie. The guard, who had become a Christian, came forward at one of her meetings and asked her for forgiveness. Corrie described what a struggle it was for her. But at last the Holy Spirit had his way, and she grasped the outstretched hand of her former persecutor, responding, "Yes, I do forgive you—with all my heart."

That is what belief "with the heart" is all about. It means "sincerely" or "wholeheartedly." It is the way the Bible uses the word when it commands us to "love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your mind" (Matt. 22:37).

Here is what John Calvin said about believing with the heart. "Let us note that the seat of faith is not in the head but in the heart. I am not going to argue about the part of the body in which faith is located, but since the word heart generally means a serious and sincere affection, I maintain that faith is a firm and effectual confidence, and not just a bare idea." It is, in other words, notitia, assensus, and fiducia, as the theologians of the Reformation and later centuries frequently expressed it.

2. It implies the Holy Spirit's work. When we look at what the Bible says about the hearts of men and women, we see, on the one hand, that the heart is "deceitful above all things and beyond cure" (Jer. 17:9) and that, on the other hand, it is the work of the Holy Spirit to renew or regenerate evil hearts ("I will give them an undivided heart and put a new spirit in them..." Ezek. 11:19; cf. 18:31; 36:26). Otherwise, we do not get a right spirit, nor do we come to believe on Jesus as our personal Lord and Savior.

God said through the prophet Isaiah, "These people come near to me with their mouth / and honor me with their lips, / but their hearts are far from me" (Isa. 29:13, emphasis added). Yet God also spoke through Jeremiah:

> "This is the covenant I will make with the house of Israel after that time," declares the LORD.
> "I will put my law in their minds and write it on their hearts.
> I will be their God, and they will be my people.
> No longer will a man teach his neighbor, or a man his brother, saying, 'Know the LORD,' > because they will all know me, from the least of them to the greatest."
> Jeremiah 31:33-34, emphasis added

This began to be fulfilled at Pentecost, when the Holy Spirit operated through the preaching of Peter to bring three thousand people to repentance and faith in Jesus Christ. It is being fulfilled in our day whenever people hear the Word of God, turn from sin, believe on Jesus as their personal Lord and Savior, and confess him before others.

Mouth Confession

The second part of this verse is the part with which I actually began, asking, "Is it possible to be a secret believer?" It answers by telling us, "It is with your mouth that you confess and are saved." This second part goes with the first, so that (in one sense) it is as necessary to confess Christ as Lord and Savior as it is to believe on him.

We are to confess him with our mouths, of course, which means openly and audibly. But a simple public testimony in a meeting does not exhaust the ways we can confess Jesus Christ as Lord.

How can we confess him? Let me suggest the following eight ways.

1. In public worship. The first and most obvious way in which you can confess Jesus Christ is by assembling with other Christians in public worship. There have been times in history when this has been a mere form for many. It is probably a mere form for many, even today. Yet this is changing. As more and more people are neglecting church, preferring the idle pleasures of the world to the demands of public worship, the mere fact of your joining with other believers to worship God can be a useful and significant confession that you are indeed a Christian.

I am aware of this most Sunday mornings. I live only four blocks from Tenth Presbyterian Church, so I walk to church. As I do this Sunday by Sunday throughout the year, I am aware of those I pass on the streets on those mornings. There are always a number who have been to the convenience store to pick up the Sunday papers and are reading them as they shuffle along sleepily. I also pass joggers. They are working earnestly to preserve their bodies, which will perish anyway in time, while they are indifferent to the condition of their souls. Other people are just walking along, some perhaps returning from an all-night debauch or binge.

But while all this is going on, there is an entirely different group of people, a subculture that is collecting from around the Delaware Valley. These people are alert and expectant. They have their Bibles in hand, and their minds are already attuned to the God they are coming to worship. The mere fact that they are collecting to worship him sets them apart. They are rightly and joyfully confessing Christ by what they do on Sunday mornings.

2. By the sacraments. A second way in which we confess Christ openly is by our participation in the sacraments: baptism, the initiatory sacrament of the Christian faith; and the Lord's Supper, the repeatable sacrament. Both are for Christians only, and by both we proclaim before other people that Jesus Christ is our Lord.

Charles Haddon Spurgeon had a wonderful sermon on the second half of this text, the part speaking of confession with our mouths, in which he listed a number of these means of confessing Christ. He spoke of baptism, calling it the crossing of the Rubicon: "If Caesar crossed the Rubicon, there would never be peace between him and the senate again. He draws his sword, and he throws away his scabbard. Such is the act of baptism to the believer. It is the crossing of the Rubicon. It is as much as to say, 'I cannot come back again to you. I am dead to you. And to prove I am, I am absolutely buried to you. I have nothing more to do with the world. I am Christ's and Christ's forever."

So also with the Lord's Supper. As you partake of it you say to the world, "I am not my own. I am Christ's. I am in fellowship with him. Therefore, I cannot indulge in the sins in which you indulge or live for the goals for which you surrender everything."

3. Through association with God's people. Not all our associations with other believers are formal, that is, in worship services and sacraments. We also associate with them informally, proving by our identification with these others, of whatever race, nationality, or status in life, that we belong to the same Lord and confess the same gospel. You can do that at work, in weekly Bible studies, or just by your friendships. We remember that in his first letter, the apostle John made our love for other Christians one of the tests by which we can know whether or not we are a Christian (1 John 3:11-13). If this is a way we can know we are Christians and are following Christ, it is obviously also a way by which others can know we are Christians. The pagans said of the early Christians, "Behold, how they love one another."

4. By how we conduct our business. How you conduct your business or how you work in someone else's business also testifies to whether or not you belong to Jesus Christ. It is a rare business that is utterly upright and moral. Therefore, there will be many occasions when a person who belongs to Christ will have to stand up for him, saying, "I cannot do that, because I am a Christian." Although a stand like that may result in isolation, abuse, ridicule, or persecution, even loss of a job, it is necessary. A faith that is not supported by an upright moral life is not worth having.

5. In reaching out to others. A fifth way we confess Christ before others is by reaching out to them in evangelism. Spurgeon said, "I believe, my brethren, that a Christian man can hardly carry out his confession with his mouth, unless he goes a little out of his way at times to bear testimony." Do you do that? Do you do anything, even something quite little, merely to be able to speak to others about Jesus? If not, how can you consider yourself to be a Christian? If you are a Christian, Christ is your Lord, and it is he who said, "You will be my witnesses" (Acts 1:8).

6. In temptation. There is never a better and more hopeful opportunity to confess Jesus as Lord than in a time of temptation. Remember Joseph. He was pursued by the wife of his Egyptian master, Potiphar. But he refused to sleep with her, proclaiming, "... How then could I do such a wicked thing and sin against God?" (Gen. 39:9). The temptation gave him an opportunity to state his true allegiance, and stating it undoubtedly also helped him to resist the sin. You would be wise to do the same.

7. In severe trials. The seventh circumstance in which you can confess Christ forcefully is in severe trials. Have you lost your job? Has your wife or husband left you? Have you discovered that you have a serious, perhaps fatal illness? This is your opportunity to show the world that you are not like those who have no knowledge of the true God or of his Son our Savior. It is a time you can say, "I am not afraid of what is coming, for I belong to Jesus Christ. He has shown his love by dying for me, and I know that he will not desert me. Even in the face of a loved one's death, says Paul, though we grieve we do not grieve "like the rest of men, who have no hope" (1 Thess. 4:13).

8. In the hour of our deaths. Finally, we sometimes also have the privilege of confessing Jesus as Lord in the hour of our deaths. This is not always possible, given the forms of medical treatment today. But it often is. Some of the greatest testimonies of believers to the grace and power of God have been given on their deathbeds.

When he was dying, William Carey, known as the father of modern missions and a great missionary to India, said to a friend, "When I am gone, say nothing about Dr. Carey; speak about Dr. Carey's Savior."

David Livingstone, the pioneer missionary to Africa, said, "Build me a hut to die in. I am going home."

John Bunyan, the Bedford tinker who left the world the immortal Christian classic The Pilgrim's Progress, said as he died, "Weep not for me, but for yourselves. I go to the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who will, no doubt, through the mediation of his blessed Son, receive me, though a sinner. We shall ere long meet to sing the new song, and remain everlastingly happy, world without end. Amen."

Dwight L. Moody, the great evangelist, said, "I see the children's faces. Earth is receding. Heaven is opening. God is calling."

Righteousness and Salvation

Since the end result of heart belief and mouth confession, which we have been studying, is the righteousness and salvation about which the text speaks, and since these are the greatest blessings any human being can receive, let it be your deep desire to believe on Jesus as Savior and Lord wholeheartedly and let it be your earnest endeavor to confess him before others in every possible way. Let's be rid of all "secret discipleship," if such a thing even exists. We do not have long to live. Let us use our time well and wisely, above all by trusting wholly in Jesus Christ and by confessing him boldly with our mouths. Let us stand with him, bearing his reproach, knowing that if we do, one day we will be with him in glory and will reign with him forever.

Jesus himself said, "Whoever acknowledges me before men, I will also acknowledge him before my Father in heaven" (Matt. 10:32).

Chapter 147.
Health, Wealth, and What?

Romans 10:10

For the last few studies I have been following an alternating procedure in which I have first expounded a text from Romans and then dealt with wrong ways of understanding the gospel or doing evangelism that result from misusing or neglecting what the text teaches. Thus far I have dealt with two wrong approaches: (1) the religion of signs and wonders, and (2) the doctrine that eliminates claims of Christ to lordship from salvation matters.

In this study I want to tackle another serious aberration, namely, the gospel that is often proclaimed on television by the so-called television evangelists. This is sometimes called the "health, wealth, and happiness" gospel.

The reasons I am dealing with this aberration at this point is that it has bearing on the word saved, which we came to in the last two verses we were studying. Romans 10:9 says, "If you confess with your mouth,

'Jesus is Lord,' and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, you will be saved" (emphasis added). The next verse, Romans 10:10, says, "For it is with your heart that you believe and are justified, and it is with your mouth that you confess and are saved" (emphasis added). I said in the last study that the future tense of the verb in verse 9 indicates that this is speaking of salvation from the wrath of God against sin at the last judgment. If I had been dealing with this fully, I could have shown that "salvation" is an inclusive term for what the Bible offers. It includes: (1) salvation from the penalty of sin, a past tense; (2) salvation from the power of sin, a present tense; and (3) salvation from the presence of sin, a future tense. Each part has to do with sin.

Most Christians will think this is obvious. What person who claims to be a Christian could deny it? Yet this is precisely what is being lost or even denied by the many popular TV preachers. This is no small matter. The error concerns the very essence of Christianity, and it is unusually harmful if for no other reason than that television is so pervasive and influential. For millions of Americans, the "electronic church" is virtually all they know of Christianity.

The Gospel According to Television

Let me begin by setting some parameters and providing some focus. First, what I am going to say does not apply to all religious television. It does not apply to the broadcasts of the Billy Graham Association, for instance. Billy Graham is an exception in this, as in many other areas of his unique ministry. Joel Nederhood's "Faith 20" program is another exception. So also, though to a lesser degree, is James Kennedy's television program. People who know the television medium well will say rightly that these programs are "bad television." That is, they do not play to television's unique capacities for oversimplification, drama, and entertainment. But that is precisely why they are a good exception. I hope they will survive.

What I am referring to are the exceptionally popular (read "financially successful") programs, particularly those that promote what is generally called "positive [or possibility] thinking" and "positive confessionism." These programs are associated with such names as Robert Schuller, Kenneth Copeland, Kenneth Hagin, Oral Roberts, and Robert Tilton. Instead of a traditional gospel of salvation from sin, these TV evangelists preach a man-centered gospel that, in its mildest form, offers self-esteem without repentance and, in its most startling extension, proclaims the deification of man, with its inevitable blasphemous encroachments on God's prerogatives.

This TV gospel promotes self-esteem instead of sin, self-help instead of atonement and redemption, an entertainer instead of Christ, and a lust for power instead of true discipleship.

In 1990, a talented friend of mine named Michael Horton edited a book on the TV evangelists entitled The Agony of Deceit. He concluded, after a careful examination of the actual teachings of this influential group of communicators, "All of the televangelists censured in this book tend to trivialize the plan of salvation. There is rarely any serious attempt to explain to the masses such basic redemptive truths as the substitutionary atonement, propitiation, or sacrifice and satisfaction.... One thing the viewer comes away with is the sense that the purpose of evangelism is not to satisfy God and his purposes, but to satisfy the consumer with the product."

In the following analysis I am depending in large measure on the material assembled by Horton and his associates.

The Gospel of Self-Esteem

The least objectionable, but still harmful, form of the TV gospel is the message of "self-esteem" associated with the name of Robert Schuller, pastor of the Crystal Cathedral in Garden Grove, California, not far from Disneyland. Schuller's weekly Sunday-morning services are broadcast on more than two hundred television stations worldwide, and he is watched by more than three million people. In an interview feature in late 1984, Christianity Today claimed that he is "reaching more non-Christians than any other religious leader in America."

Robert Schuller wants to be orthodox and claims to be. He believes in the inerrancy of the Bible and affirms the Apostles', Nicene, and Athanasian creeds. He even claims to be a Calvinist, professing submission to the Westminster Standards and the Canons of the Synod of Dort, which is the official standard of his denomination. Nevertheless, Schuller's doctrine of sin is deficient, and as a result his doctrine of salvation has shifted away from the message of God's redeeming work in Christ to what is basically a philosophy of positive thinking, at least to the extent that his views are disclosed on television.

In 1982, Schuller wrote a book that was mailed free to every minister in America. It was titled Self-Esteem: The New Reformation. In this book Schuller took issue with the ways traditional preaching speaks of sin and proposed a gospel of enlightened "self-esteem" instead. Clearly, Schuller believes that if other ministers follow his approach, most of them will have the same or nearly the same (numerical) success he has had.

What did he say? Schuller wrote, "Reformation theology failed to make clear that the core of sin is a lack of self-esteem." "The most serious sin is the one that causes me to say, 'I am unworthy. I may have no claim to divine sonship if you examine me at my worst.'" "Once a person believes he is an 'unworthy sinner,' it is doubtful if he can really honestly accept the saving grace God offers in Jesus Christ." Writing along the same lines in a paragraph quoted by Christianity Today in 1984, Schuller said, "I don't think anything has been done in the name of Christ and under the banner of Christianity that has proven more destructive to human personality and, hence, counterproductive to the evangelism enterprise than the often crude, uncouth, and unchristian strategy of attempting to make people aware of their lost and sinful condition."

To be fair to Schuller, he claims that his evangelistic strategy is to get non-Christians in the door, as it were, and then teach them the gospel later. But it is also fair to say that whatever is heard on Schuller's influential television program is not that gospel.

Besides, one cannot help but question whether the true gospel can ever be built on a false foundation. In a helpful analysis of Schuller, authors Dave Hunt and T. A. McMahon write, "One thing is certain...: The Bible never urges self-acceptance, self-love, self-assertion, selfconfidence, self-esteem, self-forgiveness, nor any of the other selfisms that are so popular today.

The answer to depression is not to accept self, but to turn from self to Christ. A preoccupation with self is the very antithesis of what the Bible teaches. "

Health, Wealth, and Happiness

The second, and much more harmful brand of the TV gospel is the "health, wealth, and happiness" message of the positive confessionists, men like Kenneth Copeland, Kenneth Hagin, Oral Roberts, and Robert Tilton. These preachers believe that "health, wealth, and happiness" are the birthright of every Christian and that the power to attain them lies within Christians themselves. They affirm the gospel. I know of none who would deny outright that Jesus died for sin and rose again from the dead. But this is not the gospel they preach. In fact, they seem almost intentionally to ignore it.

What these preachers really seem to believe in is the power of the mind to visualize and thus create what one desires. This is New Age thinking. It is not far removed from the fantasies of Shirley MacLaine and may actually have the same origins, as some argue.

A popular slogan for this distortion of the Bible's message is: "Name it and claim it." That is, we have the right to whatever we want because we are God's sons and daughters or even, as we will see, because we are ourselves "little gods." We see this view reflected in book and pamphlet titles such as Kenneth E. Hagin's "How to Write Your Own Ticket with God" and Robert Tilton's magazine, Signs, Wonders and Miracles of Faith, which is filled with stories of financial and physical success from his followers. Kenneth Copeland has written "God's Will Is Health" and "God's Will Is Prosperity." Oral Roberts promises people on his mailing list, "prosperity miracles that are within fingertip reach of your faith," and one of his most recent books is titled How I Learned Jesus Was Not Poor.

Christians who know their Bibles may wonder how the TV evangelists deal with Bible statements to the contrary, statements that say we are called to suffer with Christ or Job's statement that "The LORD gave and the LORD has taken away" (Job 1:21). It is not often that we hear the TV evangelists contradict Scripture, but they do at this point. Charles Capps, another "name it and claim it" preacher, said that Job "was sure not under the anointing" when he said, "the Lord gives and the Lord takes away" and called the statement a "lie."

Even Pat Robertson, president of the Christian Broadcasting Network and a former candidate for the presidency of the United States in the 1988 elections, said, "I can hardly think that the Bible, which was transmitted through human beings, is totally perfect. I believe it to be the Word of God and a fully inspired book, but not perfection."

The false teaching I have been describing would be serious enough if it stopped here. But, unfortunately, it does not. In an effort to enforce the "authority" the positive confessionists believe to have been given to each Christian, these teachers extend their errors to insist that by their rebirth, Christians have become "little gods" and therefore possess the authority of God himself, not only in "health, wealth, and happiness" matters but in all things. This is either so ignorant or so diabolical that it is hard for most Christians to believe that such "nice Christian men" are teaching this. But they are, as scores of verbatim quotations show. Here are some examples....

Kenneth Copeland, one of the most popular TV evangelists, said, "Every man who has been born again is an incarnation, and Christianity is a miracle. The believer is as much an incarnation as was Jesus of Nazareth." On another occasion he said, "You don't have a god in you. You are one."

Kenneth E. Hagin wrote, "Even many in the great body of Full Gospel people do not know that the new birth is a real incarnation; they do not know that they are as much sons and daughters of God as Jesus."

In a televised interview with Copeland, Trinity Broadcasting Network's Paul Crouch made this statement: "We are gods. I am a little god. I have his name. I am one with him.... Critics be gone!"

Here is a particularly offensive example from a tape series called "Believing in Yourself" by Casey Treat.

The Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost had a conference and they said, "Let's make man an exact duplicate of us." Oh, I don't know about you, but that does turn my crank! An exact duplicate of God! Say it out loud —"I'm an exact duplicate of God!" [The audience repeats it a bit tentatively and uncertainly]

Come on, say it! [He leads them in unison.] "I'm an exact duplicate of God!" Say it again, "I'm an exact duplicate of God!" [The congregation is getting into it, louder and bolder, with more enthusiasm each time.] Say it like you mean it! [He's yelling now.] "I'm an exact duplicate of God!" Yell it out loud! Shout it! [They follow as he leads.] "I'm an exact duplicate of God!" "I'm an exact duplicate of God!" [Repeatedly]....

When God looks in the mirror, he sees me! When I look in the mirror, I see God! Oh, hallelujah!...

You know, sometimes people say to me, when they're mad and want to put me down.... "You just think you're a little god." Thank you! Hallelujah! You got that right! "Who d'you think you are, Jesus?" Yep!

Are you listening to me? Are you kids running around here acting like little gods? Why not? God told me to!... Since I'm an exact duplicate of God, I'm going to act like God!"

What we see in this teaching is an inevitable multiplication of false doctrines. It began with unlimited faith, but it soon progressed to unlimited health, unlimited wealth, unlimited power, and unlimited divinity. And even that is not the end. The last stage is unlimited dominion, even more dominion or authority than Jesus. Kenneth Hagin tells of a supposed conversation he had with God that was periodically interrupted by Satan. Hagin asked God to silence the devil, but God said he couldn't do it. He was powerless. So Hagin commanded Satan to be quiet. Hagin concluded his story with these words: "Jesus looked at me and said, 'If you hadn't done anything about that, I couldn't have.'"

What is the end purpose of this unlimited, divine authority? I remind you that it is to grow healthy and rich, and to be happy for that reason. That is, it is selfish. Pat Robertson said, "We are to command the money to come to us." Fred Price says, "You, as a Christian, are supposed to be master of your circumstances.... There is no way in the world you can reign as a king and be poverty-stricken."

Let me say that I do not know of any teachings anywhere that are a better contemporary illustration of the warning of 2 Timothy 3:1-5, which says that in the last days, "people will be lovers of themselves [the gospel of 'self-esteem'], lovers of money [and]... lovers of pleasure rather than lovers of God [the 'health, wealth, and happiness' gospel]."

The Nature of Television

There is one more thing that needs to be said before I drop this topic and go on with our studies of Romans 10. The problems I have been describing result in large measure from the very nature of television, by which I mean that broadcast television is a bad medium for communicating the gospel.

We have been taught to think of television as a powerful educational tool, but education is what television probably does worst. Broadcast television is an entertainment medium, and the result is that it eventually turns everything it touches into entertainment. If entertainment is what it is presenting, that is all right. You may as well watch a movie on television as see it in a theater. But to the degree it tries to be serious, television is harmful, because it trivializes the serious by making news events, politics—yes, even religion itself—entertainment.

Because television creates and thrives on celebrities, when religion goes on television the evangelist inevitably becomes the focus of audience attention, a celebrity. He becomes "a god" and soon begins to think of himself as one, promising the viewers that they can become "gods," too. Again, the program becomes a performance, entertainment, because that is what television is. As a result, religious programs thrive, not by preaching of the gospel but by becoming "holy vaudeville" or talk shows. Above all, television is marketing products. So in the end the gospel (or religion) becomes merely another item to be sold, and success is viewed, not in the number of conversions, still less in the development of Christian character, but in audience share and income.

What I am saying is that television is not a good place to do religion. Those who attempt it do so at their own peril and that of their viewers.

We would be far better off heeding the words of Romans 10, which warn us against ascending into heaven to bring Christ down or descending into the deep to bring him up from the dead— can we say, "trying to be celebrities?"—and instead direct us to the Word of God, which is given to us by revelation, is near us, and is the "word of faith we are proclaiming" (vv. 6-8).

As far as I am concerned, let me say clearly that I have no new word from God, no new revelation. The only word I have is the Word that has been once for all delivered to God's saints. I am a teacher. I seek only to point you to those old doctrines and invite you to walk those worn paths. I do not want to entertain. The world will do that. I want to challenge your minds and move your hearts to obey the Bible's teachings. And God forbid that I, or any other preacher, should teach anything contrary to the true gospel doctrine of repentance for sin and corresponding faith in and submission to Jesus Christ. I echo Michael Horton's own words when he says:

The biblical gospel offers freedom from sin, not sinlessness; liberation from guilt, not from sinconsciousness; salvation from spiritual, not material, poverty. It offers peace with God won by Christ's bloody sacrifice—not success won by our incessant "decrees." It promises salvation from God's wrath, not freedom from the unhappiness common to all humanity from time to time. And it hides us—in the midst of our pain and grief—in the wounds of Christ, who has made us worthy to share in his suffering.

Chapter 148.
Freed from Shame or Shameless?

Romans 10:11

Near the end of the second paragraph of Romans 10, there is a quotation from the Old Testament that Paul has already used once before, at the end of Romans 9. It is from Isaiah 28, and it says, "Anyone who trusts in him will never be put to shame" (Rom. 10:11; cf. 9:23; Isa. 28:16).

This verse teaches two things: (1) the way of salvation is trust or belief in Jesus Christ, a point Paul has made many times earlier, and (2) this way is open to everyone, to the Gentile as well as to the Jew, a point which Paul is now going to stress. At the same time, the verse also paves the way for the invitation to everyone to believe, which is found in verses 12 and 13, and supports the challenge to ministers to preach the gospel to all the world's people, which is in verses 14 and 15.

Like verses 9 and 10 that precede it, this is a tremendous verse for preachers. It speaks of salvation, which is the essential task of preaching, calling on all people everywhere to put their trust in Christ. And it does so powerfully, making an implied contrast between those who do believe in Jesus and are saved, and those who do not and are lost. It is a verse from which preachers can bring out many various aspects of the gospel of God's grace.

Whatever Became of Shame?

The new idea in this verse is "shame." I have not discussed it before in this series, so I want to explore it now. But it is hard to talk about shame today, for the reason that very few people in our day are ashamed of anything or even think in such terms.

On the contrary, ours is an exceedingly shameless age.

Nearly twenty years ago, Dr. Karl Menninger of the famous Menninger Clinic in Topeka, Kansas, wrote a book entitled Whatever Became of Sin? I thought of that book and its title as I began to work on this subject, because it struck me as I proceeded with my study that in our day "shame" is an even more elusive subject than "sin," and probably for connected reasons. Menninger argued that in recent years "sin" has first been reinterpreted as "crime," which means that it has lost its core definition as being chiefly a violation of the law of God and has become instead only a violation of human law. Then it was changed from being a "crime" into a "symptom," meaning that it is now seen as being no one's fault particularly. At this stage, anything bad that anyone does can be blamed either on one's genes or the environment.

And that is why the sense of shame has gone away, too. Shame implies guilt for wrongdoing. But if none of us ever does anything wrong, there is no need to feel guilty about anything; and if there is no need to feel guilty, there is no need to be ashamed. People have no sense of shame today. We are a shameless people.

I was surprised to discover this by what is not being written today, though I probably should not have been. Let me explain. As I began this study I turned to the many books on pop-psychology, counseling, and self-discovery that find their way to my bookshelves, thinking I would discover lots of interesting material about overcoming or dealing with shame in those books. But I did not. Hardly anything has been written about shame. I couldn't even find it in Menninger's Whatever Became of Sin? Apparently, it is not in the category of what are popularly called "felt needs."

Next I looked in my books of anecdotes and quotations. But there were no stories or snappy sayings there.

In the end I turned to the massive Oxford English Dictionary, where I found pages of definitions of "shame," supported by scores of quotations from English writers. But here is the interesting thing. The quotations from which the editors of this great dictionary derived their definitions are numerous only from the early centuries of the English language. They become less frequent as the centuries go by and cease somewhere in the last century. Apparently, no one has felt much shame about anything since roughly 1896, the last date for which I could find a quotation.

"Shame" in the Bible

What a difference when we turn to the Bible! I have a computer program that will run through all the occurrences of a word or combination of words in the New International Version text, the one I use. When I ran a check on the words shame or ashamed, I found that these words occur 181 times: 149 times in the Old Testament and 32 times in the New Testament. So, obviously, shame is an important biblical idea.

What does shame mean?

The Oxford English Dictionary defines shame as a "painful emotion arising from the consciousness of something dishonoring, ridiculous or indecorous in one's own conduct or circumstances... or of being in a situation which offends one's sense of modesty or decency." But the Bible carries the meaning further and deeper than that. The Bible definition contains several important elements.

1. Disappointment. The first element is best described by the words "acute disappointment," which means being let down by someone or something in which we have believed. Paul has already used the word this way at least twice earlier in Romans, in Romans 1:16 and 5:5. In Romans 1:16 he says, "I am not ashamed of the gospel." He does not mean merely that he is not embarrassed by the gospel, though that is also true, but that he is sure he will never be let down by it, since "it is the power of God for the salvation of everyone who believes." Similarly, in Romans 5:5, where the NIV even translates the word "shame" as "disappointment," the apostle writes, "And hope does not disappoint us." It doesn't let us down.

Therefore, in terms of our text, we can say that "the one who trusts in Jesus Christ will never be disappointed by him," either in this life or the life to come. Jesus will always be found to have fulfilled his promises to us completely.

2. Being confounded. The second category of texts carries the idea of shame a bit further, envisioning a situation in which a person is confounded or left speechless. This is the way Job felt in his suffering. He said, "Even if I am innocent, I cannot lift my head, / for I am full of shame / and drowned in my affliction" (Job 10:15). Similarly, God says of those who have done evil, "... you will remember and be ashamed and never again open your mouth because of your humiliation" (Ezek. 16:63).

In my opinion, one of the most offensive things about sin is that it is never silent. Whatever the offense, the one who has committed it will find an excuse, blaming God or others or the environment or his or her genes. But this will cease in the day of God's judgment. In that day all sin and all the circumstances leading up to it will be laid bare, the shame of the wicked will be acute and profound, and they will be utterly speechless, silent, abashed, humiliated, and disgraced. No one whose sin is not covered by the blood of Jesus Christ will have a single thing to say.

3. Exposure. Perhaps the most important element in the biblical idea of shame is exposure, particularly exposure of our sins and sinful natures in God's presence. This idea is found in the earliest pages of the Bible in the story of the fall of Adam and Eve.

We are told in Genesis 2:25, which describes the condition of our first parents before the fall, that "the man and his wife were both naked, and they felt no shame." Rightly so, of course. They had nothing to be ashamed about. They had not sinned. So they stood naked before God and felt no shame, and naked before each other and felt no shame. They had no shame in their own eyes either. But when they sinned, which is what Genesis 3 is about, they did feel shame and tried to hide their nakedness by making clothes of fig leaves. Later, when God came to them in the garden, they tried to hide from him by retreating into the shrubbery.

And how about the day of God's final judgment? Jesus said of the wicked in that day, "They will say to the mountains, 'Fall on us!' and to the hills, 'Cover us!'" (Luke 23:30; cf. Hosea 10:8), so great will be their dread of this ultimate exposure.

4. Disgrace. The final element in the biblical idea of shame is disgrace or extreme humiliation. It is what Daniel was speaking of when he wrote of God's judgment, "Multitudes who sleep in the dust of the earth will awake: some to everlasting life, others to shame and everlasting contempt" (Dan. 12:2). There are scores of similar texts.

No Shame Now, But Shame Hereafter

We come now to the main point of this study and our text, and it is that those who do not trust Christ, though they may be shameless now, will be overcome with shame in the day of God's judgment, while those who trust Christ here, though they may be made objects of great ridicule, scorn, and shame by unbelievers, will have no shame hereafter.

The first case is that of the unsaved. The unsaved may have no sense of shame now, but they will have shame hereafter.

The unsaved sometimes talk about Christians as if they have faith in faith while the worldly build on facts. But everyone has faith in something, even unbelievers. What do the unsaved have faith in? Well, many trust their good reputations. As long as people think well of them, they suppose they will always be able to get by. Some trust their achievements. Certainly they will count for something, they think.

Many more trust in their stocks, bonds, property, or bank accounts. Still others place faith in their family, friends, and acquaintances.

But these "good" things do not always last, even here. Reputations fail, achievements are overshadowed or forgotten, wealth is lost, and friends and acquaintances reject us.

And the situation is even worse when we think in terms of heaven. What is a human reputation to count for there? Nothing at all. In fact, it is worse than nothing. We are sinners, according to the Bible's teaching, and the only reputation we have in heaven is for having rejected God, broken his law, and scorned his warnings. Achievements? The only achievement God will recognize is perfection. Jesus said, "Be perfect, therefore, as your heavenly Father is perfect" (Matt. 5:48).
None of us have done that. We are all condemned for our willful and sinful imperfections. Wealth? We know that wealth will not help us in God's day of judgment. We even say, "You can't take it with you." Besides, what could our wealth possibly mean to God, who has created and actually owns all things! If God should regard it at all, it would only be to censure us for coveting, hoarding, or misusing the wealth he has entrusted to us. Finally, even friends will fail us in that day, for at the judgment each will be concerned for his or her own standing before God and will not be thinking of us at all.

In an excellent sermon on this text, Charles Haddon Spurgeon wrote, "It will be a sorry business if we have been trusting in our good temper, our charity, our patriotism, our courage or our honesty, and when we come to die shall be made to feel that these cannot satisfy the claims of divine justice or give us a passport to the skies. How sad to see robes turn to rags, and comeliness into corruption!"

In that day the people who have had no shame here, who are like those described by the prophet Jeremiah—"they have no shame at all; they do not even know how to blush" (Jer. 6:15)—these shall be utterly confounded. They will find that the objects of their hopes are empty.

They will have nothing to say. Their shame will be exposed, and they will be disgraced in their own eyes and the eyes of others forever.

No Shame (Here or) Hereafter

The second case is that of Christians. Those who trust Christ here, though they may be made objects of ridicule, scorn, and shame by unbelievers, will have no shame hereafter.

If the object of their trust, Jesus Christ, were not who he is, I suppose they might know shame hereafter. If they should get to heaven and discover that Jesus is not the Savior they imagined him to be, they would certainly be confounded. If they should find that his death on the cross was not adequate punishment for their sins or that his power to keep them from falling in this life and even after this life was not sufficient, they might be ashamed. They might be ashamed that they confessed him openly before other men and women or that they induced others to turn from their sin and trust him.

They might be disappointed that they had placed him first in their lives, when there were so many other good things to be enjoyed. If Jesus should not be found to be altogether lovely, the treasure above all treasures, they could conclude that they made a bad bargain. They had only Jesus, but they could have had money and land and good times and the pleasures that sin provides.

But how could that be? Jesus is who the Bible declares him to be. He is the very Son of God, our Savior. He is the lily of the valley and the bright morning star. He is the King of kings and Lord of lords. He is Alpha and Omega, the first and the last. He is the Good Shepherd. He is the Light of the World. He is the Bread of Heaven. He is the living water; anyone who drinks of him will never thirst again. Jesus is the resurrection and the life. He is the way, the truth, and the life. He is the Word of God. He is the Lamb of God. He is the faithful and true witness. He is Immanuel,

"God with us."

How can anyone be disappointed with Jesus? How can anyone be confounded or disgraced when his or her hope is in the Lord Jesus Christ alone?

But aren't Christians sinners, too? Yes, they are. But they are sinners whose sin has been forgiven and whose nakedness has been covered by the righteousness of Christ.

I go back to the story of Adam and Eve in Eden. Our first parents were made innocent but lost their innocence through their sin of eating the forbidden fruit. Before that, they were naked and felt no shame. Afterwards they knew shame and proved it by trying to hide their nakedness, even when God came to them in the garden. Although that is the place in the story at which we left off earlier, it is not the end of the story. God came to them in the garden to expose their sin and deal with it, for God cannot ignore sin and all sin must (and will) be exposed in his presence. But, having exposed the sin and judged it, God did not stop there. We are told that God killed animals and "made garments of skin for Adam and his wife and clothed them" (Gen. 3:21).

What a wonderful picture that is! There was no way Adam and Eve could go back to the innocence they had enjoyed before the fall. Lost innocence can never be restored. But, although they could never go back, they could go forward, and the way forward was through the clothes of skin that symbolized the righteousness of Jesus Christ, given to all who put their trust in him.

Shame? Yes. But shame recognized, confessed, and dealt with permanently in God's own way. Sin is real. So is the shame that should and eventually will accompany it. But the atonement is also real. Restitution has been made by Jesus. "Therefore, there is now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus" (Rom. 8:1).

Jesus, thy blood and righteousness
My beauty are, my glorious dress;
'Midst flaming worlds, in these arrayed,
With joy shall I lift up my head.

Bold shall I stand in that great day;
For who aught to my charge shall lay?
Fully through thee absolved I am,
From sin and fear, from guilt and shame.

Whoever You Are

I call your attention to one final point. I have pointed out that in Romans 10:11, Paul is quoting from Isaiah 28:16. But to be exact I need to note that at this point he introduces a slight change in the text, a change made readily evident by comparing his first citation of the text in Romans 9:33 and his second citation in Romans 10:11. The first is closer to the Hebrew (and Septuagint, which Paul is actually quoting) when it begins "the one who." Paul broadens the text in his second use of it by substituting "anyone" for the original rendering.

Why does he do this? Doesn't Paul have a proper respect for the biblical text? Doesn't he want to treat the Old Testament carefully?

It is not that at all. What Paul wants to do (and is doing) is to bring out the full meaning of the passage, showing that "the one who" means anybody, Gentiles as well as Jews, Americans as well as Europeans, rich people as well as poor people, the disadvantaged as well as the mighty, and so on. If you do not come to Christ, you will be confounded and ashamed in the day of God's judgment. But you may nevertheless come to Christ, whoever you may be.

Do not delude yourself into thinking that you can do nothing and that everything will nevertheless be all right for you. Apart from Christ you are in deadly peril. The day will come when the Judge of the earth will summon you to his high court, and you will be required to account for your life and explain your wrongdoing. What will you say in that day when the holy God confronts you? What possible excuses can you give? In Romans 3, Paul describes what will happen. He says that in that day "every mouth [will] be silenced and the whole world held accountable to God" (Rom. 3:19).

I tell you as a minister of the Word of God that the day is coming when you will stand in God's court. You will stand there in either one of two ways. Either you will stand clothed in the righteousness of Jesus Christ as one for whom he died, whose sin and shame have been taken away. Or you will stand in the horror of your own spiritual and moral nakedness, in shame, and you will be condemned for your sin.

The Book of Revelation speaks of such people, echoing the words of Jesus himself, which I quoted earlier. "Then the kings of the earth, the princes, the generals, the rich, the mighty, and every slave and every free man hid in caves and among the rocks of the mountains. They called to the mountains and the rocks, 'Fall on us and hide us from the face of him who sits on the throne and from the wrath of the Lamb! For the great day of their wrath has come, and who can stand?'" (Rev. 6:15-17).

But the rocks will not fall. The rocks obey their Master in heaven, and neither they nor anything else will intervene to cover the exposure of those who have rejected Christ and spurned the gospel of God's grace. Their shame and your shame will be profound if you are not in Jesus Christ.

Do not wait until the day of God's judgment overtakes you, when all acts of repentance and faith will be too late. Flee to Christ now! Trust him while there is still an opportunity to do so.

The Bible says that "now is the time of God's favor, now is the day of salvation" (2 Cor. 6:2).

Jesus said, "All that the Father gives me will come to me, and whoever comes to me I will never drive away" (John 6:37).

Chapter 149.
Salvation for All

Romans 10:12-13

One of the delightful things about studying the Bible is that just when we think we have mastered one of its great doctrines, another complementary doctrine comes along to challenge our still-limited understanding of Bible truth and stretch our vision.

We have a case in point in Romans 10. If you can remember back to the beginning of Romans 9, you will recall that this great middle section of the letter began with the doctrine of election. Paul was asking why it is that not all Jews are being saved and whether the fact that they are not means that God has broken his promises to them, promises recorded in the Old Testament. He answered by teaching the doctrine of election, saying that the promises of God are for God's elect people only and that not all Jews, any more than all Gentiles, are elect. He gave three Old Testament examples: Abraham, who was chosen out of a pagan background; Isaac, who was chosen as the son of the promise rather than his half brother, Ishmael; and Jacob, who was chosen by God rather than his twin brother, Esau.

Then, having made his point about election, the apostle went on to teach about divine reprobation, the doctrine that God deliberately passes by some, who are left to perish in their sins, while saving others. He illustrated this by the case of Pharaoh, concluding, "Therefore God has mercy on whom he wants to have mercy, and he hardens whom he wants to harden" (Rom. 9:18; quoting Exod. 9:16).

Most people who first read about or hear of these two doctrines, election and reprobation, do not like them. They seem wrong, which is why Paul takes so much time to explain and defend them. His defense occupies most of the remainder of Romans 9. But here is the amazing thing. After having explained and defended these doctrines, as only Paul can do, and also presumably after having convinced us of their profound truth, the apostle now seems to be saying something utterly contradictory. He says that anyone who wishes can be saved.

At the end of Romans 9 he had quoted Isaiah 28:16, which says that "the one who trusts in him will never be put to shame." So far so good! That form of the verse, the Old Testament form, is not the least bit inconsistent with the doctrine of election, even in appearance. "The one" means "the elect one." But Paul is not content to leave the verse in that form. Instead of leaving it as it is, he alters the subject of the sentence by substituting the word "anyone" for "the one," thereby universalizing it. And lest we miss what he is doing, he makes his point twice, once by requoting Isaiah 28:16 in verse 11 and then by saying the same thing over again in a quotation from Joel 2:32 in verse 13.

We have already studied the first statement, the alteration of the Old Testament quotation in verse 11: "Anyone who trusts in him will never be put to shame." The second quotation says, "Anyone who calls on the name of the Lord will be saved" (v. 13).

What a stretching of our minds!

On the one hand, "God has mercy on whom he wants to have mercy, and he hardens whom he wants to harden" (Rom. 9:18). That teaches the doctrines of election and reprobation.

But, on the other hand, "Everyone who calls on the name of the Lord will be saved." That is the universal gospel offer.

A Welcome Doctrine

I do not mean to suggest by this introduction to Romans 10:12-13 that there can ever be a contradiction in the Bible, of course, for there cannot. The Bible is God's book, and God does not contradict himself, alter his truth, or lie. In this case, the explanation is that although everyone is free to come to Jesus Christ in salvation and may indeed come if he or she will, the only ones who do come are those whom God has chosen and regenerated, because it is only their rebirth that enables them to trust Christ.

But that is not the thrust of these verses. Verses 12 and 13 are not in Romans 10 to give us a theological explanation of election in reference to the parallel truth, which is the gospel offer. They are there to extend the gospel offer, which is clear from what follows, since in the very next section Paul appeals for messengers to take the offer of salvation for all who will trust Jesus Christ as Savior throughout the world.

What a welcome teaching this is—"Everyone who calls on the name of the Lord will be saved." If it were not for this teaching, we might think that the doctrine of election necessarily excludes us or that the gospel is for people other than ourselves. But here we are told that it is for you and me, all of us, if we will trust Jesus. It does not make any difference who you are or what you may or may not have done. You may be rich or poor, educated or uneducated, advantaged or disadvantaged. You may be passive or highly motivated. You may be religious or not religious at all. You may be moral, or you may be very immoral. You may have lived in sin a long time. You may have committed adultery or stolen money. You may even have murdered someone. It does not matter. The text says, "Everyone who calls on the name of the Lord will be saved."

"There Is No Difference"

But perhaps you are still thinking that there is some difference that might exclude you. If so, you need to see that any possible differences are excluded on two counts. Paul expresses them as two reasons why "everyone who calls on the name of the Lord will be saved."

1. There is no difference between Jew and Gentile. This means that there is no meaningful difference between any two peoples, of course. Because, if ever there could have been a difference, it would have been the difference between the Jewish people and all others. God had chosen the Jewish people to be a nation through which he would send the Messiah. And not only that, he had given them the law and made special promises to them. Paul knew these advantages and appreciated them, because he had listed them in the ninth chapter of Romans: "Theirs is the adoption as sons; theirs the divine glory, the covenants, the receiving of the law, the temple worship and the promises. Theirs are the patriarchs, and from them is traced the human ancestry of Christ, who is God over all, forever praised!" (Rom. 9:3-5).

If ever any people had the advantage of position and promise, it was the Jewish people. Yet "there is no difference between Jew and Gentile" so far as the gospel is concerned. Why? Because all are sinners—Paul has made this point in the first two and a half chapters of the letter—and because no sinner, however favored, is able to achieve a right relationship to God by his or her abilities. God has done this himself for sinners through the death of Jesus Christ, and this death is for all who will trust him. In other words, Jesus did not die only for Jews. He died for Gentiles, too. He died to save all who will call on him for salvation.

2. The same Lord is Lord of all people. If there were different gods, we might expect that the various peoples of the world who worship these different gods would be treated differently by them. But because there is only one God, it is reasonable to expect that in matters of salvation this one God will treat all his creatures on an equal basis. And he has. We might say that this statement, "the same Lord is Lord of all," is summarized by what Paul wrote to his young protege Timothy: "There is one God and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus" (1 Tim. 2:5).

There is a disagreement among commentators whether "Lord" in this verse means Jesus or God the Father, since it could mean either. Charles Hodge presents both sides. The majority of commentators refer the word to Jesus because it is used of him in verse 9, "If you confess with your mouth, 'Jesus is Lord,' and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, you will be saved," and because the word is so often used of Jesus in the New Testament. On the other hand, says Hodge, in the next verse "Lord" refers to the Father, since the verse is a quotation from Joel, who uses "Lord" that way. Again, the idea is nearly parallel to Romans 3:29-30, where Paul wrote, "Is God the God of Jews only? Is he not the God of Gentiles too? Yes, of Gentiles too, since there is only one God, who will justify the circumcised by faith and the uncircumcised through that same faith."

There is probably little difference in meaning between these two possibilities, since Jesus is fully God, and God the Father is seen only in Jesus (John 14:9). Nevertheless, as Hodge says, "the analogy of Scripture... as well as the context" is in favor of referring it to Christ.

In my judgment, the perfect illustration of these points, embracing the combined truths of "one God and one mediator" is the statement the apostle Peter made when he was brought to the house of the Roman centurion Cornelius, as told in Acts 10. Cornelius was a devout man to whom God had given a vision of an angel who told him to send to Joppa to bring back a man named Simon Peter who would bring him a message from God. Cornelius sent two of his servants and a soldier, and while they were on their way, God gave a corresponding vision to Peter to prepare him for their visit. Peter "saw heaven opened and something like a large sheet being let down to earth by its four corners" (v. 11). In it were many animals that were unclean according to Jewish dietary laws. Then Peter heard a voice saying, "Get up, Peter. Kill and eat" (v. 13).

Peter replied as any devout Jew would, "Surely not, Lord! I have never eaten anything impure or unclean" (v. 14).

The voice said, "Do not call anything impure that God has made clean" (v. 15). This happened three times for emphasis.

About this time the men sent by Cornelius arrived, and Peter understood that the vision was in reference to their request. Normally a Jew of Peter's standing would not have entered the house of an "unclean" Gentile. But, being prepared by God, Peter went with them and arrived the following day to find a large gathering of people whom Cornelius had called together. "We are all here in the presence of God to listen to everything the Lord has commanded you to tell us," said Cornelius (v. 33).

Peter began, "I now realize how true it is that God does not show favoritism but accepts men from every nation who fear him and do what is right. [This is] the message God sent to the people of Israel, telling the good news of peace through Jesus Christ, who is Lord of all" (vv. 3436). These are the exact same points Paul makes in Romans 10:12: that there is no difference between peoples and that the same Lord, in this case, clearly Jesus, is Lord of all. Peter then went on to explain the gospel, beginning with the appearance of John the Baptist to announce Jesus and continuing with the details of Jesus' life, death, and resurrection. Then he said, "All the prophets testify about him that everyone who believes in him receives forgiveness of sins through his name" (v. 43, emphasis added). Again, this is the exact point Paul makes in Romans 10:13.

As a result of Peter's explanation, Cornelius and the others believed on Jesus as their Savior, the Holy Spirit came on them in a verifiable way, and they were baptized. The results were proof to Peter, as well as to those Jews who came with him, that, as Paul says, "everyone who calls on the name of the Lord will be saved."

Calling on Christ

Those words are from Joel 2:32, of course, as I pointed out earlier. What is so significant about them is that they conclude that great parenthesis in Joel's prophecy that looks ahead to the pouring out of God's Holy Spirit at Pentecost and to the proclamation of the gospel to all peoples that followed the Spirit's coming. As a matter of fact, Peter quoted these exact words at Pentecost, saying, This is what was spoken by the prophet Joel:

> "In the last days, God says,
> I will pour out my Spirit on all people.
> Your sons and daughters will prophesy, your young men will > see visions, your old men will dream dreams.
> Even on my servants, both men and women, I will pour out > my Spirit in those days, and they will prophesy.

I will show wonders in the heavens above and signs on the earth below, blood and fire and billows of smoke.
The sun will be turned to darkness and the moon to blood before the coming of the great and glorious day of the Lord.
And everyone who calls on the name of the Lord will be saved."

Acts 2:16-21, emphasis added; cf. Joel 2:28-32

What does it mean to "call on the name of the Lord"? What did Joel mean, and what were Peter and Paul getting at by quoting him?

The words "call on" are simple words that embrace a great deal of truth. Sometimes they are used of worship. For example, at the beginning of the Bible, we are told of a time when "men began to call on the name of the Lord" (Gen. 4:26). That is, they acknowledged or worshiped him.

Again, there are times when the words seem to refer explicitly to prayer. A clear example is the contest between Elijah and the priests of Baal in which Elijah issued a challenge: "You call on the name of your god, and I will call on the name of the LORD. The god who answers by fire— he is God" (1 Kings 18:24).

A third use of the words is for praise. This is a frequent use in the Psalms, as in Psalm 116:1213:

How can I repay the LORD for all his goodness to me?
I will lift up the cup of salvation and call on the name of the LORD.

That is, "I will praise him."

In the New Testament the words often refer to believing on God or trusting God or Jesus. That is a fourth meaning. For example, in Acts 9 we are told of Paul's attempts to arrest all who "call on [Jesus'] name" (Acts 9:14, 21), that is, the followers of Jesus. The same meaning is present in 1 Corinthians 1:2, where Paul addresses the letter to "all those everywhere who call on the name of our Lord Jesus Christ—their Lord and ours," that is, to those who believe on and are followers of Jesus.

This is what you and I are to do. If you are not a Christian, you have been ignoring the true God.
You have not been praying to him, and you are certainly not trusting him. Now you are challenged to reverse that entirely. You are to worship, pray to, and praise God—as he is revealed in Jesus Christ. Above all, you are to believe on Jesus himself and trust in what he has accomplished on the cross by dying for your sin.

The Bible's promise is that you will be saved if you will do this. That is, you will be saved from your sin and from the wrath of God that hangs over you because of it.

I do not care what your condition up to this point may have been. You may have made a shipwreck of your life and be sinking in the waves like Peter was when he started to walk over the Sea of Galilee to Jesus but then took his eyes off Jesus and looked at the churning sea about him. Peter was about to perish, but he called to Jesus, "Lord, save me!" and we are told that "immediately Jesus reached out his hand and caught him" and so rescued Peter (Matt. 14:28-31).

You may have been fighting Jesus like Paul had been trying to do earlier through his attempts to destroy Christianity. But when God stopped him on the way to Damascus, Paul called on the Lord Jesus Christ and was saved.

Perhaps you have been utterly ignorant of the gospel, like the Philippian jailor. But you have been alerted to your need, and you are calling out now as he did, "What must I do to be saved?" The answer is, "Believe in the Lord Jesus, and you will be saved" (Acts 16:30-31). You need to respond, like the jailor did, and commit yourself to Christ.

But don't put it off. You need to call on Jesus today.

Call on Jesus Now

In the summer of 1991, 1 was in northern Michigan to speak to student leaders of the InterVarsity Christian Fellowship. On the final day of my week there, when I did not have to speak, I drove to Sault Ste. Marie, where the impressive Soo Locks link Lake Superior with Lake Huron. Not far from the locks is a retired Great Lakes freighter, the Valley Camp, now turned into a maritime museum, and inside the Valley Camp are tragic remains of one of the greatest naval disasters of modern times, two badly mangled lifeboats from the S.S. Edmund Fitzgerald. This is her story.

The Edmund Fitzgerald was a Great Lakes freighter nearly a thousand feet long, almost as long as the Empire State Building in New York City is high. She had sailed to Duluth, Minnesota, to pick up iron ore, and now, during the first week of November 1975, she was making her way across Lake Superior to the Soo Locks to bring the ore to the industrial cities of the South. The first day out, a terrible storm moved down out of Canada to the lakes. That is common enough on the Great Lakes in the winter months, but this was a particularly bad storm, with waves reaching twenty-five or thirty feet in height. The captain of a freighter that was following the Edmund Fitzgerald, from whom we have sworn testimony to what happened, was worried.

Somewhere along the way, the Edmund Fitzgerald began to take on water and developed an increasingly strong list to starboard. She sank low in the water. The captain of the other ship kept in radio and radar contact, but the Fitzgerald's captain kept reporting that everything was all right.

The last communication from the doomed freighter was this tragic message: "We are holding our own."

Minutes later the ship headed into a wave that washed over her low-lying decks, and she never came up. In less than ten seconds the Edmund Fitzgerald sank, with the loss of all twenty-seven people aboard. The captain of the ship that was following reported that she simply disappeared from his radar screen. One minute she was there.

The next she was gone forever, the prop that was still turning driving her directly downward until she broke into pieces on the lake bottom.

If you have not called on the Lord Jesus Christ for salvation, your state is like that of the stricken freighter. You are headed into judgment—and who can say how close you may be to the ultimate disaster?

Do not say, "I am holding my own."

Only a fool would say that when he or she is sinking, and you are sinking. Instead, call on the name of the Lord Jesus Christ for salvation. Do so confidently, because, as our text says, "Everyone who calls on the name of the Lord will be saved."

Chapter 150.
A Plea for Missions

Romans 10:14-15

When young William Carey, the acknowledged founder of the modern missionary movement, first applied to his church board to be sent to India, he received a classic reply. "Young man," said one of the older church leaders, "when God chooses to save the heathen of India, he will do so without your help." Fortunately, Carey knew better than that. He knew that when God determines that something is to happen he also determines the means to make it happen, and, in this case, the first step to the evangelization of India was the pioneer work of William Carey. Carey persevered, and the rest, as they say, is history.

No Conversions in a Vacuum

I think of that story as I come to Romans 10:14-15, mainly because of the placing of these verses in Romans. The verses themselves are a stirring plea for missions, one of the most important in the Bible. But much of their force comes from their setting in Paul's argument.

Think of the preceding verse: "Everyone who calls on the name of the Lord will be saved" (v.
13). That is a wonderful statement of the universal application of the gospel. It is for everybody. Anyone who calls on Jesus Christ as Savior will be saved. But how can people do that unless they know about him? And how can they know about Jesus unless someone goes to them to teach them about him? Those are precisely the questions Paul has in mind as he begins this new section, asking: "How, then, can they call on the one they have not believed in? And how can they believe in the one of whom they have not heard? And how can they hear without someone preaching to them? And how can they preach unless they are sent?"

The answer is obvious: A person cannot hear the gospel and believe on Christ unless someone takes the gospel to him or her.

However, not only are these verses related to what has gone before, to verse 13. They are also related to what follows, to verses 16-21. For Paul, in this entire section (Romans 9-11), is dealing with Jewish unbelief, and he is going to show in the latter half of chapter 10 that the unbelief of Israel is not God's fault, since God had sent messengers to the Jewish people. Paul himself was one. He had preached the gospel, and he had done so clearly. If the Jews did not believe, it was not because they could not, since they had both heard and understood the message.

While we are at it, we should note that verses 14 and 15 are also related to the letter as a whole. One commentator on Romans, E. F. Scott, remarks, "This passage might seem to be only a digression, but it is central to the whole Epistle. More plainly than anywhere else Paul here discloses his purpose in writing as he does to the Roman church. He is coming to Rome in order to make it his starting-point for a new mission, and he needs the co-operation of the Christians in the capital."

Says John Murray, "The main point is that the saving relation to Christ involved in calling upon his name is not something that can occur in a vacuum; it occurs only in a context created by proclamation of the gospel on the part of those commissioned to proclaim it."

In these verses Paul proves this point by giving us a series of linked statements, leading from an individual's calling on Christ in faith, backward through the mandatory intervening steps of belief in Christ, hearing Christ and preaching about Christ, to a preacher's being sent to proclaim the Lord Jesus Christ to those who need to hear him. In other words, the text is a classic statement of the need for Christian preaching and for the expanding worldwide missionary enterprise.

The First Necessity: Calling on Christ

The first thing that is necessary if a person is to be saved, as verse 13 has already said, is that he or she "call on" Christ. This verse alone proves the point, which I have already stressed many times in these studies, that saving faith, a faith that saves, is more than mere intellectual assent to certain truths about Jesus.

This is because the statement in verse 13 flatly distinguishes between "believing" (the Greek word is "faith") in Christ and "calling on" Christ for salvation: "How, then, can they call on the one they have not believed in?" Many people know about Christ. A significant number of these also probably believe that he is the Son of God and the world's Savior, as the Bible teaches. But they have never called on him in personal trust, and so they are not Christians. They are not saved. Saving faith, as I have said many times, has three elements: (1) intellectual content or knowledge, (2) personal assent to or agreement with that content, and (3) trust or commitment. The Latin words are: notitia, assensus, and fiducia. In this verse "calling on" Christ means the last of those three elements.

Let me make this personal.

It is not enough for you to sit under the preaching of the Word of God to be a Christian, important as that is. It is not enough for you to know theology or even to be a student of the Bible. I commend all those things to you, but they alone do not make you a Christian. To be a Christian you must call on the Lord Jesus Christ personally, saying, "Lord Jesus Christ, I confess that I am a sinner. I cannot save myself, and I call on you to save me. Help me. Save me from my sin."

If you will do that and really mean it, Jesus will save you. In fact, he already has, because it is his work in you that leads to that confession. But I repeat: Intellectual belief is not enough; you must commit yourself to Jesus as your own personal Lord and Savior to be saved.

The Second Necessity: Belief in Christ

The second step in Paul's linked series of statements is that a person must believe in Christ in order to call upon him. Isn't that interesting? I have just said that mere intellectual belief is not enough. There must be personal trust or commitment to him as Lord and Savior. Yet this does not mean that the other part, intellectual belief or content, is unimportant. On the contrary, it is essential. For how can you call upon one you do not know? How can you ask Jesus to save you from your sin unless you understand and believe that he is the Savior?

Intellectual understanding without commitment is not true faith, but neither is commitment without intellectual understanding. If you must believe on Jesus in order to call on him, then your mind must be engaged in knowing who he is and what he has done for you.

The late Ray Stedman, who was a good friend and former pastor of the Peninsula Bible Church in California, knew Harry A. Ironside when he was pastor of the Moody Church in Chicago. He remembered Ironside describing a visit to Chicago by the flamboyant evangelist Gypsy Smith. Gypsy Smith got his name because he really did have a gypsy background, and he told many fascinating stories about growing up in a gypsy camp. On this occasion the message was made up almost entirely of these stories. At the end of the meeting, Gypsy Smith gave an altar call, and hundreds of people surged forward. Ironside used to say that he wondered what they were coming forward for. "Perhaps," he said, "they wanted to become gypsies."

The point was a good one, since one of the things that sets Christianity off from other world religions is that it deals with objective truth and with the facts of history.

Unless the facts are proclaimed, the message is not Christianity.

Unless the facts are understood and believed, the faith that follows is not true faith, regardless of its intensity.

The Third Necessity: Hearing Christ

The third of Paul's statements is that in order to believe in Christ a person must hear Christ. I repeat the last two words, "hear Christ," because that is what the verse literally says. The New International Version is mistaken when it adds the word "of so the text reads, "believe in the one of whom they have not heard." What it actually says is: "believe in the one whom they have not heard."

The point is that it is Christ himself who speaks to the individual, and that it is hearing him that leads first to belief and then to calling on his name in salvation.

This should not surprise us, of course, because this is exactly what Jesus taught. John 10 is a clear example. In that chapter, Jesus was speaking about himself as "the good shepherd," and he was explaining how his sheep know him and respond to his voice:

The man who enters by the gate is the shepherd of the sheep. The watchman opens the gate for him, and the sheep listen to his voice. He calls his own sheep by name and leads them out. When he has brought out all his own, he goes on ahead of them, and his sheep follow him because they know his voice. But they will never follow a stranger; in fact, they will run away from him because they do not recognize a stranger's voice... I am the good shepherd; I know my sheep and my sheep know me—just as the Father knows me and I know the Father—and I lay down my life for the sheep. I have other sheep that are not of this sheep pen. I must bring them also. They too will listen to my voice, and there shall be one flock and one shepherd.

There is a danger that some will use this emphasis on hearing Christ himself as an excuse for subjectivity. This happens when people say, "God told me so-and-so," and then follow it with something entirely unrelated to Scripture. Or when they say, "The Holy Spirit said..." and then add some personal desire or utterly unbiblical whim. We all know Christians who have used statements like this to justify behavior that is blatantly contrary to the Word of God.

But our passage provides two entirely adequate safeguards, even while stressing the need for us to "hear" Christ personally. The first safeguard is the step that has gone immediately before this, where Paul stressed the need for intellectual content or belief. This has to do with Bible truths and with the facts of Bible history. There is nothing subjective here. On the contrary, this is soundly objective. By linking the facts of the message to hearing Christ, Paul is saying that although Jesus speaks personally and individually to the one he is calling to faith, he does not do so apart from the truths of Scripture. He speaks to us not by leading us away from Scripture, but by leading us to Scripture and by speaking through Scripture. The subjective word is based on the objective revelation.

The second safeguard is found in the step that follows, namely, the "preaching" of God's Word by God's messengers. This means that the "word" of Christ is not whatever you might choose to make it. Rather it is the content of Christian doctrine as taught by qualified and appointed preachers. "The point," says Morris, "is that Christ is present in the preachers; to hear them is to hear him."

Jesus taught this, too, of course. When he sent seventy-two disciples ahead of him to preach in his name and prepare people for his coming, he encouraged them, saying, "He who listens to you listens to me," and "he who rejects you rejects me" (Luke 10:16). It is the same today. When I (or any other minister) stands up to teach the Bible, if I do it rightly, it is not my word you are hearing. It is the Word of God, and the voice you hear in your heart is the voice of Christ. So, if you do not like what I am saying, do not get angry with me. I am only the postman. My job is just to deliver the letters. And when you respond, do not think that you are responding to me. You are responding to Jesus, who is calling you through the appointed channel of sound preaching.

The Fourth Necessity: Preaching Christ

In speaking of this passage's second safeguard against subjectivity in hearing the voice of Christ, I have already moved on to the fourth step in Paul's series of linked statements, which are in the last analysis a great plea for missions. It is that for a person to hear Christ, someone must proclaim Christ to him or her. This is a strong statement for the necessity of preaching.

In his excellent commentary, Leon Morris emphasizes that "hearing" is a reflection of firstcentury life, when few people could read and communication was largely through the spoken word. He suggests that this does not exclude other valid forms of communication today, print media, for instance. That is true enough, of course. The gospel can be taught by qualified and appointed writers—Leon Morris is one—as well as by qualified preachers. But that aside, there is still something special and necessary about verbalized communication, particularly preaching, since it is through such preaching that God most often chooses to make the gospel known.

This was true of apostolic preaching. John Calvin wrote, "By this very statement... he [Paul] has made it clear that the apostolic ministry... by which the message of eternal life is brought to us, is valued equally with the Word."

It is true of preaching today, too, though in a lesser sense. Today's preaching is not valued equally with the Word, but it is through preaching that the Word is most regularly made known and blessed by God to the saving of men and women. J. I. Packer is right on this point when he says, "A true sermon is an act of God, and not a mere performance by man. In real preaching the speaker is the servant of the Word and God speaks and works by the Word through his servant's lips.... The sermon... is God's ordained means of speaking and working.

The divine commission to ministers is a commission to preach and teach, and the accompanying promise is that, if they preach the word faithfully, they will not preach in vain."

The Fifth Necessity: Sending Christ's Messengers

This brings us to the fifth and last step in Paul's linked statements about the way people are brought to call on Jesus Christ for salvation. It is his bottom line. He has indicated that people must believe in Christ before they can call on him. They must hear Christ before they can believe. There must be preachers of the Word if people are to hear Christ. Now he concludes that for Christ to be proclaimed to such people, preachers must be sent to them.

By whom? By God, of course. This is God's work; no one can take it lightly upon himself. It is why Jesus said, "Ask the Lord of the harvest, therefore, to send out workers into his harvest field" (Matt. 9:38). If God does not send the messenger, the message will not be blessed by him, and those who hear will not be saved. As Leon Morris says, "A self-appointed herald is a contradiction in terms."

But it is also true that messengers must be sent by the churches, just as Paul and Barnabas were sent on their missionary journeys by the Gentile church at Antioch (Acts 13:1-3). In fact, one of the objectives Paul had in writing Romans was to enlist the support of the Roman church in his plan to take the gospel beyond Rome to Spain and other places to the west (Rom. 15:23-29). The application for us is that if people today in unreached areas of the world are to hear the gospel and have the opportunity to believe on Jesus Christ, those who know Christ must pool their resources to send God's messengers to them. We must do it. A strong missions program is mandatory for an obedient church.

Four Applications

This has been a five-point study of Paul's text (one point more than was common even for Charles Haddon Spurgeon, the great "four-point" preacher). Five points is a lot to remember. Nevertheless, here are four more quick points in conclusion. Each is a verse of Scripture.

1. Matthew 9:37-38. [Jesus said,] "The harvest is plentiful but the workers are few. Ask the Lord of the harvest, therefore, to send out workers into his harvest field." These are our Lord's own words about praying for Christian missionaries. It is a recognition that God must call and send them. But I ask, "When God calls, will we be prepared to send them, too? Will we give our money to help make the gospel of salvation widely known?"

Let me share some facts with you. According to a recent report by the Foreign Mission Board of the Southern Baptist Convention, the world's population is about 5.3 billion people. Roughly one-third (1.7 billion) are people who would call themselves "Christian." Among the other twothirds, one-third (1.3 billion) have never heard the gospel, and the other two-thirds (2.3 billion) have heard it but are unconverted. The first group, which includes most of the western nations, accounts for 62% of the world's wealth. It spends 97% of that on itself. The remaining 3% is divided between secular charities, which get 1% of its resources, and Christian causes of all kinds, which get 2%.

Of that 2% allotted to Christian causes, 99.9% is spent in our own countries to provide for our own churches and Christian institutions. Of the remaining .1 %, spent for Christian work abroad, .09% is spent on those who have already heard the gospel but are unconverted, and only .01% on the 1.3 billion persons who have never even heard the name of Jesus Christ.

I am sure I do not have to emphasize that this represents a tremendous challenge for Christians who are serious about wanting to take the gospel to the whole world in obedience to the Great Commission.

2. Second Timothy 4:2. "Preach the Word; be prepared in season and out of season; correct, rebuke and encourage—with great patience and careful instruction." If you are a preacher or Bible teacher, even in a small class, do not be distracted from your primary calling by other useful but secondary things. Many things are important, but nothing is as essential as preaching and teaching God's Word. Be faithful to that task.

3. Matthew 28:18-20. [Jesus said,] "All authority in heaven and on earth has been given to me. Therefore go and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, and teaching them to obey everything I have commanded you...."

These are the words of the Great Commission in its best-known form, and they are for all Christians. So I add this reminder: Although not all Christians are called to be preachers or teachers, all are nevertheless called to be agents of Christ's commission. Ask God to give you opportunities to speak to others about Jesus and his death for sinners, and then be sure you actually do it.

4. Second Corinthians 6:2b. "I tell you, now is the time of God's favor, now is the day of salvation." This is for you, if you have not yet responded to the gospel by believing in and calling on Christ. There are billions of people who have never heard the gospel, but you are not one of them. You have heard it. I have been making it clear to you. What you need to do right now is to turn from your sin and call on Christ.

Chapter 151.
God's Beautiful People

Romans 10:15

The kind of work I do does not bring me into contact with the world's beautiful people very often. But I have been with them just enough to know that there really are "beautiful people," and my friends in California, who have far more opportunity to mingle with celebrities than I do, confirm it.

Some years ago a friend of mine from Philadelphia was hosting the then well-known singing star and actor, Pat Boone, and his wife. He called our home to ask if he could bring them by, since they were going to be filming something that evening and needed a place to rest for a few hours in the late afternoon. They were with us from about three in the afternoon until six. Mr. and Mrs. Boone really were beautiful. They had flawless features, perfect skin, immaculate grooming, and were meticulously dressed. They were obviously made (or remade) for the camera. And not only that. They smelled good. They seemed to be unlike other people. They were so perfect that I could only relate them to the poem about Richard Cory, who "glittered when he walked."

We are surrounded by a cult of beauty in our day, of course. Ever since the fall of the human race, people have valued beauty too much, usually neglecting the more important inner beauty of the soul. But at no time in history has physical beauty been at a higher premium than today. Movies and television are largely responsible, since they have created an entertainment-and beauty-directed age.

How different when we turn to our text! Though speaking of beauty, it is clearly speaking of a nonphysical kind of beauty when it says, "How beautiful are the feet of those who bring good news!" (Rom. 10:15).

Inner Beauty and Outer Beauty

A good place to start in trying to understand this text is by admitting that it is not a very attractive statement for most of us, and the reason is clear. We usually look at the outward appearance of things, including people, and we make our judgments on that basis. Moreover, we do not think of feet as beautiful. Regardless of what follows, when the text says, "How beautiful are the feet..." the idea seems quaint at best and probably even a bit repulsive. It becomes even more so when we remember that the feet of an ancient traveler would be dusty and smelly from the unsurfaced and unsanitary roads.

How strange that we think like this. We should know better. One of the things our grandparents used to say to us was: "Beauty is as beauty does." But instead of thinking about actions, we think of beauty in terms of a perfect figure or a flawless face.

About thirty-five years ago, when I was in high school, I met another "beautiful person," Eddie Fisher, one of the singing idols of the fifties. It happened behind the scenes at Radio City Music Hall in New York City. I suppose it was because of that meeting that I have always had more than a usual interest in Eddie Fisher's life and career. He was married to Debbie Reynolds, dumped her to marry Elizabeth Taylor, and then was dumped by Taylor when she had her affair with Richard Burton on the set of the blockbuster movie Cleopatra. That was the way Eddie Fisher's life went, and it was rather sad. Yet I was pleased to read just a year or so ago that in an interview with a reporter, Eddie Fisher summed up his experience of America's cult of beauty by saying rather wisely, "I have learned that a pretty face is just a pretty face." It took him a lifetime to learn it.

What does the Bible say about beauty? You know the answer. In ancient Israel the people favored King Saul because of his large stature and good looks, but God rejected Saul and chose David, explaining, "The LORD does not look at the things man looks at. Man looks at the outward appearance, but the LORD looks at the heart" (1 Sam. 16:7b).

Similarly, the apostle Peter wrote to Christian women, saying, "Your beauty should not come from outward adornment, such as braided hair and the wearing of gold jewelry and fine clothes. Instead, it should be that of your inner self, the unfading beauty of a gentle and quiet spirit, which is of great worth in God's sight. For this is the way the holy women of the past who put their hope in God used to make themselves beautiful..." (1 Peter 3:3-5).

The Beauty of God and God's Works

I do not mean to say by this that beauty is undesirable in itself. The Bible says that God is beautiful. In fact, several chapters before the one in Isaiah from which Paul gets the quotation he uses in Romans 10:15, Isaiah tells the people, "Your eyes will see the king in his beauty" (Isa. 33:17), meaning that they would see God.

This was David's great desire, too:

> One thing I ask of the LORD, this is what I seek:
> that I may dwell in the house of the LORD all the days of my life, > to gaze on the beauty of the Lord and to seek him in his temple.

God's creation is also beautiful, and so are the laws that govern it. In fact, when we conform to those laws, we can end up producing something beautiful ourselves.

There is an illustration of this truth in something Richard Buckminster Fuller (1895-1983), the world-renowned architect and engineer, once said. A student at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology asked Fuller whether he took aesthetic factors into account when he was tackling a technical problem. "No," he replied. "When I am working on a problem, I never think about beauty. I think only of how to solve the problem. But when I have finished, if the solution is not beautiful, I know it is wrong. " I doubt Fuller was thinking of God when he said that, but he was nevertheless unwittingly testifying from his own area of expertise that God, God's laws, and God's creation really are beautiful.

Each of the wives of the patriarchs is said to have been beautiful: Sarah (Gen. 12:11, 14), Rebekah (Gen. 24:16; 26:7), and Rachel (Gen. 29:17).

Job's daughters were beautiful (Job 42:15).

In proportion to its length, the book of the Bible that uses the word beautiful more than any other is Song of Songs. There the husband rightly expresses delight in the beauty of his bride and the bride in the beauty of her husband. This teaches that there is a place for beauty in our lives and a proper appreciation of beauty among Christians.

Yet that is not the whole story. It is true that Sarah, Rebekah, and Rachel were beautiful, but their beauty was a danger that led to the compromising behavior of at least two of their husbands, Abraham and Isaac. Bathsheba was beautiful, but her beauty contributed to the fall of King David. In the Book of Daniel, Nebuchadnezzar is represented by a beautiful tree, but it was cut down (Dan. 4). Proverbs warns that "beauty is fleeting" (Prov. 31:30), and James says that the beauty of the rich and influential person will inevitably "fade away" (James 1:11).

Most significant of all, we remember Isaiah's description of the earthly appearance of Jesus Christ who, he wrote, "had no beauty or majesty to attract us to him, / nothing in his appearance that we should desire him" (Isa. 53:2). If even Jesus Christ was not physically attractive, we should know that beauty is at best a matter of indifference and at times even a snare.

Beauty Is as Beauty Does

All that prepares us to turn back to our text in Romans. For when we are able to get the idea of mere physical beauty out of our heads, at least for a while, we can begin to understand what the text is saying. The first thing we notice is that the kind of beauty we find here is not descriptive beauty but functional beauty. In other words, it is the kind of definition our grandparents were speaking of when they said, "Beauty is as beauty does." They meant that true beauty is measured by gracious acts or by the gracious and faithful performance of one's duties.

The former Surgeon General of the United States, C. Everett Koop, has published a book of memoirs that contains an illustration of what I am talking about. At one point in his book, Koop expresses appreciation for the outstanding nurses he worked with during his days as Surgeon-inChief of the Children's Hospital in Philadelphia. Working with a nurse who knows the way you think and can anticipate your moves and needs is one of the most satisfying things about surgery, according to Koop's testimony. He felt this deeply. So he tells how each Christmas he would hang a long sign over the door to the operating room that said, "Through these portals pass the most beautiful girls in the world." A few years later, when the Intensive Care Unit had developed to a outstanding degree, he did the same thing there. Now there were two signs at Christmas that read: "Through these portals pass the most beautiful girls in the world."

Koop wrote, "The nurses knew I wasn't talking about superficial physical attraction; they knew that I appreciated the beauty of all the things they did to make possible our success in the operating room [and ICU]."

Romans 10:15 is also a functional definition, which means that the beauty it describes is that of someone who is doing something. And that is the second thing to notice: what the beautiful person is doing is bringing the Good News of the gospel to other people.

I said a few paragraphs back that the quotation is taken from Isaiah—Isaiah 52:7 to be exact, though there is a very similar text in Nahum 1:15. In Isaiah's setting, the passage is speaking of consolation for Israel during the years of Babylonian captivity, picturing a runner appearing on the hills to announce the fall of the people's enemies and the triumph of God's king. The image is the same as that of the well-known story of the Greek runner who made his way from the battlefields of Marathon to Athens to announce the Greek victory over the Persians in 490 B.C. The route was generally uphill for a total distance of more than twenty-six miles, and as soon as he arrived in the city and had gasped the word "Victory!" the runner fell dead from his efforts. It was in honor of this welcome messenger that the marathon race was run in ancient Greece and is still run today in many parts of the world.

But, like many Bible texts, there is even more to it than this. For as even the rabbis recognized, the messenger is the herald of the Messiah, which is appropriate since the next chapter (the continuation of the announcement) introduces us to the Suffering Servant of Isaiah 53. The salvation of the people from earthly enemies was undoubtedly good news, but a message of deliverance from sin is greater still. John Murray says, "As the prophecy found its climactic fulfillment in the Messiah himself, so it continues to be exemplified in the messengers whom he has appointed to be his ambassadors (cf. 2 Cor. 5:20)."

Paul is right on target when he says that the messengers of the cross are beautiful. They are beautiful because they are bearers of the gospel, which is the most beautiful message in the world.

The Elephantiasis Convert

Donald Grey Barnhouse, one of my predecessors at Tenth Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, heard a story from a missionary in western Africa that is a moving illustration of what I have been writing. It was about a man who had the disease known as elephantiasis. In this disease the skin becomes thick and hard, and the limbs of the victim become enormously enlarged, much like the leg of an elephant, hence the name elephantiasis. The leg from the knee down to the foot can become as large as twelve to fifteen inches in diameter, and of course it is quite restricting and often painful. I have known at least one American who has this affliction.

But here is the story as Barnhouse tells it:

This poor victim of elephantiasis became a radiant Christian and could do nothing other than tell people of the grace of God which he had shown in sending his Son Jesus Christ to die for them. He lived in an African village and determined that every soul in the village should hear the good news of salvation. It was extremely difficult for him to walk with the monstrous legs which bore him about, but he thought nothing of the pain and toiled on from hut to hut to tell those who dwelt there about the Savior who had come into his life. Each evening he would return to his own hut where he was maintained by the kindness of his relatives. At the end of several months he was able to tell the missionary that he had visited every hut in the village and that he was now starting to take the gospel message to a village that was about two miles away.

Each morning he would start out painfully, walk the two miles to that village, go from hut to hut with the gospel, and return the two miles before sundown to his own hut. Finally, there came the day when he had visited every hut in the neighboring village. His work being done in these two villages, he remained at home for some weeks but began to be more and more restless.

He spoke to the pastor and to the missionary, who was a medical doctor, about a village that lay ten or twelve miles through the jungle, and asked if the gospel were being taken to that village. As a boy, before he had been afflicted, he had traveled the jungle path to that village, and he remembered that it was a large village and that there were many people there, and he knew that they needed the good tidings of the Savior. He was advised not to think of going to that village, but day after day the burden grew upon him. One day his family came to the missionary and said that the man had disappeared before dawn and they had heard him go but supposed that it was but for a moment. He did not return, and the family was concerned about him.

Afterwards, the full story became known. He had started down the path toward the distant village. Step after weary step he dragged his leathery legs and gigantic feet along the path that led to his goal. The people of the village later told how he had come to them when it was already noon; his feet were further swollen, bruised and bleeding. He had been forced to stop and rest again and again, and it was already past mid-day when he came. They offered him food, but before he would eat he began to tell the people about Jesus. Up and down the village he went, even to the very last hut, telling them that the God of all creation was Love and that he had sent his only Son to die that their sins might be removed. He told how the Lord Jesus had been raised from the dead and had come into his heart, bringing such joy and peace.

There was no shelter for him in that village; and even though the sun was low he started on his way down the jungle path toward home. The darkness of Africa is a terrible darkness, and the night can bring forth many creatures from the jungle. The sun went down and the poor man dragged himself along the path in the darkness guided by some insight which kept him from going astray. He told his pastor later that his fear of the night and the animals which might come upon him was more than balanced by the joy that he had in his heart as he realized that he had told a whole village about the Lord Jesus Christ.

Toward midnight the missionary doctor was awakened by a noise on his front porch. He listened, but all seemed still. Somehow he could not go back to sleep, and he went to the door with a light to see what had caused the noise. He recognized at once that the poor neighbor had returned to the village from his long trip, and had come with his wounded and bleeding leg-stumps to the door of the dispensary. The missionary called his helpers and they lifted the man, almost unconscious, and put him on one of the beds in the little hospital. The doctor said that he had seldom seen such a frightful sight as he looked upon those bleeding feet which had come back from such an errand of love and mercy. Unashamedly the doctor told how he had bent over those feet to minister to them, and as he cleaned and dressed them, he told how his own tears had fallen with the ointment upon them. The doctor ended the story by saying, "In all my life I do not know when my heart was more drawn out to another Christian believer. All I could think of was the verse in the Word of God, 'How beautiful are the feet of them that bring glad tidings, that publish peace.'" Here was a man who had been sent by God to tell the story of what Christ had done for him, and although he had to do it at the cost of such personal agony, yet he had not flinched but had gone through to the end to tell needy men the good news of salvation for their souls.

Beautiful Bilney

That is a very moving story, of course, as I said when I introduced it. But it is not unusual. For centuries, ever since the days of Jesus Christ, God's beautiful people have strategized and sacrificed and gone out of their way to bring the gospel to those they know need it.

Do you know how the gospel came to Hugh Latimer (1400-1555), that great bishop who became one of the brightest lights of the Protestant Reformation in England? Hugh Latimer was a "beautiful" man, strikingly good-looking and brilliant. But he did not know Christ, and he was using his learning to oppose the teachings of the Reformers, especially that of Melanchthon, Martin Luther's co-worker and friend. Latimer was at Cambridge at this time, and there was at Cambridge a little monk whose name was Thomas Bilney. No one paid much attention to Bilney. But Bilney had discovered the gospel, and he wanted the great Hugh Latimer to come to Christ, too. "What a tremendous influence he would have, if only he would discover the gospel of God's grace in Christ," Bilney thought.

So he hit on a plan. One day after Latimer had been preaching, Bilney caught his arm as he was coming out of the church and asked if he would hear his confession. That was a prescribed duty of a priest. So Hugh Latimer listened to Bilney, and the little monk who had found Christ "confessed" the gospel, sharing how it had changed his life. Latimer later said that he was converted by Bilney's gospel "confession." As for Latimer, he became a great reformer in England and is best known for his encouragement of Nicholas Ridley as they were being led to the stake in Oxford at the height of the English persecutions in 1555: "Be of good comfort, Master Ridley, and play the man; we shall this day light such a candle by God's grace in England as (I trust) shall never be put out."

Bilney was not a beautiful person as we generally think of beauty. But he was the bearer of the gospel to Hugh Latimer, and that means that he was beautiful in the sight of God, just as are all those are who obeying the Lord Jesus Christ in carrying out the Great Commission.

May I suggest that you start thinking of beauty the way God does. What you think is beautiful now is going to be a thing of the past in just a few short years. Those you think beautiful now will no longer be beautiful in physical terms. But the beauty of the bearers of the gospel will last forever. What is more, they will go on getting more and more beautiful, as they use not only this life but eternity to praise the Lord Jesus Christ more fully.

Beauty really is as beauty does.

I invite you to value others not by their outward appearance, but by their service to Jesus Christ and the gospel. And I invite you to become one of God's beautiful people yourself. Our text tells you how.

Chapter 152.
The Sad Reality of Unbelief

Romans 10:16

Several thousand years ago, there was a man who was chosen to follow a great leader. The leader possessed outstanding religious and moral qualities, and the man I am talking about lived with him and learned from him for three years. He was part of a small group who were privileged to do so. In time this man became disillusioned with his teacher and eventually betrayed him to his enemies when he had an opportunity to profit personally from the betrayal. But then he became disillusioned with himself for what he had done. Disillusionment led to depression, depression to desperation, and desperation to despair. In the end he killed himself by hanging.

That man's name was Judas. His teacher was Jesus Christ.

We All Have "Failures"

In my library at Tenth Presbyterian Church are several dozen books that deal with evangelism, and I have noticed that they rarely speak of failures. They are filled with stories about people who almost always come to faith as a result of the evangelist's testimony. I understand that, of course. Books rightly try to be positive. Americans are success-oriented. Few people like to discuss their failures, but there are failures for all of us, even as there were for Jesus. (At least they are failures from a human point of view, though not from God's perspective.) My point is that we need to understand "failures."

Paul did. God gave Paul great success in his missionary work, enabling him to plant churches throughout much of the ancient world, particularly in Asia Minor and Greece. But Paul was too honest not to describe his failures, too. One of the places he does so is in Romans 10:16, our text.

I remind you that the apostle has been describing the chain by which the gospel comes to an individual, enabling the person to call on Jesus Christ and be saved. It has five parts: (1) the sending of the messenger, (2) the preaching of the gospel by the messenger, (3) hearing the word of Christ as he speaks through the messenger, (4) the listener's believing the message, and (5) the listener's calling on Jesus Christ for salvation. That had happened many times in Paul's missionary journeys. But the apostle is nevertheless aware that it is possible to fulfill the two human parts of that chain—the sending and the preaching—and still have people fail to believe the good news or call on Jesus.

Isn't that the sad reality in this text?

"But not all the Israelites accepted the good news. For Isaiah says, 'Lord, who has believed our message?'" (Rom. 10:16).

It is as if Paul is saying, "I have preached the gospel in many places and to the best of my ability. God has blessed my efforts. But I want you to know—I am the first to admit it—that not all of my work has been successful. Not everyone to whom I have spoken has believed in Jesus Christ and become a Christian."

As the verse stands in most of our Bibles, Paul seems to be speaking about his efforts among Jewish people, and it is true that he is thinking in Romans 9-11 primarily about Jewish unbelief. That is why the New International Version has added the words "the Israelites" to this verse. But they are not in the Greek text, which means that what Paul actually wrote was: "But not all accepted the good news." "All" includes everybody. So what he is acknowledging is that there will always be what we would call failures in our witnessing, regardless of who we may be, where we go, or to whom we may be speaking.

And let me say something else. If Paul is talking about Jews primarily, which the NIV thinks he is doing, then the words "not all" must be what Leon Morris calls "a masterly understatement." Not all? "Hardly any" would be more like it. What is more, those who rejected his message did not merely reject the message. They also rejected Paul, persecuting him so that he was driven from place to place and was often beaten and imprisoned.

When we read the account of Paul's missionary journeys in Acts and his personal description of his sufferings, particularly in the Corinthian letters, we expect that Paul might have become embittered. But the opposite was the case. Instead of making him bitter, the unbelief of his countrymen gave him such great sorrow that he was able to cry out at the beginning of this section of the letter, "I speak the truth in Christ—I am not lying, my conscience confirms it in the Holy Spirit—I have great sorrow and unceasing anguish in my heart. For I could wish that I myself were cursed and cut off from Christ for the sake of my brothers, those of my own race, the people of Israel" (Rom. 9:l-4a).

Unbelief is painful to those who know Jesus Christ, which is why I have titled this chapter "The Sad Reality of Unbelief." Unbelief is sad. But it is still a reality, which we must acknowledge if we are not to become discouraged and utterly ineffective in our witnessing.

A Significant Prophecy

"'Not discouraged,' did you say? How does that follow? I would think that acknowledging failure in advance would be the most discouraging thing one could possibly do," a person might be thinking. Although that might seem to be the case, it does not actually work that way. What really happens will become clear in this study.

The first thing we want to notice is that "failure" from a human point of view is something that all God's servants have experienced. Paul reminds us of this (as well as reminding himself) by quoting from Isaiah 53:1, that well-known opening verse of the equally well-known chapter on the Suffering Servant: "Who has believed our message and to whom has the arm of the LORD been revealed?" It is in the form of a question, but in spite of this, Isaiah seems to be saying that the people refused to believe him. He preached, but his message was rejected, just as were the words of Jeremiah and all the other great prophets.

Yet there is more than that to Paul's choice of Isaiah's testimony to the reality of unbelief. I say this because, if we are only trying to think of Old Testament texts to prove that messengers of the gospel have been rejected throughout history, we can probably find better texts than this ourselves. How about, for example, Elijah's complaint from the desert beyond Beersheba? "The Israelites have rejected your covenant, broken down your altars, and put your prophets to death with the sword. I am the only one left, and now they are trying to kill me too" (1 Kings 19:14b). Or how about the many passages in Jeremiah in which the weeping prophet complains that the people would not hear his message? If we were seeking an Old Testament text to show only that others have also had their message rejected, we could find stronger passages than the one Paul actually uses.

But, of course, Paul knew what he was doing. There are at least three reasons why he quotes this verse and not another.

1. It comes very close to the verse he has just cited about the beauty of those who bring good news. That verse was taken from Isaiah 52:7, and it was positive and encouraging, which was how I treated it in the last study. But Paul was aware that the prophet who spoke such encouraging words about the reception of the messenger who bore good news to Zion also acknowledged just eight verses later that the ultimate message of good news about the work of the Messiah was not and would not be believed. In other words, the verse is a healthy dose of realism.

2. It is the introductory verse to the most important chapter in the Old Testament about the Messiah's suffering. This means there is a link between the unbelief of the hearers and the content or nature of the message. It works two ways. On the one hand, it tells us that the people disbelieved (or would disbelieve) the message. On the other hand, it tells us that the nature of the message was the very reason for their unbelief. It was not the kind of message they wanted.

So what's new? Today, if we preach a message suited to our listeners' wants or felt needs, we can gain a wide hearing. If we tell them that Jesus will give them treasure on earth rather than treasure in heaven, people will line up at the trough. If we tell them that Jesus will make them feel good rather than make them holy, people will clamor for the fix. If we tell them that Jesus died to cure them of their low self-esteem rather than their sins, they will pay for our glass cathedral. Much of the modern church-growth movement is built on exactly such reasoning. And it works! It works well. It builds mega-churches, and it makes the bearers of the "mega-gospel" rich—because it is what sinful people want to hear.

But it is not the gospel. The true gospel is a gospel of a crucified Savior, suffering in our place for our sins. That gospel is repugnant to the natural, unsaved man, and because it is, it will be rejected by him unless God first does a work of grace to turn him from his sin and error to the truth.

3. It is a prophecy about the preaching of the gospel by Christ's messengers. As I ponder this text, I find myself thinking that it is probably for this reason more than any other that Paul quotes it. In other words, Paul is regarding it as a prophecy of his own days and of precisely what he was experiencing. Isaiah had said that not all would believe the message of Christ's sufferings when it was preached, and that was exactly what was happening. This must have been an important encouragement for Paul, because he has already cited Isaiah to make the same point earlier, writing in Romans 9, "Though the number of the Israelites be like the sand by the sea, / only the remnant will be saved" (v. 27, quoting Isa. 10:22). He is returning to the same theme now.

Unbelief is not a welcome or desired response to our teaching, but it helps to know that this is what God has said will happen in many instances.

Four Kinds of Soil

This was Jesus' teaching, too. In Matthew's Gospel the very first parable Jesus tells is on this theme. It was about a farmer who went out to sow seed:

As he was scattering the seed, some fell along the path, and the birds came and ate it up. Some fell on rocky places, where it did not have much soil. It sprang up quickly, because the soil was shallow. But when the sun came up, the plants were scorched, and they withered because they had no root. Other seed fell among thorns, which grew up and choked the plants. Still other seed fell on good soil, where it produced a crop—a hundred, sixty or thirty times what was sown.

Matthew 13:4-8

The disciples did not understand this parable at first, so Jesus explained it to them. The seed that is snatched away by the birds represents the case of those who do not understand the message and from whom Satan comes and snatches away even what they have. The scorched seed represents those who seem to receive the gospel but who are soon turned away by trouble or persecutions. The thorns represent the cares of this world and wealth, for which some barter away their eternal souls. Only a fourth part of the seed lands on good soil, sinks down, grows, and produces a crop.

This is what Jesus had experienced. He was rejected by many. Early in his ministry, most of his supposed disciples turned away. At the end even the Twelve forsook him.

It is also what the early preachers of the gospel experienced, which is why Jesus gave them the story—to prepare them (and us) for what was coming.

Let me be very practical at this point and say that what Isaiah experienced, what Jesus and the early disciples and Paul all experienced, is what you will experience, too—if you are serious about spreading the gospel. You, too, will come up against the sad reality of unbelief.

Think of the kinds of people you will meet who will not believe.

1. Those who are hard. I mean by this those who have been hardened by sin, are addicted to vice, and over whom the devil has a very strong control. God is able to break those bands, of course. But it will often be the case that sin remains strong, and the devil snatches away the message even before it is fully understood or is allowed to do its work.

A few years ago I heard two Christian women talking, and one asked the other, "Why is America in such a declining moral state today?"

Her friend answered, "It is because the people love sin."

I suppose that there are other answers that could be given. But it seemed to me when I heard it that it was a perfectly adequate explanation and possibly the best that could be given. People love sin. And they are hardened by it. The problem with American culture is not that people have not heard the gospel. They have heard it. Most have also understood it. The problem is that they love sin rather than God. They do not want the gospel, because they are aware that to receive it they would have to turn from the vices they dearly love.

If you are in that category, the category of the willful and willing sinner, I grieve for you. Your danger is frightful. Here is a true story from the writings of Harry Ironside. There was a young English woman who had been brought up in a Christian home and had often been pressed to come to Christ. But she chose the way of the world instead. In spite of the pain it caused her father and mother, she chose to run with a wild crowd and repeatedly rejected the appeals made to her. One day she was taken with a serious illness. The doctor did all he was able to do in those days. It did not help, and she was expected to die in a short time.

One night this woman awoke out of a fitful sleep with a frightened expression in her eyes, and she asked excitedly, "Mother, what is Ezekiel 7:8 and 9?" "What do you mean, dear?" her mother asked.

The young woman answered that she had had a dream in which someone seemed to be telling her to read Ezekiel 7:8 and 9. Her mother did not know what those verses were, but she reached for a Bible and began to read them: "I am about to pour out my wrath on you and spend my anger against you; I will judge you according to your conduct and repay you for all your detestable practices. I will not look on you with pity or spare you; I will repay you in accordance with your conduct and the detestable practices among you. Then you will know that it is I the LORD who strikes the blow."

The poor girl sank back onto her pillow with a look of horror on her face, and a few hours later she passed into eternity.

I suppose there are some people who might be able to take that story lightly, especially those who are being hardened by their sin. And I confess that for me it is secondhand. I did not know this family. Still I remind you that even if the story is not true, though I have no reason to doubt it, the verses I just read are in the Bible. It is God himself who has spoken them, and sin will be judged. Sin hardens hearts, and rejected grace only makes judgment more terrible.

2. Those who are shallow. The second kind of person who will not believe the gospel is the shallow person, represented by the rocky soil. There are many today. We are surrounded by shallow people, and we are often shallow ourselves—shallow in our thinking, shallow in our passions, shallow in our aspirations, shallow in our deeds. I think T. S. Eliot hit it on the head when he described our empty culture in "The Hollow Men."

> We are the stuffed men We are the hollow men
> Leaning together
> Headpiece filled with straw. Alas!

Alas, indeed! And that was in 1925, before television! I wonder what Eliot would say now, when television has swept over our culture like a plague, catching everyone in its ever more mindless and ever more embracing web. In Eliot's day, between the two World Wars, people were refusing to think. Today, millions no longer know how to think. If the message is not mindless, flashy, and entertaining, they will not come to hear it. They cannot even think about their souls.

3. Those who are choked by wealth. In Mark 10:17-22, we are told about another of Jesus' "failures." A young man came to him who was spiritually earnest, seeking, and apparently quite moral. Moreover, he came asking the right question: "Good teacher, what must I do to inherit eternal life?" Most of us would have given him a quick presentation of the gospel. But Jesus, who was interested in genuine discipleship rather than in mere numbers of followers, began to probe his understanding of who God is and what God requires of us. Although he reminded the young man of the law, reviewing it with him, the young man imagined he had kept it from his youth. Then Jesus got to the matter that was choking out the new life of the gospel. "One thing you lack," Jesus said. "Go, sell everything you have and give to the poor, and you will have treasure in heaven. Then come, follow me" (v. 21).

The story ends with: "At this the man's face fell. He went away sad, because he had great wealth" (v. 22).

And Jesus was sad, too, because Jesus had loved him. Jesus told the disciples, "How hard it is for the rich to enter the kingdom of God!" (v. 23).

I know many people who are being kept from genuine discipleship because of wealth, and it is not always a case of their having it. In some cases they are merely trying to get it. Their minds are on the high salaries, the company bonuses, and on what those benefits will allow them to do and buy. And for this they perish! Like Esau, they are selling their souls for a bowl of stew. How different are Jesus' teachings! Jesus said, "If anyone would come after me, he must deny himself and take up his cross and follow me.... What good will it be for a man if he gains the whole world, yet forfeits his soul?" (Matt. 16:24, 26).

Not Many Perhaps, But Some

But I cannot leave you on this note. The reason is that we have not yet exhausted Paul's statement nor the answer to Isaiah's provocative question.

"Not all... accepted the good news," Paul writes. No, but some did and some will. In the very next chapter, after he has explored the subject of Israel's unbelief a bit further, Paul will insist that heat least had believed the gospel and that God has always had a remnant of those who have refused to bow to Baal.

"Lord, who has believed our message?" asks Isaiah. Not many, true. But "not many" is not "no one." Though sparse of results at times, preaching has always been blessed by God to save some. It is not because of anything in them, of course, but because of the power of God in the gospel, which is what we will be talking about in the next study.

In the meantime, let's get on with the task. You are not responsible for the results. God alone is responsible for that. But you are responsible for obeying the Lord Jesus Christ in taking the message to others. And if you cannot explain the gospel well—bring them to someone who can. Bring them to where the Bible is taught and Christian theology is explained without compromise. And pray for them. The Bible says, "The prayer of a righteous man [or woman] is powerful and effective" (James 5:16b).

If you are one of the unbelieving ones—unbelieving because of your hard, shallow, or choked heart—know that you do not have to remain in your unbelief, however hard or shallow or entangled you may be. Turn from your sin and call on Jesus Christ now.

Someone has said, "On the great clock of time there is only one word: NOW." It is a throwaway statement, but it is true. Now is the time to pass from the sad reality of unbelief to the joyous reality of faith in the Lord Jesus Christ as your Savior.

Chapter 153.

The Bible's Power to Change Lives

Romans 10:17

During the decade I spent as chairman of the International Council on Biblical Inerrancy (19781988), I listened to many sermons on the Bible, as well as preaching quite a few myself. But the best I heard was by Dr. W. A. Criswell, pastor of the First Baptist Church of Dallas. He gave it at ICBI's first "Summit Meeting" in Chicago in the fall of 1978.

At the time, Criswell had been pastor of the First Baptist Church of Dallas for over thirty-five years. He had been in the ministry for more than fifty years, and he had been chosen to address this amazing gathering of 350 pastors, scholars, and leaders of the major para-church organizations on the subject "What Happens When I Preach the Bible as Literally True?" His answer was a tour de force, as he explained what had happened to himself, what had happened to his church, and what he believes happens to God when God's Word is thus used and honored.

About a year after Criswell had gone to the Dallas church, he announced to his already wellestablished congregation that he was going to preach through the Bible, beginning with Genesis and going right on to the last benedictory prayer in Revelation. "You never heard such lugubrious prognostications," he reported. People said it would kill the church. "Nobody will come to hear someone preach about Habakkuk, Haggai, and Nahum. Most people don't even know who those biblical books or characters are," they said. Criswell did it all the same, however. Much to everyone's astonishment, the problem that developed was not the demise of the church, but where to put all the people who were pressing in weekly to hear such biblical preaching. There were thousands of conversions, and today the First Baptist Church of Dallas is one of the largest, most effective, and most biblically sound churches in the entire country.

Scoffers abound. Critics multiply. But the lesson of history is the unique power of the Bible to change people's lives and build churches.

Hearing What?

This is what Paul is getting at in the verse to which we have come in our study of Romans 10, though there is some question among commentators about how it should be fitted in. Is it a digression? It could be, since Paul has spoken about unbelief in verse 16 and is going to deal with the unbelief of Israel explicitly in verses 18-21. Is it a throwback to what he has already said in verses 13-15? In my judgment, as well as in the judgment of a number of other commentators, the verse is best understood as a succinct summary of what has gone before.

I say "succinct" because the sentence as Paul wrote it has no verbs. The New International Version has added two verbs to make the passage flow better for English readers, "comes" and "is heard." But what Paul actually wrote was: "So, then, faith by hearing, and hearing through the word of Christ." The very tone sounds like a summary of verse 14: "How, then, can they call on the one they have not believed in? And how can they believe in the one of whom they have not heard? And how can they hear without someone preaching to them?"

In our text the idea of "hearing" occurs two times: "faith by hearing and "heard through the word of Christ." It makes us ask: "Hearing what?" There are two answers to that question.

1. The gospel. The first and most obvious answer is the message of the gospel, that is, the biblical message of salvation from sin through the work of Jesus Christ, as that message is preached by Christ's ambassadors. This is what Paul has been writing about in verses 14 and 15, showing that: (1) for people to call on Christ for salvation, they must first believe in Christ; (2) for them to believe in Christ, they must first hear about Christ (or, "hear him," as I said in an earlier study); (3) for them to hear Christ, someone must preach Christ to them; and (4) for someone to preach Christ to them, the messenger must first be sent. Everything Paul says in this section has to do with preaching the gospel. In fact, he will be thinking along these lines in the next verses, too, for his point there will be that his countrymen have had the gospel preached to them and are therefore without excuse in regard to their unbelief.

If we look at the matter in a broader context, we can even say that this is what the entire letter to the Romans is about. It is the gospel. It tells us that when we were hopelessly lost in sin and under the threat of God's judgment, God acted to save us through the work of Christ. He sent Jesus to die for us, taking the punishment of our sins to himself, so that the love of God might go out to save the sinner. What is more, the salvation thus achieved is not only a salvation from the punishment due us for our sins. It is also salvation from the power of sin in our lives and eventually even from the presence of sin. It ends with glorification (Rom. 8:29-30).

This gospel is a glorious message, one the world very much needs to hear. It is why Paul calls it "the good news" in verse 16.

2. Christ himself. The large majority of commentators take the phrase "through the word of Christ" as an objective genitive, meaning that the word is the word about Christ or that he is the content of the message. That is a true statement, of course. It is what I have just been saying about the gospel. However, I am convinced that here, rather than being an objective genitive, the phrase "through the word of Christ" is actually a subjective genitive, which means that Jesus is understood to be speaking the gospel message or "word."

I have two reasons for believing this. First, this is the way the word of Christ was referred to in verse 14. In the earlier discussion of that verse I pointed out that the proper translation is not "the one of whom they have not heard," as the New International Version has it, but "the one whom they have not heard." The point I made there is that Jesus speaks through his messengers, so that those who hear the messenger to the extent of believing on Christ and calling on Christ for salvation have actually heard Jesus as he has spoken his truth to them and called them to faith. Jesus said that this is what he would do (see John 10:3-5, 16).

Since this is what "hearing Christ" meant in verse 14, it is right to see that earlier meaning in this verse too.

Second, if verse 17 only means "the word about Christ," the two parts of the verse are redundant, because this is what the "message" of the first part of the verse means. It would reduce to: "Faith comes from hearing the gospel, and the gospel that is heard is the gospel."

On the other hand, if "hearing Christ" is the meaning, an important truth is added. To paraphrase this a bit, the proper meaning of verse 17 would be: "Faith comes from hearing the gospel preached, and the reason faith comes from hearing the gospel preached is that Jesus himself, the object of the gospel as well as its subject, speaks through the messenger to call the listening one to faith."

Word and Spirit

This is a very important point, as I said. In fact, it was the chief discovery the Reformers made so far as the nature and function of the written Word of God is concerned. The way they talked about it was to stress the mutual working together of the Word of God (the Bible), on the one hand, and the Holy Spirit of God (the Spirit of Christ), on the other.

Martin Luther, John Calvin, and others had a very strong faith in the work of the Holy Spirit to convert, teach, and lead people. They knew verses like John 3:8 ("The wind blows wherever it pleases. You hear its sound, but you cannot tell where it comes from or where it is going. So it is with everyone born of the Spirit"); 1 John 5:6 ("... And it is the Spirit who testifies, because the Spirit is the truth"); and 1 Corinthians 2:12-14 ("We have not received the spirit of the world but the Spirit who is from God, that we may understand what God has freely given us. This is what we speak, not in words taught us by human wisdom but in words taught by the Spirit, expressing spiritual truths in spiritual words. The man without the Spirit does not accept the things that come from the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness to him, and he cannot understand them, because they are spiritually discerned").

But when the Reformers thought about these verses and others that stress the work of the Holy Spirit, they also remembered verses that taught the importance of the Bible in knowing the mind and will of God. They understood rightly that God speaks only through the written Word.

Without the Holy Spirit, the Bible is a dead book. That is why the man "without the Spirit" cannot understand it. But, on the other hand, without the Word as an objective guide from God, claims to a special leading by the Holy Spirit run to excess, error, or mere foolishness. Knowing the importance of both, the Reformers preached the Word in the power of the Holy Spirit, and the transformation of Europe and the western world was the result.

Let me put the Reformers' doctrine back into the terminology of our text by saying: When the Bible is preached, Christ speaks. Isn't that what the verse says? And when Jesus speaks, his voice brings life out of death and his sheep awake from their spiritually lost condition and follow him.

In the sermon I referred to earlier, W. A. Criswell said, "No word spoken for God ever falls to the ground. Somehow, some way, in areas of life that we don't understand and don't know, God blesses it in his good purpose, in his electing choice, and in his heavenly time. That is the basis on which I have tried to build, with God's help, the congregation you call the First Baptist Church of Dallas."

Let me say it again. The reason the Bible is powerful is that it is not the mere words of men, however insightful they may be, or even (do not misunderstand me here) the unique and inerrant Word of God, as important as that is. It is because God speaks to people through the Bible by the Spirit of Christ, and because that Word is life-giving and life-transforming.

"The Book That Set My People Free"

Maybe you are thinking that the Bible only works like that in America or in southern Bible Belt areas of the country, like Texas. If so, let me take you half a world away and tell you the story of Rochunga Pudaite, an Indian national from the people known as the Hmars. He tells his story in a volume titled The Book That Set My People Free.

The Hmars were at one time one of the most feared tribes in India. They had descended from Mongols who had come from central China, crossed the lower Himalayas, and settled in northeast India. They were headhunters, and when they fought they took heads that they hung over the doors of their bamboo huts. The British, who ruled India in those days, called them "barbaric tribesmen" and said they were almost like animals. When the British tried to enter the Hmar territory, the Hmars fought back. On one occasion they took five hundred heads in just one raid on a tea plantation. The soldiers pursued them. A few Hmars were killed, but most escaped back into the jungle, which is where they were when a Welsh missionary by the name of Watkin Roberts brought the Bible to their tribe.

Roberts was a chemist who had been converted during one of the great Welsh revivals of the last century, and when he read an account of the pursuit of the Hmar headhunters by British soldiers, he felt that God wanted him to take the Bible to them.

When Roberts arrived at the border of the Hmar territory in India, the British authorities would not let him proceed, declaring the area much too dangerous. So Roberts did the next best thing. He found some Lushais from a tribe adjoining the Hmars and began to translate the Bible into their related language. When he received a small gift for the work from a lady in England, he printed a few hundred copies of the Gospel of John and sent a copy to each of the tribal villages.

One of these copies came to the village in which Pudaite's father was living. A Lushai tribesman happened to be there and read the book to him. Pudaite's father could not understand what it meant to be "born again," and the neighbor could not explain it to him. He suggested that the chief invite the translator to the village.

When Roberts asked the British agent for permission to go, he was told not to enter the Hmar territory. "When I go in there, I take along a hundred soldiers for protection, and I can't spare a single soldier for you," said the agent. Roberts showed him the tribal chief's invitation but was told it was deceptive. "They only want to chop your head off," he said. Roberts went anyway and was able to explain the gospel to the people. After a week of teaching, the chief and four Hmar men announced that they wanted to make peace with the God of the Bible by believing on Jesus Christ. One of the four men was Pudaite's father.

This man, whose name was Chawanga, became one of the first Hmar preachers. He traveled all over the territory, teaching the Bible, leading people to Christ, and founding churches. These early Hmar preachers founded churches in almost every village. Many people came to Christ. They were tired of their fighting, drinking, and fear. When they became Christians they began living different lives. They began to work harder and built schools for their children.

Strangely enough, the British branded Watkin Roberts a troublemaker for his part in this tribal transformation and ordered him to leave. As a result, he left only a part of the Bible in the Lushai language.

The Hmars chose Rochunga Pudaite to do the Hmar translation. Although none of them had ever been out of their own area of northeast India, they sent Pudaite to a mission school and then to a college in India. The missionary worked with others to see that Pudaite was able to continue his education in Scotland and then in America. Pudaite did the translation and later became the new head of the mission Watkin Roberts had founded, the Indo-Burma Pioneer Mission, which later changed its name to the Partnership Mission.

Today, reports Pudaite:

The Hmars... have become one of the most advanced ethnic groups in all India. At least ninetyfive percent are Christians, worshiping in over 200 churches. Except for Mr. [Roberts], the only missionary they have had is the Bible.

Hmar population is now up to about 125,000. Eighty-five percent can read and write, a phenomenal percentage in India [and a higher percentage than the citizens of Philadelphia]. They have eighty-eight church-sponsored elementary schools, seven junior highs, and four high schools—one with an enrollment of about a thousand. They even have a good hospital, staffed by Hmar doctors and nurses.

One of our Hmars holds the rank of ambassador in the Indian Embassy in Yugoslavia. Another is the Indian charge d'affaires in Saudi Arabia. Another is the highest ranking civil servant in India. Another is the administrator of a large state. Every year the government gives tests to select the outstanding young men for government service. Only about twenty are selected in the whole country. For several years one or two Hmars have been in each group of winners. And there is only one Hmar for every 7,000 people in India.

The Hmars have also begun taking the gospel to other tribes, starting hundreds of churches in other territories. They have taken food to tribes that were starving. As for Rochunga Pudaite, he is now head of an organization called Bibles for the World, which has already mailed millions of Bibles to postal addresses in scores of countries and has a vision for mailing in this decade at least one billion Bibles to the more than one billion telephone addresses worldwide.

Pudaite says, "The Bible is the Book that reveals the mind of God, the heart of man, the way of salvation, and the blessedness of believers. It is the Book that tells us where we come from and where we are going. It is the Book that set my people free."

Faith by Hearing

I conclude with two important applications. The first is for believers. The second is for those who have not yet called on Christ.

First, if people can only be converted by hearing the gospel message, which is what Paul says, then believers must make sure they hear it. It is our responsibility to take the gospel to them and to send others to places where we cannot go ourselves. Do not suppose that what you can do is unimportant or that God is going to save people without human messengers, by a direct word from heaven, for example. All who are saved are saved because Christians have done something to bring the gospel to them.

If you object that you were saved while sitting alone in your room, remember that it was by believing the message of the Bible that some Christian communicated to you somehow. It may have been by the direct word of a father or mother, an uncle or grandmother. It may have been years ago, when you were a child. It may have been more recently. But somehow, some Christian brought you the message about Jesus. Perhaps you did not have exposure to Christian teaching in your family. Perhaps you were converted in a distant city in a lonely hotel room through reading a Gideon Bible. Remember that somebody bought that Bible and somebody else put it there. If you were saved by a tract, some Christian wrote it, others published it, and still others arranged for it to get into your hands. It is the same if you have heard the gospel on the radio or on television or through a book.

The Bible says, "Faith comes from hearing the message, and the message is heard through the word of Christ." That is the way the salvation came to you. It is also the way it must go from you to others.

Second, a word for those who are not yet Christians. If you are not yet a believer in Jesus Christ, you need to understand that our text is true and very accurate when it says that, "faith comes from hearing the message." How do people become believers? It is by hearing the message. And why is that so? It is because the Lord Jesus Christ himself speaks to them through the preacher to call them to faith.

So take advantage of the teaching. Listen to it. Find a faithful pastor who is teaching the Word of God Sunday by Sunday from his pulpit, and learn from him. Open your heart to the words that are being taught. One commentator wrote, "If you will open your heart now, and willingly pay attention to the good news that God has nothing against you, that he loves you, that he sent the Lord Jesus Christ to die for you, that Christ did die for you personally, and that he was buried, and that God raised him from the dead on the third day as the guarantee of your salvation—if you will open your heart to this, you will find faith coming to you."

"Faith comes from hearing." God has planned it that way. The message is being taught. Your part is to open your ears to that truth, trusting that, as you do, God will make the message true for you and that you will find yourself calling on the Lord Jesus Christ to be your Savior.

Excuses

Romans 10:18-20

We are coming to the end of Romans 10. There will only be one more study of this chapter, a study of verse 21 titled "The Outstretched Hands of God." So this is a good point to look back over chapters 9 and 10 to see where Paul's argument has brought us and where we are going.

I pointed out in the introductory study of this third major division of Paul's letter (chaps. 9-11) that Paul is dealing with the meaning of history in these chapters. He is asking in a general way, "Where is history going? What is God doing" in history as time goes by and one historical age succeeds another?" He is also asking, "What is God doing with Israel?"—an important question since the Bible concerns Israel so much. Specifically, Paul is asking, "Have God's purposes in regard to Israel failed?" This seems to be the case, because very few Jews had responded to the gospel.

If you remember that introductory study, you may recall that I outlined chapters 9 through 11 by seven answers Paul gives to that last question. He tells us that God has not failed, because:

1. All whom God has elected to salvation are or will be saved (9:6-24).

2. God had previously revealed that not all Israel would be saved and that some Gentiles would be (9:25-29).
3. The failure of the Jews to believe was their own fault, not God's (9:30-10:21).
4. Some Jews (Paul himself was an example) have believed and have been saved (11:1).
5. It has always been the case that not all Jews but only a remnant has been saved (11:2-10).
6. The salvation of the Gentiles, which is now occurring, is meant to arouse Israel to envy and thus be the means of saving some of them (11:11-24).
7. In the end all Israel will be saved, and thus God will fulfill his promises to Israel nationally (11:25-32).

The entire tenth chapter has developed the third of those seven reasons, which means that we are coming to the end of the argument that the failure of the Jews to believe is not God's fault.

"Keep It Simple, Paul"

But maybe it isn't the Jews' fault either! Have we considered that? This seems to be the question Paul answers in these closing verses. I suppose it came about somewhat like this.

We may imagine Paul teaching these things on some occasion, expounding the details of election, reprobation, free will, human responsibility, grace, and the ways in which the gospel comes to those who need it. But when he pauses for a moment, someone raises his hand and asks a question. "That is all very interesting," this person says. "But is it really necessary to go into all that intricate explanation about words most of us can't even pronounce and can't define? Why do you have to justify the ways of God in that manner? Isn't it just simpler to say that Jews failed to believe because they just haven't heard the gospel? Or, if they have heard it, perhaps they just haven't understood it. You theologians are always making things too complicated."

If something like that happened during one of Paul's teaching sessions—and it probably did happen, not once but scores of times—we can imagine the apostle answering exactly as he does in these verses.

"It might be nice if we could make excuses like that," Paul might have said, "but unfortunately we can't. The Jews have heard the message, just as the Gentiles are now also hearing it. The Bible says, 'Their voice [that is, the voice of the gospel messengers] has gone out into all the earth, their words to the ends of the world.' What is more, the Jews have also understood it. This is proved by Moses, who quoted God as saying, I will make you envious by those who are not a nation; I will make you angry by a nation that has no understanding,' and by Isaiah, who told us that God says, 'I was found by those who did not seek me; I revealed myself to those who did not ask for me.'"

The bottom line of Paul's answer is that we cannot blame God for our lack of faith or even for a lack of understanding.

The First "Excuse": They Didn't Hear

Let's look at each of these excuses carefully, especially since they touch on our situation as well as Israel's. The first excuse is that the Jews were not responsible for their unbelief for the reason that they had not heard the message. Paul's answer is that they *hav*e heard it. He establishes this truth by quoting Psalm 19:4.

There are two problems with this proof. If Paul had merely said, "The Jews have heard the gospel, because I have preached it to them, and so have the other apostles," there would be no problem at all. It would be his testimony. But instead of appealing to what he had done, he quotes from Psalm 19. And as soon as we turn to that psalm, we find that the text deals not with preaching the gospel but with what theologians call the general revelation. It concerns the revelation of God in nature.

Psalm 19 is in two parts. The second part is about the Bible, telling us that the law of God is perfect, trustworthy, right, radiant, pure, and so forth. The first part is about God's creation. It begins,

> The heavens declare the glory of God; the skies > proclaim the work of his hands.

It is of this natural or general revelation that the verse Paul quotes was written: "There is no speech or language where their voice is not heard" (v. 3). That is, the existence of God is declared by what he has made. It is the point Paul himself developed in Romans 1. This natural revelation is of such quality and extent that all are guilty for their failure to acknowledge God, seek him out, and worship him.

The problem is that this general revelation is not the gospel, and it is the gospel that Paul is talking about in Romans 10.

How are we to explain this?

One way is to say that Paul is talking about the general revelation. This was the view of no less weighty a commentator than John Calvin, who held in addition that Paul was writing of the proclamation of the gospel to the Gentiles: "The argument is this—from the very beginning of the world God has displayed his divinity to the Gentiles by the testimony of his creation, if not by the preaching of men." However, despite Calvin's reputation and proven skill as an expositor, most interpreters reject this view, judging, rightly in my opinion, that the passage as a whole is about Jews, rather than Gentiles, and about the Christian gospel of salvation through faith in Jesus Christ, rather than about the general revelation.

A second approach to the problem is to assume that Paul merely borrows the words of Psalm 19 to make his point, but without intending to say that this is what the psalm teaches. Charles Hodge takes this view: "He simply uses scriptural language to express his own ideas, as is done involuntarily almost by every preacher in every sermon." This is a possibility, since Paul does not introduce the quotation by words like "Moses says," "God says" or "the Scripture says." On the other hand, as Leon Morris notes, he does quote the verse exactly, word for word, which suggests that he really is appealing to the specific Old Testament passage for support.

It is probably the case—most writers take this approach—that Paul sees a connection between the first and second parts of Psalm 19, between the general revelation and the specific revelation, and that he does so rightly. In other words, he understands that the two forms of revelation are complementary and that what is said of one can generally be said of the other. Thus, when Psalm 19 insists in its first part, that the revelation of God in nature is continuous ("day after day" and "night after night," v. 2), abundant ("they pour forth speech," v. 2) and universal ("there is no speech or language where their voice is not heard," v. 3), this should be understood of the specific revelation, too. The revelation provided in the Bible is also continuous, abundant, and universal, and what is said of the Bible should be said of the preaching of the Bible's message by the Christian preachers.

John Murray takes this view, arguing, "Since the gospel proclamation is now to all without distinction, it is proper to see the parallel between the universality of general revelation and the universalism of the gospel. The former is the pattern now followed in the sounding forth of the gospel to the uttermost parts of the earth."

The second problem with this quotation follows from what has been said. If Paul means, as I take him to mean, that the gospel has been proclaimed to everyone, just as the general revelation is made known to all persons everywhere, how can we believe him? Had all people everywhere really heard the gospel? In Paul's day? In ours? Had even every Jew? The obvious answer to this puzzle is that Paul is speaking representatively, as he does in other places, for example, in Colossians 1:23: "... This is the gospel that you heard and that has been proclaimed to every creature under heaven, and of which I, Paul, have become a servant." He does not mean that every creature on earth at that time had literally heard the gospel, but that the gospel had been so widely proclaimed that all types of people—Gentiles as well as Jews, slaves as well as free men—heard it.

Let me say, then, that if this was true in Paul's day, when the gospel was just beginning to be proclaimed throughout the world, it is certainly far more true today. Sometimes we emphasize the roughly one and a half billion people who have not even heard of Christ. It is right that we do. But how about the three and a half billion who have? How about you?

I have traveled over a fairly large portion of the world, and I can testify, as many others also can, that there are Christians nearly everywhere on earth and that Christian churches flourish in nearly every country. There are exceptions, of course. But nearly everywhere you go there is a Christian witness, so that we can say, as Paul does, "Their voice [that is, the voice of the messengers] has gone out into all the earth, their words to the ends of the world." And today, not only have the messengers gone forth, but their voice has gone forth, too, by radio and through the printed word. In some countries, such as the United States, the gospel is proclaimed literally around the clock by radio.

So we cannot object, as this imaginary listener to Paul's teaching might be supposed to object: "But isn't it the case that they have simply not heard?" That is not a way of getting off the hook for most people. The message has been made known, and they have heard it—so they are without excuse. You are without excuse, too, if you have refused to come to Jesus Christ as your rightful Lord and Savior.

The Second "Excuse": They Didn't Understand

Yet the human mind and heart are quite subtle. "True," our imaginary questioner might say, "the Jews as a whole have heard and been acquainted with the gospel. But isn't it true that the problem might lie in another area, not that they have not heard but that they have not understood the message when it has been made known. Wouldn't that explain their unbelief?"

Paul's answer is another quotation, in fact several. He quotes from Deuteronomy 32:21 and Isaiah 65:1 (and, at the very end, from Isaiah 65:2, which we will come to in the next study).

> I will make you envious by those who are > not a nation; I will make you angry by a > nation that has no understanding.
> I was found by those who did not seek me;
> I revealed myself to those who did not ask for me.

This is generally taken to mean: Didn't the Jews understand that the gospel was to be preached to the Gentiles? They did because the Old Testament (Moses, Isaiah, and other Old Testament writers) prophesied it. I do not agree with this. I think Paul means: Didn't the Jews understand the gospel? They did, because they were provoked to jealousy when the Gentiles, upon whom they had often looked disparagingly, believed it.

Do you see how this works? If Paul's countrymen did not understand the gospel of salvation by grace through the work of Christ—if it was utter foolishness to them—why would they have had such an emotional reaction when it was proclaimed among the Gentiles? It would have been just another example of Gentile foolishness in religious matters. "Who cares what the Gentiles believe?" they would say. "Let them believe anything they like, as long as we have our Judaism, which, as we know, is superior in every way."

But that was not the reaction Paul was seeing. Instead of detached indifference and smug superiority, there was jealousy and anger on the Jews' part. This indicated that they understood very well what was happening. They knew that the message being received by the Gentiles was a message of salvation by the grace of God apart from keeping the law and that it was being taught not as a contradiction of Judaism, but as a fulfillment of it. That is what made it so offensive.

That, and the fact that Christianity was being received by Gentiles of all people, these "nopeople," these ignorant and irresponsible people. For that is what the verses from Deuteronomy and Isaiah say about them.

Think how offensive each of these items would be, if you considered yourself to be among the privileged people of God, as the Jews did.

1. "Those who are not a nation. "This does not mean that the Gentiles were not organized into nations. They obviously were. It means that they were not a special people in the sight of God, as the Jews were. The Jews were the nation among whom God had worked exclusively for thousands of years, from the time of Abraham right up to the time of Jesus Christ. Now suddenly, if Christianity were true, their privileged position was being taken away and these "nopeople" were replacing them.

2. Those who have "no understanding. "This was literally true. The Gentiles, for all their vaunted philosophy and secular learning, were ignorant pagans spiritually. They understood nothing about the true God. They did not have the law. They did not know God's ways. So their ways ran to gross pagan vice and depravity. Paul described the Jews' superior self-awareness accurately in Romans 2, when he wrote, "You rely on the law and brag about your relationship to God.... You know his will and approve what is superior" (vv. 17-18). How offensive, then, to have the gospel received by the ignorant Gentiles.

3. Those who "did not seek" God. The Jews did seek God. This is how they would have described their religious life and quest. They sought him by trying to obey his revealed law and by keeping his ordinances. The Gentiles did not do any of this. They were happy-go-lucky pagans. Yet they were finding God in spite of themselves, if Christianity were true. You do not have to exercise your mind a great deal to appreciate how this must have worked on Paul's Jewish countrymen and turned them into angry, jealous, and offended opponents of Paul and the early preaching. Pilate they abhorred, but they could live with Pilate. They could endure the Roman occupation, just as they could endure their own corrupt and cynical politicians. But they could not endure Christianity.

Paul was quite right in saying that their anger toward the Gentiles showed that they understood the nature of the gospel very well.

Offended by God's Grace

So do people today understand the gospel, and they oppose it for exactly the same reason. Why do people hate Christianity? Why do they find themselves unable to be utterly indifferent to it? It is because of grace. Grace means that God saves the undeserving. Grace saves "nobodies," those who are "no people" in the judgment of those who are important. Grace saves the ignorant. Grace saves those who are not even seeking God, reaching out to confront them in their lost state and turn them from what is destroying them to the glories of salvation through Jesus Christ.

How the natural man hates that!

If God would only take note of who we are, if he would only pay court to our superior and advanced intelligence, if he would only at least credit us with trying—if he would do that, why, then, we would welcome the gospel and embrace him openly and enthusiastically. Instead, he insists that we come with no claims upon his favor at all. He insists that we accept his judgment when he says of us,

> There is no one righteous, not even one; there is no one who understands, no one who seeks after God.
> All have turned away, they have together become worthless; there is no one who does good,
> not even one.
> Romans 3:10-12

What is our problem? Is it that we have not heard the gospel? No, we have heard it—"Their voice has gone out into all the earth, their words to the ends of the world." Is it that we have not understood the gospel? No, we have understood it all too well. That is why we are angry with those who have received it, and with God, who refuses to play by our rules and take note of our accomplishments.

Our problem is not that we have misunderstood grace. It is that we have rejected grace. It is because we will not bow our stiff, disobedient, and obstinate necks to God's gospel.

Yet there are those who do. Some are Jews, like the apostle Paul himself. He was a stiff-necked, self-righteous, angry Pharisee at one time. He was trying to stamp out Christianity. But God reached down to him in his sin, showing him how hard and sinful he really was and how desperately he needed a Savior. When Paul finally abandoned his self-righteousness and came to God as he was freely offered in Christ, Paul discovered grace and became the greatest champion of grace the world has yet seen. His letter to the Romans is a lasting testimony to his transformation.

There are also others, not great Pharisees like Paul but merely people who have been a "nopeople" up to now, people without any special spiritual understanding, people who have not really been seeking after God, people like you and me. We have found God, too. And the reason is the same: grace. It is because God was pleased to save us. There is no other reason. God has chosen "the foolish things of the world to shame the wise... the weak things of the world to shame the strong... the lowly things of this world and the despised things—and the things that are not—to nullify the things that are, so that no one may boast before him" (1 Cor. 1:27-29).

If you are making excuses, you are boasting still. Abandon your boasting. Forget your excuses, and come to the one who loved you and died for you in spite of them.

Chapter 155.
The Outstretched Hands of God

Romans 10:21

If we ever need proof that God's ways are not our ways and his thoughts are not our thoughts, we should turn to the ninth and tenth chapters of Romans. Romans 9 is about election, predestination, and reprobation. Romans 10 is about human responsibility.

Many people see these as hopelessly irreconcilable doctrines, supposing that if God elects to salvation, we cannot be responsible for rejecting the offer of salvation or, if we are responsible, salvation must be by works and not by God's grace. This was the argument of Pelagius in the days of Saint Augustine. Augustine answered, showing that these are not irreconcilable doctrines. Predestination and personal responsibility are two mutually supportive truths that need always to be held together, as Paul clearly does in Romans. When we do understand them, we see not only that they must be held together, but that the first is actually the solution to the second.

The progression is like this: first, human responsibility; second, the perverse exercise of human responsibility in rejecting God; and third, salvation by God's sovereign grace. Predestination could be described as "God's secret weapon," because apart from it no one would be saved.

In the last verse of Romans 10, we see what happens when the only working element in man's relationship to God is human responsibility. The result is unbelief. As Robert Haldane says, "We see what is the result, when God employs only outward means to lead men to obedience, and does not accompany them with the influence of his efficacious grace."

The Compassionate God

It is characteristic of Paul's method of teaching that he ends a reasoned argument with quotations from the Old Testament, establishing what he has just said. He did this at the end of Romans 9. He does it here as well. In fact, in Romans 10 he has already given us six quotations from the Old Testament: Joel 2:32 (in v. 13), Isaiah 52:7 (in v. 15), Isaiah 53:1 (in v. 16), Psalm 19:4 (in v. 18), Deuteronomy 32:21 (in v. 19), and Isaiah 65:1 (in v. 20). The seventh quotation is a continuation of the reference to Isaiah 65:1, since with it Paul simply moves on to the next verse (v. 2): "All day long I have held out my hands to a disobedient and obstinate people."

This is a moving statement, because it spells out the nature of God's love in contrast to the disobedient and obstinate rejection of the love of God by human beings. The first part, the part that spells out the nature of God's love, teaches three things about it.

1. It is continuous. God pictures himself as holding out his hands toward Israel for an entire day. Have you ever tried to hold out your hands (or arms) for even a few minutes? It is a terribly difficult thing to do. In a short time it becomes excruciatingly painful. Very few persons could hold out their hands for even an hour. No one on earth could do it for a day. Yet God says he has done this continuously: "All day long I have held out my hands to a disobedient and obstinate people."

And what a day this has been! With God a thousand years is as a day, and a day is as a thousand years. Thus, the day of God's grace has already lasted over four thousand years, if we begin with Abraham—even longer if we begin with Adam and Eve.

Moreover, it is still continuing. The day of grace has not ended, and it will not end until Jesus returns the final time for judgment.

I want you to think of this personally, especially if you have not yet come to Jesus Christ as your Savior. The day of God's grace has been continuous with you, too. Forget the four thousand years since the time of Abraham. Think only of the years of your life, however long or short they have been. It may be that the time of God's outstretched love began in your childhood when a Christian mother or father told you about Jesus and urged you to commit your life to him. It may have continued into your youth through the godly influence of relatives, Sunday school teachers, or other concerned Christians who explained the gospel to you. It may have been part of your later life, if you are older. Indeed, it is continuing now, if you are not yet a disciple of Jesus Christ.

How many entreaties to believe on Jesus Christ have you heard? How many sermons have you sat through? If you have been attending a good evangelical church for any length of time, I know you have heard the gospel there. Think how continuous and long-suffering the grace of God is. And remember this: If you reject the gospel, each entreaty, each warning, and each sermon will rise up to render you without excuse at the day of God's judgment. If you perish, no one will be responsible for it but yourself.

2. It is compassionate. The love of God for sinners is not only a continuing love. It is compassionate, that is, it is filled with passion for you. This is clearly taught in this text, for the picture of the constantly outstretched hands of God is meant to portray compassion. It is the posture of a parent reaching out to a crying child. It is the gesture of a husband to his wife or a wife to her husband. It is the gesture of Jesus, who reached out to us from the cross.

If you want to know what the hands of God are like, I encourage you to think of Jesus and his hands. We see them often in the gospels. One day Jesus was approached by a leper, a man with a loathsome, feared disease, a person no one would touch. "Jesus," we are told, "reached out his hand and touched the man" (Matt. 8:3). On another occasion, two blind men asked for healing. Jesus "touched their eyes... and their sight was restored" (Matt. 9:29-30). On still another occasion, Peter was walking to Jesus over the water, as Jesus had invited him to do. But Peter looked around, saw the tumultuous waves, lost faith, and began to sink. "Immediately Jesus reached out his hand and caught him" and so saved Peter from drowning (Matt. 14:31). Jesus "put his hands" on little children and blessed them (Mark 10:16). As he ascended into heaven after his resurrection, he "lifted up his hands and blessed" those who were watching him depart (Luke 24:50). Jesus' hands were always healing, always blessing, always saving. They are compassionate hands.

I am sure also, though the story does not say so explicitly, that the hands of Jesus were stretched out toward Jerusalem when he came to the brow of the hill overlooking that great city and wept over it, saying, "If you, even you, had only known on this day what would bring you peace—but now it is hidden from your eyes" (Luke 19:42).

3. It is costly. There is one more important thing to see about the outstretched hands of God. They teach us that the love of God is costly—that is, costly to God. Those hands bear the imprint of the nails brutally pounded through them as Jesus was affixed to the cross to bear the penalty for our sins. Someone has said, "No other god has wounds." Exactly! No other god has paid the price for redemption because of his continuing and compassionate love for us, except the God/man, who is Jesus Christ.

Disobedience and Passionate Unbelief

What has been the response to God's great love? This is what the second half of the verse is telling us. The response has been rejection. Two words summarize it.

1. Disobedient. When we think of the gospel, we usually think of it as an invitation, and it is true that the Good News is sometimes presented in that way. Jesus himself said, "Come to me, all you who are weary and burdened, and I will give you rest" (Matt. 11:28). The Bible ends with an invitation: "Whoever is thirsty, let him come; and whoever wishes, let him take the free gift of the water of life" (Rev. 22:17).

But what most of us forget is that the gospel is also a command. It is a command to turn from sin to faith in Jesus Christ and to follow him in obedient discipleship. Do you remember how Paul preached to the Greeks in Athens? He ended his address on Mars Hill by saying, "... we should not think that the divine being is like gold or silver or stone—an image made by man's design and skill. In the past God overlooked such ignorance, but now he commands all people everywhere to repent. For he has set a day when he will judge the world with justice by the man he has appointed. He has given proof of this to all men by raising him from the dead" (Acts 17:29-31, emphasis added.)

Similarly, at Pentecost, Peter commanded the people, saying, "Repent and be baptized, every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ for the forgiveness of your sins" (Acts 2:38).

It is a characteristic of people to labor strenuously to disobey this command. It was that way for Israel, and it is also true for people today. There is nothing we resist so much as a command, no command we resist so much as a command given to us by God, and no command given to us by God that we reject so much as the command to repent and turn to Jesus.

So the first thing set over against the love of God represented by his outstretched hands is disobedience.

2. Obstinate. Not only was Israel's response to the gospel one of disobedience; it was an obstinate disobedience. That is, it was hard-nosed, steely-faced, heart-encrusted, and doggedly persistent. So is ours. What was true of Israel is true of all natural human responses to God's love in Christ Jesus.

Jesus described this in a parable (Matt. 21:33-46). He told of a landowner who enclosed a field, planted a vineyard, dug a winepress, and built a watch-tower. Then he leased the land to those who were to tend it for him. At harvest time he sent servants to collect his rightful share of the crop, but the renters fell on the servants, beating one, killing another, and stoning a third. The landlord sent other servants, but they were treated the same way. At last he sent his son, thinking, "Surely they will respect my son." But when the wicked tenants saw the son, they said, "This is the heir. Come, let's kill him and take his inheritance" (v. 38). So they threw him out of the vineyard and killed him. When Jesus asked his listeners what the owner would do, they said he would return and destroy the wicked tenants and "rent the vineyard to other tenants who [would] give him his share of the crop at harvest time" (v. 41). Then, anticipating exactly what Paul says in Romans 10, Jesus concluded, "Therefore I tell you that the kingdom of God will be taken away from you and given to a people who will produce its fruit" (v. 43).

The picture is of obstinate resistance to the rights and love of God, and it describes what happened. The prophets were the servants. They had been beaten, killed, and stoned. Jesus was the Son. He was crucified.

Therefore, the kingdom was taken from these Jewish tenants, and the door of salvation was thrown open to the entire world.

But even this gospel was resisted. When Jesus was crucified, God did something that should have profoundly shaken every Jew who knew of it. When Jesus died, God tore the great veil of the Jerusalem temple in two. This was the veil separating the Holy Place from the Most Holy Place, and for centuries it had barred the way to God, on the grounds that sinful men and women could not simply barge in upon God's holiness. Now the veil was torn, signifying that the way to God was open. No longer was it necessary to be a Jew to enter the outer temple courts or a priest to enter the temple itself or the high priest to enter the Most Holy Place. Because of Jesus' death, the way was open, and anyone—Gentiles as well as Jews, women as well as men, slaves as well as free-born people—anyone could come to God through him.

But what did the Jews do? They just sewed the torn veil of the temple back together and went on with their exclusively Jewish worship. They rejected the witness of those who had seen the risen Lord, explaining the empty tomb as a theft and deception on the part of the disciples, and perpetuated their sacrificial system, which was now rightly superseded by the perfect sacrifice of himself by Jesus Christ, until the temple was at last destroyed by the Romans. The majority regarded the Christians as renegades and hated every extension of the gospel to the Gentiles, even though passages like those Paul is quoting in Romans foretold that this would happen.

A Terrible Contrast

Most commentators on this passage note the contrast between Isaiah 65:1, quoted in verse 20, and Isaiah 65:2, quoted in verse 21. The first describes how the Gentiles, who had not sought God, found him. The second describes how the Jews, to whom God had specifically and continuously offered a way of salvation, had rejected him. It is a great contrast. But to my way of thinking, the greatest contrast is not this but rather the contrast between the compassionate, loving God, stretching out his hands to save sinners, and the hardness of those who obstinately turn their back upon him. It is this that makes what is being described at the end of Romans 10 so disturbing and so bad.

Once again I need to become personal. In ancient times God could say that he had repeatedly stretched out his hands to Israel. But in that Old Testament period Jesus had not yet come. His coming had been foretold, but he had not come yet, and there was undoubtedly great confusion about what the prophecies of his coming really meant. Besides, the prophets, although numerous over the years, were nevertheless infrequent at any given time in that history, and none of them had access to our amazing "modern" means for proclaiming the gospel.

What a difference today! If God was stretching out his hands toward Israel then, how much more is he stretching out his hands to men and women today. Today Jesus has come. And not only has he come, the meaning of his coming is understood and the messengers of the gospel have literally taken this Good News throughout the world. The gospel has been explained in magazines, tracts, and books. It is heard on radio. It is seen in movies and video tapes. It has been declared dispassionately, as men and women with acute minds and much knowledge have appealed to the reason of their hearers. It has been proclaimed emotionally and fervently, as preachers have pleaded with their congregations to turn from the sin that is destroying them and find salvation in Jesus, where alone it may be found.

What more can be done? Jesus said to those of his day, "We played the flute for you, and you did not dance; we sang a dirge, and you did not mourn" (Matt. 11:17). He was referring to the contrast between the ministry of John the Baptist, which was a serious call to repentance, and his own which was more open, less threatening, and winsome.

Can we not say the same thing today? Preachers of the gospel have reasoned and debated, begged and pleaded, argued and cajoled, coaxed and implored. We have given reasons, argumentation, warnings, and motivations. We have preached and prayed. In the name of God we have stretched out our own hands to sinners, pleading, "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and you will be saved..." (Acts 16:31).

But what has been the result? We have found exactly the same thing that both Jesus and Paul found. The unregenerate world is not interested in the gospel. And, if the truth is told, there are a good many apparent Christians who do not seem to be very interested in it either. They treat church attendance lightly, preferring to stay home Sunday evenings and watch television rather than worship God, who saved them, and allow the teaching of his Word to nourish their emaciated souls. They do not study their Bibles. They do not read Christian books. Their minds are flabby, and so are their spiritual muscles. They do not work for Jesus. They do not tell others about him. They do not even give money so that others can do the work in their place. They live for themselves. That is what they are doing. Are they not like those Paul describes? Disobedient?

As for the unsaved world—well, the unregenerate world crucified Jesus when he came the first time. It would lynch him again if it had the opportunity. It is against such hard and rebellious hearts that the love of God, symbolized by his outstretched hands, shines brightly.

But be warned. If what I have said describes you, if you have not yet come to Christ and are resisting him, know that one day those outstretched hands of God will become the hands of his judgment. For Jesus will himself be your judge. The Bible says, "The LORD will judge his people..." (Deut. 32:36). When the author of Hebrews comments on that text, he says, "It is a dreadful thing to fall into the hands of the living God" (Heb. 10:31).

What Shall You Do?

Fortunately that end is not yet here. Today is still the day of God's grace. And that is why we are going to find Paul moving back into the reign of grace in Romans 11, where he asks, "Did God then reject his people?" and will answer, "By no means!" citing himself as an example (v. 1).

But what of you? What should you do in this present moment? Some who look at the doctrine of election think it means you should do nothing because you can do nothing. That does not follow. You cannot save yourself. That is certain, which is why the gospel is a gospel of grace. If you could save yourself, it would be a gospel of works. You cannot make God be gracious to you, but you can listen to him as he speaks in the gospel. You can look to him and see his hands outstretched.

"Shouldn't I seek God?" you ask. Not at all! He is already seeking you, and if you think you are seeking him, you will inevitably fall back into trusting in your own efforts. Instead of seeking him, you need merely to be quiet and listen to what he says.

William R. Newell writes,

Should we not seek God? No! You should sit down and hear what is written in Romans: first, about your guilt, then about your helplessness, and then about the inability of the law to do anything but condemn you; and then believe on Christ whom God hath sent; and then praise God for righteousness apart from works, apart from ordinances! Hear how God laid sin, your sin, on a substitute, his own Son, Jesus Christ our Lord, and that now, sin being put away, God has raised him from the dead. Seek God? No! God is the seeker, and he has sought and is now seeking those that asked not of him, and has been found by those who sought him not!—but simply heard the good news and believed!

Let me put it another way. God is calling you, and he is doing it exactly as Paul says he does in Romans 10:14-15. That is the way the gospel comes to everyone. First, the messengers are sent. Second, they preach the Good News. Third, the voice of Jesus is heard in the preaching. Fourth, the sinner believes. Fifth, the person calls on Jesus for salvation. You need to hear the message, because it is in the teaching of the gospel that the voice of God is heard and his outstretched hands are seen.

When Jesus first appeared to the disciples in the upper room following the resurrection, Thomas, one of the disciples, was not present.

Although told of the resurrection and that the others had seen Jesus, he was unconvinced. "Unless I see the nail marks in his hands and put my finger where the nails were, and put my hand into his side, I will not believe it," he said (John 20:25).

A week after his first appearance to the disciples, Jesus appeared again. This time Thomas was present. Jesus held out his hands, showing Thomas his wounds, saying, "Put your finger here; see my hands. Reach out your hand and put it into my side. Stop doubting and believe" (v. 27).

Thomas did not even have to do that. Instead, he fell at Christ's feet, confessing, "My Lord and my God!" (v. 28).

That is exactly what happens today as people read the Bible and hear it preached. They see Jesus in the Bible's pages. They hear him speak their name, and they come to him. In that moment the disobedience and unbelief of a lifetime fade away, and they find themselves calling out, "My Lord and my God!" It is a wounded hand that holds out salvation to you and invites you to come. Reach out and touch that hand. Then allow it to enfold you in an embrace that nothing on earth or in heaven will ever diminish or disturb.

Part Fourteen: The Times of the Gentiles

Chapter 156.
Has God Rejected Israel?

Romans 11:1

Ancient Bibles did not have chapter divisions, as our Bibles have. These were added later, the earliest appearing in Codex Vaticanus in the fourth century. Moreover, the earliest divisions were different from what we have now, and our present chapters came even later, in the Middle Ages. The divisions we have are certainly not from Paul. Still, when we come to the beginning of a new chapter, as we do now in our study of Paul's great letter to the Romans, it is natural to take the division seriously, look back over the distance we have traveled, and try to get a bearing on the matters still to come.

Has God's Word Failed?

The present discussion began in Romans 9, following Paul's magnificent statement about the believer's eternal security in Christ in Romans 8. It began in response to an obvious question: How can we believe in the eternal security of the Christian if, as we can clearly see, Jews as a whole are not responding to the preaching of the gospel and thus are not being saved? If Christianity is true, doesn't this mean that God has rejected Israel? If God has rejected Israel, how can we suppose that he will avoid rejecting us as well? And if he can or will reject us, isn't it true that we must reject the doctrine of eternal security?

Paul's immediate answer, in Romans 9:6, was that God's plans for Israel have not failed. To prove it he unfolds the seven main arguments found in chapters 9 through 11.

1. God's historical purpose toward the Jewish nation has not failed, because all whom God has elected to salvation are or will be saved

(Rom. 9:6-24). In this section Paul distinguishes between national Israel and spiritual Israel, which consists of those whom God has chosen to know Christ. His point is that membership in the visible Jewish nation did not guarantee salvation, any more than mere formal membership in a Christian denomination guarantees the salvation of church members today. What determines salvation is the electing grace of God in Christ, and that has always been a matter separate from any ethnic, national, or organizational distinctives.

2. God's historical purpose toward the Jewish nation has not failed, because God had previously revealed that not all Israel would be saved and that some Gentiles would be (Rom. 9:25-29). If God had promised that all Jews would be saved and had then failed to save some of them, God's word would indeed have failed. But this is not the case, since God had foretold in advance that many Jews would not believe and would be scattered and that, in their place, many of the scattered Gentiles would be gathered to Christ.

3. God's historical purpose toward the Jewish nation has not failed, because the failure of the Jews to believe was their own fault, not God's (Rom. 9:30-10:21). The Jews refused to believe because they wanted to earn salvation for themselves, even though Abraham, David, and all others who were saved were saved through believing God's promises concerning Jesus Christ. The majority wanted to be approved by God on the basis of their own good works and righteousness, and so would not submit to the righteousness that comes by faith in Christ.

4. God's historical purpose toward the Jewish nation has not failed, because some Jews (Paul himself was an example) have believed and have been saved (Rom. 11:1). As long as even one Jewish person has been saved, no one can claim that God has rejected his people utterly. Paul was one, even if there were no others. But, in fact, the situation is not as grim as that. As the next section shows,

God has always preserved a considerable remnant of believing Jewish people.

5. God's historical purpose toward the Jewish nation has not failed, because it has always been the case that even in the worst of times a remnant has been saved (Rom. 11:2-10). Paul proves this from the days of Elijah, a dark period but one in which, by God's own count, seven thousand Jews were still faithful to God, having refused to worship Baal. Seven thousand was a small portion of the nation, but it was still a sufficiently large number to derail the claim of anyone who might think that the plan of God had failed.

6. God's historical purpose toward the Jewish nation has not failed, because the salvation of the Gentiles, which is now occurring, is meant to arouse Israel to envy and thus be the means of saving some of them (Rom. 11:11-24). God has a right to do anything he wants with sinners. He can save whom he wants. He can condemn whom he wants. Still, condemnation seems rather harsh toward his ancient "chosen" people. "Is God merely writing them off?" we might ask. Paul's answer is that this is not the case. Rather, God is using the day of Gentile salvation for the good of Israel, since it is through God's work among Gentiles that Israel is being stirred from self-complacency and lethargy, and some are being saved.

7. Finally, God's historical purpose toward the Jewish nation has not failed, because in the end all Israel will be saved, and thus God will fulfill his promises to Israel nationally (Rom. 11:2532). This is so gracious and wonderful that Paul concludes with a benediction praising God's great wisdom.

Paul has made it clear that God is working out a great purpose and [has] insisted on divine predestination and election; the will of God is done. He has also insisted that human responsibility is real and important, and he has made it plain that this must be borne in mind when considering the fact that Israel has not entered the blessing as Gentile believers have. What then does it matter to belong to the chosen people? At first sight, it may seem, not very much, for Gentiles may be saved as well as Jews. But it is far from Paul's thought that being a Jew matters little. He goes on to show that, while in the providence of God Israel's sin and unbelief have been used to open up the way for the Gentiles, now the conversion of Gentiles will lead to the conversion of Jews. The Jews still have a place in God's plan.

Charles Hodge looks at the argument of Romans 11 similarly, noting that it has two parts. "In the former [part] the apostle teaches that the rejection of the Jews was not total. There was a remnant, and perhaps a much larger remnant than many might suppose.... In the latter [part], he shows that this rejection is not final."

Godet adds, "This partial rejection... is not eternal, but temporary (vv. 11-32). For after it has served the various ends which God had in view in decreeing it, it shall come to an end, and the entire nation shall be restored, and with the Gentiles shall realize the final unity of the kingdom of God." This is an ending worthy of the benediction with which Paul concludes the fourth section of his letter.

Has God Rejected His Ancient People?

At the start of chapter 11, the point to which we have come in our verse-by-verse exposition of Romans, we are at Paul's fourth argument of the seven listed above. It is the shortest of the seven. Question: "I ask then: Did God reject his people?" Answer: "By no means! I am an Israelite myself, a descendant of Abraham, from the tribe of Benjamin" (v. 1).

What Paul says in this terse personal reference has been understood in two ways. One approach is based on the vehemence of his answer and supposes Paul to be denying that any Jew could suppose that God would abandon Israel. "More meaning can be attached to 'of the seed of Abraham, of the tribe of Benjamin' on this interpretation," according to John Murray. The problem with this view is that it turns Paul's reply into a mere emotional response, rather than an argument, and we are in the midst of a very clear set of reasoned arguments in this chapter.

The second view is the one I have assumed from the beginning of these studies, namely, that Paul is using his own case as proof that Israel has not been abandoned. As long as there is only one believing Jew—though, in fact, there are many—no one can affirm that God has rejected Israel utterly. Paul is a remnant by himself, whether or not there are any others. But, in fact, there are and always have been others, as the next section shows.

Why, then, does Paul speak so forcefully of his Jewish ancestry? In my opinion, it was in response to the many unkind things that must have been said to him about it. I have friends who are Jewish believers who report that when they accepted Jesus as the Messiah they were at once rejected as Jews by many of their former friends and family members.

In one case, in a Bar Mitzvah service, the male members of the family were invited to take part in the Torah readings, and a friend of mine who had become a Jewish Christian went forward with them. He was stopped by the rabbi, who claimed that he was no longer a Jew because he believed in Jesus. My friend's instinctive response, which is why I tell this story, was: "Are you telling me that I am not a Jew? How can you say that I am not a Jew? God made me a Jew. My mother and father were Jews. I am descended from Jews. I am a son of Abraham."

It is hard to suppose that Paul did not hear similar accusations many hundreds of times or that his response would not have been precisely what we find it to be in Romans. "Not a Jew?" he might have objected. "How can you say I am not a Jew? I am an Israelite, a descendant of Abraham, from the tribe of Benjamin."

Each of those terms is worth exploring.

1. An Israelite. There are three names used to denote this ancient people: Hebrews (cf. Phil. 3:5), Jews, and Israelites. The origin of "Hebrew" is not known, though it may be derived from the name Eber, found in Genesis 10:21, 25, in which case it denotes a broader grouping of people than ethnic Israel alone. It would be similar to the word Semite. "Jew" comes from Judah, the fourth son of Jacob by Leah and (later) the most prominent of the twelve tribes. This name stresses the people's ethnic origins. The distinguishing feature of "Israel" is that it is the people's covenant name. It was the name given to Jacob when he wrestled with the angel at the Jabbok and God blessed him (Gen. 32:28).

As soon as we recognize that "Israel" points to the covenant, we see that Paul's choice is exceedingly appropriate. For the question being raised in Romans is whether or not God can break covenant, and the answer is: Surely not! God never breaks a promise.

2. A descendant of Abraham. Nothing designates a Jew so decisively as being "a son of Abraham." Therefore, Paul uses this phrase, too. In his case, of course, being a descendant of Abraham had Christian importance, for he had shown earlier that Abraham is an example of faith and that all who have faith are therefore Abraham's true spiritual children, both Jews and Gentiles (cf. Rom. 4:11-12, 16).

3. Of the tribe of Benjamin. Benjamin was small among the tribes of Israel, but it was significant beyond its size for many reasons. First, Benjamin was the only son of Jacob to have been born in Israel. The others were born on the far side of the desert in Paddam Aram. Second, Jerusalem, the capital of Israel, was within its territory. Third, Benjamin was the only tribe that remained with the tribe of Judah in the south at the time of the civil war following the death of Solomon. The northern tribes quickly drifted away from the forms of worship that had been given to Israel, set up apostate altars, became increasingly wicked, and were the first to be carried away into captivity (in 721 B.C.). Benjamin, in the south along with Judah, remained closer to God, preserved a larger measure of righteousness, and thus survived longer, until the conquest by Babylon (in 586 B.C.).

Martin Luther argues at this point that Paul had contended against God "with all this strength" and that "if God had rejected his own people, he surely would have rejected the Apostle Paul." But thoughtful as this may be, it is not the point Paul is making. Paul is not arguing that he has been saved in spite of his sinful past, which would be an argument for grace, but that he is a Jew and is saved, which is an argument for God's faithfulness to his covenant. In other words, he is saying nothing new, but only what had been stated many times in the Old Testament.

When the people sinned by asking for a king and later confessed it, saying, "We have added to all our other sins the evil of asking for a king" (1 Sam. 12:19), Samuel answered, "Do not be afraid. You have done all this evil; yet do not turn away from the LORD, but serve the LORD with all your heart.... For the sake of his great name the LORD will not reject his people, because the LORD was pleased to make you his own" (vv. 20, 22).

Psalm 94 speaks of God's judgment of the wicked and his disciplining of those he loves. Yet it also explains the discipline, saying, "For the LORD will not reject his people; / he will never forsake his inheritance" (v. 14).

Jeremiah quotes God as saying,

> Only if the heavens above can be > measured and the foundations of the > earth below be searched out > will I reject all the descendants > of Israel because of all they > have done.
> Jeremiah 31:37

Paul was steeped in the Old Testament. So we can well understand his horrified and extreme reaction to the suggestion that God might somehow break his promises to Israel and cast his people off. Discipline? Yes. A remnant in times like the present? Of course. But cast Israel off? Abandon the covenant? Break the promises? How could God do that and still remain God? If that happened, truth, honor, righteousness, and justice would be torn from the deity, and God would no longer be God.

In view of this argument, we can see why Paul does not only argue that some of Israel are being saved, himself being one example, but also maintains that in the end the fullness of God's blessing will be extended to the Jewish people nationally, and "so all Israel will be saved," as he says in verse 26.

A Few Applications

I realize, as I come to the end of this study, that much of what I have written has been analytical and technical and that its relevance to ourselves and our times is not readily apparent. But it is nevertheless a practical matter, and there are several major points of application.

1. We should not be discouraged in our evangelism, because all whom God is calling to faith in Jesus Christ will come to him. If anyone should have been discouraged in his evangelism, it should have been Paul in his attempts to reach the Jewish people. He was God's chosen messenger to the Gentiles (Acts 9:15), but Paul always began his missionary efforts with the Jews and again and again he was rejected by them. In 2 Corinthians he describes how he had been beaten five times by the Jewish authorities and how he was in constant danger from them, as well as from Gentile rulers (2 Cor. 11:24, 26). Later, when he went to Jerusalem with the offerings from the Gentile churches, he was set upon by a fanatical mob and would have been torn to pieces if the Romans had not intervened to save him. Jewish opposition led to his imprisonment.

Yet Paul was not discouraged by this, because he knew that he had been sent to preach the gospel to all people and that those whom God was calling to faith in Jesus Christ would come to him. In Elijah's day, God had reserved seven thousand faithful Jews. In Paul's day, one by one God was calling out thousands more. So also today. Because God is calling to faith those whom he has chosen to call to faith, we, too, can work on without discouragement and know that our "labor in the Lord is not in vain" (1 Cor. 15:58).

2. We should be warned against presumption. It is true that all whom God is calling to faith will be saved, but this does not mean that all of any race, social class, or denomination will be. In the days of Elijah, God had seven thousand believers. But there were other thousands, no doubt hundreds of thousands, who did not obey God, worshiped Baal, and were not saved. They were Jews. Although they were outward, visible members of the covenant community, they were not what Paul earlier termed true "Israel" (Rom. 9:6). They were Abraham's "natural children," but they were not "children of the promise," because they did not follow Abraham's example by believing in the one who was to come.

Being a Jew did not in itself save these people, though there were great advantages to Judaism, as Paul acknowledges. Neither will membership in a Christian denomination save you, though there are also advantages to belonging to a good church. We must not presume on our affiliations. The Bible says to "make your calling and election sure" (2 Peter 1:10). It means, be sure you believe in Jesus Christ as your Savior and that you are actually following him as your Lord.

The five foolish virgins of Jesus' parable thought that they were well off because they had been invited to the wedding banquet, had accepted the invitation, called Jesus "Lord," and were even waiting for his second coming—but they were not "ready" when he came (Matt. 25:1-13). Make sure that you are not among their company.

3. We should put all our confidence in God, who alone is the source, effector, and sustainer of his people's salvation. How foolish to put your confidence in anything else, or even in a combination of lesser things. If a person can be a Jew, with all the spiritual blessings attending to that great religious heritage, and yet be lost, certainly you are foolish to trust in your ancestry, nationality, education, good works, or (strange as it may seem) your good intentions. "Salvation comes from the LORD" (Jonah 2:9). It comes from God alone. Make sure that you are trusting him and what he has done for you in Jesus Christ. Make sure you are able to sing:

Nothing in my hand I bring,
Simply to thy cross I cling;
Naked, come to thee for dress,
Helpless, look to thee for grace;
Foul, I to the fountain fly;
Wash me, Savior, or I die.
Rock of Ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in thee.

4. We must never take part in or yield to anti-Semitic attitudes or actions. If God himself has not rejected the Jews in spite of their long history of willful sin, dogged disobedience, and fierce rejection of him—if he loves them still and has a plan for their eventual salvation as a nation—it is clear that you and I, if we are Gentiles, must not reject them either. We must never yield to or take part in anti-Semitism.

There are many blemishes on the church of Jesus Christ accumulated during the long years of its history, but of all those blemishes one of the most terrible and tragic has been the participation of so-called Christians in the persecution of the Jews. I know that not all, perhaps hardly any, of those actually persecuting Jews were true Christians. But that is another matter. Instead of hatred there should have been love. Instead of prejudice there should have been understanding. Let us determine that regardless of what the past has been, we will think and act like Christians—like Jesus himself, who died with arms outstretched even to those who crucified him.

We must love all men and women and seek to reach all without favoritism until Jesus comes again.

Chapter 157.

God's Remnant

Romans 11:2-5

Puul's letter to the Romans moves forward by rational arguments and statements, not by stories. But in Romans 11:24-5, the apostle touches on a great Old Testament story as support for his contention that God has not abandoned Israel and that the word of God has not failed. It is the story of Elijah, following his victory over the prophets of Baal on Mount Carmel (1 Kings 18:1619:18).

The God of Elijah

Elijah had challenged the priests of Baal to a contest in which they were to ask Baal to send fire to consume the sacrifice on their altar, while Elijah would ask God to send fire to consume the sacrifice on his. When Baal failed and God answered spectacularly, sending fire to consume not only Elijah's sacrifice, but also the wood, stones, soil, and water in the trench, the prophet seized his opportunity and had four hundred prophets and priests of Baal killed.

It was a great victory.

But news of it reached Ahab, the wicked king of Israel, who told his wife, Jezebel, what Elijah had done. She was more wicked even than Ahab, and she swore to have Elijah killed immediately in swift retaliation. Elijah, who was undoubtedly exhausted emotionally by the earlier test of wills, lost confidence in God and fled on a forty-day journey into the remote wilderness of Mount Horeb, which is another name for Sinai.

The next morning God spoke to him. "What are you doing here, Elijah?"

Elijah replied in what is surely one of the most pitiful complaints in all Scripture: "I have been very zealous for the LORD God Almighty. The Israelites have rejected your covenant, broken down your altars, and put your prophets to death with the sword. I am the only one left, and now they are trying to kill me too" (1 Kings 19:10). Never mind that the Israelites had just responded to his challenge to execute the four hundred prophets and priests of Baal.

God did not chide his prophet, as we might have done. Instead, he took care of him, provided what he needed and encouraged him.

First, he gave Elijah a new vision of himself. He placed him on the mountain while a great wind, an earthquake, and a fire passed by. These powerful natural phenomena reflected God's strength and sovereignty, but God was not in them. Instead, after the wind, earthquake, and fire had passed by, God spoke to Elijah in what is described as "a gentle whisper."

God repeated the question: "What are you doing here, Elijah?"

Elijah gave the same answer as before. Then God told him to anoint two new kings: Hazael as king of Aram and Jehu as king of Israel. He was also to anoint Elisha to be his own successor as God's prophet. These three, the two kings and Elisha, would be a strong new team to help him. Finally, God said, "Yet I have seven thousand in Israel—all whose knees have not bowed down to Baal and all whose mouths have not kissed him" (1 Kings 19:18).

This is the story Paul refers to in Romans 11:2-5, quoting verses 10, 14, and 18 of 1 Kings 19 specifically.

The Flow of Paul's Thought

Since this account begins the fifth of Paul's arguments in Romans 9-11—in which he proves that the purposes of God for Israel have not failed and are, in fact, continuing—it will be useful to summarize and review them here, as we have done at each point at which a new argument is introduced.

God's purposes for Israel have not failed because:

1. All whom God has elected to salvation are or will be saved (Rom. 9:6-24). What determines salvation is the electing grace of God in Christ, and that has always been separate from any ethnic, national, or organizational distinctives.

2. God had already revealed that not all Israel would be saved and that some Gentiles would be (Rom. 9:25-29). This is a proof from prophecy.
3. The failure of the Jews to believe was their own fault, not God's (Rom. 9:30-10:21). The Jews refused to believe because they wanted to earn salvation for themselves, just as most people do today.
4. Some Jews have believed and have been saved (Rom. 11:1). Paul offers himself as an example.
5. It has always been the case that even in the worst of times a remnant has been saved (Rom. 11:2-10). This is the point to which we have come now. It is proved by the fact that even in the dark days of Elijah's ministry, by God's own count and revelation, seven thousand Jews were still faithful to God and had refused to worship Baal.
6. The salvation of the Gentiles, which is now occurring, is meant to arouse Israel to envy and thus be the means of saving some of them (Rom. 11:11-24).
7. In the end all Israel will be saved (Rom. 11:25-32). Together, these arguments are a powerful case for the irrevocability of God's covenant promises, even in the face of such strong human resistance and rejection as had been shown by Israel.

A Remnant Will Be Saved

The new idea in this argument is the "remnant." This word refers to a small surviving part of something, either an object or a custom or a people. We probably use the word most often to describe a bit of fabric left over from a bolt of cloth after most of it has been sold, or a remnant of carpet after most of the roll has been sold. In the Old Testament the word refers in most cases to the small company of Jews who survived or were to survive the invasions, destructions, and captivities inflicted on them by the Assyrians and Babylonians in the sixth and eighth centuries B.C.

It is an interesting feature of this word that it occurs many times in the Old Testament (sixty-two times in all), but only three times in the New Testament (NIV). In each New Testament occurrence the reference is to an Old Testament text.

The first New Testament reference is in Acts 15, the chapter that describes the Council at Jerusalem. On this occasion the leaders of the church had met to discuss the place of the Gentiles in the expanding church and whether they were to be required to submit to the law of Moses, including circumcision and observance of the Jewish feasts. The decision was to free Gentiles from this Jewish yoke, and it was based in part on a quotation from the Book of Amos, cited by James (emphasis added):

> After this I will return > and rebuild David's fallen tent.
> Its ruins I will rebuild, and I will restore it, > that the remnant of men may seek the Lord, and all the > Gentiles who bear my name, > says the Lord, who does these things....
> Acts 15:16-17; quoting Amos 9:1112

In these verses "remnant" refers to the Jews who survived the deportation by the Babylonians, who in the days of the apostles were being given renewed opportunity to seek the Lord and to whom, as the new people of God, believing Gentiles would be added.

The other two New Testament references are in Romans. We have already seen one. It occurred in chapter 9 in a quotation from Isaiah (emphasis added):

> Isaiah cries out concerning Israel:

"Though the number of the Israelites be like the sand by the sea, only the remnant will be saved.
For the Lord will carry out his sentence on earth with speed and finality."

Romans 9:27; quoting Isaiah 10:2223

The final New Testament use of the word remnant is in the passage we are studying.

We need to ask two questions in order to understand the text well.

1. What do verses 2-5 add to verse 1? If you have been following the argument, you will be aware that Paul has already proved God's faithfulness to Israel by showing that, even if no other Jew has been saved, at least he had been. And as long as there is one, nobody can claim that God has utterly abandoned Israel. At first glance, the verses that follow seem to be saying the same thing, only by using the story of Elijah and God's revelation of the existence of seven thousand who had not abandoned the true God and bowed to Baal. So do these verses really add anything?

The answer is that they do add something. In fact, they add two things.

First, they show that although God could have been faithful to his promises by merely saving one of the vast number of the Israelites, his grace extended far beyond that. There were seven thousand in Elijah's time, and by natural implication we are to assume that the same was true in Paul's day and is true in our day, too. Paul is answering the argument that God must have broken his promises since, for the most part, Jews were not receiving Christ and Gentiles were. He is saying that although the number of Jewish believers is proportionately small, there were nevertheless many who had believed. The numbers were not negligible. We remember that three thousand believed in Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost (Acts 2:41) and that from that time on "the Lord added to their number daily those who were being saved" (v. 47). God is doing the same thing today.

Second, the use of Elijah's story shows that God's choice of a believing remnant, far from being an anomaly, has actually always been the case. The story in 1 Kings does not come from the very last days of the monarchies, when destruction by the Assyrians or Babylonians was just around the corner. It occurred somewhat earlier in Israel's history. But even at this earlier time it was the case that only a remnant was being saved.

Paul is grounding his experience and the results of the preaching of the gospel in his time in past Jewish history. He is showing that preaching in the first Christian century perfectly fits the pattern of God's ways.

2. To whom is Paul referring when he speaks of "his people, whom he foreknew"? This is an interesting question and one that has divided even the best commentators. I find them almost evenly divided. There are two possibilities. First, the words may refer to the nation as a whole, citing Israel as the "foreknown" or elect people of God. Or, second, they may refer restrictively only to the elect within Israel. F. Godet, John Murray, and Leon Morris hold to the first interpretation. John Calvin, Robert Haldane, and Charles Hodge hold to the second.

It is easy to argue for the second position, because Paul has already distinguished between national Israel and true Israel in Romans 9. Hodge starts at this point, arguing that it is the best position because (1) "it is precisely the distinction which Paul had made, and made for the same purpose, in chapter 9:6-8"; (2) "this is apparently Paul's own explanation in the sequel—the mass of the nation were cast away, but 'a remnant, according to the election of grace,' were reserved"; and (3) "the illustration borrowed from the Old Testament best suits this explanation." There is nothing wrong with this, of course. It is based on truth.

On the other hand, there are reasons for thinking that in this chapter Paul is thinking of the nation as a whole and is referring to Israel when he writes "his people, whom he foreknew."

There is no question, of course, but that Paul has been proving God's faithfulness to his people by referring to an elect remnant. Since God has elected some Jews, though a remnant, to be saved along with the believing Gentiles, it is clear that Israel as a nation has not been cast off. But here is the problem. In verse 1 Paul is talking about the nation. His question can be restated as: "Has God cast off the nation of Israel?" The answer is: "No, he has not rejected the nation, because he is saving some of them, and I am one." In other words, "his people" in verse 1 and "his people, whom he foreknew" in verse 2 must refer to the same people, and this people must be the nation as a whole.

Moreover, this is the direction in which the chapter is moving. For, when we get to verses 26-29, we find Paul writing, "And so all Israel will be saved, as it is written:

> The deliverer will come > from Zion; he will turn > godlessness away from > Jacob.
> And this is my covenant with them > when I take away their sins.

As far as the gospel is concerned, they are enemies on your account; but as far as election is concerned, they are loved on account of the patriarchs, for God's gifts and his call are irrevocable" (the quotation is a loose rendering of Isaiah 59:20-21 and 27:9).

Here is the way Godet describes what is happening:

Of all the peoples on the earth only one was chosen and known beforehand, by an act of divine foreknowledge and love, as the people whose history would be identified with the realization of salvation. In all others salvation is the affair of individuals, but here the notion of salvation is attached to the nation itself.... The Israelites contemporary with Jesus might reject him; an indefinite series of generations may for ages perpetuate this fact of national unbelief. God is under no pressure; time can stretch out as long as he pleases. He will add, if need be, ages to ages, until there come at length the generation disposed to open their eyes and freely welcome the Messiah. God foreknew this nation as believing and saved, and sooner or later they cannot fail to be both.

Encouragement for Hard Times

The application of these truths in regard to Israel is what the rest of Romans 11 contains. We will be following it out in detail as we make our way through these verses. But there are also applications for us today, and this is the note on which I want to end this study.

1. God always has a remnant, and the remnant is often much larger than we might suspect. I think of Christians who are working in difficult places or under difficult circumstances—in an inner-city mission, for example. Or, as many did for years, behind the Iron Curtain. Or with a class of people who are particularly resistant to the gospel. Or with children who have turned away from God. If you have been called to such a work or been given such a concern, you may be in the depressed state of mind that overcame Elijah. You have worked hard. There have been meager results. What you have done has been misunderstood and rejected, perhaps even violently. You may be inclined to give up, thinking, "Lord, they have killed your prophets and torn down your altars; I am the only one left, and they are trying to kill me" (v. 3).

If you are thinking or feeling that way, you need to know that God still has his seven thousand who have not bowed down to Baal, that you are therefore not alone and that your work will not be without results.

Our problem is a simple lack of faith, which means that we judge by mere outward appearances and not by God's promise. Elijah was a great prophet, yet he made exactly this mistake. He could not see what God was doing, so he assumed that he was the only faithful person left.

Calvin says,

It follows, therefore, that those who evaluate the church on the basis of their own opinions are in error. And indeed if that distinguished prophet who was so endowed with the light of the Spirit was deceived in this way when he desired to reckon the number of God's people by his own judgment, what will be the case with us, for our highest discernment, when compared with his, is nothing but dullness? Let us, therefore, form no rash decision on this point, but rather let this truth remain fixed in our hearts, that the church, which may not appear as anything to our sight, is nourished by the secret providence of God.... for God has a way, accessible to himself but concealed from us, by which he wonderfully preserves his elect, even when all seems lost.

If that does not comfort and encourage us, it is hard to know what can.

2. The remnant of those who are God's people have not bowed to Baal. Baal was a particularly corrupt god of the ancient Canaanites, whose worship persisted because of the failure of the Jews utterly to exterminate the Canaanites at the time of the conquest under Joshua. It consisted of blatant sex worship, coupled with pure materialism. In fact, the sex was meant to insure the materialism—for the practice of sacred prostitution was supposed to guarantee the recurrence of the seasons, with corresponding blessing on the crops from which came wealth in that society. We have the same thing today. Our western culture, particularly in America, is charging down the twin freeways of sexual promiscuity and blatant materialism. Only with us, the wealth is intended to insure the sex or sexual favors (or perhaps make them more pleasant), rather than the other way around.

What do we say in such times? Many, myself included, are inclined to be pessimistic. "The culture is wicked. Virtue is declining. Only I am left. I might as well give up."

But that is not the true picture. The culture may indeed be rushing down a slippery slope to damnation. But God has his remnant, nevertheless, and this remnant has not bowed its knee to the Baal of sex and possessions. There are devout people, who are living for God and trying to do the right thing, often in what are terrible circumstances. We should be encouraged to know this, seeking out such persons and encouraging them whenever we can. That is what the church is to be, after all—the company of those who are living for God and are encouraging one another to live for him even in this present evil world.

So let us get on with it. "Let us fix our eyes on Jesus" and so run the race set out for us (Heb.
12:1-2), whatever it may be. Moreover, let us run it, knowing that one day, like ourselves, all God's elect people will stand before him, having conquered this present wicked world. And though we will generally have been despised and persecuted, we will know that God has accomplished his perfect will in us and that nothing we have done for Jesus will have been done in vain.

Chapter 158.
Saved by Grace Alone

Romans 11:6

Two things must characterize any Christian. One is a profound sense of personal sin and unworthiness. The other is an overwhelming awareness of the grace of God. The two go together, of course, for without a proper sense of sin, we will never appreciate grace. We will think that the good we experience from God's hand is merited. On the other hand, the more we appreciate the grace of God, the more aware we will be of our sin and want to be free of it.

A Trophy of God's Grace

The apostle Paul was a trophy of God's grace, and he never forgot it. How could he? He had been raised in Judaism, but his understanding of what that required made him into a self-righteous man who thought that he above all others pleased God. It made him zealous to the point of killing those who disagreed with him. When Stephen was stoned to death, Paul was present to hold the coats of those who threw the stones. In fact, Paul was on his way to Damascus to arrest more of the followers of Jesus and have them killed when the Lord appeared to him in a bright light, called him to faith, and redirected his energies.

What a miracle of grace Paul was! In spite of his deep self-righteous attitude and vicious acts, God saved him graciously, that is, by grace alone. From that time on Paul preached the grace of God everywhere and to everyone.

Most of the verses in the Bible concerning grace are from Paul. There are only eight occurrences of the word grace in the entire Old Testament (NIV), but there are 128 occurrences in the New Testament, and most of them are from Paul's sermons or in his letters. For example, Acts 20:24.
"I consider my life worth nothing to me, if only I may finish the race and complete the task the Lord Jesus has given me—the task of testifying to the gospel of God's grace."

Romans 1:5. "Through him and for his name's sake, we received grace and apostleship to call people from among all the Gentiles to the obedience that comes from faith."

Romans 3:23-24. "All have sinned and fall short of the glory of God, and are justified freely by his grace through the redemption that came by Christ Jesus."

Romans 5:15. "For if the many died by the trespass of the one man, how much more did God's grace and the gift that came by the grace of the one man, Jesus Christ, overflow to the many!"

Romans 5:20-21. "Where sin increased, grace increased all the more, so that, just as sin reigned in death, so also grace might reign through righteousness to bring eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord."

Romans 6:14. "Sin shall not be your master, because you are not under law, but under grace."

Romans 12:6. "We have different gifts, according to the grace given us."

1 Corinthians 1:4. "I always thank God for you because of his grace given you in Christ Jesus."

1 Corinthians 15:10. "By the grace of God I am what I am, and his grace to me was not without effect. No, I worked harder than all of them—yet not I, but the grace of God that was with me."

2 Corinthians 8:9. "For you know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, so that you through his poverty might become rich."

2 Corinthians 9:8. "God is able to make all grace abound to you, so that in all things at all times, having all that you need, you will abound in every good work."

Galatians 1:6. "I am astonished that you are so quickly deserting the one who called you by the grace of Christ and are turning to a different gospel."

Galatians 5:4. "You who are trying to be justified by law have been alienated from Christ; you have fallen away from grace."

Ephesians 1:5-8. "He predestined us to be adopted as his sons through Jesus Christ, in accordance with his pleasure and will—to the praise of his glorious grace, which he has freely given us in the One he loves. In him we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, in accordance with the riches of God's grace that he lavished on us with all wisdom and understanding."

Ephesians 2:4-8. "Because of his great love for us, God, who is rich in mercy, made us alive with Christ even when we were dead in transgressions—it is by grace you have been saved.... in order that in the coming ages he might show the incomparable riches of his grace, expressed in his kindness to us in Christ Jesus. For it is by grace you have been saved."

Ephesians 3:7-8. "I became a servant of this gospel by the gift of God's grace given me through the working of his power. Although I am less than the least of all God's people, this grace was given me: to preach to the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ."

2 Timothy 1:9-10. "[God] has saved us and called us to a holy life—not because of anything we have done but because of his own purpose and grace. This grace was given us in Christ Jesus before the beginning of time, but it has now been revealed through the appearing of our Savior."

2 Corinthians 13:14. "May the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Spirit be with you all." Colossians 4:18. "Grace be with you."

1 Thessalonians 1:1. "Grace and peace to you."

1 Thessalonians 5:28. "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you."

1 Timothy 1:2. "Grace, mercy and peace from God the Father and Christ Jesus our Lord."

I count eighty-one verses about grace by Paul, and these are only a few of them. Together they constitute the most profound treatment of this great doctrine in all the world's literature and assure us that the great apostle of grace was himself formed by it.

A Gratuitous Comment

Paul's love of this doctrine is the only reason I can think of for his having included the words about grace that we find in Romans 11:6. I say this because they are really unnecessary at this point of the argument.

Charles Hodge calls this verse an exegetical comment on the last clause of the preceding one." And so it is. But the previous verse has already made the point: "So too, at the present time there is a remnant chosen by grace" (v. 5, emphasis added). And so has the one before it: "And what was God's answer to him? 'I have reserved for myself seven thousand who have not bowed the knee to Baal'" (v. 4). The verse does not say merely, "There are seven thousand who have not bowed the knee to Baal," but rather, "I have reserved for myself seven thousand..." (emphasis added). This is the work of God, and it is a gracious work. In the same way, Paul has spoken of the grace of God in salvation in Romans 5 and 6. Romans 5:12-21 is the most extensive treatment of the doctrine of grace in the Bible.

So why does Paul add __Rom11__verse 6 to Romans 11? It is because he loved this doctrine, saw it everywhere, and wanted his readers to see it and love it, too.

And also perhaps because he knew how difficult it is for most people to accept grace and how inclined we are to add works to it. I imagine that as he wrote the preceding verses, referring to the seven thousand faithful Jews from the days of Elijah's ministry, he would have thought that some readers would instinctively give those faithful Jews some credit and by extension give themselves a bit of credit, too. They would be thinking, "Well, it is true that those were dark days. But at least there were seven thousand who did not bow to Baal. Let's give them credit for that, and the Jewish people as well. There have always been Jews who have been faithful. Thank God we have the strong spiritual character we do!"

Because that kind of thinking comes naturally to all of us, and Paul knew it, he interrupts the natural flow of thought that would have led him to the distinctions between the majority of Jews and the remnant, which he develops in verses 7-10, to make sure we all understand that even the remnant exists by God's grace only. It is not that some had it in them to be faithful while others did not. It is rather that God chose the remnant to believe.

God's Grace or Man's Works?

The verse itself makes only one point: that grace and works are incompatible opposites. So if a person is to be saved by grace, it cannot be by works; otherwise, grace is not grace. Conversely, if a person is to be saved by works, it cannot be by grace; otherwise, work would not be work. The footnote of the New International Version indicates that some ancient manuscripts include the second part of the contrast.

Calvin calls Paul's statement "a comparison of opposites," adding:

The grace of God and the merit of works are so opposed to one another that if we establish one we destroy the other. If, then, we cannot allow any consideration of works in election without obscuring the unmerited goodness of God, which Paul so greatly desired to commend to us in election, those fanatics, who make the worthiness which God foresees in us the cause of our election, must consider what answer they are to give to Paul. Whether it is past or future works which we are considering, Paul's statement that grace leaves no room for works will always resound in our ears.... He states that God was led to make this distinction for no other reason than his own good pleasure, and contends that any concession given to works detracts to that extent from grace.

Today we have many evangelicals who argue for salvation by grace apart from works. But if they are asked why some are saved instead of others, they do not give Paul's answer, which is the electing grace of God, but say rather that it is because of something God sees or foresaw as being in them. Either God foresees their good works, justifying them on that basis. Or else, he foresees their faith. He knows they will believe; therefore, he elects them. The first supposition is a repudiation of the gospel. It means salvation by works instead of faith. The second supposition makes "faith" a work, and thereby excludes grace.

What shall we say about faith, then? Where does it come in? The answer is that faith is a result of regeneration or the new birth and is therefore the product and not the cause of God's election. This is exactly what Paul said in those well-known verses from Ephesians that I quoted in part earlier: "Because of his great love for us, God, who is rich in mercy, made us alive with Christ even when we were dead in transgressions.... For it is by grace you have been saved, through faith—and this not from yourselves, it is the gift of God—not by works, so that no one can boast" (Eph. 2:4-5, 8-9).

Isn't it amazing how these great doctrines of grace hang together and reinforce each other! Election, foreknowledge, sin, grace, faith—they are a gallery of doctrines before which any regenerate and understanding mind must marvel, as Paul himself clearly did.

> Amazing grace—how sweet the sound—
> That saved a wretch like me!
> I once was lost, but now am found,
> Was blind, but now I see.

A Reasonable Doctrine

Amazing Grace! Yes, but also not so amazing, at least when we consider how imperative grace is. We might even call it reasonable, not because we can give a reason why God should be gracious—there is no reason for grace but grace itself—but in the sense that, as Robert Haldane says, it is "necessarily and obviously implied in every other doctrine of the gospel."

1. "Dead in transgressions." Sometimes people think they have a problem with grace, even more so with election. But the real problem people have is not with election, grace, or foreknowledge, but with the doctrine of depravity. There are only three possible views of mankind as far as sin is concerned. The first: Some deny it. They say that people are not sinners, at least not in any metaphysical sense. The worst they will say is that we are not perfect. We are evolving beings. We are getting better and better all the time. The second: Some admit the imperfections but argue that it is possible to correct them. We can make ourselves better, if we want to. The third, the biblical view: We are so hopelessly lost in sin that there is nothing we can do to save ourselves or even to make ourselves better. We need outside help, the grace of God.

The first view may be described by saying that human beings are in great moral health. The second view says that we are sick. The third view says that we are dead so far as being able to do anything to help ourselves is concerned. We need a resurrection.

If this is true, how could salvation come in any way other than by the unmerited grace of God without any relationship to anything we might do?

"But surely God foresees which people will have faith," says someone. Really? If we are "dead in [our] transgressions and sins," as Paul writes in Ephesians 2:1, what could God possibly see but an unregenerate and therefore spiritually dead heart, unless he should have determined beforehand to give faith to it? Or again, if as Paul says in Romans 3:10-11, "There is no one righteous, not even one; there is no one who understands, no one who seeks God," what could God possibly see in us but a nature obstinately determined to resist him at every cost? If we are to be saved, clearly it is going to have to be God's work from beginning to end.

2. "You must be born again." A second doctrine that is perfectly consistent with grace and makes grace eminently necessary and reasonable is the new birth. When Jesus was talking to Nicodemus, he told him that apart from being born again he could not "see the kingdom of God" (John 3:3) and a little later that he could not "enter the kingdom of God" (v. 5). Nicodemus did not understand very much of that. He began to think in physical terms rather than spiritually, asking, "How can a man be born when he is old? Surely he cannot enter a second time into his mother's womb and be born!" (v. 4). But at least he got the idea that, whatever Jesus was talking about, it was humanly impossible. How, then, can we be born again?

Jesus gave the answer when he said, "Flesh gives birth to flesh, but the Spirit gives birth to spirit. You should not be surprised at my saying, 'You must be born again.' The wind blows wherever it pleases. You hear its sound, but you cannot tell where it comes from or where it is going. So it is with everyone born of the Spirit" (vv. 6-8). If the new birth depends on the sovereign working of God's Spirit, then it does not depend on us, and we can no more control it than we can control the wind. Salvation will have to be of God. It must be of grace from the beginning to the end.

3. "Through faith." If salvation is by grace and grace is opposed to works, then to be saved by grace through faith implies that faith is not a work. If it were a work, salvation would be by works; and, as we have already seen, if it were by works, "grace would no longer be grace."

What is faith, then? Faith is receiving what God gives. It is believing him and trusting him. Charles Haddon Spurgeon wrote, "Faith is not a blind thing; for faith begins with knowledge. It is not a speculative thing; for faith believes facts of which it is sure. It is not an unpractical, dreamy thing; for faith trusts, and stakes its destiny upon the truth of revelation.... Faith is the eye which looks.... Faith is the hand which grasps.... Faith is the mouth which feeds upon Christ." It is no credit to us to have an eye that looks or a hand that grasps or a mouth that feeds. These body parts are given to us by God. No more is faith a credit to the one who uses it, for it, too, is given by God and functions rightly only when it rests upon him.

Grace, Mercy, Peace

At the start of the two letters to Timothy, Paul has a greeting that is familiar to us, because it is used so often in benedictions to close a worship service: "Grace, mercy and peace from God the Father and Christ Jesus our Lord" (1 Tim. 1:2; 2 Tim. 1:2; cf. 2 John 3). Those three terms— grace, mercy, and peace—are worth thinking about as I bring this study to a close.

Grace has been the subject of this study. It refers to God's unmerited favor apart from anything seen or foreseen in us. It is utterly contrary to works. For work is something we do, and grace does not look to us but flows from the unfettered will of God.

Mercy is an aspect of grace. Indeed, it is almost the same thing, except that mercy has reference particularly to those who are pitiful. It looks on us and feels sorry for us. It reaches out to save us in Christ.

Peace is the last of these terms. It describes what comes to us as the result of God's grace and mercy. The first result is peace with God. God has made peace between himself and us by the blood of Christ's cross (Col. 1:20). It required an atonement. The second result is peace among human beings. By removing the need for competition, since all Christians have and are is of grace, God makes it possible for them to function peacefully within the church. The third result is personal. It is the peace that comes when we are embraced by the grace of God and know ourselves to be so.

It is for this that I call attention to those three words. As long as you are trusting to your own good works, you will never have personal peace of mind and heart, nor should you. For how can you hope to meet the righteous demands of the holy God? Live by works, and you will perish by works. It is like asking God for justice. Justice is what you will get, and justice will condemn you. But if you throw yourself upon the grace of God, trusting in Christ, then you will have peace, because your peace will depend not on your own imperfect works but upon Jesus' own perfect work for you.

After World War I, President Woodrow Wilson outlined "fourteen points" for a proposed peace settlement between the allied nations and Germany. At the time the French Prime Minister was Georges Clemenceau (1841-1929), who was difficult at the best of times and did not like Wilson's proposals, probably because they came from the United States rather than from France. "Fourteen points?" he objected. "Even God Almighty only has ten."

Actually, God's peace plan has only one point and it is that you give up trying to impress him with your sullied works and instead embrace Jesus Christ as your Savior. If you do, your experience will be like Paul's, who saw the depth of his sin and the glory of God's grace and from that point on was never the same and never stopped talking about it.

Chapter 159.
All of God: A Summary

Romans 11:7-10

There is a story about a rabbi who was trying to explain a Jew's way of thinking to a Gentile. "I'll show you how a Jew thinks," he said. "Give me the answer to these three questions. Here is the first. Two men fall down a chimney. One comes out clean and the other dirty. Which one washes?"

"That's easy," the Gentile said. "The dirty one, of course."

"Wrong," said the rabbi. "After they fall down the chimney they look at each other. The dirty one sees that his friend is clean and assumes he is clean, too. So he does nothing. The clean one washes because he looks at the other man, sees that he is dirty, and thinks that he is dirty, too."

"Here's the second question. Two men fall down a chimney. One comes out clean and the other dirty. Which one washes?"

"That's the same question," said the Gentile.

"No, it isn't," said the rabbi. "It's quite different."

"Well, then, I suppose it's the one who is clean."

"Wrong again," the rabbi replied. "The dirty one washes because he looks at his hands and sees that they are dirty. He washes. What could be more obvious than that?"

"Here's the third question. Two man fall down a chimney...." "That's the same question again," said the Gentile.

"No," said the rabbi. "It's entirely different. What's the answer?" "I don't know," said the Gentile.

"Neither of them washes, because it's a ridiculous story to begin with. How could two men fall down a chimney and one come out clean and the other dirty?"

It is because of this kind of thinking that Jews say that whenever two Jews are together you are always going to find at least three opinions.

I do not know if there is any truth to that story and that saying. But whether or not such things can be said of Jews in general, they were certainly not true of the apostle Paul, who was an ardent Jew and a very careful thinker. Paul never held to two contrary opinions, and the single opinion concerning the gospel he did hold has been pursued in Romans with relentless and irrefutable logic.

It is time to sum up some of that teaching.

A Time to Summarize

A good teacher knows when enough information has been given out and it is time for a summary, and since Paul was a good teacher he seems to have been aware that a summary was needed at precisely this point in his letter. It is what Romans 11:7-10 is about. These verses are a summing up of what Paul has written thus far in Romans 9-11.

What has he written?

First, there is his teaching about election. He introduced the subject in Romans 9, showing that God's purposes in salvation have not failed because, even though the great majority of Jews had rejected the gospel, those whom God had elected to salvation beforehand nevertheless were being saved. Later, in Romans 11, he provided examples of what he was talking about, indicating that he was among that elect number himself and that in the days of Elijah there were seven thousand who also fit that category.

Second, there is his teaching about reprobation, the doctrine that God passes by the many who are not saved, sovereignly declining to elect them to salvation. In Romans 10 Paul went to great lengths to show that this does not eliminate the guilt of those who are passed by, for we continue to be responsible for our own actions, including our unbelief, and it is for these sinful acts that we are judged.

Third, there is the reason for man's rejection of the gospel. The Jews are Paul's prime example, because he is discussing the fate of unbelieving Israel in these chapters. But it is the same for all persons apart from Christ. People reject the gospel because they want to establish their own righteousness and do not want to submit to the righteousness that comes from God. Paul discusses this in chapter 10.

Fourth, there is the teaching that what has happened historically in the overall rejection of Christ by Israel had been foretold by God and was therefore no surprise to God, nor did it cause a departure from his plan. In Romans 9, Paul gave four separate Old Testament quotations to make this point (Hos. 2:23; 1:10; Isa. 10:22-23; 1:9). In Romans 11:8-10 he provides two more: verse 8, which combines words from Deuteronomy 29:4 and Isaiah 29:10; and verses 9 and 10, which quote Psalm 69:22-23.

Grace Equals Election

Yet Paul's summaries are never mere summaries. They always seem to carry his argument just a bit further, even in summing up. In this case, Paul's summary has the effect of highlighting the doctrine of election and thus brings him back to the point from which he started out.

Robert Haldane reviews the teaching in verse 7, asking, "What is the result of all that the Apostle has been saying? It is this: Israel as a nation hath not obtained righteousness, of which it was in search (Rom. 9:31), but the election among them—the chosen remnant reserved by God, spoken of above—hath obtained it." He then asks suggestively, "Can anything more expressly affirm the doctrine of election?"

You may have noticed in that quote that, in his summary of verse 7, Haldane used the word "election" rather than "elect" (NIV). Haldane is reflecting the King James Version, rather than the New International Version. The older version says, "the election hath obtained it." But this is not only a matter of translations. The facts are that Paul carefully uses the word "election" rather than "elect" and that this is the only time in the entire New Testament in which he departs from his regular usage.

Is there a reason? There seems to be, for "election" points more strongly than "elect" to the body of the redeemed whom God has chosen, which is Paul's chief point. If he had written only that "the elect obtained it," the wording might be seen as suggesting that salvation was something the elect were themselves able to achieve. When he says "the election obtained it," it is clear they obtained it only because God first gave it to them.

So I repeat again, as I have many times in these studies, salvation is not something any of us are able to earn ourselves. Salvation is entirely of grace (v. 6). In fact, taken together, verses 6 and 7 say that grace is election and that election is grace. Without one you just do not have the other.

Election and Reprobation

There is another thing we have to have in order to have election, and that is reprobation, the passing over of those who are not chosen. These verses are particularly strong in reinforcing this teaching.

But let's do a bit of review ourselves, particularly of the comparison I made between election and reprobation earlier in this volume. I do this here because the matter is disturbing to some people. The question I asked before and now ask again is: Are the actions involved in these two doctrines to be thought of in exactly the same sense? Are they equally ultimate? That is, does God determine the destinies of individuals in exactly the same way so that, without any consideration of what they do or might do, he assigns one to heaven and the other to hell?

We know he does that in the case of those who are being saved, because we have been told that election has no basis in any good seen or foreseen in those who are elected. This is precisely what we saw in Romans 11:6, when we examined it in the previous study. The question is whether this can also be said of the reprobate, that is, that God has consigned them to hell apart from anything they have done, apart from their deserving it.

Here some important distinctions must be made. Election and reprobation are similar in at least two ways: (1) both originate in the eternal counsels or will of God, rather than in the will of man, and (2) both have the glory of God as their objective. But election and reprobation are also dissimilar in important respects.

Here are the two important points of difference.

First, when we refer to reprobation we refer to the reprobate being "passed by" (Westminster Confession of Faith, chap. 3, sec. 7). Some will argue that in its ultimate effect there is no difference between passing by and actively ordaining an individual to condemnation. But while that is true of the ultimate effect, there is nevertheless a major difference in the cause. The reason why some believe the gospel and are saved by it is that God intervenes in their lives to bring them to faith. He does this by the new birth or regeneration. But those who are lost are not made to disbelieve by God. They do that by themselves. To ordain their end, God needs only to withhold the special grace of regeneration.

Second, we speak of God's ordaining the lost "to dishonor and wrath for their sin" (Westminster Confession of Faith, chap. 3, sec. 7). That is an important observation, too, for it makes reprobation the opposite of an arbitrary action. The lost are not lost because God merely consigns them to it, but rather as righteous judgment for their wrongdoing.

Of course, the most important thing to say about these doctrines is that they are taught throughout the Bible and are therefore to be believed by all who accept the Bible as God's faithful revelation, whether we understand them well or not. In the earlier study I mentioned:

Proverbs 16:4. "The LORD works out everything for his own ends—even the wicked for a day of disaster."

John 12:39-40. 'They [the people of Jesus' day] could not believe, because, as Isaiah says elsewhere: 'He has blinded their eyes and deadened their hearts, / so they can neither see with their eyes, nor understand with their hearts, nor turn—and I would heal them.'"

John 13:18. Jesus said, "I know those I have chosen. But this [his betrayal by Judas] is to fulfill the scripture: 'He who shares my bread has lifted up his heel against me.'"

John 17:12. Jesus prayed, "While I was with them [the disciples], I protected them and kept them safe by that name you gave me. None has been lost except the one doomed to destruction so that the Scripture would be fulfilled."

1 Peter 2:7-8. "Now to you who believe, this stone [Jesus Christ] is precious. But to those who do not believe, 'The stone the builders rejected has become the capstone,' and, 'A stone that causes men to stumble and a rock that makes them fall.' They stumble because they disobey the message—which is also what they were destined for."

Jude 4. "Certain men whose condemnation was written about long ago have secretly slipped in among you."

The clearest texts are in Romans 9, where "hate" is used of Esau ("'Jacob I loved, but Esau I hated,'" v. 13) and "harden" of Pharaoh ("Therefore God has mercy on whom he wants to have mercy, and he hardens whom he wants to harden," v. 18). Romans 9 is the most forceful statement of double predestination in the Bible.

The Hardening of Israel

I said above that Paul's summaries, though summaries, always seem to carry his arguments a bit further. At this point I want you to see another way in which these verses carry the argument further. It comes by comparing Paul's teaching about reprobation in Romans 9 with what we have here.

Who was Paul using as an illustration of reprobation in chapter 9? The answer, as you can tell from the reference to that chapter above, is: Esau, the father of the Edomites, and Pharaoh, the nation's great enemy. Paul wrote that God "hated" Esau and that he "hardened" Pharaoh's heart. And so he did. No Jew would doubt that. Neither Esau nor Pharaoh was among the elect people of God. But here is the striking thing. In Romans 11 Paul is not writing about non-Jews, Edomites, and Egyptians. He is writing about Israel, which means that he is applying the doctrine of reprobation to the allegedly "chosen" people.

What is more, he is saying that even those things that should have been a blessing to them— presumably the very things he lists at the start of Romans 9 ("the adoption as sons;... the divine glory, the covenants, the receiving of the law, the temple worship and the promises... the patriarchs," vv. 4-5)—have become a "snare," "trap," "stumbling block," and "retribution" for them in their unregenerate state (11:9).

This is a critical point. It means that if the blessings of God are misused —and they always are misused unless we allow them to lead us to faith in Jesus as our Savior—they will inevitably harden our hearts, propel us into further sins, and eventually lead to even greater judgment.

There is a powerful statement of this principle at the very end of the Old Testament, in Malachi.

Those were bad days. The people, led by their priests, were far from God. They were so far from God that when he sent Malachi to rebuke them for their sins, their response was one of hostile surprise and confrontation. They retorted, "How have you loved us?... How have we shown contempt for your name?... How have we defiled you?... How have we wearied [God]?... How are we to return?... How do we rob you?...

What have we said against you?" when Malachi accused them of those sins (Mal. 1:2, 6-7; 2:17; 3:7-8, 13).

The priests were chiefly to blame for this attitude. So the strongest judgments are pronounced against them: "'If you do not listen, and if you do not set your heart to honor my name,' says the LORD Almighty, 'I will send a curse upon you, and I will curse your blessings. Yes, I have already cursed them, because you have not set your heart to honor me'" (Mal. 2:2). Sober words!

Blessings That Become Curses

Here is where this summary of Paul's teaching comes home forcefully to us. If individual Jews, who were a chosen nation, missed salvation because of their rejection of Christ and if, as a result, the blessings of God that had been given to them became a curse for these people, it is entirely possible (indeed probable) that many sitting in the evangelical churches of America today are also missing salvation because of their failure to trust Jesus in a personal way and that their blessings have become curses, too.

Do you understand that? It means that if you will not allow the good things we enjoy as allegedly Christian people to lead you to Christ, which is what God has given them to us for, they will be worse than worthless to you. They will actually be harmful and propel you inevitably into an even greater spiritual stupor, hardness of heart, and sin.

Here are four examples.

1. Baptism. Baptism is an outward sign of an inward, spiritual union with Jesus Christ. It is meant to strengthen our faith by making the inward reality more palpable to us. But countless allegedly Christian people have trusted the outward sign without the inward commitment. They have judged themselves to be saved persons without any true following after Jesus Christ. Therefore, the very thing that should have been an instruction and blessing to them has become a false ground of hope.

2. Communion. The same thing is true of communion. Entire branches of the church teach that grace is somehow imparted in the physical partaking of the elements, so that the physical act by itself conveys salvation. But the reality is not physical. The Lord's Supper is meant to show us the broken body and atoning blood of Jesus Christ and lead us to trust him and place our faith in him, not in the ceremony. If we do not trust Christ, the sacrament, which is intended to do us good, actually becomes a curse for us, and we become superstitious and even pagan in our practice.

3. Material possessions. I do not need to elaborate on this. Money and other material goods are from God. But they are dangerous, particularly when we possess them in abundance. They should lead us to God in gratitude. More often they lead us from him.

4. The Lord's Day. My fourth example is particularly timely. A short while ago the United States observed the fiftieth anniversary of the bombing of Pearl Harbor by the Japanese, which brought America into World War II and altered the course of history. It was a terrible disaster for this country, for it crippled the Pacific Fleet and claimed 2,403 young lives.

The bombing took place on Sunday morning, December 7, 1941. What is not so well known is that after the defeat of Japan in 1945, General Douglas MacArthur took control of the archives of the Japanese war department and set translators to work on the enemy's papers. They discovered that in the years prior to the war, the Japanese had sent professors to the United States to study America's national character to determine at what point and in what manner we would be most vulnerable to attack. Their combined reports judged that our guard would be lowest on a Sunday morning following a Friday on which both the Army and the Navy had a payday.

That is precisely what December 7, 1941 was. In earlier years, Sundays were sacred days of rest and worship for the majority of Americans, and even those who were not Christians respected them. But that had changed by the winter of 1941. Our day of national blessing had become a national hangover, and God turned this former blessing into a curse. That weekend at Pearl Harbor was a debauch of vast proportions, and we were unprepared and unable to meet the Japanese attack when it came.

Yet I must say, as terrible as the destruction at Pearl Harbor was, it was only physical and temporal—it is now long past—and it does not begin to compare with the spiritual condemnation of even a single eternal human soul.

Reasonable but Useless

There are probably some people, maybe many, who are taking this in an entirely mistaken fashion. You stopped following me after my review of election and reprobation, and you are now wondering, "What difference does all this make if election is true, as you teach, and I am not among that number?"

That is a reasonable question. But it is a useless one, because we do not know in advance who the elect or reprobate are. It is something hidden in the eternal counsels of God. Yet there is a way to find out if you are among the elect, and that is to turn from your sin and put your trust and confidence in Jesus Christ. That is what the elect do. If you will not have Jesus Christ as your Savior, even this clear summary of his teaching will become a curse for you. You will use it as an excuse to move even farther from Jesus and salvation. But you should not do that. Instead you should allow it to bring you to Christ, and then you will find it to be a blessing.

Chapter 160.
Riches for the Gentiles

Romans 11:11-12

To many people the doctrines of election and reprobation seem wrong because they appear to be arbitrary. "Arbitrary" means that there are no reasons for them. It means that God chooses one and not another as if he were plucking petals from a daisy, saying: "I love you.... I love you not.... I love you.... I love you not."

That is not an accurate picture, of course. True, we dare not think that God owes us an explanation for what he is doing or that we could fully understand it if he should give us a complete one. But even if we do not have an explanation, that does not mean that God does not have his reasons. God is a purposeful God, and we should rightly suppose that everything he does has a purpose, and an infinitely wise one at that.

However, God has given us some explanation of why he chooses some people and passes by others. We saw it when we were studying Romans 9. It is that God might be glorified, that is, that he might be known as he truly is. In Romans 9, Paul taught that God makes his patience, wrath, and power known in the case of the reprobate, whom he passes by and judges for their sin, and that he reveals his mercy in the case of the elect, whom he saves apart from any supposed worthiness in them.

But there is more. We remember that Paul is dealing with the meaning of history in these chapters, and this means that he is writing on what we might call a down-to-earth level as well as on a theological one. He has been talking about the passing by of the great mass of Israel, which has rejected Jesus as the Messiah. "Does God have a purpose in that?" we might ask.

The verses we come to now teach that God does have a purpose. God is using the passing by of Israel to bring salvation riches to the Gentiles.

Four Important Points

We are entering a new section of Paul's overall argument in these verses. They are the start of the sixth of the seven arguments I have outlined and reviewed many times already in this volume.

Therefore, this is a good point to look in a comprehensive way at what Paul says. In Romans 11:11-12, Paul makes four points that govern his thought throughout the remainder of the chapter.

1. Israel has "stumbled," but their stumble is not final. They fell down, but they will get up again. Earlier, Paul made the point that the unbelief of Israel is not complete; that is, there is and has always been a remnant. In this section he teaches that the unbelief of Israel will not be forever. They stumbled as a nation by their rejection of Jesus as their Savior and Messiah, but they will rise again.

2. Their "stumble" had a purpose: it would be used by God to bring salvation to the Gentiles. Later in this chapter, Paul will speak about the opening of salvation to the Gentiles as a "mystery," something that was formerly unknown and hidden but is now revealed (v. 25; cf. Rom. 16:25; Eph. 3:3-4, 6, 9; Col. 1:26). Few would have suspected this from what is taught in the Old Testament, still less that the salvation of the Gentiles would be achieved by the Jewish rejection of Jesus. But such is the case! It is an example of the "riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God" about which Paul will write later (Rom. 11:33).

It is a case of severe judgment resulting in great blessing!

Robert Haldane says of this point, "We ought to remember that the Lord may have infinitely wise and gracious motives for his most severe and terrible judgments."

3. The salvation of the Gentiles will lead in time to the "fullness" of Israel, that is, to the salvation of the Jews as a nation, and this in turn will lead to even greater Gentile blessing. If the salvation of the Gentiles was a mystery, this is an apparently greater mystery still. It means that the Jews have not been cast off so that salvation might come to the Gentiles instead, but that through Gentile salvation the Jews themselves might find Jesus as their Savior.

4. The way this will happen is by the spiritual riches of the Gentiles making Israel envious. They will see what the Gentiles have, recognize that these spiritual blessings were intended for them, and long to possess them, too. Leon Morris expresses this rightly when he writes, "Paul is saying that the salvation of the Gentiles was intended in the divine providence to arouse in Israel a passionate desire for the same good gift."

Gentile Salvation

The first two of these points are unquestionably true, of course: (1) Israel has rejected Jesus, and (2) their rejection of Jesus has resulted in the spread of the gospel to the Gentiles. The Book of Acts tells the story.

We must remember that nearly all the first Christians were Jews, in spite of the fact that people from scores of nations heard the gospel and believed it as a result of Peter's preaching at Pentecost (Acts 2:15, 40). Acts recounts how in those early days "they continued to meet together in the temple courts" (Acts 2:46), and, as we learn later through the controversy over Gentile circumcision, they all undoubtedly continued to observe the ceremonies, sabbaths, rites, feasts, and holy days of Israel. This would have continued indefinitely, with Christianity becoming only a minority sect of traditional Judaism, were it not for the persecution that broke out as a result of the opposition to the gospel by the Jewish authorities.

Acts 4 tells how Peter and John, the chief leaders, were brought before the Sanhedrin and threatened with harm unless they should cease preaching Jesus. Chapter 5 tells of the arrest and subsequent flogging of all the apostles. Chapter 7 recounts the death of Stephen, the first Christian martyr, which seems to have triggered a general persecution. The text says of that event, "On that day a great persecution broke out against the church at Jerusalem, and all except the apostles were scattered throughout Judea and Samaria" (Acts 8:1).

The scattering caused Philip, one of the newly elected deacons, to go to Samaria, where he preached Christ and many Samaritans believed (Acts 8:4-7). Then God sent him south along the desert road to Gaza, where he explained the gospel to the Ethiopian eunuch (vv. 26-39). Philip led him to Christ, and the eunuch carried the gospel back to his home in Ethiopia. Philip then made his way up the Gentile coast to Caesarea, where he seems to have settled down and carried on a long and effective ministry (Acts 21:8).

Paul's story is similar. Paul was converted on his way to Damascus to arrest Christians there. After his conversion, he might have stayed in that city except for Jewish rejection of Jesus and the consequent persecution. When "the Jews conspired to kill him," the disciples lowered the apostle over the city walls by night in a basket so he could escape (Acts 9:23-25). Paul had been living in Jerusalem before this and would probably have returned and settled there after his escape from Damascus, except for more persecution in the capital. When the Jews of Jerusalem tried to kill him, the disciples "took him down to Caesarea and sent him off to Tarsus" (v. 30).

So also later, during the course of his missionary career. It was Paul's procedure to go to the Jewish synagogues whenever he entered a city. But his message was almost universally rejected, and when that happened he went to the Gentiles. This took him to scores of Gentile cities.

At Pisidian Antioch (Acts 13). "When the Jews saw the crowds, they were filled with jealousy and talked abusively against what Paul was saying.... The word of the Lord spread through the whole region. But the Jews incited the God-fearing women of high standing and the leading men of the city. They stirred up persecution against Paul and Barnabas, and expelled them from their region" (vv. 45, 49-50). As a result, the missionary party went to Iconium.

At Iconium (Acts 14). "The Jews who refused to believe stirred up the Gentiles and poisoned their minds against the brothers.... There was a plot afoot... to mistreat them and stone them" (vv. 2, 5). As a result of this rejection, Paul and Barnabas took the gospel to the Lycaonian cities of Lystra and Derbe.

At Lystra (Acts 14). "Some Jews came from Antioch and Iconium and won the crowd over. They stoned Paul and dragged him outside the city, thinking he was dead" (v. 19). The next day, Paul and Barnabas went to Derbe.

At Thessalonica (Acts 17). On the second missionary journey, Paul and his new missionary companion, Silas, came to Thessalonica. Paul preached in the synagogue, as was his custom. "But the Jews were jealous; so they rounded up some bad characters from the marketplace, formed a mob and started a riot in the city" (v. 5). The trouble caused Paul to move on to Berea.

At Berea (Acts 17). At Berea those who rejected Christ caused trouble (v. 13), and Paul went to Athens.

At Ephesus (Acts 19). On the third missionary journey, Paul came to Ephesus. The riot at Ephesus caused Paul to leave that city and travel again through Macedonia.

In every place it was the same story. It was exactly as Paul later wrote in Romans: "Because of their transgression [he means the rejection of Jesus as Messiah and Savior by the Jews], salvation has come to the Gentiles to make Israel envious." Rejection and persecution have had that effect wherever the messengers of the cross have come. Rejection has always led to the spread of the gospel elsewhere. The great Christian apologist Tertullian said, "The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church." So it has been.

Jewish Salvation

What about the third of Paul's four points? The first two are obviously true: (1) Israel has rejected Jesus, and (2) the rejection of Jesus by Israel has resulted in the expansion of the gospel to the Gentiles. The third point is that the salvation of the Gentiles would lead in time to the "fullness" of Israel, that is, to the salvation of Israel as a nation, and that this in turn would lead to even greater Gentile blessing. This has not happened yet, but it will happen.

In view of Paul's clear statements here and throughout Romans 11, 1 cannot see how so many reformed theologians of our day reject the idea of a future time of blessing for Israel. I know why they do it. They do not like the details of prophecy that some have worked out, in which Israel seems to have a separate destiny from the church. And they do not like the implied theology. To their way of thinking, any future blessing of Israel as a nation must be a backward step, a regression in God's plan. Spiritual realities in Christ have replaced the Jewish types that pointed to them. The church has replaced Israel. In this view the church becomes the new Israel, and the old Israel is superseded forever.

But how they can affirm that, in view of Paul's teaching here? Paul is not talking about spiritual Israel in these chapters. He is talking about the Jews as a nation. And when he asks the question, "Did they stumble so as to fall beyond recovery?" his answer is as emphatic as when he is dealing with antinomianism or with the good purposes of God's law (Rom. 6:2, 15; 7:13). "Not at all!" By no means! God forbid! It was inconceivable to Paul that God would cast Israel off, because to do so would mean that God would be breaking his covenant promises, and he could not do that and remain a truth-keeping, faithful God.

The Problem Is with Us

When we look at these three points, we have to admit that there are no real problems with them:
(1) Israel has rejected Christ, (2) their rejection has resulted in an extension of blessings to the Gentiles, and (3) the nation of Israel will yet be saved. The only problem is with point four. And it is not God's problem! It is ours. Why has the conversion of Israel as a nation not taken place? If we answer in terms of the mechanism given as an answer in verse 11, the problem is obvious. For the most part, Gentile Christians have not lived in a way that would provoke anyone, let alone the Jews, to envy what they possess.

Does our conduct as Gentiles lead the Jews to desire what we have? Does it lead anybody to desire it? Honesty compels us to admit that our conduct has in general led to exactly the opposite result.

The sin is not entirely on one side, of course. Any Christian who has talked with Jews about Jesus must be amazed at the blindness that seems to have settled over most Jewish people. Even if they know their own Scriptures well, which most do not, they seem to go to incredible lengths to deny their clear teaching. Recently, an intelligent Jewish leader told a member of our staff, "Nowhere in the Scriptures is there a prophecy of an individual Jewish Messiah." This man takes the prophecies to refer to the nation collectively instead. There is much blindness.

But our sin is equal to theirs, or even greater. We know the gospel. We have the power of the Holy Spirit to live like Jesus Christ and show his love to all who are perishing, Jews and Gentiles alike. But instead of showing love to Jews, most Gentiles (even many genuine Christians) have shown the Jews prejudice and hatred. "Instead of showing to God's ancient people the attractiveness of the Christian way, Christians have characteristically treated the Jews with hatred, prejudice, persecution, malice, and all uncharitableness," writes Leon Morris.

He adds in what is surely a major understatement, "Christians should not take this passage calmly."

How Should We Evangelize?

Let us take it seriously. Let us take it seriously enough to ask: "How, then, should we evangelize?" and, "What kind of evangelists should we be?" Here are some suggestions.

1. We should be friends to those we wish to win. I do not mean to suggest by this that it is impossible to present the claims of Christ to strangers. It is possible, and we should do it as God gives opportunity. But as striking as stories about speaking to someone on an airplane and having that person make a decision for Christ on the spot may be, most conversions do not happen that way. They happen as people who know Jesus as their Savior tell friends about him. The trouble with most of us is that we do not have many non-Christian friends, though we should have.

There is an emphasis today on what is called "friendship evangelism. "Joe Aldrich has written books on this subject. It is how the Billy Graham crusades are lifted up and carried forward, and the crusade workers train lay people in this area. I commend it to you.

2. We should be models of help and service. We should be models in this area even apart from any evangelistic interest, simply because we should be helpful and serving people. But, in addition to this, there is no doubt that many have been won to Christ by someone who helped them in Christ's name. Aren't you disposed to like and listen to someone who helps you? And aren't you turned off by someone who does not? Or is rude? Why should it be any different with unbelievers?

If you are serious about evangelism, you should seek ways to help others regularly. If you do not know how to do this on your own, find a program that will give you a structure for it.

3. Let everything you do be characterized by love. The distinguished missionary statesman E. Stanley Jones once asked the Indian leader Mahatma Gandhi what Christians would have to do to win India for Jesus Christ. Gandhi knew India well, and he knew Christians well, too. He said, "There are four things Christians should do if they want to win India for Christ. First, Christians should act like Jesus Christ. Second, do not compromise your faith. Third, learn all you can about the non-Christian religions. And fourth, let everything you do be characterized by love." Gandhi knew the force of love, and he had seen much of its opposite, particularly from Christians. So he spoke wisely when he reminded the followers of Jesus: "Let everything you do be characterized by love."

4. We must verbalize the gospel. We must act out of love, but we must also speak the truth of the gospel in love, because the gospel is truth and it is the truth of his Word that God blesses.

How do we do that in the area of Jewish evangelism? We have to be friends first, of course. We have to be helpful and show love. But, having done that and thus having earned a right to speak, we can begin by reminding the Jews of their own great religious heritage. We can remind them that there were many thousands of years of past history when Israel alone had knowledge of the true God. In the days of Abraham and the patriarchs, Moses, David and the other kings, Isaiah and Jeremiah and the prophets, only the Jews knew God truly. God was the God of Israel. Gentiles were outside of that great national body, and their religions were utter paganism. While the Gentiles lived in their paganism and its resulting moral degeneracy, the Jews were receiving God's moral law and were being taught the way of approach to God by sacrifices.

In that day, the only way a Gentile could be saved was by identifying with the Jewish nation. A few did. Ruth the Moabitess was one. Naaman the Syrian was another. But there were not many. Most Gentiles were cut off from salvation by geography and ethnic origins. Jesus was right when he told the Samaritan woman, "Salvation is from the Jews" (John 4:22).

But when God sent Jesus to be the Savior, he sent him not only to be the Savior of the Jews but as the world's Savior, too. When Jesus died, God showed this by tearing the veil of the temple in two from top to bottom. That act signified that the way to God was now open to anyone who would come through faith in his sacrifice. In one sense that meant the end of Judaism, at least in its ancient form. No Jew today worships at a temple in Jerusalem. No Jew brings the required sacrifices for sin. The end of that system was the opening of salvation to Gentiles.

It is the way I have been saved. Now by the grace of the God of Israel, I, a Gentile "dog," have been brought into the blessings that ancient Israel once enjoyed alone. I have been made a member of the covenant people. I have been brought by faith into the spiritual succession of the patriarchs.

I realize that the very name "Jesus" may be offensive to you if you are a Jew, and I can understand why. Christians, certainly Gentiles, have often behaved horribly toward Jews. But I ask you to recognize this: If Jesus is not the Messiah of Israel, then there is no hope for my salvation. I am a lost pagan, without hope and without God in the world. It is only by the Jewish Messiah and by the grace of the Jews' God that I am saved. That is why I commend Jesus so earnestly to you as your Savior.

Chapter 161.
Life from the Dead

Romans 11:13-15

The title of this study, "Life from the Dead," is taken from the phrase Paul uses for the anticipated salvation of Israel as a nation in the final days of world history: "If their rejection is the reconciliation of the world, what will their acceptance be but life from the dead?" (v. 15). This is a tremendous prediction, a description of what can only rightly be called a national resurrection. But if we are to understand the resurrection part, both for Israel and ourselves, which is our goal in this study, we must begin with the part that speaks about death.

In our day Israel is spiritually dead, though she is to rise again, just as all persons are spiritually dead apart from the life-giving work of God in Jesus Christ. To deal with this important subject, I want to start not with the teaching of Paul in Romans 11, though we will come back to it, but with the teaching of Jesus Christ.

The Death of a Nation

During the last week of our Lord's earthly life, following his entry into Jerusalem on what we call Palm Sunday, Jesus focused nearly all his teaching on events that were to come. John's Gospel has one version of this emphasis; it tells us about Jesus' private teaching of the disciples. This instruction had to do largely with the coming of the Holy Spirit, the privilege of prayer, persecution from the world, and Jesus' promise to take care of his disciples and make them fruitful in his service.

The Synoptic Gospels focus on the Lord's public teaching.

What did Jesus teach publicly? I ask this question here, because the emphasis was along the lines Paul has been developing in the eleventh chapter of Romans and is the background for it.

Consider the twenty-first chapter of Matthew. The first part of that chapter describes Jesus' triumphal entry into Jerusalem, followed by the cleansing of the temple. This angered the Jewish leaders, with the result that Jesus "left them" figuratively as well as literally (v. 17), returning to Bethany where he and his disciples spent each night of the final week.

The next morning on the way back to the city, Jesus saw a fig tree, which he approached, expecting to find figs. Instead, it was barren; so he cursed it, saying, "May you never bear fruit again!" (v. 19). This was not a rare case of pique on Jesus' part. Everyone can understand that. Rather it was a parable in which the fig tree represented Israel. The tree was supposed to have been fruitful, but it was not. It was judged for its barrenness.

This acted parable is then followed by a pair of spoken parables. The first concerned two sons, each of whom was told by his father to go and work in his vineyard (Matt. 21:28-32). One said he would go, but did not. The other refused, but later went. When Jesus asked which son did what his father wanted, his hearers replied rightly that it was the one who actually went into the vineyard and worked there. Jesus made this application: "I tell you the truth, the tax collectors and the prostitutes are entering the kingdom of God ahead of you. For John came to you to show you the way of righteousness, and you did not believe him, but the tax collectors and the prostitutes did. And even after you saw this, you did not repent and believe him" (vv. 31-32).

The point is obvious. It is not what we say that matters with God, but what we do, and what God requires us to do is to repent of our sin and believe on Jesus. The people as a whole had not done this.

The second parable is even more devastating. It concerned a landowner who planted a vineyard and leased it to tenant farmers (Matt. 21:32-44). He went away on a journey, and when the harvest came, he sent servants to collect his share of the produce. Instead of giving it to him, the tenants seized the servants, beat one, killed another, and stoned a third. At last the owner sent his son, thinking the tenants would respect him. But instead of respecting him and receiving him well, the tenants killed him, too.

"When the owner of the vineyard comes, what will he do to those tenants?" Jesus asked.

The religious leaders answered that he would bring them "to a wretched end," then "rent the vineyard to other tenants," who would "give him his share of the crop at harvest time" (v. 41).

Jesus then made clear that in this parable God is the Father, he himself is the Son, and his hearers are the tenant farmers. He quoted Psalm 118:22, which says, "The stone the builders rejected has become the capstone," concluding, "Therefore I tell you that the kingdom of God will be taken away from you and given to a people who will produce its fruit" (v. 43). This was an unequivocable statement that the kingdom of God would be taken away from the Jewish people and given to the Gentiles, which, of course, is exactly what Paul teaches has happened.

In the verses that are our text (Rom. 11:13-15), Paul speaks of Israel having been rejected (v. 15). In the verses we looked at in the last study, he made the same point by speaking of the people's "fall" and "loss" (vv. 11-12).

A Present Sad Reality

This is an all-too-sad reality, of course. As Paul saw it, the tragedy lay in Israel's rejection of Jesus as the Messiah, with all that entailed. For centuries the Jews had been waiting anxiously for the Messiah's coming, asking themselves whether any leader who emerged above the average might be him. This is what they asked John the Baptist. "Are you the Christ?" "Are you Elijah?" "Are you the Prophet?" (cf. John 1:19-21). If Jesus was the Christ, as Paul firmly preached he was, Israel's rejection of Jesus was a rejection of the very future for which they had been hoping. It was a repudiation of their spiritual destiny. Paul was acutely aware of this and grieved for what his people had lost.

But even that is not the worst that had happened. If Jesus was the Messiah, the kingdom of God was wrapped up in him and to reject him was to reject or lose that kingdom.

This means that by rejecting Jesus, Israel lost all that was truly spiritual in their heritage. They still had their feasts and celebrations, of course, but they lost what those important celebrations stood for. Yom Kippur, the Day of Atonement, is a chief example. On that day the high priest was to perform two important acts. First, he was to sacrifice a goat and then take some of its blood into the Most Holy Place of the temple and sprinkle it on the Mercy Seat of the Ark of the Covenant, thereby making atonement for the people's sins. The blood of the innocent victim thus came between the holy presence of God, understood to be above the Mercy Seat between the outstretched wings of the cherubim, and the broken law of God, which was contained within the Ark. It was a picture of what theologians call substitutionary or vicarious atonement. It is why the day was rightly called the Day of Atonement.

The second act involved a live goat. The high priest was to place his hands upon the head of this goat while confessing the sins of the people to God, thereby transferring them to the goat in a symbolic way. Then the goat was to be driven out into the wilderness to die there. This symbolized the bearing away of the nation's sins.

This symbolism was fulfilled by Jesus Christ, who made atonement for our sins by his death and also bore them away from us, which was symbolized by his dying outside the walls of Jerusalem. When Israel rejected Jesus, the people lost what the Day of Atonement stood for. So today, although Jews observe Yom Kippur, it is no longer a true day of atonement, because there is no atonement. There are no sacrifices. Instead, it has become a day merely for confessing one's sin and feeling remorse for it. It has become a ritual rather than a hopeful reality.

Even the Passover has suffered this fate. The central feature of the Passover was the Passover lamb, the blood of which was spread upon the doorposts of the houses of the Jewish people so that the angel of death would pass over them and the firstborn of those homes would not die. The blood of the lamb was an atonement for the people's sin, just as the blood of the goat was an atonement. The Jewish people were as much sinners as the Egyptians. But today, when the Passover is observed by Jews, the day has no atoning significance. Indeed, it has nothing to do with sin or its removal, but only with the memory of the physical deliverance of the people from their earthly bondage.

All this was finalized, as it were, by the destruction of Jerusalem shortly after the time of Jesus and Paul. When the Romans conquered the city in 72 A.D., the temple was destroyed, and it has never been rebuilt. The temple ceremonies ceased with its destruction. In fact, even the nation ceased to exist as a nation, and it is only recently and after nearly two thousand of years of history that a remnant of the people has been regathered in their homeland as the newly reconstructed Israel.

A Resurrected People

That may very well be significant. For although in Paul's day the nation was on the verge of ceasing to be a nation, the regathering of the people in our day may be the beginning of events leading to the resurrection of the people about whom Paul is speaking.

There are three possible ways the phrase "life from the dead" can be taken. It is appropriate to note them here.

1. A figurative expression. The words can be no more than a figurative expression, which is how Charles Hodge regards them. "The most common and natural interpretation is that which considers the later clause ['life from the dead'] as merely a figurative expression of a joyful and desirable event. " There is nothing wrong with this, of course. The conversion of the masses of Israel, resulting in additional blessing for the Gentile world, can certainly be described by any phrase that is joyful. But "life from the dead" is such a powerful phrase that it is hard to believe that it does not suggest a great deal more than this.

2. The final resurrection. A large number of commentators, both ancient and modern, have thought of the phrase "life from the dead" as referring to the final resurrection, on the grounds that only the resurrection of the dead can be the climactic event of world history. The resurrection and the final judgment to follow it are the climax of world history, of course. But it is questionable whether "life from the dead" can mean this. Leon Morris notes that "life from the dead" nowhere else refers to the resurrection, and the closest equivalent phrase ("alive from the dead," Rom. 6:13, Greek text) refers not to the resurrection, but to the spiritual life of Christians through their mystical union with Jesus Christ.

Besides, Paul is speaking of something that is to occur within history, and the resurrection is not to be thought of as being within history so much as being the termination of it.

Paul's use of the illustration of the olive tree in the verses that follow also suggests this, because it places the breaking off of the Jewish branches, the grafting in of the Gentile branches, and the eventual regrafting of the Jewish branches all on the same plane. Since the first two are within history, the last should be also.

3. The spiritual regeneration of Israel. The third interpretation does not exclude interpretation number one, but it sees "life from the dead" as referring also to the spiritual regeneration of the Jewish people, which will certainly be necessary if they are to believe on Jesus as their Messiah and be saved by him. It is a necessity for everyone.

Why did the Jews reject Jesus, after all? It is not sufficient to say that they were "a stiff-necked people," extremely stubborn, although many Jews undoubtedly are, just like many Gentiles. The reason people reject Jesus Christ is because they are dead in their sins, and being spiritually dead, they are unable to understand the extent of their need, comprehend the grace of God in the gospel, or yield their hearts to the Savior. This is what Paul was teaching in the earlier chapters of this letter when he pointed out that

> There is no one righteous, not even one; there is no one who understands, no one who seeks God.
> Romans 3:10-11

It is what he teaches in Ephesians when he writes, "As for you, you were dead in your transgressions and sins" (Eph. 2:1). Paul means that apart from a spiritual resurrection, which Jesus called being "born again," no one is able to be good, understand spiritual things, or seek God. On the contrary, we run away from him and make substitute gods to take the true God's place.

"The Resurrection and the Life"

So what is the solution? The solution is obvious. We need to be born again. We need a spiritual resurrection. We need God, because only God is able to give life and provide resurrections. But praise be to God, this is exactly what God does. God is in the resurrection business.

I remind you of the death and resurrection of Lazarus (John 11:1-44). Jesus had been away from Jerusalem and Bethany preaching in the area of the Jordan River when Lazarus got sick, and although the sick man's sisters immediately sent word to Jesus, Lazarus died and had been in his tomb four days before Jesus got back to Bethany where Lazarus's sisters lived. At first Jesus had private conversations with the two sisters, Martha and later Mary. He told Martha, "I am the resurrection and the life. He who believes in me will live, even though he dies, and whoever lives and believes in me will never die" (v. 25). It was a declaration that Jesus is able to bring life out of death, both spiritually and physically, the very thing we are talking about.

When Jesus asked where Lazarus had been buried, the sisters, their friends, and the accompanying mourners led him to the tomb. Jesus asked for the stone to be removed. "But, Lord," said Martha, "by this time there is a bad odor, for he has been there four days."

Jesus replied that she was going to "see the glory of God." He prayed, thanking God that he had heard him and always heard him. Then he addressed the dead man.

"Lazarus, come out!"

The Bible says, in what is surely a great understatement, "The dead man came out, his hands and feet wrapped with strips of linen, and a cloth around his face" (v. 44).

If this were only the story of a physical resurrection, it would be spectacular enough. We have bodies, and our bodies die. We need physical resurrections if we are to stand before God, see his face, and worship him forever—as we sense we have been destined by God to do. But the deaths of our bodies are not our greatest problem, nor is a physical resurrection our greatest need. We also have dead souls, and we need the resurrection of our souls and spirits if we are to turn to Jesus Christ in living faith and find salvation in him.

Fortunately, the story of Lazarus is also about spiritual resurrections and the promise that spiritual life is to be found in Jesus. He alone can do what needs to be done. He alone can call us from the dark, loathsome charnel house of sin.

And he does. Everyone who has ever come to Christ in saving faith has experienced just such a spiritual resurrection. We were dead in our sins, but we heard Jesus calling, "Lazarus, come out!... John, come out!... Mary, come out!... Robert, come out!..." Whatever our name has been!

And we responded. All who have ever heard that call have responded and have thereby passed out of spiritual death into spiritual life.

Have you? If you have not, I urge you to pay attention to the Bible, the Word of God, because it is through the Bible and its teaching that Jesus calls men and women today. Read it. Allow yourself to be exposed to sound teaching. Meditate on Bible truths.

I believe that if you do that, you will hear Jesus calling and will find that his call is bringing you to new spiritual life.

Resurrection of a Nation

This brings me back to Israel as a nation, for it is Israel we are talking about primarily, and it is the resurrection of that nation that is our chief concern in this passage. We are studying the teaching that the Jews will have a spiritual rebirth in the final days.

I know there are people who consider that impossible, and for a number of reasons. Some reasons are theological, like those I mentioned in the previous study. Some are practical: "How can such a thing happen, considering the fierce opposition the Jews have shown to the gospel through the centuries?" I grant that these are large obstacles on the human level. I cannot even imagine how my sympathetic Gentile neighbor can come to believe in Christ, considering the effects of sin in blinding the human heart, not to mention Jewish people, who have good historical reasons for resenting Christians and resisting evangelism.

But we are not talking on the human level here. We are speaking about God and about resurrections, of which only he is capable. "With God all things are possible" (Matt. 19:26). Why should the future gathering in of Israel be thought impossible when it is God who is doing the gathering?

New Life Now

Let me add something else as well, even though it is not to be found in our text, strictly speaking. Because God is God of the impossible and of resurrections, God is also more than adequate for your problems in life right now, whatever they might be.

I have had people tell me that their problems are insolvable. They have been trapped in a sinful sexual relationship that they could not break or an addiction from which they could not free themselves. Is that your story? If it is, let me assure you that it is not impossible for God to solve. If Jesus can raise Lazarus from the dead, he can break your destructive habits. He can free you from any sin, however dreadful it may be or however long you may have practiced it. He can release you to serve him.

Other people have told me that a relationship that once meant a great deal to them has died. People often speak this way of a marriage that is going through difficult times. What do you do when love seems to have departed and affection seems to have failed? The world is ready to break off such marriages, of course, claiming that they must have been mistakes. But if this is your situation, I tell you on the authority of the Word of God that this is no course for a Christian. You are to stand against this "easy" escape, and prove by the resurrection of your marriage that God is still the God of miracles.

Do you say it can't happen? Not to you?

Of course, it can happen. Do you think you are a more difficult case than anyone else? You are not. You are like everybody else. And besides, who said it has anything to do with what you are like? We are not talking here about human possibilities. We are speaking about what God can do and will do if you will ask him to do it and determine to obey him, however costly that may be. What is more, if you will do it, you will find that the demonstration of the life-giving power of God in your life will be used by God to draw others to faith, just as many believed on Jesus because of his resurrection of Lazarus.

One of the reasons we have so little true faith today is that we have so few genuine transformations. Let us do what we can to set that straight. Let us have more "life from the dead" Christianity.

Chapter 162.
Holy to the Lord

Romans 11:16

If I were to ask anyone today what he or she thinks of first when asked to list the characteristics or attributes of God, I am sure that in nearly every case the person I would be speaking to would say "love." Yet that would not have been true for the Old Testament saints. They would have said "holiness." Surprisingly, that is a concept almost never thought about by most people today.

What is more, not only did the Old Testament figures think of holiness when they thought about God. They also thought of holiness in reference to anything or anybody who had contact with God, for they knew that only what is holy can have contact with him. Holiness dominated their religious ideas. We can see this by the variety of ways the word holy is used. R. C. Sproul, in his study of The Holiness of God, provides a partial list of items to which the word was applied: holy ground, holy Sabbath, holy convocation, holy nation, holy anointing oil, holy linen coat, holy jubilee, holy house, holy field, holy tithe, holy water, holy censers, holy ark, holy bread, holy city, holy seed, holy word, holy covenant, holy ones, the Holy Place, and the Holy of Holies.

On top of everything else, God was the thrice-holy God. "Holy, holy, holy is the LORD Almighty," called the angels (Isa. 6:3).

Holy Dough and Holy Branches

We need to remember this when we come to Romans 11:16, for Paul is certainly writing within an Old Testament framework when he says, almost casually, "If the part of the dough offered as firstfruits is holy, then the whole batch is holy; if the root is holy, so are the branches."

That strikes us as very strange.

Holy dough? And holy branches? We can understand how God might be thought of as holy, though we probably do not understand what even that means very well. But to speak of things like dough and branches as "holy" seems almost humorous. It is as though Paul were pulling our leg.

He is not, of course. What he is doing is drawing upon an Old Testament understanding of holiness to carry forward the important point he is making in Romans 11, namely, that God has not given up on Israel. It is true that the mass of Israel has been laid aside temporarily in order that by their rejection, salvation might come to the Gentiles. But even in this period of rejection, Israel has not been rejected utterly; a remnant is still being saved. Nor will Israel be rejected finally; for at the last the masses of Israel will be brought to faith in Jesus Christ, who died for them that they might have forgiveness for their sins.

We need to look at these two images carefully and then apply them to God and his dealings both with Israel and with us.

1. The dough. The translation of the first part of verse 16 given to us by the New International Version is a bit more explicit than Paul himself. Paul does not use the word dough. He writes (literally), "If the firstfruit is holy, so also the lump." The emphasis is on "firstfruit," and when we check this concept out in the Old Testament we find it applied to a variety of substances. For example, in Exodus 23:19 it is applied to the first produce of the land, whatever it might be (cf. Deut. 26:1-11). In Exodus 34:22 it is applied to the wheat harvest specifically, and the people are told to present the "firstfruits" in a festival called the Feast of Weeks (cf. Num. 28:26-31) and later at the Feast of Ingathering. Leviticus 2:12, 14 calls the "firstfruits" a grain offering. Leviticus 23 elaborates on the way the offering is to be made. Numbers 15:20-21 describes the offering as a "cake" made from a portion of ground meal. In Numbers 18:12 the "firstfruits" are olive oil and new wine, as well as grain.

Paul does not specify which of these "firstfruit" offerings he has in mind. But since he ends the sentence with the word lump, the New International Version translators are probably right to assume that Paul is thinking of Numbers 15 particularly and so offer the interpretive translation, "If the part of the dough offered as firstfruits is holy, then the whole batch is holy."

But we still haven't discovered what this means. We are wondering, "What are the firstfruits? And what does the 'whole batch' represent?"

The only way to understand this image is from the context, of course. But even when we do that there are at least two possibilities. Some writers have identified the "firstfruits" as the first Jewish converts, thus viewing them as a pledge of more converts to come, represented by the "whole batch." That would prepare for the conclusion Paul will reach in verse 26: "And so all Israel will be saved." The trouble is that it would be out of step with the second of the two images Paul uses: that of the root and branches. In that image, the root stands for the patriarchs. It is how Paul himself interprets it in verse 28: "As far as the gospel is concerned, they are enemies on your account; but as far as election is concerned, they are loved on account of the patriarchs."

This parallel suggests that both "firstfruits" in the first illustration and "root" in the second illustration represent Abraham, which is the second of the two possibilities I mentioned. Most commentators hold to this view, among them Charles Hodge, who gives four excellent reasons why the reference must be to Abraham.

2. The root and the branches. The second of these two images is not so prominent in the Old Testament, but it is the easier of the two to understand, since Paul develops it himself in this passage. It is what verses 17-24, which follow our text, are all about. In this similitude, the root stands for the patriarchs of Israel (perhaps only Abraham), the natural olive with its many branches stands for the nation of Israel, and the wild olive tree stands for the Gentile peoples. In Paul's development of the idea, the natural branches, representing individual Jews or successive generations of Jews, are broken off in order that branches from the wild tree, representing individual Gentiles or successive generations of Gentiles, are grafted in. The bottom line of the illustration is that in time God is going to graft the original or natural branches back into their own olive tree.

This brings us to the root meaning of verse 16, of course. For Paul is saying that the patriarchs were "set apart" to God and that this has inescapable consequences for their descendants. To put it in the simplest possible terms: The Jews are a special people because of their descent from Abraham, and this is true of them even in their rebellious and unregenerate state. It means that even yet God has not given up on Israel.

A Holy Nation

Here we have to think about the word holy. It is one of the hardest words in the Bible to define. There are several reasons for this. One is that it is a chief, if not the chief attribute of God, and we can never understand God as he is in himself completely. It is also difficult because the word is used of people ("Be holy, because I am holy," Lev. 11:44-45; cf. Lev. 19:2; 20:7; 1 Peter 1:16) and of objects. A few of the objects it is linked to were listed earlier. The bottom line of these three applications of the word holy—(1) to God, (2) to human beings, and (3) to objects—is that holiness has to do with being "set apart." If you can remember that, you will be able to understand the word in each of these rather diverse applications.

1. A holy God. When we speak about God being holy, most people think that this means that God does not sin. Everything he does is right. That is involved in the matter of God being holy, but it is not really what holiness is about. Holiness means that God is "set apart" from us. That is, he is not like us. He is over and above and utterly beyond us, so that we cannot even begin to imagine what he is like except to the extent that he stoops to reveal himself to us.

Theologians have stretched themselves to find terms to express what this means. Germans speak of God being ganz anders or "wholly other." English theologians speak of God being transcendent. Rudolf Otto, a German writer, coined a term in Latin, speaking of God as the mysterium tremendum, which means an "awe-inspiring mystery."

Let me express this another way. When we speak of God's attributes, we are inclined to list holiness along with such other things as sovereignty, omnipotence, eternity, grace, mercy, love, and so on. But, strictly speaking, holiness does not belong in this catalogue at all, since it describes all that God is and since it qualifies every other attribute. In other words, God is not just sovereign; his is a holy sovereignty. God is not just love; his is a holy love. And so on.

Holiness is what sets God apart from us and renders him awesome to us, who are both finite and sinful.

2. Holy objects. How, then, can objects be called holy? At first glance this seems to be utterly impossible, if holiness refers to what God is wholly in himself. But as soon as we remember that holiness describes what is "set apart," the word begins to make sense. Objects become holy when they are "set apart" to God's service rather than to common uses. It is in this way that the Sabbath becomes holy to the Lord. It is a day set apart to God. We desecrate it when we use it for secular ends. In the same way, water, bread, and the temple become holy water, holy bread, and a holy temple when they are set apart for God's service. Each of them becomes holy because of the use to which it is dedicated. In fact, we can speak of holiness as dedication, that is, as something "given to God," or even consecration, which means "to render sacred (or holy)."

3. A holy people. All this brings us to the main point of our study and to the text. For we are speaking here of a holy people, and in its primary sense a holy people is a people "set apart" for God. This is what Israel was and is. The Jews were set apart to God by his > choice of Abraham. Therefore, because Abraham was set apart, so are his descendants, even to this day. This does not mean that all the descendants of Abraham, all Jews, are saved, of course. Paul has already shown that this is not the case. But it does mean that they remain a people set apart for God's purposes. To put it in other language, God is not finished with Israel yet.

One writer who sees this and develops it well is Robert Haldane. He provides several Old Testament texts to illustrate the principle.

Deuteronomy 7:6. In this chapter, Moses is instructing the people on what they are to do when they enter the Promised Land. They are to destroy the Canaanite peoples and their culture, above all refusing to intermarry with them. Why? "For you are a people holy to the LORD your God. The LORD your God has chosen you out of all the peoples on the face of the earth to be his people, his treasured possession."

Deuteronomy 10:15 (with 4:37; 14:2; 26:19; 32:8-9). Israel had been very rebellious against God. Moses reminds the people of it. Nevertheless, he says, "The LORD set his affection on your forefathers and loved them, and he chose you, their descendants, above all the nations, as it is today."

Exodus 2:24. The people were slaves in Egypt and cried out under their harsh bondage. "God heard their groaning and he remembered his covenant with Abraham, with Isaac and with Jacob."

Deuteronomy 4:31. This chapter foresees a day in which the people would fall into idolatry, forsaking the God who had loved them, delivered them from Egypt, and brought them into their land. It promises that in spite of their sin, if they would call out to God in their distress, God would hear them and deliver them. "For the LORD your God is a merciful God; he will not abandon or destroy you or forget the covenant with your forefathers, which he confirmed to them by oath."

Isaiah 43:21. "... my chosen, the people I have formed for myself that they may proclaim my praise."

1 Samuel 12:22. After Israel had asked for an earthly king and was given one, Samuel rebuked them for their sin. Nevertheless, he added, "For the sake of his great name the LORD will not reject his people, because the LORD was pleased to make you his own."

It would be possible to add scores of additional verses like these, all showing that for the sake of the patriarchs the people of Israel had a special relationship to God, even when they sinned, and that God would not abandon them. Did they suffer for their sin? Of course! Were all Jews saved? Of course not! Nevertheless, many were, and down through the course of history the purposes of God for his people continued unchanged and in the end will result in their national conversion. Haldane concludes rightly, "As the lump is holy through the offering of the firstfruit and as the tree derives its character from the root, so the descendants of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, whom the Lord chose, were set apart by solemn covenant for his service and glory."

Holy "On That Day"

I have spoken several times of the Jews as being holy to God in spite of how they lived, that is, as holy even in Israel's rebellion, since they remain God's special people and fulfill God's purposes even in that state. One of those purposes is the salvation of the Gentiles now being accomplished through their rejection, as we have seen. Yet I recognize that it is possible to gain a wrong impression from what I have said about being holy "even in rebellion" and to assume that God does not care how we live. Or, to put it in other words, to suppose that we can be saved without holiness. I want to correct that now, since we must always remember that "without holiness no one will see the Lord" (Heb. 12:14).

To make this point, let me take you to the end of the Book of Zechariah. I go to Zechariah for three reasons. First, Zechariah is a postexilic prophet. That is, he wrote after the return of the Jews from their exile to Babylon. This is important, because there are people who suppose that all the promises of God to the Jews were fulfilled either in the days of Solomon (when they enjoyed the fullest extent of their territorial possessions), in the days of Ezra and Nehemiah (when they were regathered from many places to which they had been scattered), or by the coming of Jesus Christ (when the types and symbols of their earthly worship were fulfilled spiritually in him). But Zechariah lived after the exile and was looking forward to blessing for Israel in days that were (and are) clearly still to come.

Second, Zechariah envisions a specific great day of national blessing, which he refers to repeatedly in the last chapters of his prophecy by the words "on that day." The phrase occurs sixteen times (Zech. 12:3, 4, 6, 8, 9, 11; 13:1, 2, 4; 14:4, 6, 8, 9, 13, 20, 21), and there are other similar terms in addition. This seems to refer to the day (or days) of the final consummation of all things, for it includes judgment upon the Gentile nations as well as forgiveness, restoration, and spiritual blessing for Israel.

The third reason I refer to Zechariah is that the prophet ends on the exact note we have been studying: holiness. In fact, it is he who uses the phrase "holy to the Lord," which I have taken as the title for this study.

Here is how he writes: "On that day HOLY TO THE LORD will be inscribed on the bells of the horses, and the cooking pots in the LORD'S house will be like the sacred bowls in front of the altar. Every pot in Jerusalem and Judah will be holy to the LORD Almighty, and all who come to sacrifice will take some of the pots and cook in them. And on that day there will no longer be a Canaanite in the house of the LORD Almighty" (Zech. 14:20-21).

What is Zechariah getting at? Why holy bells? And holy cooking pots? The answer, of course, is that Zechariah is looking ahead to the same day Paul is anticipating in Romans 11, when the Jews as a nation will be brought to God and will be forgiven for their sin and purified from it. In that day there will be no mixture, a remnant saved and the larger portion lost. Nor will the people be saved and yet remain in sin. They will be a thoroughly purified people, so much so that everything associated with them will be holy, even the bells on their horses and the pots on their stoves. They will be set apart to God to such a degree that everything they have or touch will be dedicated to him.

And there is another interesting point. In the paragraph immediately before this, Zechariah describes the revitalized people going to Jerusalem to worship God by celebrating the Feast of Tabernacles (or Ingathering). This was a feast at which the "firstfruits" were offered. But the reason for the reference at this point in Zechariah is that the Feast of Tabernacles was the final harvest festival, when the whole year's crop was gathered in. We can hardly miss the symbolism. It is the day when the crop of Israel will be gathered to God, when Israel as a nation will be "holy to the Lord" (Zech. 14:20), when "Israel will be saved" (Rom. 11:26).

Our Common Destiny: Holiness

As I began this study I said that in the end I wanted to apply it to ourselves as well as to Israel as a nation, and I want to do that now in closing. The point is that this is also our destiny as Christians. We, too, are to be "holy to the Lord." And if that is the case, if that is what we will surely be one day—since "without holiness no one will see the Lord"—we must strive to be holy now.

Here is how I applied this in my earlier study of the Minor Prophets. Have you ever thought of your destiny in terms of holiness? If you are a Christian, you have been set apart to God to be wholly his. But you are not holy now. You are sinful now, and the more you live, the more you will be aware of it. Your destiny is holiness. That is why we read about this so often in the Bible. God told the people through Moses, "Be holy, because I am holy" (Lev. 11:44-45; cf. 19:2; 20:7). And Peter picks up on the theme, writing, "But just as he who called you is holy, so be holy in all you do; for it is written: 'Be holy, because I am holy'" (1 Peter 1:15-16). This is not only a command. It is our sure end. If we belong to Jesus Christ, God, whose purposes do not change, will make us like him in holiness one day.

We usually think of salvation relationally today. That is why, as I said at the beginning of this study, we think of God's attributes as being, first of all, love, then perhaps mercy, kindness, goodness, and such things. This is not wrong, of course. God is love, and we are being enabled to love him and others because he first loved us and so showed us what love is like.

But this is not the way the Bible speaks of our destiny. It is not the love relationship that is emphasized. We are not told that we will spend our time in heaven loving God and others, though we undoubtedly will. The Bible emphasizes holiness. And the reason it does is that a lack of holiness is what accounts for our inability to love rightly and, in fact, to do anything else well. The reason our relationships to God are not all they should be is that we are not holy. The reason why our relationships to others are not all they should be is that we are not holy. We need to be holy.

But, praise God, one day we shall be holy. "We shall be like [Jesus], for we shall see him as he is" (1 John 3:2).

So why not be holy now? That is what John concludes. For immediately after telling us that we will be like Jesus one day, he says, "Everyone who has this hope in him purifies himself, just as he is pure" (v. 3). Do you? You will, if you have your eyes fixed on that great destiny.

Chapter 163.
Root, Shoot, and Branches

Romans 11:17-24

If there is any one thing that illustrations are supposed to accomplish, it is that they are to make what is being taught clear. Charles Spurgeon, the great Baptist preacher who was exceptionally good at illustrations, called them "windows that let in light."

The interesting thing about the Bible's illustrations is that they do not always do that. In fact, they sometimes seem to do the opposite. Think of Jesus' parable of the sower (Matt. 13:1-23). After Jesus had described to the masses of his listeners the four kinds of soil and the four results of the farmer's sowing, the disciples, who did not understand him, asked what the story meant and why he was speaking in parables. Surprisingly, Jesus replied, "The knowledge of the secrets of the kingdom of heaven has been given to you, but not to them.... This is why I speak to them in parables..." (vv. 11, 13). He was saying that the purpose of his story was to obscure, rather than make the teaching plain.

A Difficult Illustration

The apostle Paul was not trying to be obscure when he introduced in Romans 11 the illustration of the olive tree with its rejected and newly grafted branches. He was trying to be clear. Nevertheless, the illustration seems to have been unusually difficult for subsequent readers of this letter. I gave what I considered to be the obvious meaning of the metaphor in the last study—the "root" is Abraham, the branches that have been "broken off are subsequent generations of unbelieving Jews, the branches that have been "grafted in" are believing Gentiles. But not everyone thinks it is that clear. One commentator remarked that he uncovered at least a half-dozen different interpretations in the course of his preparation of these verses.

In my opinion these difficulties stem largely from the most common of all errors in studying parables or illustrations. That is, to press them beyond the simple, single point of the illustration. Sometimes people do that by overly stressing the illustration's details. At other times they treat the stories too literally.

Let me show what I think has happened here. I think the chief problems with the treatment of the illustration of the olive tree comes from treating it as concerned with individuals alone, on the one hand, or with nations, on the other. What happens if you think of the broken off branches in terms of individuals? Obviously, you have introduced the thought that a person's salvation can be lost. That allows us to warn against presumption, which we must do in any case. Our next study will do exactly that. But the idea that salvation can be lost runs counter to

Paul's explicit teaching in Romans 8, in which he stressed that nothing in all creation will ever "separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus our Lord" (v. 39).

Even worse, if that is the view we take, there is no purpose to Romans 9-11. For the only reason for Paul to be writing these chapters is to answer the objection that we cannot believe in eternal security if Israel is lost, since in that case God would not have been faithful to them.

But suppose we treat the illustration as having to do with nations? In that case, the nation of Israel is replaced by Gentile nations, and we find ourselves beginning to think about some kind of Gentile supremacy. The commentator I mentioned earlier, the one who discovered at least six different interpretations of the illustration of the olive tree, did just that. For in his detailed treatment of Romans 11, the chapter that follows his study of the olive tree is entitled "Gentile Domination."

These difficulties can be eliminated if we realize that Paul is not talking about either individuals or nations specifically, but only about the masses of Jews and many Gentiles. His point is that most Jews have not believed on Jesus Christ and are therefore cut off from the spiritual blessings that should belong to them because of their being Jews, while many Gentiles, who have no claim upon the spiritual blessings granted Israel, have nevertheless entered into those blessings by faith in the Jews' Messiah.

As far as the covenant of God with Israel is concerned, Paul says that it is being fulfilled, though not with every individual Jewish person. Those whom God has elected to salvation are being saved, both Jews and Gentiles, and in the end there will be a time of repentance and spiritual blessing for Israel nationally.

An "Unnatural" Illustration

In the case of this illustration there is also another problem that we have to deal with, namely, that the grafting process Paul describes seems to be unnatural. Wild shoots are not usually grafted onto cultivated roots, as Paul describes. Rather it is the other way around. William Sanday and Arthur C. Headlam say rightly, in their well-known commentary, "Grafts must necessarily be of branches from a cultivated olive inserted into a wild stock, the reverse process being one which would be valueless and is never performed."

Paul's "error" has led some commentators, like C. H. Dodd, to make smug remarks about the apostle's supposed ignorance. Dodd wrote, "Paul had the limitations of a town-bred man.... He had not the curiosity to inquire what went on in the olive-yards which fringed every road he walked."

Well, the process may not have been as impossible as all that, and Paul may not be writing in ignorance. Some years ago, William Ramsay, one of the great students of the apostle Paul's teaching and travels, did a study of "The Olive-Tree and the Wild-Olive," in which he produced what seems to be ancient confirmations of what Paul described. According to Ramsay, the Roman writer Columella said that "when an Olive-tree produces badly, a slip of Wild-Olive is grafted on it, and this gives new vigor to the tree" (Res Rustica, V, 9, 16). Similarly, Palladius wrote that "the Wild-Olive graft invigorated the tree on which it was set" (Opus Agriculturae, XI, 8, 3). Ramsay referred to the renowned Mediterranean fruit-tree botanist Theobald Fisher as saying that the process described by Paul "is still in use in exceptional circumstances at the present day."

However, there is a problem with Ramsay's solution, too. According to Ramsay, the purpose of grafting in the wild shoot is to invigorate the old tree or root. But, according to Paul's use of the illustration, the Gentiles, who are represented by the wild olive shoots, bring nothing to the fusion. Ramsay's solution, while it may be true horticulturally and may excuse Paul from the charge of ignorance, actually confuses the issue.

In my opinion, the real explanation is in a phrase Paul himself uses in verse 24, when he speaks of the Gentiles being grafted into a cultivated olive tree as "contrary to nature." If this is to be taken at face value, it means that Paul was fully aware that what he was describing—the grafting of a wild shoot into a cultivated stock—was unnatural. But that is precisely his point. It was utterly unnatural that God should work in this manner to save Gentiles. Yet it is what God has done. Salvation is of grace. However, if God did the unnatural thing in saving Gentiles, how much more should we expect him to do the natural thing eventually and thus bring about the future widespread belief of Israel in their own Messiah?

An Instructive Illustration

But enough analysis! What is the point of this substantial biblical illustration (eight verses)? What are its lessons? I see seven of them.

1. There is only one people of God. This is an obvious point of the olive-tree illustration, but surprisingly it is often completely overlooked, particularly by those who, like myself, believe that Romans 11 is prophesying a future day of Jewish blessing. A large number of those who do this are dispensationalists who tend to locate the widespread conversion of Israel in a future age and describe it in terms that give the Jews an identity and destiny quite different from the church. I believe in Israel's future conversion, because I believe that Romans 11 and other passages teach it. But the opponents of dispensationalism are right when they insist that there are not two peoples of God with two destinies but one only.

In this letter, Abraham has been presented as the father of all who are saved, since they are saved by faith, as he was. He is the root of the tree. Therefore, all who are saved, whether Jews or Gentiles, are saved only by believing God, as he did, and are thus part of the one olive tree.

Moreover, when Paul speaks of the future day of Jewish conversion, he is not speaking of something outside of or beyond history, nor of a dispensation yet to come. This is within history. It is within the very flow of events that we ourselves know that Gentiles and eventually Jews will all believe in Christ and the entire company of God's elect will be made up.

2. The people of God must (and will) bear fruit. Paul does not speak of fruit-bearing specifically in these verses. But that is the whole point of grafting: to produce a more fruitful tree. Besides, although Paul does not speak of fruit by that term, this is certainly what he has in mind when he writes of unbelieving Jews being broken off "because of unbelief and of believing Gentiles being grafted into the Jewish tree "by faith" (v. 20). Unbelief is the ultimate expression of fruitlessness, and faith is the first of all fruits.

I observed in the previous study that the olive tree is not a prominent image in the Old Testament, especially in regard to Israel. Nevertheless, it is used of Israel in two passages: Jeremiah 11:16 and Hosea 14:6. They have nothing to do with wild branches being grafted into the old stock. But they do have to do with fruitfulness. Jeremiah 11:16 reads:

> The LORD called you a thriving olive tree with fruit beautiful in form.
> But with the roar of a mighty storm he will set it on fire, and its branches will be broken.

Why is the tree to be destroyed by fire and its branches broken? The next verse explains that it is "because the house of Israel and the house of Judah have done evil." That is, they were not fruitful. They were not believing. It is possible that Paul got the idea for his more elaborate illustration in Romans from this passage.

And perhaps from Hosea 14:6, too, the only other verse that applies the olive-tree illustration to the Jewish nation. I say this because, like Romans 11, this verse looks forward to a future day of blessing for Israel, saying, "His [Israel's] splendor will be like an olive tree, / his fragrance like a cedar of Lebanon."

The point, of course, is that God requires fruitfulness in his people. In fact, without fruitfulness they are not his people. This is what Jesus taught in the discourse recorded in John 15, though with the illustration of a vine and its branches rather than an olive tree and its branches. He said, "I am the true vine and my Father is the gardener. He cuts off every branch in me that bears no fruit, while every branch that does bear fruit he prunes [trims clean] so that it will be even more fruitful.... I am the vine; you are the branches. If a man remains in me and I in him, he will bear much fruit.... This is to my Father's glory, that you bear much fruit, showing yourselves to be my disciples" (John 15:1-2, 5, 8). The vine illustration is prominent in the Old Testament (see Ps. 80:8-16; Isa. 5:1-7).

3. Gentiles contribute nothing to the salvation process. This is the point at which I found William Ramsay's material to be unhelpful and even misleading. For although the point of grafting is to bring the strength and fruitfulness of the shoot to enrich the old tree, in Paul's illustration it is entirely the reverse. The engrafted branches are the Gentiles, and the thrust of his words to them is that they are not to boast over the cut-off branches, as if they were valuable themselves. Instead, we who are Gentiles are to bear in mind that we "do not support the root, but the root supports you [us]" (v. 18).

We stand, but our standing is by faith alone, and that means that we stand only by grace. We have no inherent claim to anything.

It follows, too, that there is no "good" in Gentile religion. People today think in terms of all religions bringing their little bit of truth to the whole, each one adding its part, but this is utterly at odds with Paul's illustration. Asians do not contribute their little bit of yin and yang. Africans do not contribute their little bit of superstition from their tribal religions. Indians do not contribute their little bit of folk wisdom or dances. Americans do not contribute their democracy or capitalism. According to Paul's illustration, Gentiles are a "wild olive" (v. 17), one of the most worthless of all trees.

And let's not overlook the word wild. Apart from the grace of the gospel in Jesus Christ, all we have are our wild ways. And they are destructive ways, too. The only true way is the way of faith in Christ that has come to us through Judaism.

Do you remember what Jesus told the Samaritan woman? She wanted to engage him in debate over which of the two religious traditions she was acquainted with was best, the religion of the Samaritans or the Jews. "I can see you are a prophet," she said when Christ told her she was living in sin. "Our fathers worshiped on this mountain, but you Jews claim that the place where we must worship is in Jerusalem" (John 4:19-20).

Jesus answered that although a time was coming when the place of worship would be irrelevant ("Believe me, woman, a time is coming when you will worship the Father neither on this mountain nor in Jerusalem"), nevertheless, this did not mean that the religions of the Samaritans and Jews were equal—"You Samaritans worship what you do not know; we worship what we do know, for salvation is from the Jews" (vv. 21-22).

The only true religion is the revealed religion, which God has given to us through the channel of Judaism. Not all Jews are saved, of course. Paul is saying that clearly. Nevertheless, he is also saying clearly that Jews are not saved by becoming Gentiles; rather Gentiles (as well as Jews) are saved by becoming true Jews. That is, all who are saved are and must be the true spiritual children of Abraham.

4. Neither do Jews. I have said that Gentiles contribute nothing to the salvation process. But now we have to add that neither do Jews. Is that contradictory? Didn't I just quote Jesus as saying that "salvation is from the Jews"? Yes, but that is quite different from saying "salvation is being Jewish."

The word from implies a channel. It means that the way of salvation has been made known through the revelation given to Israel, through its kings and prophets, above all through Jesus Christ. Jews become beneficiaries of that revelation, not by being Jews or by bringing any innate measure of spiritual understanding or intrinsic righteousness to God. They benefit only and in exactly the same way Gentiles do, which is by believing on Jesus. "They were broken off because of unbelief," Paul says—"And if they do not persist in unbelief, they will be grafted in, for God is able to graft them in again" (vv. 20, 23). He could hardly make his point clearer.

Weren't those broken-off branches in the Jewish tree called "holy," in Paul's original use of the root and branches illustration? In what sense, then, were the branches holy? The answer, as we saw in the previous study, is that they were "set apart" to God's purposes. What were those purposes? They were that the Jews might be:

The receivers of the law, the prophets, and the writings. That is, we received our Bibles through Judaism.

The preservers of these for the world. We would not have our Bibles, especially not our Old Testaments, had not Jewish scribes faithfully and meticulously preserved these ancient documents for us.

The earthly line of the Messiah. Jesus was a descendent of Abraham through the tribe of Judah. He was a descendant of King David.

God's witnesses to these truths. All the early preachers, including Paul himself, were Jews. Without their faithful witness to these truths, none of us would have known of Jesus, understood the gospel, or believed.

5. Do not boast. The fifth application of the truths embodied in the illustration of the olive tree is the one Paul himself emphasizes. At this point of the letter he is writing to Gentiles specifically, as he says in verse 13, and the burden of his words is that they dare not boast over the Jews because of their present favored position. It is true that Jewish branches were broken off so that, in God's providence, the gospel might come to Gentiles. Their rejection has been a source of Gentile blessing. But Gentiles are not to boast, since they stand only by faith and will themselves be broken off if they do not continue in it.

We must not forget the warnings throughout the Bible about boasting. If we boast, we are not believing. For boasting is being proud of our own (supposed) achievements, and believing is receiving what God in Jesus Christ has done for us.

6. Do not presume on God's favor. The sixth application follows closely on the warning not to boast. For when we boast we are presuming on God's favor, and that is fatal. Presuming means assuming that everything is right between ourselves and God, regardless of what we may believe or not believe or of how we may act. The only way we can avoid presumption is to obey God and pursue righteousness diligently. As I have often said, if we are not following after Jesus Christ in faithful discipleship, we are not disciples. And if we are not disciples of Christ, we are not Christians.

7. Fear (respect) God. Finally, fear God (vv. 20, 22). This does not mean that we are to cower before God if we are Christians. It has to do with respect. Still it is nevertheless a holy, awesome respect we are to have—awe before both God's kindness and severity. This is reminding us that God is not mocked. Sin will be punished, and unbelief does exclude us from the good tree of salvation, whoever we may be. We need to consider that there is indeed only one people of God and that entry into that one people is by true faith in Jesus in all cases.

Chapter 164.
A Warning to the Gentile Churches

Romans 11:17-22

In Romans 11, Paul is writing about the future of the Jews as a people. So it is surprising how much of what he says in this chapter is to Gentiles. He began by addressing them directly in verse 13 ("I am talking to you Gentiles"), and he continues speaking to them exclusively until verse 25, where he begins to address a broader group of people again. In verses 17-22, he warns the Gentiles not to boast over Judaism because of the Gentiles' current favored status, saying that if the Jews, who were God's especially chosen people once, have been rejected at least temporarily because of unbelief, the Gentiles also will be rejected if they follow their bad example.

This is a serious warning, one that we must take to heart.

Prosperity seems always to lead to some kind of boasting, and this is true of spiritual prosperity as well as of material prosperity. When we go through hard times, we usually sense our inadequacy and draw close to God, calling on him for help. But as soon as things go well for us, we find it easy to think that it is because of who we are or what we have done and not because of God's unmerited grace and blessing. Then we cease to trust God; we drift away from him and fall into sin. It was an awareness of this ever-present danger that caused Paul to write forcefully to the Christians at Corinth, "If you think you are standing firm, be careful that you don't fall!" (1 Cor. 10:12).

As Paul writes to those of us who are Gentiles, he is aware that our present position might cause us to boast over the Jews who held a privileged position before us. But he warns us not to boast. Rather, fear God, he says. We may be standing now, but we stand only by grace. If we cease to stand in grace by believing God, we, too, will fall.

Does that mean that salvation can be lost? No. Paul has been teaching the doctrine of perseverance. But what he says here is nevertheless a strong warning against spiritual presumption. John Calvin believed in eternal security, but he wrote, "We should never think of the rejection of the Jews without being struck with dread and terror."

The Fall of National Churches

What Paul tells us in these verses is that if the Gentiles fail to stand by faith, they will be cut off, just as the Jews were. So I begin by saying that this has happened to churches in large sectors of the world. At one time these places had thriving churches. But no longer. Today that earlier witness has been radically reduced and in some cases nearly eradicated.

1. The church in Asia Minor. I start with Asia Minor, what we today call Turkey. This was the first major area of the ancient Gentile world to be evangelized, largely because of Paul's missionary travels. Thanks to his efforts, churches were planted in Derbe, Iconium, Lystra, and Ephesus, among others, and the gospel spread from Ephesus to such surrounding cities as Smyrna, Pergamum, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, and Laodicea, which are mentioned in the early chapters of Revelation. By the year 113, about sixty years after Paul's work, Pliny, the Roman governor of Bithynia, complained to the emperor Trajan that the new faith was affecting the older worship patterns. People were neglecting the ancient gods, and the temple revenues had fallen off. Irenaeus, one of the first great Christian writers (c. 130-c. 200), was from Smyrna. The great fourth-century defenders of Nicene orthodoxy, Basil of Caesaria, Gregory of Nazianzus, and Gregory of Nyssa, were from Cappadocia.

Yet where is the church of Asia Minor today? Its early vitality faded, its gospel became mere moralism, and the Moslem invasions of the early Middle Ages overwhelmed it and almost entirely snuffed it out. Today Turkey is an almost-virgin mission field for Christianity.

2. The church in North Africa. There is an almost identical pattern for North Africa. Tertullian (c. 155-c. 220), the first great Christian apologist, was from Carthage on the north African coast. Cyprian (c. 220-258), who was born about the time Tertullian died, was his predecessor's intellectual heir, and in time he became bishop of the city. There was a major center of the African church at Alexandria, further to the east. It produced such outstanding leaders as Clement (c. 150—c. 215) and Origen (c. 185—c. 254). The great defender of Christ's deity during the years of the Arian controversy, Athanasius (c. 295-373), was likewise from Alexandria. Most impressive of all, Saint Augustine (354-430), the greatest theologian of the early church, was born in Tagastein, northern Africa and later became the celebrated bishop of Hippo, also on the African continent.

Under such leadership, Christianity thrived in North Africa for several centuries. But, again, it lost its vitality, faded, and was eventually replaced by Islam. Moslems took possession of Jerusalem in 638 and then conquered most of Asia Minor from 1071 onward. In spite of the energetic and repeated efforts of the Crusaders, the last Crusader conquest in Palestine was surrendered in 1291, and Constantinople in Asia Minor fell in 1453.

3. The church in Italy. To the north and west, in Italy, the early church was subjected to many years of persecution by the weakened Roman Empire, but it eventually seemed to have triumphed for good as the result of the celebrated conversion of the emperor Constantine on the eve of his battle against the armies of Maxentius on October 28, 312. Constantine claimed to have received a vision the night before the battle in which he saw the Christ symbol (the Greek letter "x" with the character for "r" through the center of it, the first two letters of the Greek word for "Christ") accompanied by the words "In this sign conquer." He had the sign painted on his helmet and the shields of his soldiers, marched into battle, and was victorious.

The final phase of the state's persecution of the church was now ended, and the church was given preferred legal status. Constantine himself presided over the great Council of Nicaea in 325. Ironically, prosperity turned out to be more harmful to the church than persecution. The religious hierarchy became even more corrupt than that of the declining empire. By the late Middle Ages, the western church was selling salvation through the system of indulgences, which appalled Martin Luther, provoked the posting of his Ninety-five Theses in 1517, and sparked the Reformation.

If ever a church had its candlestick removed by Jesus, while nevertheless retaining the outward appearances of influence and prosperity, it was the Roman church of the Middle Ages. The church had apparently triumphed, but wise observers saw it as nothing more than an evil, powerful, and secularized institution.

Calvin must have been thinking of the slide of the early church into the corruption of the Middle Ages when he wrote, referring to our passage in Romans, "The fearful defection of the whole of the world which afterwards took place gives clear evidence of how necessary this admonition was. When God had watered the whole of the world with his grace in but a moment, so that religion flourished universally, the truth of the gospel shortly afterwards vanished, and the treasure of salvation was taken away. The only explanation of so sudden a change is that the Gentiles fell away from their calling."

4. The church of the Reformation in Europe. Heirs of the Reformation tend to boast over Roman Catholicism at this point, praising Martin Luther and the other sixteenth-century Reformers. But we must remember that the same decline overtook the Reformation churches. Once a dominant influence in Germany, Switzerland, France, and Holland, the Reformation churches soon forgot the true gospel, grew weak internally, and are now attended by only a small minority of people. Less than 4 percent of Europeans attend church, even on religious holidays.

5. The church in England and the West. And what of the church in England and the West? What of the church in the United States? In England attendance at church is only marginally better than on the European continent. England, like Europe, is a great mission field. And who does not sense that churches in the United States, though attended by substantially large numbers of people at the moment, are nevertheless declining? Who would say that the present influence of Christianity on our cultural value system is as great today as it was even a decade ago, not to mention during the early years of our country's history?

The Fall of Particular Churches

What has happened on a national level happens in individual churches too. One of the saddest things I know is the decline of a once-vital church.

I think of the church in which I was ordained. Formerly a bastion of orthodoxy, it has been weakened through a series of ineffective pastorates. Its current pastor, who is neo-orthodox (Barthian) in theology, was not chosen by the pastoral seeking committee for his orthodoxy.

Although the members of the pastoral search knew he had departed from a high view of Scripture as God's inerrant Word and from the orthodoxy that had characterized most of his predecessors, this man was chosen because the committee felt they needed an "orator" if the church was to survive. It is not surviving, of course. The evening service has gone, and the impact this church once had in the great city in which it is located has evaporated.

What does Paul say in our text? "Do not be arrogant, but be afraid. For if God did not spare the natural branches, he will not spare you either."

It bears repeating that he told the Corinthians, "If you think you are standing firm, be careful that you don't fall" (1 Cor. 10:12). Can such a thing happen to a conservative, Bible-based church? Of course, it can. It will happen if we do not continue strong in the faith once delivered to the saints. We stand by grace through faith. But if we forget that it is by grace that we stand or that we must continue in faith, believing what God teaches in the Bible, then we will fall—as surely as those formerly thriving churches that have preceded us on the stage of world history.

The Fall of Individuals

I intend to turn to what Paul tells us to remember, since it is his solution to the problem I have been describing. Before I do, I will extend the warning one step further by applying it to individuals who suppose they are Christians because they are part of a Christian church and affirm the right things, but who are not actually anchored in the grace of God and are not exercising that true faith in God that comes from the presence of the Holy Spirit within them.

Let me warn you that it is fatally easy to assume that all is well with your soul when actually you are perishing. In fact, in your unbelieving state it is the most natural thing in the world, because you do not perceive what is really spiritual and suppose that the externals of Christianity are what matters.

If you have any sensitivity to spiritual things, you must ask yourself, "Has my commitment to Christ made any discernible difference in my life?" In other words, is there anything you are doing now that you would not be doing if you were not a Christian? Is there anything you are not doing because you know it would displease Jesus Christ? Are you obeying his commandments? Do you love to be with other Christians?

Are you studying the Bible? And when you study it can you really say that you hear God speaking to you in its pages? Do you recognize what you read there to be the truth? Do you change what you are doing as a result? Are you trying to order your life according to the Bible's teaching and redirect it according to right Christian priorities?

This is what it means to "make your calling and election sure" (2 Peter 1:10), in sharp contrast to what Jesus was warning of when he described sowing seed on ground where it seemed to grow well but soon dried up for lack of depth, was choked by weeds, or was snatched away by Satan (Matt. 13:1-9).

I have already mentioned John Calvin and the fact that he is strong on the doctrine of eternal security or perseverance. But listen to what he says to individuals who consider themselves Christians but who may nevertheless be presuming on the grace of God: "It is not enough to have embraced only once the grace of God, unless during the whole course of your life you follow his call. Those who have been enlightened by the Lord must always turn their minds to perseverance."

Four Things to Remember

How do we "stand by faith" (Rom. 11:20)? Paul gives the answer in verse 22. According to Robert Haldane, there are four things Paul tells the Gentiles to remember.

1. He urges them to behold "the severity of God's strict justice in cutting off and casting out the unbelieving Jews." We tend to treat God as a benevolent old man who will never do anything as harsh as judge anyone. We are especially prone to this if we are only cultural Christians and not truly regenerate. We need to disabuse ourselves of such fantasies. God is love, but he is also a God of strict justice. His rejection of the Jews should be a warning to us never to presume on his goodness but, rather, always to strive to make certain we are truly saved.

2. He reminds them of God's "goodness in conferring unmerited favor on the Gentiles." They attained a righteousness they were not even seeking. The emphasis here is on God's unmerited favor, for it takes away all grounds for boasting or presumption. If there is nothing in us that has brought us to Christ, there is obviously nothing in us that keeps us there either. We dare not presume. We stand by grace only.

3. He stresses "the necessity of [their] continuing in that goodness, by abiding in the faith of the Gospel." Nothing but faith will enable the believer to stand in grace. Therefore, we must cultivate faith. How? Paul has already given us the answer: "Faith comes from hearing the message, and the message is heard through the word of Christ" (Rom. 10:17). Faith comes by studying the Bible and by hearing it taught and preached. That is why we must continue to go to church to hear sound teaching and why we must study the Bible privately as well. If we do not, we will drift away. And if we drift away without returning eventually—and how can we be sure we will return?—we will perish.

I repeat: Nothing but faith will enable the believer to stand in grace. But I also add now: Nothing but unbelief keeps anyone from grace. No one needs to perish. Paul also wrote, "If you confess with your mouth, 'Jesus is Lord,' and believe in your heart that God raised him from the dead, you will be saved. For it is with your heart that you believe and are justified, and it is with your mouth that you confess and are saved.... 'Anyone who trust in him will never be put to shame'" (Rom. 10:9-11).

4. He warns them that "if they abide not in the faith, they should be themselves cut off." So do not presume! We start with faith, but we must also end with faith. If we do not, we shall be cut off, as Israel was.

"Lest We Forget"

In the summer of 1897, the British Empire held a great celebration to mark the sixtieth anniversary of the accession to the throne of Queen Victoria. She had become the British monarch on June 20, 1837, and there had been a fiftieth-year Jubilee in 1887. This follow-up celebration a decade later was the high point of the Victorian era and the zenith of British power and influence. Prime ministers, judges, statesmen, and other highly placed representatives assembled from every part of the worldwide empire. Hundreds of the great ships of the massed British Navy clogged the Thames. It was unlike anything the world would ever see again.

But at last the festivities were over. The statesmen and the ships departed, and Rudyard Kipling, the outstanding British poet of the Victorian period, had written "Recessional," a reminder of man's impermanent grandeur:

God of our fathers, known of old,
Lord of our far-flung battle-line,

Beneath whose awful hand we hold Dominion over palm and pine — Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet, Lest we forget—lest we forget!
The tumult and the shouting dies; The captains and the kings depart:
Still stands Thine ancient sacrifice, An humble and a contrite heart.
Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet, Lest we forget—lest we forget!
Far-called, our navies melt away; On dune and headland sinks the fire:
Lo, all our pomp of yesterday Is one with Nineveh and Tyre!
Judge of the Nations, spare us yet,
Lest we forget—lest we forget!
If drunk with sight of power, we loose
Wild tongues that have not Thee in awe,
Such boastings as the Gentiles use,
Or lesser breeds without the Law— Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet, Lest we forget—lest we forget!
For heathen heart that puts her trust In reeking tube and iron shard,
All valiant dust that builds on dust,
And guarding, calls not Thee to guard, For frantic boast and foolish word— Thy Mercy on Thy People, Lord!

Kipling was writing of the British Empire, of course. But his words speak equally to churches and to individuals who foolishly boast of their own attainments or coast along in their present favored standing without pausing to remember the grace of God that brought them to that place and the obligation they have to stand together as Christians in grace by faith alone. So do not forget! Stand in your high calling! Stand by faith! Greater individuals than you and I have perished. Nations as powerful as ours have been overthrown. And stronger churches than ours have fallen to the severity of God's just judgments in history.

Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet,
Lest we forget—lest we forget!

Chapter 165.

A Future for God's Ancient People

Romans 11:23-24

It is not going too far out on a limb to suggest that few of today's Christians have mastered the great prophecy of Ezekiel. Not many could give an outline of that book. Most could not tell even a single thing that is in it. Yet there is a story in Ezekiel 37 that most of us are aware of. It is the story of Ezekiel's preaching in the valley of dry bones, which is acknowledged in the chorus of a Negro spiritual: "Dem bones, dem bones, dem dry bones! / Now hear the word of the Lord."

God brought the prophet to a valley full of dry bones and told him to preach to them. When Ezekiel did as God commanded, the bones began to come together to form complete human skeletons. Tendons, flesh, and skin appeared on them. At last, as Ezekiel continued to preach, breath entered the bones and "they came to life and stood up on their feet—a vast army" (Ezek. 37:10).

God explained the lesson, saying, "These bones are the whole house of Israel. They say, 'Our bones are dried up and our hope is gone; we are cut off.' Therefore prophesy and say to them: 'This is what the Sovereign LORD says: O my people, I am going to open your graves and bring you up from them; I will bring you back to the land of Israel. Then you, my people, will know that I am the LORD, when I open your graves and bring you up from them. I will put my Spirit in you and you will live, and I will settle you in your own land...'" (vv. 11-14).

The story is relevant to Paul's teaching in Romans 11, of course. He is writing about Israel, saying that the Jewish people will become believers in Jesus Christ in the last days. Yet, based on our observance, nothing is more improbable than such a conversion, or even the image Paul is using.

He has spoken of a cultivated olive tree whose branches were broken off and of a wild olive tree whose branches were grafted into the cultivated stock. That illustration pictures the inclusion of the Gentiles in Israel's spiritual blessings. But, then, in what is surely an impossible situation in terms of horticulture, Paul begins to speak of the broken and discarded branches being grafted back into their own olive tree. Branches once broken off a tree die and cannot be regrafted. True enough. But we are not speaking here about things that are merely possible or impossible in nature. We are speaking of God, and with God all things are possible.

Robert Haldane says wisely, "What is not done in nature, and cannot be effected by the power of man, will be done by God, with whom all things are possible. He is able to make the dry bones live, and to restore the severed branches of the Jewish nation."

In the preceding verses (vv. 20-22), Gentiles are warned that, unless they stand in faith, they will be cut off. Verses 23-24 are the reverse of that, telling the Jews that if they "do not persist in unbelief but rather believe in Jesus, they will be brought back in.

Two Explanations

Until now, my interpretation of Romans 11 has been following what seems to me to be the general meaning and flow of the chapter. However, most people are aware—you may be one— that there is a sharp debate over the true meaning of these verses, and this is the place both to acknowledge this debate and deal with it. There are two main explanations, though they have numerous modifications.

1. A present explanation. The first interpretation rejects any futuristic references in Paul's teaching about the Jews and sees these verses as describing only what we already observe in regard to the general pattern of Jewish unbelief coupled with the salvation of some Jews. According to this view, Paul would be teaching that the hardening of the Jews is not so great as to prevent some being converted and entering the Christian church, just as Gentiles do, and that this will continue to the end of the present age of gospel grace.

2. A future explanation. The second interpretation sees Paul looking ahead to a future moment in God's dealings with Israel in which there will be a great and general conversion of Jews in fulfillment of ancient but as yet unfulfilled prophecies. This will take place when the salvation of all the Gentiles who are to be saved (but who are not yet saved) shall have been accomplished.

Charles Hodge has a helpful discussion of these two possibilities, showing that the first was developed largely during the Reformation period as the result of two things: first, the extravagant prophetic views of the Millennarians, which the Reformers rejected; and, second, what Hodge freely admits was the Reformers' prejudice against the Jews. Sadly, we must admit that Hodge is right in this. The Jews were the despised people of the late Middle Ages, and the Reformers, Luther especially, did not rise above this unjustified hatred. To illustrate his point, Hodge cites a particularly offensive passage from Luther, which he wisely leaves in German, saying that it "does not admit of translation."

The Present Explanation

Arguments for the first of these explanations can be found in various places, particularly among present-day Reformed people who draw their theology from the sixteenth-century Reformers. I would like to focus on one excellent example. It is a study entitled "A Distinctive Future for Ethnic Israel in Romans Eleven?" by O. Palmer Robertson, who wrote the paper when he was an associate professor of Old Testament theology at Westminster Theological Seminary. He then became pastor of a church north of Washington, D.C. Robertson makes the following points:

1. Much (if not all) of Romans 11 is dealing with God's purposes for the Jews in the present age. Robertson discusses verses 1, 5, 13-14, and 30-31 especially, showing rightly that they are speaking about the salvation of some Jews at the present time, a remnant. Paul is an example, and so are those few who responded or will have responded to his teaching and to that of the other ministers of the gospel. Robertson concludes, "These references do not exclude by necessity parallel references to some future purpose of God with Israel. They do, however, warn the exegete against assuming too hastily that the entirety of chapter eleven of Romans deals with Israel's distinctive future." There can be no quarrel with this analysis.

2. Verses assumed to speak of God's distinct dealings with Israel in the future do not necessarily do so. Here Robertson discusses verses 1, 5, 12, 15, 17-24, and 25-26a, the critical discussion being of verse 25, which speaks of Israel being hardened "until the full number of the Gentiles has come in." Robertson concludes that "until" does not refer to a termination of something after which something else will happen, but to a final termination of everything (a terminus ad quem rather than a terminus a quo). He calls this an eschatological termination. That is, it concerns the return of Christ and the final judgment. Therefore, writes Robertson, the passage means only that "throughout the whole of the present age, until the final return of Christ, hardening will continue among part of Israel."

Here I do find myself disagreeing with the author, for in my judgment that is just not what Romans 11:25 says. There is nothing to indicate that this verse is speaking of the return of Christ, the final judgment, or any such thing, but of the future of the Jews, and it is saying that they will be converted. We will come back to this when we look at the second explanation.

3. The words "and so all Israel shall be saved" (v. 26a) should read "in this way all Israel shall be saved," meaning that the elect among Israel will be saved by responding to the gospel just as they are currently doing. This is not foolish reasoning, of course. Robertson is an excellent scholar, and his view is probably the prevailing current view among Reformed Bible students and theologians. But, in my judgment, it overlooks the flow of the chapter. During my student days I was told that the future explanation was a dispensational view only and that no Reformed theologians held to it. Having studied these views carefully, I find instead that the majority of the great commentators on Romans, including Reformed commentators, recognize that the passage is speaking of a future day of Jewish conversion. Moreover, they see a future gathering-in of Israel as the point to which the chapter has been moving. The pattern is:

The possibility of a time of future Jewish conversions: "God is able to graft them in again" (v. 23), The probability of a time of future Jewish conversions: "How much more readily will these, the natural branches, be grafted into their own olive tree" (v. 24), and The certainty of a time of future Jewish conversions: "And so all Israel will be saved" (v. 26a).

The Future Explanation

Among commentators who defend the second view—the future explanation—none is more thorough than Charles Hodge. He gives eight reasons why the passage is looking forward to a time of future blessing for ethnic Israel. At this point I set his arguments over against Robertson's.

1. "The whole context and drift of the apostle's discourse is in... favor" of the second view. Hodge discusses the earlier part of the chapter at this point, recalling Paul's statement that the eventual conversion of the Jews is a probable event that would be in the fullest measure beneficial and glorious for the world (v. 12). The only natural extension of that is their actual conversion.

2. "It is evident that Paul meant to say that the Jews were to be restored in the sense in which they were then rejected." In the earlier part of the chapter Paul was speaking of the rejection of the Jews not as individuals, but as a nation or community. "Jews" as an ethnic grouping is contrasted with "Gentiles" as an ethnic grouping. Therefore, when Paul speaks of a future time of Jewish conversion he must be thinking of a general conversion of this ethnic body. "How can [verse 15] be understood of the conversion of the small number of Jews which, from age to age, have joined the Christian church?" Hodge asks. "This surely has not been 'life from the dead,' for the whole world."

3. "It is plain from this and other parts of the discourse that Paul refers to a great event, something which should attract universal attention." The conversion of a few Jews and their addition to the church from time to time does not fit this expectation.

4. The introduction to verse 25 ("I do not want you to be ignorant of this mystery, brothers") is in words Paul normally uses "when he wishes to rouse the attention of his readers to something especially important." The conversion of a few Jews from time to time does not fit this definition. Nor is it something really new, since he has already spoken of the remnant of those who are being converted several times previously.

5. "The gradual conversion of a few Jews is no 'mystery.'" In the Bible's language, a mystery is something that at one time was unknown but has now been revealed. Knowledge of the gradual conversion of a few Jews does not require any special revelation. On the contrary, it is a fact of simple observation.

6. "The words 'all Israel' cannot... be understood of 'spiritual' Israel, because the word is just before used in a different sense." The Israel that has experienced "a hardening in part" (v. 25) is ethnic Israel. It cannot be spiritual Israel, because what distinguishes spiritual Israel from ethnic Israel is that spiritual Israel is not hardened but rather has turned (or will turn) from sin and has embraced (or will embrace) Jesus Christ as Savior. Since ethnic Israel is what is referred to in verse 25, the word cannot be used in an entirely different sense in verse 26, which immediately follows. If it is ethnic Israel which has been hardened, it must be ethnic Israel which will be saved.

7. "The words... correctly rendered in our version 'until' cannot... be translated 'as long as' or 'so that,' followed as they are here by the aorist subjunctive." This is a technical matter that must be argued by experts in the fine points of Greek grammar. It is enough to note here that it is directly opposed to Robertson's interpretation of "until," summarized under point 2 above.

8. "The following verses seem to require this interpretation." In these verses the result that is contemplated is a full accomplishment of the ancient prophecies, which predict a general Jewish salvation. What is more, the reason given is the unchangeable nature of God's purposes and covenant, which Paul establishes in verse 26 by combining sentences from Isaiah 59:20-21 and 27:9. His quotation reads:

The deliverer will come from Zion; he will turn godliness away from Jacob.
And this is my covenant with them when I take away their sins.

The rejection of the Jews in Paul's day did not involve every individual of Jewish descent, and the conversion of the Jews in this future day likewise will not necessarily involve every individual Jewish person. But as the masses of Israel are rejected now, so the masses of Israel will be converted then because, having once taken the Jews into a special relationship with himself, God, "whose gifts and... call are irrevocable" (v. 29), will not cast them off.

It is hard for me to discover any other valid meaning than this obvious meaning of the passage.

Some Practical Applications

We are not living in the future, however. So although the promise of a day of future blessing for the Jewish people is important for how we are to think of God's promises, gifts, and covenant, I want to end not by thinking ahead to some future day, but rather by applying Paul's teaching to how we should think and act now.

I begin by going back to my opening illustration, which was Ezekiel's experience in the valley of dry bones. This illustration teaches that the salvation of any individual, Jew or Gentile, is a miracle of God and therefore depends on God as much as does the resurrection of a great army of soldiers from mere bones. This is exactly the teaching of Romans 11, of course. For, having spoken of individual Jews as branches that have been broken off from the olive tree that is rooted in the patriarchs, Paul has also spoken of them being grafted back in. That is not humanly possible. Therefore, although it is nevertheless possible, it is so only because "with God all things are possible" (Matt. 19:26).

Leon Morris writes, "If the orchardist wanted certain branches in his tree he would not have cut them off in the first place. But Paul is not talking about orchardists; he is talking about God, and the orchard is no more than an illustration. He is talking about a miracle of grace and assuring his readers that God is able to perform that miracle."

That is what we need, too, of course. We need this supernatural working of God in our minds to give us understanding of the gospel, in our hearts to give us an affection for Jesus Christ, and in our wills to bring us to the point of a personal turning from sin to faith in the Savior.

But we are slow to admit our need of God's gracious working.

What could have caused such blindness? It is a failure to understand four great truths that the meaning of grace presupposes.

1. The sin of man. We are complacent about our spiritual condition, so we assume that God is also. The thought that we are fallen creatures who are in rebellion against God's rightful rule seldom enters our heads.
2. The judgment of God. Most of us have lost appreciation for all cause-and-effect links, especially in moral areas. So the idea of a final judgment of God at the end of human history, when sin will be punished, seems fantastic to us.
3. Our spiritual inability. Our society has taught us that for man "all things are possible." We believe we are the masters of our own fate, the captains of our own ship. So the idea that we need the grace of God in order to get right with God, because we cannot save ourselves, seems—well, it just seems wrong, frankly. We assume that it will always be possible for us to mend our relationships with God.

4. The sovereign freedom of God. In this day of so-called human rights, we assume that God owes us something: salvation or at least a chance at salvation. But God does not have to show us favor. He does—that is what the gospel is about—but he does not need to. The freedom of God to give or withhold favor is the very essence of salvation. The Bible teaches that "salvation comes from the LORD" (Jonah 2:9), and the sooner we acknowledge that important truth the better.

Salvation Is from God

Yes, but it is nevertheless also to be received by faith. Salvation depends on God, because only "God is able" to do what is needed. But notice what Paul says: "If they do not persist in unbelief, they will be grafted in" (emphasis added). We have seen that because the Jews are God's specifically chosen people it is: (1) possible, (2) probable, and (3) certain that they will be saved as a nation in the final days. But these specifically chosen people must nevertheless also believe on the Lord Jesus Christ to be saved. And if they must have faith, clearly we must also. No one can be saved without faith. I cannot be saved without faith. You cannot be saved without faith. No one can be saved without faith.

When Peter preached at Pentecost, he emphasized the electing grace of God in salvation, saying,
"The promise is for you and your children and for all who are far off—for all whom the Lord our God will call" (Acts 2:39). But Peter did not understand the sovereignty of God in salvation to eliminate the need for saving faith. His message was: "Repent and be baptized, every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ for the forgiveness of your sins" (v. 38). The passage concludes, "With many other words he warned them; and he pleaded with them, 'Save yourselves from this corrupt generation'" (v. 40).

My message is exactly the same. Salvation is of the Lord. But it comes by the preaching of the gospel and is something you enter only when you turn from sin and place your trust in Jesus Christ as your Savior. God saves, but he saves by bringing sinners to faith in Jesus Christ. Won't you believe that gospel and trust Jesus, if you have never believed on Jesus before? Today the door of God's grace stands open, and the promise of the Bible is that "everyone who calls on the name of the Lord will be saved" (Acts 2:21).

Chapter 166.
The Mystery of Jewish Hardening

Romans 11:25

In this volume of the Romans series, we have been studying Paul's unfolding of the purposes of God in history for more than forty chapters, focusing on the nation of Israel, and we come in Romans 11:25-32 to the last of the seven major points Paul is making. His theme here is the future conversion of the great mass of Israel in the final days.

Most commentators recognize that this is a new section and therefore separate it from the preceding verses by descriptive titles. Leon Morris calls verses 25 through 32 "The Conversion of Israel. "John Murray describes this section as "The Fullness of the Gentiles and the Salvation of Israel." C. K. Barrett titles it "God's Plan Complete." Ray Stedman labels it "Our Great and Glorious God." H. C. G. Moule calls these verses "The Restoration of Israel Directly Foretold: All Is of and for God." William Barclay calls them "That All May Be of Mercy."

So also in our Bibles. The New International Version follows this line when it titles Romans 11:25-32 "All Israel Will Be Saved."

Clearly, this section is the culmination of what Paul has been saying in chapters 9 through 11 of this letter. He introduced his line of thought in verse 6 of Romans 9, wondering rhetorically if God's purposes in history may have failed, since so many Jews, God's specially chosen people, have rejected Jesus Christ as their Messiah. Our earlier studies have shown that Paul denied this implication and has been giving reasons for an entirely different view, namely, that God is still in control of history. Therefore, all that has happened both in the rejection of Israel and the conversion of Gentiles has been according to God's wise and perfect plan. You will recall that Paul has seven arguments to show that God's purposes have not been sidetracked by Israel's unbelief:

1. God's historical purposes have not failed, because all whom God has elected to salvation are or will be saved (Rom. 9:6-24).
2. God's purposes have not failed, because God had previously revealed that not all Israel would be saved and that some Gentiles would be (Rom. 9:25-29).
3. God's purposes have not failed, because the unbelief of the Jews was their own responsibility, not God's (Rom. 9:30-10:21).
4. God has not failed, because some Jews (Paul himself was an example) have believed and have been saved (Rom. 11:1).
5. God has not failed, because it has always been the case that not all Jews but only a remnant has been saved (Rom. 11:2-10).
6. God's plans have not failed, because the salvation of the Gentiles, which is now occurring, is meant to arouse Israel to envy and thus be the means of saving some of them (Rom. 11:11-24).
7. Finally, God's historical purposes toward the Jewish nation have not failed, because in the end all Israel will be saved, and thus God will be seen to have honored his promises toward Israel nationally (Rom. 11:25-32).

It is this final point, the last of the seven, to which we come now.

The "Mysteries" of God

In the earlier portion of Romans 11, Paul has argued both the possibility and probability of the conversion of the mass of Jewish people. Now he moves from argument to prophecy, stating the certainty of the blessing that shall one day be, and this means that what he has to say now is in the nature of special revelation.

This is the significance of the word mystery in verse 25. When we use that word, we have in mind something that is puzzling or unknown. One dictionary calls it "something that has not been, or cannot be, explained; something beyond human comprehension; a profound secret; an enigma." However, that is not the meaning of the word in the New Testament, in Paul's writings specifically, or, for that matter, in the ancient world in general.

In the ancient world a mystery was something unknown to most people but specially revealed to some. This was the meaning of the word as used of the ancient mystery religions, for example. The existence of these religions (Mithras, Isis and Osirus, Dionysus, Attis and Cybele, Eleusis and others) was known to nearly everybody. But the specifics of their religious rites were known only to initiates, much like today's Masons, who also have secret rites, signs, handshakes, and symbols of which most people are unaware.

The apostle Paul uses the word in this way but with specifically biblical elements. He uses "mystery" to refer to something that at one time was not known and could not be arrived at by any amount of human reasoning, but that has now been revealed to us by God through such inspired teachers as himself and the other apostles.

Charles Hodge says, "Any future event... which could be known only by divine revelation is a mystery."

This was an important term for Paul, which means that he was aware of being the channel of such divine revelation for our benefit. One proof of this is the number of times he uses the word mystery and the variety of ways in which he uses it. Some years ago, H. A. Ironside, a former minister of Moody Memorial Church in Chicago, wrote a book on The Mysteries of God in which he explored these formerly hidden but now known doctrines at some length. It is not one of Ironside's best books, in my judgment, since it is poorly written and strongly dispensational. Nevertheless, it has the important virtue of being somewhat comprehensive. In it Ironside explored:

1. "The Mysteries of the Kingdom of Heaven" (Matthew 13:11)
2. "The Mystery of the Olive Tree" (Romans 11:25)
3. "The Great Mystery of Christ and the Church" (Ephesians 5:32)
4. "The Mystery of Piety" (1 Timothy 3:16)
5. "The Mystery of the Rapture of the Saints" (1 Corinthians 15:51)
6. "The Mystery of Lawlessness" (2 Thessalonians 2:7)
7. "The Mystery of God Finished" (Revelation 10:7).

Ironside's main point was that the mysteries of the New Testament are things we should know, yet strangely are largely ignored by masses of today's Christians. We should not be ignorant of these things. It is true that "the secret things belong to the LORD our God," but the mysteries are among those that are revealed and therefore "belong to us and to our children forever" (Deut. 29:29). Ministers are to be faithful stewards of these truths (1 Cor. 4:1).

Israel's Future: A Mystery

This brings us back to the specific mystery Paul is writing about here, namely, that the mass of Israel will be saved. Why is it a mystery? Obviously, because it is not something any of us would ever figure out by mere reason or deduce by observation. As far as we can see, Israel has been rejected permanently. We do not see even a glimmer of national restoration. But what we cannot see or deduce Paul declares by revelation to be a future fact: "Israel has experienced a hardening in part until the full number of the Gentiles has come in," and then "all Israel will be saved" (vv. 25-26).

We have already looked at this statement in some detail, trying to weigh the arguments for and against belief in a time of future Jewish blessing. It is not necessary to argue them again here. Instead, we need only explore the key phrases in the statement more fully.

The "full number" of the Gentiles is actually only "fullness" in the Greek text, but the New International Version is surely right when it amplifies the term by adding the word number. Fullness could mean "fullness of blessing," meaning that some Gentiles will receive the full measure of those blessings originally given to the Jews. But Paul has not been dealing with that idea. He has been asking why not many Jews have been saved and why so many Gentiles have been saved instead, and he is prophesying that in the future large numbers of Jews will be converted. In this context the "fullness of the Gentiles" must mean their full number, that is, all the elect to be saved from among the many Gentile nations.

How about the word until? We have already seen that this is not a terminus a quo, an ending after which nothing else should be expected. Rather, it is a terminus ad quem, an ending of one thing, after which something else will happen.

I have not been trying to develop a full treatment of prophecy in our study of Romans 11, because it is not called for. I have merely been trying to explain what Paul is teaching in chapters 9-11. But I should mention that when Paul says "Israel has experienced a hardening in part until the full number of the Gentiles has come in," he is saying almost exactly what Jesus said when he noted that "Jerusalem will be trampled on by the Gentiles until the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled" (Luke 21:24). The context shows that Jesus was thinking of the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, which happened under the Roman general Titus in 70 A.D. He was saying that the capital would be in Gentile hands until the end of the "times of the Gentiles," presumably an age of Gentile prominence if not also of widespread Gentile spiritual blessing.

If we think about such things, we can hardly escape noticing that in our lifetimes the city of Jerusalem has once again come under Jewish control, as a result of the reestablishment of the modern state of Israel. This suggests that the Gentile age may be drawing to a close, as Jesus predicted.

The Point of Prophecy

The point of prophecy is never merely to give God's people some special insight into what will one day happen, an insight not possessed by unbelievers. It is always practical; it is revealed for its bearing on how we are to live now. With that in mind we ask: What is the reason for the revelation of this mystery? Why does Paul tell us that "Israel has experienced a hardening in part until the full number of the Gentiles has come in"?

It is not hard to find the answer. He tells us in this very verse. It is "so that you may not be conceited."

What does that mean?

Let me suggest a few answers.

1. We should not be conceited in thinking that Gentile believers have replaced Jewish believers permanently.

There are two forms of this error, as I see it. One is a mild form; the other is particularly evil. The mild form is sometimes seen among Reformed theologians and takes the shape of denying that anything spiritual can exist beyond or in addition to the church. I realize there is a valid concern in this. Since the forms and types of the Old Testament have been fulfilled in Jesus Christ, these writers cannot think of going back to anything. It seems to them that if God is thought of as having anything more to do with the Jews as a nation, this must necessarily be a regression. It is to reconstitute a physical people rather than a spiritual people. It is to substitute an earthly kingdom for a heavenly one.

Some others have probably erred in this direction, too. But it seems nevertheless to be a uniquely Gentile form of conceit to suppose that God cannot also begin to work among the Jews after his special saving work among the Gentiles shall have ended. Indeed, how can we presume to limit what God can do historically, even by our Reformed theology? If God says that there will be a day of future Jewish blessing, then there will be one, and we must be humbled by this revelation.

The intense and evil form of this error is anti-Semitism, particularly that which grows out of Gentile Christian arrogance. I am aware that intolerance is not limited to Christians. All over the world, ethnic or racial groups are prejudiced against other groups. A song that I remember from my college days goes:

> The whole world is festering with unhappy souls:
> The French hate the Germans; the Germans hate the Poles; Italians hate Yugoslavs; South Africans hate the Dutch, And I don't like anybody very much.

A sinful world is like that. But the fact of universal prejudice does not excuse anti-Semitism among Gentile Christians. Unfortunately, we must acknowledge that this has often existed. After all, it is so-called Christians, not Buddhists or Moslems or animists, who have called the Jews "Christ-killers," forgetting that it was a Roman governor named Pilate who actually delivered Jesus to death. Whenever Gentile Christians start thinking of themselves as having somehow replaced the Jews in God's dealings, they must remember that the Jews are "loved [still] on account of the patriarchs" (Rom. 11:28) and that God says he has a spiritual future for them even yet.

2. We should not be conceited in thinking that a Gentile church is the culmination of God's dealings in history.

The fact that there is to be something beyond ourselves and our age in God's historical dealings should humble us in another way also. It should teach us that we are not the "be all" and "end all" of God's plans.

Indeed, it should warn us that Christianity will not certainly triumph in our hands. There was a time in the last century and earlier in this one when many Christians in the West thought like this, and their thinking bore fruit in a form of post-millennialism that held that Christianity would inevitably conquer the earth before the return of Jesus Christ.

One who has held this view is Loraine Boettner, who has authored such valuable books as The Reformed Doctrine of Predestination, Studies in Theology, Immortality, and The Millennium. More than thirty years ago, in an article in Christianity Today, Boettner wrote:

The redemption of the world... is a long slow process, extending through the centuries, yet surely approaching an appointed goal. We live in the day of advancing victory and see the conquest taking place. From the human viewpoint there are many apparent setbacks, and it often looks as though the forces of evil are about to gain the upper hand. But as one age succeeds another, there is progress. Looking back across the nearly two thousand years that have elapsed since the coming of Christ, we see that there has been marvelous progress. All over the world, pagan religions have had their day and are disintegrating. None of them can stand the open competition of Christianity. They await only the coup de grace of an aroused and energetic Christianity to send them into oblivion.... The Church must conquer the world, or the world will destroy the church. Christianity is the system of truth, the only one that through the ages has had the blessing of God upon it. We shall not expect the final fruition within our lifetime, nor within this century.

But the goal is certain and the outcome sure. The future is as bright as the promises of God. The great requirement is faith that the Great Commission of Christ will be fulfilled through the outpouring of the Holy Spirit and preaching of the everlasting Gospel.

That is strong propaganda. And, of course, much of it is true. The work of God will triumph. We are called to proclaim the gospel worldwide. The gospel will be widely known. But this is not the same thing as saying that Christianity, as an historical force, will triumph. Or that Gentile Christianity will one day rule the world.

Moreover, although we can understand how a philosophy like this gained acceptance in a day when the western nations were at the peak of their economic and political power and therefore seemed to dominate the world, we can hardly make such an easy assumption about the flow of history today. The West and western Christianity are surely in decline. And although it is true that Christianity is growing rapidly in the Third World, it is also true that other world religions are also growing. Fueled by oil revenues, the religion of Islam is particularly ascendant.

We must not forget that Jesus once asked pointedly, "When the Son of Man comes [returns], will he find faith on the earth?" (Luke 18:8).

Or that when Peter wrote of the last days, he did not say that Christendom would triumph, but rather that "there will be false teachers among you [who] will secretly introduce destructive heresies, even denying the sovereign Lord who bought them.... Many will follow their shameful ways..." (2 Peter 2:1-2).

Or that Jude reminded us of the apostles' warning that "in the last times there will be scoffers who will follow their own ungodly desires," adding, "These are the men who divide you, who follow mere natural instincts and do not have the Spirit" (Jude 18-19).

Or that Paul also wrote, "... in later times some will abandon the faith and follow deceiving spirits and things taught by demons" (1 Tim. 4:1).

None of these passages encourages us to believe in an inevitable expanding triumph of Gentile Christianity. On the contrary, they warn us of unbelief, apostasy, and false teaching before Christ's return. I do not mean to say that Christianity will perish from the earth, for God will have his remnant among the Gentiles, just as he has had his remnant among the Jews. But I do mean to say that Gentile believers dare not be arrogant but should instead "be afraid," knowing that "if God did not spare the natural branches, he will not spare [us] either" (Rom. 11:20-21).

Knowing that God has a future for the Jews after the Gentile age has drawn to an end should temper and diffuse our nearly insufferable conceit.

3. We should not be conceited in thinking that in ourselves we are something special.

Believers in Christ are special to God, of course. But I am not thinking of that. I am thinking of the tendency we have to assume that the reason we are saved and that others are not saved is because we are wiser or more holy or more perceptive or more significant than they are. We are not saved for any of these reasons. We are not wiser or more holy or more perceptive or more significant than others. On the contrary, "God [has chosen] the foolish things of the world to shame the wise; God chose the weak things of the world to shame the strong. He chose the lowly things of this world and the despised things—and the things that are not—to nullify the things that are, so that no one may boast before him" (1 Cor. 1:27-29).

If God has chosen the foolish things now and will one day renew a work among his ancient people when the times of the Gentiles shall have been completed, we can never suppose that we are special. Instead, we can only acknowledge that we are saved on account of the mercy of God and by his immeasurable grace.

4. We should not be conceited in somehow thinking that other people, who are not like us, are hopeless.

It is easy for us to abandon hope for others. When we see a person who has squandered his or her spiritual opportunities or who has vigorously opposed Christianity or has sinned in some particularly dreadful fashion, we conclude that there is probably no chance for such a person. We write him or her off and say such things as: "The Jews have rejected Jesus, so they are lost," or "My friends will not have Christ, so they are lost." That is the way we think. But we must not think that way, for it is never true. God is the God of all hopeless causes, ourselves included. John Newton was surely close to God's heart when he replied to someone who spoke to him of an acquaintance for whom he despaired, "I have never despaired of any man since God saved me."

What about you? You may be laboring under the thought that you are a hopeless case, because of who you are or because of something you may have done or said or thought. Or you may have a family member whose case seems to you to be hopeless. I assure you on the basis of the Word of God that the case is not hopeless. And you are not hopeless either! Only unbelief keeps a person from salvation, and even today you may still call upon the name of the Lord and be wonderfully saved.

Chapter 167.
"All Israel Will Be Saved"

Romans 11:26-27

About one hundred years ago, Frederick the Great, King of Prussia, was having a discussion with his chaplain about the truth of the Bible. The king had become skeptical about Christianity, largely through the influence of the French atheist Voltaire. So he said to his chaplain, "If your Bible is really true, it ought to be capable of very easy proof. So often, when I have asked for proof of the inspiration of the Bible, I have been given some large tome that I have neither the time nor desire to read. If your Bible is really from God, you should be able to demonstrate the fact simply. Give me proof for the inspiration of the Bible in a word."

The chaplain replied, "Your Majesty, it is possible for me to answer your request literally. I can give you the proof you ask for in one word."

Frederick was amazed at this response. "What is this magic word that carries such a weight of proof?" he asked.

"Israel," said the chaplain.

Frederick was silent.

There are many other proofs for Christianity, of course. But it can hardly be doubted that the continuing existence of Israel as a distinct people throughout the four thousand years of her history is a striking phenomenon. Dispossessed of her homeland and dispersed throughout the world, Israel has nevertheless survived while other peoples in similar situations have not. Coupled with the Bible's identification of the Jews as God's elect people and its many prophecies concerning their unfolding history, the preservation of Israel as a people is strong evidence for the Bible being the inspired and inerrant Word of God.

Even more than that, and much to the purpose for our study, the survival of Israel suggests that God has preserved these people through their many dispersions and persecutions not because he does not care for them, but because he does, and because he has a plan for the Jewish people that will unfold in blessing in the last days.

Proof from Isaiah

Romans 11:26 is the conclusion and clearest statement of this argument, the bottom line of Paul's discussion of God's historical purposes with the Jews, namely, that in the last days God will fulfill his promises to the Jews nationally by bringing the mass of Israel to faith in Jesus Christ as the Messiah: "And so all Israel will be saved."

We have already made that point several times over in the studies that have been leading up to this one, but what is unique about verse 26 is the fact that here at last Paul proves his argument from the Old Testament. This has been his pattern before, as I have already pointed out several times. Paul's pattern is to make his argument first and then, when he has completed it, to nail it down with one or more Old Testament citations. He did this in chapter 3, after having argued the case for human depravity. He did it again in chapter 4, after explaining the gospel at the end of the previous chapter. The same pattern was followed in chapters 9 and 10.

This is opposite to the pattern followed by the apostle Peter, to give just one contrary example. In his sermon on Pentecost, Peter first gave his texts and then argued from them, rather than the other way around. He did this three times, expounding Christian truth on the basis of Joel 2:2832, Psalm 16:8-11, and Psalm 110:1 (cf. Acts 2:14-41).

In Romans 11, Paul proves his argument concerning Israel by a quotation from Isaiah 59:20-21. Isaiah 27:9, Jeremiah 31:33-34, and Psalm 14:7 may have also been in his mind, since he seems to have included wording from those additional verses in his quotation.

However, there are two ways in which this quotation can be taken, and, not surprisingly, they correspond to the two ways of looking at what Paul is saying about Israel, which I have already examined. The text could be saying that the Redeemer will emerge out of Israel in order to take away the people's sins by his death on the cross. In that case, it would be a reference to Jesus' first coming and earthly ministry. Or else it could be saying that Jesus will come out of heaven to Israel in order to turn the hearts of the people from unbelief to faith. In this case, it would (or could) be referring to a time of future blessing. Those who do not believe in a future period of national conversion for Israel naturally incline to the former interpretation. Those who think Paul is prophesying an age of future blessing choose the latter.

I have already indicated my reasons for choosing the second of these views. I add here that in my judgment the emphasis in Paul's quotation of Isaiah 59:20 is on the future tense of the verb "to be," that is, the words "will come." From Isaiah's point in history, to say that the Messiah "will come" could be a reference only to Jesus' first coming. But from Paul's vantage point, which followed that first coming, the verb must be looking to a period still future, and Paul must be thinking of it.

Here are two observations that are very important.

1. Although by itself the passage in Isaiah could refer either to the first coming of Jesus or to a time of future blessing of Israel by God, from the point at which Paul under the guidance of the Holy Spirit has interpreted it as referring to this future blessing, we have the proper meaning and ought to interpret the verses in this way. In other words, to go back to the idea of the "mystery" Paul says he is revealing (v. 25), it is as if Paul acknowledges that readers of the Bible could not be sure what Isaiah was referring to before this revelation but that now we can be sure of it because of what he is teaching.

Robert Haldane says, "We may be assured that the Apostle, speaking by the same Spirit as the Prophet, and directed by the Spirit to quote him, has... given the meaning of his words."

Following a similar line of thought, Charles Hodge says, "We are, of course, bound to receive the apostle's interpretation as correct."

2. My second observation is that this positions us to see many passages that might otherwise be construed as referring only to a past blessing as actually referring to a day of future blessing, or at least possibly referring to it. This is what John Murray is arguing when he says, "This express application is an index to the principle of interpretation which would have to be applied to many other Old Testament passages which are in the same vein as Isaiah 59:20, 21, namely, that they comprise the promise of an expansion of gospel blessing such as Paul enunciates in verses 25, 26."

If that is right, this is the place in our exposition to recognize that there are other Old Testament texts that should be seen as prophesying the future conversion of the mass of Israel and to look at some of them.

Old Testament Texts

There must be hundreds of such passages. An exhaustive study would fill volumes. Yet here are some that are especially significant.

1. Jeremiah 16:14-16.'"... the days are coming,' declares the LORD, 'when men will no longer say, "As surely as the LORD lives, who brought the Israelites up out of Egypt," but they will say, "As surely as the LORD lives, who brought Israelites up out of the land > of the north and out of all the countries where he had banished them." For I will restore them to the land I gave their forefathers. But now I will send for many fishermen,' declares the LORD, 'and they will catch them. After that I will send for many hunters, and they will hunt them down on every mountain and hill and from the crevices of the rocks.'"

Since Jeremiah was writing before the fall of Jerusalem to the Babylonian armies under Nebuchadnezzar, this might be taken as a prophecy of the return of the Jews to Judah in the days of Ezra and Nehemiah, and it may even have had a partial fulfillment at that time. However, in view of the apostle Paul's understanding of Isaiah 59:20-21, it may also be referring to a more important return of Israel to her ancient homeland in the last days.

In fact, when we begin to think of the text along these lines, the words "and out of all the countries where he had banished them" take on new meaning. For now the prophecy is seen not merely as foretelling the return of the Jews from one nation alone, that is, from Babylon, but from all the world's nations, where the Jews have indeed been scattered and from which they must come if they are to return to the land of Israel.

2. Jeremiah 32:36-40. In Jeremiah 32, the chapter in which God tells Jeremiah to buy a field as a symbol of his lasting commitment to the Jewish homeland, God says, "You are saying about this city, 'By the sword, famine and plague it will be handed over to the king of Babylon'; but this is what the LORD, the God of Israel says: I will surely gather them from all the lands where I banish them in my furious anger and great wrath; I will bring them back to this place and let them live in safety. They will be my people, and I will be their God. I will give them singleness of heart and action, so that they will always fear me for their own good and the good of their children after them. I will make an everlasting covenant with them: I will never stop doing good to them, and I will inspire them to fear me, so that they will never turn away from me."

Like Jeremiah 16:14-16, this passage seems at first to be referring only to the return of the Jews to Jerusalem from Babylon, even though some of the elements in the prophecy do not seem to fit perfectly, for instance, that the people will serve God in "singleness of heart" and "always fear" him, and that God will make "an everlasting covenant with them." Singleness of heart hardly describes the history of the people from the days of Ezra and Nehemiah on. In fact, they were as wayward then as ever, and in the days of Jesus they actually turned against their Messiah.

On the other hand, as soon as we begin to think in terms of a still future blessing, the idea of "singleness of heart" and "always fearing" God and "an everlasting covenant" have an exact meaning and are seen to refer to the same future conversion of the mass of Israel that Paul is prophesying.

3. Hosea 1:10 and 2:21-23. A classic and often re-echoed prophecy of this future age is found in Hosea's symbolic naming of his children and God's promise to change their names in that day. Hosea called his children Jezreel (meaning "scattered"), Lo-Ruhamah (meaning "Not-Loved"), and Lo-Ammi (meaning "Not-My-People"). But God said, changing the names to Planted, Loved, and My People, "I will plant her for myself in the land; I will show my love to the one I called 'Not my loved one,' I will say to those called 'Not my people,' 'You are my people'; and they will say, 'You are my God.'" (See study 135, "'Children of the Living God,'" in this volume.)

There are prophecies similar to this toward the end of many of the minor prophets (cf. Joel 3:1721; Amos 9:11-15; Micah 7:8-20; Zeph. 3:9-20).

4. Zechariah 12-14. Special attention should be given to the last three chapters of Zechariah, which are presented as "an oracle" about the final days. The words "on that day," which customarily refer to God's final wrapping-up of history, including the last judgment, occur sixteen times and tie the chapters together. These chapters describe a time in which:

First, God will deliver Jerusalem from the nations of the earth, which are attacking her (12:1-9),

Second, the people will "look on... the one they have pierced" and "mourn for him" (12:10-13),

Third, a "fountain" will be opened to the house of David and the inhabitants of Jerusalem "to cleanse them from sin and impurity" (13:1-3),

Fourth, the people will call on God, causing him to say, as in Hosea 2:23, "They are my people," and the people to say, "The LORD is our God" (13:9),

Fifth, the Lord will descend on the Mount of Olives to save the people in a time of great trouble, deliver Jerusalem, and bring prosperity to the land (14:1-15), Sixth, Gentiles will go to Jerusalem to worship God (14:16-19), and Seventh, the people will become holy in all they are and do (14:20-21).

Nothing like this has ever happened; therefore, it must be future. Besides, these things were written after the regathering of the people in the days of Nehemiah and Ezra, which means that they cannot refer to those past days but must refer instead to a time yet future. That is, they must refer to the time of future Jewish belief about which Paul is writing.

Jews for Jesus

At this point the natural reaction is to say that widespread Jewish conversions are unlikely, considering the traditionally strong opposition of Judaism to Jesus and Christianity. But even if we are only looking at this from a human point of view, it may not be as far out as many think, because there seems to be a new interest in Jesus by Jewish thinkers.

Sholem Asch, a Polish Jew who was one of the best-known Jewish writers of his day, said in an interview published in the Christian Herald many years ago:

Since I first met him [Jesus], he has held my mind and heart.... I was seeking that something for which so many of us search—that surety, that faith, that spiritual content in my living which would bring me peace and through which I might bring some peace to others. I found it in the Nazarene....

Jesus Christ, to me, is the outstanding personality of all time, of all history, both as Son of God and as Son of Man.... No other religious leader... has ever become so personal a part of people as The Nazarene. When you understand Jesus, you understand that he came to save you, to come into your personality. It isn't just a case of a misty, uncertain relationship between a worshipper and an unseen God; that is abstract; Jesus is personal."

Constantine Brunner, the German Jewish philosopher, looked upon Jesus as the great representative of pure Judaism. He wrote:

Is it only the Jew who is incapable of seeing and hearing all that others see and hear? Are the Jews stricken with blindness and deafness as regards Messiah Jesus, so that to them alone he has nothing to say?... Understand, then, what we shall do: We shall bring him back to us. Messiah Jesus is not dead for us—for us he has not yet lived: and he will not slay us, he will make us alive again. His profound and holy words, and all that is true and heart-appealing in the New Testament, must from now on be heard in our synagogues and taught to our children, in order that the wrong we had committed may be made good, the curse turned into a blessing, and that he at last may find us who has always been seeking after us.

Ferdynand Zweig, a contemporary English Jew who has taught at the Hebrew and Tel Aviv universities, says, "The Jewish religion seems to be at present to the large mass of Israeli Jews uninspiring and uninspired. Could it be that Jesus could give it a new lease of life?"

Hans Joachim Schoeps, the Jewish theologian who taught the history of religion at Erlangen University in Germany, wrote:

The Messianism of Israel aims at that which is to come, the eschatology of the Gentile church at the return of him who has come. Both elective covenants confront the ebb and flow of the finite world in the shared expectation that the decisive event is still to come—the goal of the ways of God that he travels with mankind in Israel and in the Church, The church of Jesus Christ has preserved no portrait of its lord and savior. If Jesus were to come again tomorrow, no Christian would know his face. But it might well be that he who is coming at the end of days, he who is awaited by the synagogue as by the church, is one, with one and the same face.

None of these authors has accepted Jesus as his personal Savior from sin, and no one would say on the basis of these quotations that the Jews as a whole are ready to accept Jesus of Nazareth as their Messiah. But they do indicate what even many Jews are calling a new openness to Jesus and suggest, to Christians at least, that the time of future national conversion that Paul writes of in Romans, may not be far distant.

Jews and the Gentile Church

I close with a few observations on what God's historical dealings with the Jewish people mean for today's largely Gentile church.

First, the experience of Israel through the thousands of years of her history is a demonstration of the biblical principle that where there is obedience there will be blessing, and where there is disobedience there will be judgments. Israel has suffered many judgments during the centuries of her disobedience to God's law and rejection of God's Messiah. But it is the same for Christians. God is not mocked. If we disobey God's Word and persist in going our own way, God will discipline us, gently if he can but also forcefully if he must. Many believers have been so disciplined. You may be one. Learn from it. You cannot fight against God successfully.

Second, God is faithful to his covenant. We are going to pursue this in our next study, because it is the explicit teaching of Romans 11:27 ("And this is my covenant with them when I take away their sins"). This is an encouragement because it tells us that God will not give up on those whom he has chosen, even if our sins cause him to turn away his face for a time.

Third, there is a lesson about grace. For ultimately that is what this discussion is all about. God's relationship to Israel is a tremendous illustration of his grace. Chosen, yet frightfully disobedient, even to the point of rejecting and actually killing the very Son of God sent to them, Israel nevertheless has been loved by God, continues to be loved by him, and will one day be brought back to God—because God is gracious. This is our God, too. The New Testament calls today the day of God's grace.

But this day of grace will not last forever, and the regathering of Israel in her own land may indicate that God's days of grace are fast drawing to a close. Where do you stand in your relationship to Jesus, who came into this world and died on the cross to save you?

He is coming again! Will you be ready for him when he comes?

The Bible says, "We must pay more careful attention, therefore, to what we have heard, so that we do not drift away. For if the message spoken by angels was binding, and every violation and disobedience received its just punishment, how shall we escape if we ignore such a great salvation?" (Heb. 2:l-3a).

Chapter 168.
God's Irrevocable Covenant

Romans 11:27

In the last study I said I would return to the subject of God's covenant in this one, because of verse 27. A covenant is a solemn promise, usually ratified in some formal way. But I begin with a preliminary question: Is the covenant idea important for understanding biblical theology?

Covenant theologians will immediately answer, "Yes, of course. "And I must confess that I believe this is right. I will show why as I go along. But the question is still reasonable, if for no other reason than that the idea does not seem to be very important in Romans. Although this is the greatest doctrinal book in the New Testament, as almost everyone will agree, the word covenant occurs only twice in the letter: once in Romans 9:4, where it is mentioned as one of the advantages of Judaism ("Theirs is the adoption as sons; theirs the divine glory, the covenants") and the second time in our text ("And this is my covenant with them when I take away their sins").

The first is a bare mention, with no elaboration at all. The second is a quotation from the Old Testament. In neither case does the apostle develop what is called a covenant theology.

I suppose that is the best defense I have for my personal neglect of the covenant idea in Foundations of the Christian Faith. produced that large volume over five years' time, and it contains over 700 pages of material. Yet although it mentions the word covenant in a few places, it does not develop an explicit covenant theology. One of my friends chastised me for that on one occasion, wondering how a "covenant theologian" like myself could write what I call "a comprehensive" theology and ignore this subject.

Many Covenants

In my opinion, the idea does not have quite the prominence in the Bible that many covenant theologians give it. In fact, covenant theology itself was not worked out until late in the Reformation period by two of the followers of John Calvin: Zacharias Ursinus (1534-1583) and Caspar Olevianus (1536-1587). They developed the idea of two main covenants: a covenant of works established between God and Adam, and a covenant of grace established between God the Father and God the Son. Nevertheless, the covenant idea is important, as even a very quick look at the biblical material shows.

In Hebrew the word for "covenant" is bʾrith. It occurs more than 300 times in the Old Testament and is translated as "covenant" 257 times (NIV). The Greek word is diathêkê. It occurs 36 times in the New Testament, more than half of them in the letter to the Hebrews.

We can approach the subject from the number or types of covenants that are mentioned in the Bible. Everyone seems to have a different listing at this point, which complicates matters, but most lists would include:

1. God's covenant with Adam (Gen. 1:28-30; 2:16-17). The word covenant is not used in the account of God's promises and warnings to Adam, but it is assumed that God established something like a covenant with him. According to the terms of this covenant, Adam was to enjoy the fullness of God's blessing upon the condition of perfect obedience in the matter of the forbidden tree. If he should stand that test, his posterity would stand with him. If he should fail that test, he would bring judgment and death upon the race. Paul seems to be thinking of this covenant in Romans 5:12-19, though the word covenant does not occur in that chapter either.
2. God's covenant with Noah (Gen. 6:18; 9:9-17). This was a promise never again to destroy the world by flood. It was confirmed by the sign of the rainbow.
3. God's covenant with Abraham (Gen. 12:1-3; 13:14-17; 15:1-21; 17:1-22). The first two covenants, those with Adam and Noah, had to do with the human race generally. The covenant with Abraham concerns the nation of Israel and involves the following promises: that Abraham would be the father of a great nation, that God would give this people an extensive land of their own, that the land would be theirs forever, that the Redeemer would come through this line of descent, and that God would bless all the peoples of the world through this Redeemer. This covenant was repeated with Abraham's two immediate descendants: his son Isaac and his grandson Jacob.

4. God's covenant with the Jews through Moses (Exod. 19:5-6; 24:7-8; 34:28; Deut. 28:1-30:20). This is sometimes called the Deuteronomic covenant because of its extensive treatment in that book. Like the covenant established with Adam, it is a covenant of blessing contingent upon obedience and of judgment for disobedience.

5. God's covenant with David (2 Sam. 7:4-16; 1 Chron. 17:3-14). God promised David that he would establish his throne and kingdom forever, which David recognized to be a promise about the Messiah.

6. The new covenant (Jer. 31:31-34; 32:40-41). Jeremiah was the first of the Old Testament writers to use the words "new covenant." He recognized the failure of the people to keep the terms of the old covenant, but he promised a day when God would establish a new covenant in which one of the blessings would be a change of the people's hearts that would enable them to obey God and be holy.

"The time is coming," declares the Lord,
"when I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and with the house of Judah....
"I will put my law in their minds and write it on their hearts.
I will be their God, and they will be my people."

Jeremiah 31:31-33

7. The covenant of grace. This is not a biblical expression, and only one verse in the Bible even puts the words covenant and grace together in the same sentence (Heb. 10:29). But "covenant of grace" is a phrase that theologians use alongside "covenant of works," which they use to describe the covenant assumed to have been established between God and Adam. Covenant of grace refers to an agreement between God the Father and God the Son according to which the Father would give a numerous posterity to Jesus contingent upon the accomplishment of his atoning sacrifice on the cross.

We can gain a quick sense of the importance of the covenant idea by remembering: (1) that our Bibles are divided into two covenants: the Old Covenant (or Testament) and the New Covenant (or Testament), and (2) that we speak of a covenant every time we observe the Lord's Supper, remembering how Jesus said, "This cup is the new covenant in my blood..." (Luke 22:20; cf. 1 Cor. 11:25).

Unconditional Covenants

We are now ready to look at our text in Romans specifically. When we do, the first thing we notice is that the covenant is described as being God's covenant, that is, a covenant he makes: "And this is my covenant with them when I take away their sins" (emphasis added). There are covenants in the Bible between human beings, of course, but the significant ones are all between God and man (or men), and it is God who enacts them. That is the important thing. Because they are essentially God's promise to do something, they have the character and power of God behind them.

By far the most dramatic example of a covenant is the one established with Abraham, recorded in Genesis 15. The chapter tells how God told Abraham to prepare for a covenant ceremony, just as such ceremonies were apparently enacted in his day. He was to take several animals—a heifer, a goat, a ram, a dove, and a pigeon—cut each into two parts, and lay the parts on the ground in two rows over against each other. (It is helpful to note that the Hebrew word bʾrith is often accompanied by the verb "to cut," therefore literally "to cut a covenant.") In ancient times the parties would stand in the space between the rows of divided animals and make their vows there.

Presumably, the blood of the slain animals, which covered the ground where they stood, made their vows especially solemn and binding.

But here is the interesting thing. After Abraham had prepared the place for the ceremony, God caused Abraham to fall into a deep sleep, and while he was sleeping God appeared to him, symbolized by a smoking cauldron of fire and a blazing torch. These passed between the pieces of the animals, while Abraham watched. God said, "To your descendants I give this land, from the river of Egypt to the great river, the Euphrates" (Gen. 15:18).

This was not a case of covenant making between equals in which, for example, God would promise to do something and Abraham, for his part, also would promise to do something. In this covenant, God made all the promises, and Abraham was not required to do anything.
Theologians call such covenants unilateral or unconditional covenants, to distinguish them from those that do involve two parties and are conditional.

The Deuteronomic covenant is the chief example of a conditional covenant, since it promises blessing if the people obey and warns of judgment if they do not. It says:

If you fully obey the LORD your God and carefully follow all his commands I give you today, the LORD your God will set you high above all the nations on earth. All these blessings will come upon you and accompany you if you obey the LORD your God:

> You will be blessed in the city and blessed in the country.
> The fruit of your womb will be blessed, and the crops of your land and the young of your livestock—the calves of your herds and the lambs of your flocks.
> Your basket and your kneading trough will be blessed.
> You will be blessed when you come in and blessed when you go out.
>
> Deuteronomy 28:1-6

However, if you do not obey the LORD your God and do not carefully follow all his commands and decrees I am giving you today, all these curses will come upon you and overtake you:

> You will be cursed in the city and cursed in the country.
> Your basket and your kneading trough will be cursed.
> The fruit of your womb will be cursed, and the crops of your land, and the calves of your herds and the lambs of your flocks.
> You will be cursed when you come in and cursed when you go out."
>
> Deuteronomy 28:15-19

The covenant continues in that vein for several chapters.

Of course, you can see why biblical theologians speak of unconditional covenants, like that established with Abraham, and conditional covenants, like the Deuteronomic covenant. But let me point out that, strictly speaking, all the covenants are unconditional from God's point of view. God sets the terms, and the terms do not alter. They may be without condition: "I will do this, regardless of what you do." They may have multiple responses, depending upon what human beings do: "If you obey, I will bless you; if you do not, I will judge you." But what God promises to do is irrevocable from the start.

Why? It is because God is God. He is sovereign in all he does, and he is faithful. He keeps his word. And also because he foresees or, which is a better way of saying it, determines all contingencies. We are not like that. We make promises and then are unable to keep them, because things happen that we could not foresee or because we change. But God does not change, and nothing surprises him. His purposes at the end are exactly what they were at the beginning.

As far as Israel is concerned, this means that God will not forsake the Jews but will continue to work with them as his covenant people, even though they have wandered far from him and for the most part have rejected Jesus Christ. This is why Paul quotes from Isaiah 59 at this point. As John Murray says, "The effect [of this quotation] is that the future restoration of Israel is certified by nothing less than the certainty belonging to [the] covenantal institution."

A Covenant of Grace

There is another thing we need to see about this covenant and text: It is not only a covenant established by God and therefore something that is unilateral and unconditional, it is also a covenant of salvation, which means that it is a covenant of grace. This is because it is a promise to "take away their sins," and we know that the taking away of sin is done only by the death of Jesus Christ.

This is what the Book of Hebrews emphasizes. I wrote earlier that there are thirty-six uses of the word covenant in the New Testament and that more than half of them are in Hebrews. The exact number is nineteen. In that book the author is writing to Jews to show that God has replaced the old covenant, which required obedience but did not promise the means to do it, with a new covenant, which is mediated by Jesus and accomplished by his death. He refers to the sacrifices performed by the Old Testament priests and says such things as, "The ministry Jesus has received is as superior to theirs as the covenant of which he is mediator is superior to the old one..." (Heb. 8:6). Or again, "Christ is the mediator of a new covenant, that those who are called may receive the promised eternal inheritance..." (Heb. 9:15).

The Hebrews writer closes by saying, "May the God of peace, who through the blood of the eternal covenant brought back from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, equip you with everything good for doing his will, and may he work in us what is pleasing to him, through Jesus Christ, to whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen" (Heb. 13:20-21).

What Hebrews says is important, for it warns us never to think of Jewish people as somehow enjoying a separate track of salvation, as if they are saved only because they are Jews and by being Jews. Some who have taught that God will save the Jews in the last days have talked like this, leading critics of their view to say that they have created two peoples of God, a heavenly people with a heavenly destiny and an earthly people with an earthly destiny. If they have done that, they are wrong. There is only one people of God, composed both of Jews and Gentiles. The covenant we are considering has nothing to do with a separate people and a separate destiny, only that God will keep his promises to the Jewish people by leading the mass of them to faith in Jesus Christ as their Savior in the final days.

As Paul told Timothy, "For there is one God and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus" (1 Tim. 2:5).

Our Faithful God

My final point is that, therefore, we also are a party to this covenant, if we have believed on Jesus Christ. The Jews are to be brought to faith in the last days. But we stand in that same covenant today, and the attributes of God that have formed the earlier covenants are also for our encouragement. Can't you see that this is how Romans 11 is ending? Paul has been arguing for God's faithfulness to the Jews as being consistent with his faithfulness to us, and now, having shown that "all Israel will be saved," he breaks into praise of God's gracious attributes, since they affect us also.

In these last verses he is going to praise God's mercy, knowledge, wisdom, judgments, and paths, and he will close by saying, "To him be the glory forever! Amen."

When we talk about God's irrevocable covenant, as we have been doing here, and God's irrevocable call, which we will do in our next study, we are speaking about God's immutability. Immutability means that God does not change, and because he does not change he can be counted on.

In what ways does God not change? In his popular book Knowing God, English theologian J. I. Packer lists six areas:

1. God's life does not change. Created things have a beginning and an end, but God does not. His life is a constant datum. God does not grow old or mature or weaken or grow stronger. God cannot change for the better, because he is already perfect, and he certainly cannot change for the worse.

2. God's character does not change. One of the most repeated passages in the Bible is Exodus 34:6-7, in which God reveals himself to Moses, saying, "The LORD, the LORD, the compassionate and gracious God, slow to anger, abounding in love and faithfulness, maintaining love to thousands, and forgiving wickedness, rebellion and sin. Yet he does not leave the guilty unpunished; he punishes the children and their children for the sin of the fathers to the third and fourth generation." That is what God was like in the days of the Jewish exodus, and that is what he is like today. Sickness, old age, or adverse circumstances can destroy our good traits, but nothing like this ever happens to God. He can be counted on to be as kind, gracious, forgiving (and holy) as he always was.

3. God's truth does not change. This means that the truths of the Bible do not change. What we read in the pages of Holy Scripture is as right and true today as ever.

4. God's ways do not change. Packer writes: "He continues to act towards sinful men in the way that he does in the Bible story. Still he shows his freedom and lordship by discriminating between sinners, causing some to hear the gospel while others do not hear it, and moving some of those who hear it to repentance while leaving others in their unbelief.... Still he blesses those on whom he sets his love in a way that humbles them, so that all the glory may be his alone. Still he hates the sins of his people, and uses all kinds of inward and outward pains and griefs to wean their hearts from compromise and disobedience___Man's ways, we know, are pathetically inconstant—but not God's."

5. God's purposes do not change. The ups and downs of history do not frustrate God or cause him to alter what he has determined beforehand to do. Has he planned to bring many sons and daughters into glory through faith in Jesus? Then he will do it. Has he purposed to bless Israel in a special way nationally? Then that will be done. What God does in time he has planned in eternity, and what he has planned in eternity is carried out in time.

6. God's Son does not change. Perhaps most blessed of all for Christian people, the Lord Jesus Christ does not change. He is "the same yesterday and today and forever" (Heb. 13:8), and it remains true that "he is able to save completely those who come to God through him..." (Heb. 7:25).

When the great protector Oliver Cromwell was dying, he was overcome with spiritual darkness and depression, and in his despair he asked his chaplain, "Tell me, is it possible to fall from grace?"

"No," said his minister. "It is not possible."

"Then I am safe," said Cromwell, "for I know that I was once in grace. I am the poorest wretch that ever lived, but I know that God has loved me."

Do you remember this question from the Heidelberg Catechism?

Question 1: "What is thy only comfort in life and in death?"

Answer: "That I, with body and soul, both in life and in death, am not my own, but belong to my faithful Savior Jesus Christ, who with his precious blood has fully satisfied for all my sins, and redeemed me from all the power of the devil; and so preserves me that without the will of my Father in heaven not a hair can fall from my head; yea, that all things must work together for my salvation. Wherefore, by his Holy Spirit, he also assures me of eternal life, and makes me heartily willing and ready henceforth to live unto him." That is our God forever! Amen.

Chapter 169.
God's Irrevocable Call

Romans 11:28-29

Do you remember the Greek philosopher Heraclitus? He lived about 2,600 years ago in Ephesus, and it was he who said, "It is impossible to step into the same river twice." Heraclitus meant that life is in a state of constant change. So, although you can step into a river once, step out, and then step in a second time, by the time you have stepped back in the water has flowed on and the river is no longer the same. It is a different river. To Heraclitus and the Greeks who followed him, all of life seemed to be like that—as if everything is changing and it is changing all the time.

"But if that is so," Heraclitus asked, "how is it that things are not in a state of constant chaos?" He answered that life is not chaos because the change we see is an ordered change, and the reason it is ordered and not random is that the mind, reason, or order of God stands behind it.

To the Greek philosophers, God (or reason) was the only fixed point in an otherwise chaotic universe.

The Character of God

Heraclitus was not a Christian, of course. He lived well before the time of Jesus Christ. But if Heraclitus had lived six or seven hundred years later and had been given an opportunity to read Paul's letter to the Romans, he would have understood our text easily. For what Paul is saying in the closing lines of Romans 11 is that the character and, therefore, also the plans of God do not change, regardless of the way human beings alter or behave.

Anyone who has been studying Romans 11 carefully will be aware that verses 28-32 are a summary of what Paul has been at pains to prove earlier. He has been asking why Jewish people seem to have been rejected by God, why they have turned their backs on the Messiah, and he has answered that it has been for the sake of Gentile conversions. Using the image of a cultivated olive tree and branches from a wild tree, he argued that Jewish branches have been broken off so that wild branches, which represent Gentiles, might be grafted in. Jewish people have been set aside for a time so that salvation might be extended to all the many peoples of the world.

But this setting-aside is only temporary, for once "the full number of the Gentiles has come in... all Israel will be saved" (Rom. 11:25-26). That is, there will be a time of widespread Jewish conversions before the final judgment.

This earlier teaching is summarized in our present text: "As far as the gospel is concerned, they are enemies on your account; but as far as election is concerned, they are loved on account of the patriarchs, for God's gift and his call are irrevocable" (Rom. 11:28-29).

But how can Paul say this? Setting aside the matter of special revelation, what could possibly lead Paul to this conclusion? He could conclude on the basis of the widespread Jewish rejection of the gospel, which he had witnessed, that the Jews were being set aside. He could imagine on the basis of the growing Gentile response that Gentiles were being brought into God's salvation plan. But on what possible basis could Paul suppose that one day the Jews as a people would be saved? There is only one answer. It is the character of God. God is unchanging. Therefore, his plans for the Jews are unchanging, and his call, which puts his plans into action, is irrevocable.

To put this in simple language: God chose the Jews to be his special people, and nothing that has happened since, or will happen, can change that choice or relationship.

So these words are not a reflection upon Paul's missionary experience, still less an expression of his fading hope that his own people might nevertheless somehow be saved eventually. It is a deduction from God's character. That is what Leon Morris is getting when he writes at this point, "God had made promises to Israel, and these promises would be kept. Israel's refusal to accept the gospel did not mean either that the gospel was a failure or that God would not perform all he had promised to his ancient people."

God's Gifts and God's Call

In the last study we looked at one expression of God's faithfulness: the covenant. It is because God is faithful to his covenant that I borrowed the word irrevocable from verse 29 and linked it to the word covenant in verse 27, where it does not actually occur, and I spoke of "God's Irrevocable Covenant." Here two new ideas are introduced to explain the nature of God's faithfulness: God's gifts and God's call.

What do these words refer to?

The Swiss commentator F. Godet thinks that God's gifts are the moral or intellectual aptitudes of a people. He observes that the Greeks, Romans, and Phoenicians each had their own special gifts from God in areas such as science, art, law, politics, industry, and commerce. The Jews received what he called "a higher gift," that is, an aptitude and intuition for holiness. It is doubtful that this is what Paul is thinking of here. In this context, "gifts" is linked to the words call and covenant, which means that Paul is thinking of the specific gifts given to the covenant people as part of that relationship.

The true listing of the gifts given to Israel is in Romans 9, which means that the closing verses of this middle section of Romans take us back to the beginning: "Theirs is the adoption as sons; theirs the divine glory, the covenants, the receiving of the law, the temple worship and the promises. Theirs are the patriarchs, and from them is traced the human ancestry of Christ, who is God over all" (Rom. 9:4-5). Paul's mention of the patriarchs in Romans 11:28 itself requires us to think of these verses.

How about the other term, God's call? To what does this refer? Our first instinct is to think of it as God's effectual call, that is, the call of the Holy Spirit that leads the person receiving it to faith. The word was used this way in Romans 8, where Paul wrote, "And those he predestined, he also called" (v. 30).

However, this is probably not the right meaning here. In this verse "call" is virtually synonymous with predestination or election. The meaning is not that God has called or will call the Jews to saving faith, though Paul is teaching that the mass of Israel will come to faith in the final days, but rather that God has chosen the nation to be a special nation for his purposes and that he will not, indeed cannot, abandon that choice because Israel has rejected the Messiah.

Verse 29 is saying that the adoption, the divine glory, the covenants, the receiving of the law, the temple worship, the promises, and the patriarchs are Israel's still, regardless of her unbelief, and that the people remain God's covenant people.

But God! When you chose Abraham to be the father of a special people, didn't you know that he would be weak in faith himself? Didn't you know that he would step aside from his high calling and go down to Egypt, where he would be willing even to sacrifice the honor of his wife to save his own skin?

"Yes," says God, "I knew that. But I called him anyway, and my gifts to him and my calling of him were irrevocable."

But God! Surely you knew that the people who came along in the line of Abraham would be unfaithful. You gave them the law through Moses. But even Moses, great as he was, dishonored you by taking your glory to himself. He struck the rock contrary to your command, saying, "Must we bring you water out of this rock?" (Num. 20:10). You even kept him from entering the Promised Land as a result. Did you really take all that into account when you called the Jews to be a special people?

"Yes," God replies, "I knew what Moses would do. But my gifts and my call are irrevocable."

But God! What about David? David committed adultery with Bathsheba and even had her husband, Uriah, killed to escape detection. Certainly, if you had known what David would be like, you would have done things differently. Did you really consider David's sin when you set your electing love upon this people?

"Yes," God answers, "I did, and my call is irrevocable."

But God! What about the kings who followed David? And the people who copied the debased morality of those kings? How could you have set upon such people an eternal love, expressed in an irrevocable covenant?

"Your ways are not my ways," says God. "I knew the people would be wicked. Everyone is wicked. 'There is no one righteous, not even one; there is no one who understands, no one who seeks God.' I wrote that, remember. Still I have fixed my covenant love upon these people, and my call is irrevocable. My will for them has not changed."

But God! Surely your call must change in light of the way these people treated Jesus Christ.
Jesus was loving and compassionate. His greatest offense was to be holy and to speak the truth. Yet they rejected him. They hounded him to death and eventually secured his execution on a cross between two thieves. If you had foreseen that, you would never have made the promises you did. Or now, having seen their treatment of Jesus, surely you will repudiate whatever relationship you did have with them. Surely you are going to cast them off forever!

"No," God replies. "I know the end from the beginning. I knew how it would all turn out. Yet, in spite of what they did, I set an irrevocable love upon them."

Our Faithful God

I am not writing this for Jewish people particularly, of course. I am writing these studies for contemporary Christians, who are largely Gentile. So I am concerned with how this affects them. How does it affect them? How does it affect you and me?

If we were only concerned with what is usually called prophecy, that is, with what God will be doing one day, there would be little relevance. But that is not the case. As Leon Morris said, this is not an example of Paul's Jewish patriotism, but rather an outworking of his doctrine of justification. And because he is basing his conclusions on the character of God, everything he emphasizes about God's dealings with the Jews is for us, too. In the previous study we ended by thinking about God's immutability, the fact that God does not change. In this study I want to end by focusing on God's faithfulness. I want to stress that his gifts to you and his calling of you are irrevocable.

A number of years ago, Arthur W. Pink wrote a book in which he discussed seventeen great attributes of God. He expanded that list later, increasing the attributes of God to twenty-five and adding twenty "excellencies" of Jesus Christ. One of the attributes of God he discussed was faithfulness.

In what ways is God faithful? Pink suggested the following:

1. God is faithful in preserving his people. We have a phrase for this in theology: the perseverance of the saints. It can be understood in two ways. It can mean that the saints persevere, or it can mean that God perseveres with the saints. Obviously both are true, and the former is true only because the latter also is. That is, the saints persevere only because God perseveres with them. To put it in the language we have been using: The followers of Jesus Christ will be faithful to him because he is faithful to them. God said, "Never will I leave you; never will I forsake you" (Heb. 13:5; cf. Deut. 31:6). Jesus told his disciples, "Surely I will be with you always, to the very end of the age" (Matt. 28:20).

I have often taught that there are four New Testament texts that, more than any others, teach the perseverance of the saints. Two are from the lips of Jesus. Two are from Paul.

The first text is John 6:37-40: "All that the Father gives me will come to me, and whoever comes to me I will never drive away.... And this is the will of him who sent me, that I shall lose none of all that he has given me, but raise them up at the last day. For my Father's will is that everyone who looks to the Son and believes in him shall have eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day."

The second text is John 10:27-30: "My sheep listen to my voice; I know them, and they follow me. I give them eternal life, and they shall never perish; no one can snatch them out of my hand.
My Father, who has given them to me, is greater than all; no one can snatch them out of my Father's hand. I and the Father are one."

The third text is Romans 8:31-39, which we have already studied in detail: "What, then, shall we say in response to this? If God is for us, who can be against us? He who did not spare his own Son, but gave him up for us all—how will he not also, along with him, graciously give us all things? Who will bring any charge against those whom God has chosen? It is God who justifies. Who is he that condemns? Christ Jesus, who died—more than that, who was raised to life—is at the right hand of God and is also interceding for us. Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall trouble or hardship or persecution or famine or nakedness or danger or sword? As it is written:

> For your sake we face death all day long; we are considered as sheep to be slaughtered.

No, in all these things we are more than conquerors through him who loved us. For I am convinced that neither death nor life, neither angels nor demons, neither the present nor the future, nor any powers, neither height nor depth, nor anything else in all creation, will be able to separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

The final text is Philippians 1:6. "Being confident of this, that he who began a good work in you will carry it on to completion until the day of Christ Jesus."

These texts teach the perseverance of the saints and assure us that the gifts and call of God are irrevocable.

2. God is faithful in disciplining his people. God has called us to be like Jesus Christ, which means that he will do whatever is necessary to conform us to that image. Instruction?
Encouragement? Of course. But also discipline. The Bible says, "The Lord disciplines those he loves, and he punishes everyone he accepts as a son" (Heb. 12:6; cf. Prov. 3:11-12).

In one of his later writings, Harry Ironside tells of something that occurred early in his ministry. He had been preaching in Fresno, California, and the day came, surprisingly to him, when he was entirely out of money. He had to check out of his hotel, leaving his suitcase at a drugstore to be picked up later. That evening, hungry, having had no supper, he settled himself under a tree on the lawn of the courthouse for the night. He thought of Philippians 4:19, "My God will meet all your needs according to his glorious riches in Christ Jesus." He complained. Why doesn't God do it, then? Why isn't he faithful to his promise?

As Ironside prayed that night, God brought to his mind things about which he had grown careless, and in his meditation God brought him to a spiritual awakening. And, of course, God did provide for his needs. Old friends appeared to provide housing. The meetings went well, and at the end the people took up a collection that helped him get home.

But here is the interesting thing. As he left Fresno, Ironside stopped by the post office, where he found a letter from his father. He wasn't expecting it, so it surprised him. In it his father had written, "God spoke to me through Philippians 4:19 today. He has promised to supply all our need. Some day he may see I need a starving, and if he does, he will supply that." Ironside saw then that God had been putting him through a time of deprivation for discipline, to bring him closer to himself.

Here is the way Arthur Pink sees it: "God... is faithful in what he withholds, no less than in what he gives. He is faithful in sending sorrow as well as in giving joy. The faithfulness of God is a truth to be confessed by us not only when we are at ease, but also when we are smarting under the sharpest rebuke. Nor must this confession be merely of our mouths, but of our hearts also. When God smites us with the rod of chastisement, it is faithfulness which wields it. To acknowledge this means that we humble ourselves before him, own that we fully deserve his correction; and instead of murmuring, thank him for it. God never afflicts without a reason."

3. God is faithful in glorifying his people. This truth takes us back to Romans 8, to the chain of saving acts outlined in verses 29 and 30: "For those God foreknew he also predestined to be conformed to the likeness of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brothers. And those he predestined, he also called; those he called, he also justified; those he justified, he also glorified."

You may remember from the studies in the second volume of this series that Paul's theme in Romans 5-8 is glorification, and his point is that glorification is certain for those whom God has justified. He introduces this at the beginning of chapter 5, and it is the note on which he ends at the conclusion of chapter 8. What is more, Romans 9-11 are about this truth, too, for Paul's entire discussion of God's dealing with the Jews is to answer the objection that we cannot be sure of our final glorified state, since the Jews, who were once God's chosen people, have been cast off.

Paul says, "Not so!" The Jews are not cast off, because God's covenant, gifts, and calling of them are irrevocable. So also in regard to his calling of us. Having been foreknown by God, predestined, called, and justified, we may know that we shall certainly be glorified as well.

Rock of Ages

"You can't step into the same river twice," said Heraclitus. True enough. But you can anchor your boat in the faithfulness of God Almighty and plant your feet on the Rock that nothing in heaven or earth will ever shake. If you do, you will find that God is unchanging. You will find him to be exactly as he was to Abraham and Moses and David and all who have gone before or who will come after you. You will not find him withdrawing his gifts because of some failure in you, or repudiating his calling of you, once you have come to Jesus Christ.

"God's gifts and his call are irrevocable."

Arthur Pink wrote, "Unfaithfulness is one of the most outstanding sins of these evil days. In the business world, a man's word is, with rare exceptions, no longer his bond. In the social world, marital infidelity abounds on every hand; the sacred bonds of wedlock are broken with as little regard as discarding an old garment. In the ecclesiastical realm, thousands who have solemnly covenanted to preach the truth have no scruples about attacking and denying it. Nor can reader or writer claim complete immunity from this fearful sin. How many ways have we been unfaithful to Christ, and to the light and privileges which God has entrusted to us!"

The author concludes, "How refreshing, then, and how blessed, to lift our eyes above this scene of ruin, and behold One who is faithful, faithful in all things, at all times."

Chapter 170.
Mercy for All

Romans 11:30-32

The last verses of Romans 11 before the doxology (vv. 33-36) contain an important insight, namely, that all people are on an equal footing before God. For most of us this does not seem particularly perceptive, because we assume it as part of our cultural heritage. The founding document of the American republic says that "all... are created equal." But we do not really believe it. We believe in equal rights, perhaps. Or that people deserve equal opportunities. But we do not really believe that all people are equal. What we really believe is that some people—we place ourselves in that number—are better than other people.

Where does belief in equality come from? What produces the insight that all really are equal before God? There is only one answer: awareness that all have sinned and that all stand in need of God's mercy. Sin alone lowers everyone to the same needy level, so that mercy alone can lift us to the heights.

That is why Christianity, with its precise understanding of God's mercy, is the only true hope for brotherhood among human beings.

A Significant Summary

In these verses, Paul is beginning to wrap up the third great section of Romans. Verses 28 and 29 have already done this, repeating in summary what Paul developed in verses 11-24, and reminding us that the rejection of Jesus Christ by Israel worked for Gentile blessing and that the blessing of the Gentiles will in time work for Israel's good. That is the point made by the illustration of the cultivated and wild olive trees and their branches.

In the verses considered in this study (vv. 30-32) that same summation is repeated: (1) the disobedience of Israel had led to the showing of mercy to the Gentiles, and (2) the mercy shown to the Gentiles will in time lead to Israel's blessing.

Yet Paul is never merely repetitious, and what is new in this section is an emphasis on mercy. This means that here Paul's summary is extending further back than over chapter 11 alone. It is going all the way back to chapter 9, where the mercy of God was carefully discussed. In that chapter Paul was explaining God's sovereignty in election, asking: "Is God unjust?" "Not at all!" he answers. "For he says to Moses,

> I will have mercy on whom I have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I have compassion.

It does not, therefore, depend on man's desire or effort, but on God's mercy.... God has mercy on whom he wants to have mercy, and he hardens whom he wants to harden" (Rom. 9:14-16, 18).

But we have come a long way since Romans 9, haven't we? There, Paul was explaining how mercy accounts for God's saving some and not others. But here in Romans 11, he is thinking of mercy inclusively rather than exclusively. That is, having pursued to the end his teaching about God's historical dealings with the Jewish people and having prophesied a time of future Jewish blessing, Paul observes that in this way God is showing mercy to all. "For God has bound all men over to disobedience so that he may have mercy on them all" (v. 32).

That verse does not teach universal salvation, of course. If it did, it would be contradicting Romans 9. Paul is talking about Jews and Gentiles as groups of people, not as individuals. But he is nevertheless inclusive in his assessment of God's mercy. Although neither Gentiles nor Jews deserve mercy, God is merciful to both. That is the point. And it is this important insight that leads Paul, the formerly self-righteous Jewish patriot and proud Pharisee to regard all human beings as equal before God.

If you are prejudiced against other people in any way, if you think yourself to be superior to them for whatever reason, it is because you do not understand the nature of your sin or God's grace.

The Quality of Mercy

Let's talk about mercy and how it differs from such other qualities of God as goodness and grace.

"Goodness" is a general term, involving all that flows from God: his decrees, his creation, his laws, his providences. It extends to the elect and to the non-elect, though in different ways. "Grace" denotes favor, particularly toward the undeserving. "Mercy" is an aspect of grace, but the unique quality of mercy is that it is shown to the pitiful.

Arthur W. Pink says, "Mercy... denotes the ready inclination of God to relieve the misery of fallen creatures."

A. W. Tozer says, "Mercy is... an infinite and inexhaustible energy within the divine nature which disposes God to be actively compassionate."

Many great Bible texts talk about mercy. When Moses asked to be shown God's glory and God agreed to hide him in a cleft of the rock and cover him with his hand while his glory passed by, God said, "I will cause all my goodness to pass in front of you, and I will proclaim my name, the LORD, in your presence. I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion" (Exod. 33:19-20, emphasis added). The very essence of God is mercy, according to this passage.

When David sinned by counting the fighting men of Israel and God gave him a choice of punishments, one of which was a plague that God himself would send, David chose the plague, saying, "Let us fall into the hands of the LORD, for his mercy is great; but do not let me fall into the hands of men" (2 Sam. 24:14, emphasis added). This teaches that God is merciful even in his judgments.

Psalm 51:1 measures God's mercy by his love: "Have mercy on me, O God, according to your unfailing love" (emphasis added).

Isaiah 55:6-7 promises mercy to anyone who will seek it:

> Seek the LORD while he may be found;
> call on him while he is near.
> Let the wicked forsake his way and the > evil man his thoughts.
> Let him turn to the LORD, and he will > have mercy on him, and to our God, for > he will freely pardon (emphasis added).

Ephesians 2:4-5 says, "God, who is rich in mercy, made us alive with Christ even when we were dead in transgressions—it is by grace you have been saved" (emphasis added). Any one of these texts is more than adequate for this or any number of helpful studies on this subject.

Disobedience from All, Mercy to All

But we are now studying Romans 11:30-32, so I want to ask what these verses specifically tell us of God's mercy. I suggest two things.

1. To appreciate mercy, we must see it against the dark background of sin. To grasp this point, all we have to do is count words. How many times does the word mercy occur in these verses? Answer: It occurs four times, once in verse 30, twice in verse 31, and once in verse 32. Mercy is the dominant idea, which is why we are examining it at this point. But now let's ask: How many times does "disobedient" or "disobedience" occur? The answer is also four times, twice in verse 30 and once each in verses 31 and 32. John Murray says, "The lesson is obvious. It is only in the context of disobedience that mercy has relevance and meaning."

Arthur Pink points out that one way to understand mercy over against grace or even the goodness of God is to think of God's dealings with the unfallen angels:

He has never exercised mercy toward them, for they have never stood in any need thereof, not having sinned or come beneath the effects of the curse. Yet they certainly are the objects of God's free and sovereign grace. First, because of his election of them from out of the whole angelic race (1 Tim. 5:21). Second, and in consequence of their election, because of his preservation of them from apostasy, when Satan rebelled and dragged down with him one-third of the celestial hosts (Rev. 12:4). Third, in making Christ their Head (Col. 2:10; 1 Pet. 3:22), whereby they are eternally secured in the holy condition in which they were created. Fourth, because of the exalted position which has been assigned them: to live in God's immediate presence (Dan. 7:10), to serve him constantly in his heavenly temple, to receive honorable commissions from him (Heb. 1:4). This is abundant grace toward them; but mercy it is not.

For God to show mercy, there must first be sin and the misery that attends it. And that is exactly our condition as fallen human beings. Sin abounds! But it is precisely in that context and against that dark and tempestuous background that the mercy of God flashes forth like lightning.

2. We need mercy if we are to be saved. This is the second thing that these verses specifically teach. Paul has been writing about the salvation of both Jews and Gentiles, and when he gets to the end of his discussion, as he does here, it is of mercy alone that he is thinking. On what possible grounds could Gentiles hope to be saved apart from God's mercy? There is no other basis. Paul wrote > to the Ephesians, who were Gentiles, to remind them that before their conversion they "were separate from Christ, excluded from citizenship in Israel and foreigners to the covenants of the promise, without hope and without God in the world" (Eph. 2:12). The Gentiles had nothing going for them. If they were to be saved, it had to be by God's mercy alone.

But mercy is no less necessary for the Jews, according to these verses. Unlike the Gentiles, they did have a great deal going for them. They had the gifts Paul mentions to the Ephesians (Eph. 2:12), plus those he spells out more fully in Romans 9:4-5. Yet these spiritual advantages did not save the Jews. They were unbelieving. Therefore, as Paul says, "God has bound all men over to disobedience so that he may have mercy on them all."

We do not think this way naturally. We think in terms of our own good works and justice. We suppose ourselves to be deserving, which means that we consider ourselves to be better than other people. We are not. Apart from mercy we will perish.

"God Be Merciful"

Earlier in this volume I referred to Jesus' story of the Pharisee and the tax collector as an illustration of how, in order to be saved, we must come to God on the basis of his mercy. I return to the same story now, though at greater length, for exactly the same reason.

The story is based on contrasts, and the first is between the Pharisee and the tax collector themselves. We have a bad mental image of Pharisees because of some of the things Jesus said about them, but the people of that day actually thought very highly of the Pharisees. These men were known for their faithful adherence to the law. Nicodemus was a Pharisee, and so was Paul. They were among the most honored of their contemporaries.

Moreover, that is the way Jesus presented the Pharisee in his story. The Pharisee prayed, thanking God that he was not like other men. He did not steal. He was not an adulterer. He fasted twice a week and tithed what he possessed.

It was altogether different with the tax collector. Nobody had any warm feelings for tax collectors, and not only because paying taxes is an unwelcome duty. Tax collectors were collaborators with the unpopular occupying Roman army, and they were hated for it. Moreover, they were allowed to collect all the money they could, keeping whatever was above what Rome demanded, and that caused resentment.

This tax collector knew he was a sinner: "God, have mercy on me, a sinner." Well, why not? That is exactly what he was. Up to this point everyone who heard Jesus' story would have been right with him. On the one hand, the righteous Pharisee. On the other hand, the sinful tax collector. The first, the center of attention. The other, on the edge of the crowd, where he belonged.

But then Jesus introduced a second contrast, and it was as unexpected and puzzling as the first was acceptable. Speaking of the tax collector, Jesus said, "I tell you that this man, rather than the other, went home justified before God. For everyone who exalts himself will be humbled, and he who humbles himself will be exalted" (Luke 18:13-14).

What is going on here? Didn't we hear the story right? Or is there perhaps more to the character traits of the Pharisee and the tax collector than we were told. The Pharisee appeared righteous, but perhaps he really was not. Maybe he was a thief on the side or an adulterer or a secret blasphemer of God. And maybe the tax collector was not really so bad. Perhaps we have judged him too harshly. We know at once that this is not the answer. Outwardly and inwardly, the two men were exactly what we know them to be: two sinners, though one was unaware of it. One was a "righteous sinner," the other an "unrighteous sinner." The only difference is that the tax collector knew he was a sinner and therefore came to God seeking mercy.

So he found it!

The heart of this story is in the tax collector's prayer. It is one of the shortest prayers in the Bible—only seven words in English, six in Greek—but it is also one of the most profound.

Consider the beginning and the end, eliminating the middle. That is, delete the words "have mercy on" and retain the words "God" and "me, a sinner." These words contain the essential ingredients in all religion—holy God and sinful man—and they express the insight anyone gains when he or she becomes aware of God's presence: God is a holy God. Therefore, to become aware of God in his holiness is to become aware of ourselves in our sin. This is how we know that the tax collector knew God, despite his reputation, and that the Pharisee did not know him. The Pharisee began, "God..." but we know that he was not praying to God since he did not see himself to be a sinner. Actually he was praying to himself. The tax collector was praying to God, because he did see himself as a sinner. These two always go together.

Now consider the middle section of the prayer: "have mercy on." This shows that the tax collector was pleading for mercy on the basis of what God has done to provide it. The Greek word used is a verb form of the word for "Mercy Seat" (hilasterion), which refers to the covering of the Ark of the Covenant in the Jewish temple. The tax collector's prayer literally means "treat me as a person who comes on the basis of the blood shed on the Mercy Seat as an offering for sins."

Picture the Ark of the Covenant in your mind. It was a wooden box about a yard long, covered with gold and containing the stone tablets of the law of Moses. The lid of this box was the Mercy Seat, constructed of pure gold and with images of cherubim or angels on each end. Their wings went backward and upward, almost meeting over the center of the Ark. God was imagined to dwell symbolically between those outstretched wings. As it stands, it is a picture of judgment. For what does God see as he looks down from between the wings of the cherubim? He sees the law that we have broken. He sees that he must judge sin.

But here is where the Mercy Seat comes in and why it is called the Mercy Seat. Upon that covering of the Ark, once a year on the Day of Atonement, the high priest sprinkled the blood of an animal that had been killed just moments before in the courtyard of the temple. The animal was a substitute, an innocent victim dying in place of those who deserved to die. Now, when God looked down from between the outstretched wings of the cherubim, what he saw was not the law that we have broken, but the blood of the innocent victim. He saw that atonement had been made and that his love was now free to reach out to save anyone who would come through faith in that sacrifice.

This is why I say that the prayer of the tax collector is profound. It was an appeal to mercy, and it understood where mercy could be found.

Moreover, its very form expressed the truth taught by the Ark of the Covenant. That is to say, between "God," whom we have offended, and "me, a sinner," which describes us all, the tax collector placed the Mercy Seat and what it symbolized. His prayer puts it on the horizontal level. The Day of Atonement does it vertically. But it is the same thing. Both precisely express the only way of salvation.

Of course, under the Old Testament system, the sacrifices were a picture of the sacrifice of Jesus Christ that was yet to come. They were important. But it was not the death of animals, however many, that actually purged away sin. The true atonement was provided by the Lord Jesus Christ. When the tax collector prayed, "God, have mercy on me, a sinner," he was thinking of the animal sacrifices, because Jesus had not yet died. When we pray that prayer, we should be thinking of Jesus and the way God in his mercy has provided for our salvation through him.

Debtor to Mercy Alone

Here are three important things to remember about mercy.

1. You can appeal to mercy. The right of God to show mercy to whom he will show mercy, and compassion to whom he will show compassion, cannot be challenged. Mercy cannot be compelled. Otherwise it is not mercy. But that does not mean that you cannot appeal to mercy. You can. The Bible is full of such appeals and says that it is through such appeals that mercy may be found.

2. If you have received mercy, you must be merciful to others. Jesus told about a servant who was forgiven a great debt and then prosecuted a man who owed him just a little. The master of the first servant then threw him into jail. The point is that you cannot claim to have been forgiven by God if you are then unforgiving or harsh with other people. The followers of Jesus must be the most merciful of all people.

3. If you have found mercy, you must make it widely known. We know that God has mercy on whom he wills to have mercy and compassion on whom he wills to have compassion. God is sovereign. But there is nothing in the Bible that hinders you from saying as clearly and as forcefully as you can that God's very name is Mercy and that he will save all who come to him for it. God has never turned a deaf ear to anyone who asked for mercy. He has never rejected any person who has believed on Christ Jesus.

Come, every soul by sin oppressed, There's mercy with the Lord,
And he will surely give you rest, By trusting in his Word.
Only trust him, only trust him, Only trust him now.
He will save you, he will save you, He will save you now.

Do you believe that? Will you come? If you do, you will find God to be exactly what Paul declares him to be in this passage: the God of mercy who saves many through faith in Jesus Christ.

Part Fifteen: Doxology

Chapter 171.

No One Like God

Romans 11:33-35

Several decades ago, when I was growing up, the evangelical church was very much interested in prophecy. Sermons frequently discussed prophecy, books on prophecy circulated widely, and there were scores of prophecy conferences that were well attended. This was not a bad thing, of course. The Bible contains a great deal of prophecy; it should be expounded along with other material in due course. But there was a negative side to this focus that caused many who grew up in evangelical churches during that period to lose substantial interest in the topic. Those who studied prophecy tended to become so proud of being on the inside track of what God was doing that they disengaged from real life.

What happened was summed up for me by a person who reacted to news about any gloomy political situation by being happy about it. "If things are getting worse, the Lord must be about to come back," is how he explained it to me.

The biblical writers did not react this way. Sad current events caused them to grieve. Even when they were discussing future events, as Paul has been doing in the ninth, tenth, and eleventh chapters of Romans, they did not end their discussions by being smug about their superior knowledge but by glorifying and drawing closer to God.

There is no greater example of this than the way in which the apostle Paul ends the third major section of Romans. He has been tracing the ways of God in history and has contributed to our knowledge of those ways by revealing that in the last days God will draw the masses of the Jewish people to faith: "And so all Israel will be saved" (Rom. 11:26). Where does this marvelous discussion of God's ways leave Paul? He is not smug about his knowledge of the future. Instead, he is in awe of God, and his response is to burst forth in the magnificent doxology with which this section ends. Because Paul has been talking about God's mercy, what he does in this section is what Joseph Addison wrote about in his hymn of 1712.

> When all thy mercies, O my God, My rising soul surveys, > Transported with the view, I'm lost In wonder, love, and praise!

As Paul contemplated the mercies of God, he was so lost in wonder that he composed the doxology similarly, as an outpouring of praise that began:

> Oh, the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable his judgments, and his paths beyond tracing out!
>
> Romans 11:33

The Problem in the Church

Following this pattern, I want to close our studies of Romans 11 with a careful treatment of the attributes of God that Paul specifically mentions. But I confess that I have a problem doing so. We will sometimes acknowledge that God's thoughts are not our thoughts and that neither are our ways his ways (cf. Isa. 55:8). But we have to acknowledge here that even the thoughts and ways of Paul are not the same as ours. In our day, what we want to do is jump on quickly to Romans 12 and "get practical," rather than taking time to contemplate the perfections of the deity.

When he was only twenty years old, Charles Haddon Spurgeon began his half-century-long career in London with a sermon on knowing God, in which he argued that "the proper study of God's elect is God." Spurgeon said, "The highest science, the loftiest speculation, the mightiest philosophy, which can ever engage the attention of a child of God, is the name, the nature, the person, the work, the doings, and the existence of the great God whom he calls his Father." He argued that thinking about God improves the mind and expands it.

But how many in our day regularly think about God, even in church? It is impossible to know what is going on in another person's mind, of course. But judging by our actions, words, desires, and church programs, I would argue that not one in a hundred churchgoers today actively thinks about God or stands in awe of him as part of an average worship service.

Earlier in this century there was a wonderful Christian and Missionary Alliance pastor in Chicago whose name was A. W. Tozer. He wrote a number of outstanding books that I heartily commend to you, one of which is entitled The Knowledge of the Holy. Here is how Tozer saw the situation thirty years ago:

The church has surrendered her once lofty concept of God and has substituted for it one so low, so ignoble, as to be utterly unworthy of thinking, worshipping men. This she has done not deliberately, but little by little and without her knowledge; and her very unawareness only makes her situation all the more tragic.

This low view of God entertained almost universally among Christians is the cause of a hundred lesser evils everywhere among us. A whole new philosophy of the Christian life has resulted from this one basic error in our religious thinking.

With our loss of the sense of majesty has come the further loss of religious awe and consciousness of the divine Presence. We have lost our spirit of worship and our ability to withdraw inwardly to meet God in adoring silence. Modern Christianity is simply not producing the kind of Christian who can appreciate or experience the life in the Spirit. The words, "Be still, and know that I am God," mean next to nothing to the self-confident, bustling worshiper in this middle period of the twentieth century.

This loss of the concept of majesty has come just when the forces of religion are making dramatic gains and the churches are more prosperous than at any time within the past several hundred years. But the alarming thing is that our gains are mostly external and our losses wholly internal; and since it is the quality of our religion that is affected by internal conditions, it may be that our supposed gains are but losses spread over a wider field.

That is how Tozer saw the situation in his day. But who can suppose that the situation has improved over the last three decades? On the contrary, our addiction to television, entertainment, and the me-centered outlooks of our time has made the situation worse. And the really sad thing is that we are largely unaware of what has happened.

No people ever rise higher than their idea of God. Conversely, a loss of the sense of God's high and awesome character always involves a loss of a people's moral values and even what we commonly call "humanity." We are startled by the utter disregard for human life that has overtaken large segments of the United States. But what do we expect to see when a country like ours openly turns its back on God? We deplore the breakdown of moral standards in the church, even among its most visible leaders. But what do we think should happen when we have focused our worship services on ourselves and our own, often trivial, needs rather than on God?

Tozer said, "What comes into our minds when we think about God is the most important thing about us." But if the full truth be told, many of us hardly think about God at all.

The Nature of God

The problem is not merely our preoccupation with ourselves and with material things, of course. Part of the problem lies with the very nature of God. God is not like us. In fact, God is not really like anything else we can actually experience or know. As a result, there is always something about God that is indescribable, and this makes it hard to think about him.

When we begin to talk about God, we use similes. That is, we compare God to someone or something else, saying, "God is like...." But the closer we get to God and the better we understand him, the less those comparisons work for us, and we find ourselves saying, as Paul does, "Oh, the depths...." "How unsearchable...." And "Who has known the mind of the Lord? Or who has been his counselor?"

In the book I have already mentioned, Tozer draws attention to Ezekiel's vision of God recorded in the first chapter of his prophecy and to his increasingly inadequate attempts to describe it. Ezekiel was seeing something he had never seen before. So at first he falls back on the language of resemblance: "I looked, and I saw a windstorm coming out of the north—an immense cloud with flashing lightning and surrounded by brilliant light. The center of the fire looked like glowing metal, and in the fire was what looked like four living creatures" (Ezek. 1:4-5, emphasis added).

The nearer he approaches to the divine throne, the less sure his words become: "Spread out above the living creatures was what looked like an expanse, sparkling like ice and awesome.... When the creatures moved, I heard the sound of their wings, like the roar of rushing waters, like the voice of the Almighty, like the tumult of an army" (vv. 22, 24, emphasis added).

Finally, Ezekiel is standing before the throne of God himself, and after a few attempts to describe what he sees, he says only, "This was the appearance of the likeness of the glory of the LORD" (v. 28, emphasis added).

This is why God prohibited the worship of himself by images in the second of the Ten Commandments: "You shall not make for yourself an idol in the form of anything in heaven above or on the earth beneath or in the waters below. You shall not bow down to them or worship them; for I, the LORD your God, am a jealous God, punishing the children for the sin of the fathers to the third and fourth generation of those who hate me, but showing love to a thousand generations of those who love me and keep my commandments" (Exod. 20:4-6).

At first glance it seems strange that God should prohibit the worship of himself by images. "What harm can it do?" we might ask. "Don't images merely focus the attention of the worshiper?"

Theologian J. I. Packer says there are two answers to that. First, images dishonor God, for they are always less than he is and therefore obscure rather than reveal his glory. Second, images inevitably mislead the worshiper, for they suggest false ideas by comparison.

Even though God revealed himself to us personally in Jesus Christ, it is surely no accident that Jesus came before the age of photography, movies, or television. So we do not have a picture or electronic image of him. Instead of by pictures, the way God reveals himself—even the way he reveals Jesus to us today—is by the words of Scripture.

The medieval theologians spoke of the deus absconditus, meaning "the hidden God." And so God is! God is always partially hidden, and even the parts we see, we see only because God has revealed them to us in the Bible.

The Incommunicable Attributes

One helpful distinction theologians make is between what they call God's communicable attributes and his incommunicable ones.

Communicable attributes refer to characteristics of God that he shares with us in some measure, since we are made in his image—things like knowledge, wisdom, love, and mercy—in fact, the things Paul actually mentions in this doxology in Romans. God is infinitely above us in these things, of course, but we somewhat understand what they are since we share in them on a much lower level. The incommunicable attributes are characteristics of God that he does not share with us, indeed, cannot share, since they are uniquely a part of what it means for God to be God. They involve such things as self-existence, self-sufficiency, and eternality.

We are going to be looking at a few of the communicable attributes as we go on in our study of Paul's doxology, since he specifically mentions God's wisdom, knowledge, judgments, and paths (or ways). Here it is worth looking at a few of the attributes that are incommunicable. Let's take the three I just mentioned.

1. Self-existence. This means that God has no origins, that he has always been and that he owes his existence to nobody. When you and I speak of our existence, we have to say, "I am what I am by the grace of God." But when God revealed himself to Moses at the burning bush, God said only, "I AM WHO I AM" (Exod. 3:14).

Of course, this is where our problem in knowing God chiefly lies. The way we learn about something is by breaking it down into its constituent parts and then by tracing those parts to their origin. If we can explain how something came to be, we are well on the way to understanding it. God is not subject to that type of analysis. When we analyze things, those things point back to him as their ultimate and only sufficient cause. But God himself points back to nothing. He is existent in himself alone and therefore ultimately is unknowable. God cannot be analyzed and evaluated as created things can be.

2. Self-sufficiency. This attribute means that God has no needs and that he therefore depends on no one. Again, we are not like that. We have countless needs—needs for oxygen to breathe, food to eat, clothes to wear, houses in which to live, and other things—and if we are deprived of any one of them, even for a short time, we cease to be. We die. God does not need anything. In himself, he is and has everything he needs.

This runs counter to ideas that many people have about God. Supposing him to be like themselves, they assume that God needs many things, if not to survive, at least to be happy and fulfilled as God. For example, they imagine that at one time God was lonely and that he created men and women to keep him company. They forget that God is a Trinity and that he always had a perfectly fulfilling fellowship in the Godhead.

Other people suppose that God needs worshipers. But if every individual on the face of the earth became an atheist tomorrow, refusing even to acknowledge God's existence, God would be no more deprived by our atheism than the sun would be deprived of light if all of us should become blind.

Still other people suppose that God needs helpers, even suggesting that he created us to help him "get the job done," whatever that is. It is true that God has given us the privilege of doing useful and meaningful work for him. In the Garden of Eden he gave meaningful work to Eve and Adam. In this age of gospel proclamation he has given us the task of being his evangelists and has even called us "fellow-workers" with Jesus Christ. But this does not mean that God needs us. God can manage very well without us and has always done so. That he chooses to use us is due only to his own free and utterly sovereign will.

3. Eternality. It is hard to describe in a few word what "eternity" means as an attribute of God, but it has to do with his everlastingness or perpetuity. In other words, it means that God is, always has been, and always will be, and that he is ever the same in his infinite and eternal being.

This has great practical bearing for us, because it means, among other things, that God can be trusted to remain as he has revealed himself to be. In other words, what we read about him in the Bible remains as true of God today as ever it was, and what others before us have found to be true about God we will find to be true also. Since God has loved us in Christ even before the foundation of the world, we can be sure that he is continuing to love us and will do so forever. Since God has purposed all things from before creation, we can be sure that those purposes will be worked out perfectly. Above all, since God will be present at the end, just as he was at the beginning, we can know that he is inescapable and that one day we will have to give him an accounting for what we have done with our lives.

Right Thoughts about God

How do we form right thoughts about God, if God is so hard to know? We must do so on the basis of the Bible's revelation, of course, thinking and reflecting upon what the Bible tells us propositionally. But here are two additional things that may prove practical. In Knowing God, J. I. Packer suggests:

1. Remove from your thoughts limits that would make God small. That is what we have been doing in this study. We have been trying to break out of our limited world of cause and effect, dependency and time, and have been trying to think of God as self-existent, self-sufficient, and eternal. It is what the biblical writers do again and again.
2. Remind yourself of the acts of God that are great. The biblical writers do this when they remind themselves of God's acts of deliverance on their behalf. They remind themselves of how God created the heavens and the earth, how he intervened in the history of Israel to bring his people out of their Egyptian slavery and establish them in their own land, driving out their enemies. We must remember how he sent the Lord Jesus Christ to die for our sin and rise again as our triumphant Savior.

Who Is Like God?

In the Old Testament there is a book named after its author, whose name means "Who is like God?" The book is Micah. It is a somber book, because Micah lived in evil days, as all the minor prophets did, and his message is one of divine judgment. The people had sinned. They would not repent, and judgment was certain to come upon them. But Micah is not all about judgment, and toward the end of his prophecy Micah asks the question that his name conveys: "Who is a God like you?" (Mic. 7:18). He answers exactly as Paul answers the same implied question toward the end of Romans 11.

> Who is a God like you, who pardons sin and forgives the transgression of the remnant of his inheritance?
> You do not stay angry forever but delight to show mercy.

You will again have compassion on us; you will tread our sins underfoot and hurl all our iniquities into the depths of the sea.
You will be true to Jacob, and show mercy to Abraham, as you pledged on oath to our fathers in days long ago.

Micah 7:18-20

If God were like us, he would never have shown mercy in the first place, for the people of Micah's day (in fact, of any day) did not deserve it. If he were like us, even if he showed mercy at one time, he would have ceased to show mercy later, because the people would have exhausted his patience. But God is not like us! Thank God for that! God is God, and there is no one like him. He is "the LORD, the LORD, the compassionate and gracious God, slow to anger, abounding in love and faithfulness, maintaining love to thousands, and forgiving wickedness, rebellion and sin. Yet he does not leave the guilty unpunished..." (Exod. 34:6-7).

If God were not like that, there would be no hope for any of us. We would all perish. But he is like that, and there is hope. Think about that, and learn to praise him for it.

Chapter 172.
The Perfect Knowledge of God

Romans 11:33

A number of years ago at a Bible conference in upstate New York I gave a series of studies on the attributes of God. The series seemed to be a blessing to the people who were there, and afterward one of the men was talking about it to a friend. He remarked that he had been a Christian for nearly forty years, that he had attended church faithfully all that time. "Yet in all those years I have never heard anyone teach about the attributes of God. I have never even thought about them," he said.

His friend asked, "Who did you think you were worshiping all that time?" Who are you worshiping? I do not know what answer the man in my story gave his friend, but if he was like most of us and was honest, he would probably have said, "A god like myself." God is not like us, of course, but we persist in thinking of him as if he were, because we can handle a god who is diminished in that way. We can even dismiss him as irrelevant. The Bible tells us that God rebukes that kind of thinking. God says to those who treat sin lightly, "You thought I was altogether like you. / But I will rebuke you and accuse you to your face" (Ps. 50:21).

God also says, "My thoughts are not your thoughts, / neither are your ways my ways" (Isa. 55:8). Yet we constantly try to reduce God to our level. And we all do it. It doesn't make any difference how smart we are. Apparently Erasmus, the brilliant Dutch humanist, thought this way, because Martin Luther wrote to him once, saying, "Your thoughts of God are too human."

No One Like God

The very fact that God is not like us is part of the problem, and it would be an insurmountable problem were it not that God has condescended to reveal himself to us.

In the last study we looked at some of God's incommunicable attributes, meaning those characteristics of God that he does not share with us in any way because he cannot: things like self-existence, self-sufficiency, and eternality. Those qualities belong to God alone. Therefore, we can only make the most feeble attempts to understand what they mean, and usually we have to do so by negatives. We have to say things like: God has no origins, God depends on no one, and God had no beginning and will have no end.

On the other hand, there are also what are called God's communicable attributes. These are qualities that God does share with us, and while these, too, are beyond our full understanding, they are nevertheless things we can begin to understand because we possess similar characteristics, though to a lesser degree.

Some of these qualities are found in the doxology that ends Romans 11, particularly verse 33. There Paul writes, "Oh, the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable his judgments, and his paths beyond tracing out!" There are four items in this verse: wisdom, knowledge, judgments, and paths. In this and the following three studies, I propose to look at each of these characteristics, beginning in this chapter with God's perfect knowledge, since it is logically prior to the others. Wisdom flows from knowledge, and God's unsearchable judgments and paths are the outworking of his wisdom.

The Knowledge of God

The unique quality of the knowledge possessed by God is its perfection. That is, God knows all things, and he knows them exhaustively. We also "know" things, but our knowledge is partial and imperfect.

How can we describe God's knowledge? Arthur W. Pink wrote, "God is omniscient. He knows everything; everything possible, everything actual; all events, all creatures, of the past, the present, and the future. He is perfectly acquainted with every detail in the life of every being in heaven, in earth, and in hell.... Nothing escapes his notice, nothing can be hidden from him, nothing is forgotten by him.... He never errs, never changes, never overlooks anything."

A. W. Tozer expands this description by adding negatives: "God has never learned from anyone." Indeed, says Tozer:

God cannot learn. Could God at any time or in any manner receive into his mind knowledge that he did not possess and had not possessed from eternity, he would be imperfect and less than himself. To think of a God who must sit at the feet of a teacher, even though that teacher be an archangel or a seraph, is to think of someone other than the Most High God, maker of heaven and earth....

God knows instantly and effortlessly all matter and all matters, all mind and every mind, all spirit and all spirits, all being and every being, all creaturehood and all creatures, every plurality and all pluralities, all law and every law, all relations, all causes, all thoughts, all mysteries, all enigmas, all feeling, all desires, every unuttered secret, all thrones and dominions, all personalities, all things visible and invisible in heaven and in earth, motion, space, time, life, death, good, evil, heaven, and hell....

Because God knows all things perfectly, he knows no thing better than any other thing, but all things equally well. He never discovers anything, he is never surprised, never amazed. He never wonders about anything nor (except when drawing men out for their own good) does he seek information or ask questions.

When we reflect along these lines, we begin to understand why Paul writes naturally but with amazement, "Oh, the depth of the riches of the... knowledge of God." He is admitting that God's knowledge is so much greater than ours that we can only stand in awe of it.

The perfection of God's knowledge is also disturbing, however, if we think about it, which is one reason why people try so hard not to think about God. As long as we are merely thinking about God's knowing about things or other people, the idea of his knowledge is only awesome or even amusing, like our reaction to the response of a group of children at school who were asked whether they thought God understood computers. The majority thought he did not. That's amusing. Of course, God understands computers! Although we know that when we think about it, the subject is not so amusing when we consider that God also knows about us—all about us. We do not mind an ignorant God, or a God who forgets. But what are we to do with a God "before whom all hearts are open, all desires known"? Such a God is immensely threatening, which is why we try to banish him from our thinking.

God's Knowledge and Believers

Yet we need to know about God's attributes, including his knowledge. Let me first suggest four things that knowledge of the perfect knowledge of God should do for Christians.

1. It should humble us. I think here of Job. God allowed Satan to attack righteous Job to demonstrate that a believer is able to love God solely for who he is and not merely for the many blessings he gives. So Satan did attack Job, taking away his possessions, killing his children, and eventually attacking even his health. Job was reduced to abject misery, but even in his most wretched state he did not blame God. "The LORD gave and the LORD has taken away" was his amazing testimony (Job 1:21).

At this point Job's friends came to see him, and most of the rest of the book consists of their long speeches and Job's answers. Job's friends had divergent points of view, but basically they argued that since God is a moral God and this is a moral universe, bad things do not happen without good reasons. Therefore, Job must have sinned in some way and thus have brought his troubles on himself. Job did not consider himself to be innocent of all sin, of course. But he knew that he had done nothing to deserve what was happening to him. He was right. What he did not know was that his suffering was the focal point of an invisible but important cosmic struggle.

All this time—for thirty-seven chapters—God was silent. But at last, at the very end of the book, God speaks. What do we expect God to say? We expect God to explain things to Job or at least offer him some comfort. After all, Job has been through a lot. We expect God to tell him about Satan's accusations and reveal how Job had been singled out as a righteous man who would trust God even in misery. This is not what we find. Instead, we find God rebuking Job for presuming to think that he could understand God's ways, even if they were explained to him. This is in the form of a lengthy interrogation having to do with God's perfect knowledge as contrasted with Job's ignorance. The interrogation begins:

> Who is this who darkens my counsel with words without knowledge?
> Brace yourself like a man; I will question you, and you shall answer me.
> Where were you when I laid the earth's foundation?
> Tell me, if you understand.

Who marked off its dimensions? Surely you know!
Who stretched a measuring line across it?
On what were its footings set, or who laid its cornerstone—while the morning stars sang together and all the angels shouted for joy?
Who shut up the sea behind doors when it burst forth from the womb, when I made the clouds its garment and wrapped it in thick darkness, when I fixed limits for it and set its doors and bars in place, when I said, "This far you may come and no farther; here is where your proud waves halt"?

Job 38:2-11

These are only the first ten verses of God's questioning. It goes on for four chapters—a total of 129 verses, less the five verses that introduce and then sustain the narrative—and at the end Job is completely humbled. He replies to God, Surely I spoke things I did not understand, things too wonderful for me to know....

Therefore I despise myself and repent in dust and ashes.

Job 42:3, 6

If we begin to appreciate the perfect knowledge of God and, by contrast, our own pathetic understanding, the first effect it will have on us will be humility, as in Job's case. We will be embarrassed to think that we ever supposed we could contend with God intellectually.

2. It should comfort us. It is not only humility that knowledge of the perfect knowledge of God will work in us. We will also find that our knowledge of God's knowledge brings comfort. This is because God also knows us. He knows the worst about us and loves us anyway. Again, he knows the best about us, even when other people do not and instead blame us for things that are not our fault. Earlier in the story, Job expressed his comfort in God's knowledge of him, saying, "He knows the way that I take; / when he has tested me, I will come forth as gold" (Job 23:10).

Do you remember Hagar, Abraham's concubine who gave birth to Ishmael? Early in the story Hagar was so badly mistreated by Sarah, Abraham's wife, that she decided to run away. God appeared to her to say that he knew what she was suffering but that she should return to Sarah and submit to her. As a result of this revelation Hagar gave a new name to God, which is translated best as "You are the God who sees me" (Gen. 16:13). It was a comfort to Hagar to know that God saw her and knew about her suffering.

The second year he was in London, Charles Haddon Spurgeon preached a sermon on that text in which he told of visiting the cell of a man who had died while imprisoned. The cell was down a long winding stair of a castle, where light never penetrated, and it was only as large as the man himself. "Sometimes they tortured him," said Spurgeon's guide. "But his shrieks never reached through the thickness of these walls and never ascended that winding staircase. Here he died, and there, sir, he was buried," he said, pointing to the ground. Yet, said Spurgeon, there was one who did see him and knew the extent of his suffering, and that was God.

If you are in difficult circumstances and no one on earth either sees or cares, remember that God sees and cares and that, if you are a true Christian, he will make it all up to you one day.

3. It should encourage us to live for God. One of the greatest chapters in the Bible having to do with the perfect knowledge of God is Psalm 139, a psalm of David. It begins:

O LORD, you have searched me and you know me.
You know when I sit and when I rise;
you perceive my thoughts from afar.
You discern my going out and my lying down; you are familiar with all my ways.
Before a word is on my tongue you know it completely, O LORD.

Psalm 139:1-4

The second stanza remarks that "such knowledge is too wonderful" for David, "too lofty" for him to attain. Then it continues:

> Where can I go from your Spirit?
> Where can I flee from your presence?
> If I go up to the heavens, you are there; if I make my bed in the depths, you are there.
> If I rise on the wings of the dawn, if I settle on the far side of the sea, > even there your hand will guide me, your right hand will hold me fast.

Psalm 139:7-10

The fourth stanza says that God's knowing gaze penetrates the night and deep darkness; the next acknowledges that God knew the writer even before his birth, when he was in his mother's womb. In all the Bible there is no greater tribute to the perfect knowledge of God in respect to an individual.

But where does this great psalm end? Strikingly, it ends on a practical note, like so many of David's psalms. It ends by David asking God to help him lead a godly life, precisely because God knows him so well.

> Search me, O God, and know my heart; test me and know my anxious thoughts.
> See if there is any offensive way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting.

Psalm 139:23-24

Do you see how this works? We know so very little. We do not even know ourselves. But God knows us. He knows our weaknesses and our strengths. He knows our sins and our aspirations toward godliness. He knows when isolation will help us grow strong but also when we need companionship to stand in righteousness. He knows when we need rebuking and correcting but also when we need encouragement and teaching. If anyone can "lead me in the way everlasting" it is God. Moreover, since I know he knows me and wants to help me, I can be encouraged to get on with my Christian living.

4. It should help us to pray. Jesus taught this in the Sermon on the Mount when he encouraged his followers to pray to God confidently, expecting answers. "When you pray, do not keep on babbling like pagans, for they think they will be heard because of their many words. Do not be like them, for your Father knows what you need before you ask him" (Matt. 6:7-8). This is then followed by what we call the Lord's Prayer, a model prayer consisting of just fifty-two words.

God's knowledge of what we need is so perfect that he often answers even before we pray to him. "Before they call I will answer; while they are still speaking I will hear," said God through his prophet Isaiah (Isa. 65:24).

God's Knowledge and Unbelievers

Thus far I have been speaking to Christians, whose sins have been judged in Jesus Christ. They can say thankfully, as Paul does in Romans, "Oh, the depth of the riches of the... knowledge of God." But I cannot leave this subject without applying it also to those who are not Christians. If you are not yet a believer, let me remind you that you have sinned and that you have sinned in the face of God. You have sinned knowingly, willfully, brazenly, and repeatedly. God is a holy God. How do you suppose you will be able to escape his judgment on the day when you stand before him? "Nothing in all creation is hidden from God's sight. Everything is uncovered and laid bare before the eyes of him to whom we must give account" (Heb. 4:13).

Do not delude yourself on this point. God sees you, and he will punish your sin. After Adam and Eve sinned, they tried to hide in the shrubbery of the Garden of Eden, but the bushes were not dense enough to hide them from the eyes of God. No human eye saw Cain murder his brother, but God saw it and said, "Your brother's blood cries out to me from the ground" (Gen. 4:10). Achan stole a wedge of gold and a beautiful set of Babylonian clothing, but God saw his theft and brought it to light, and Achan's judgment followed (Josh. 7). Ananias and Sapphira lied to the church, but God revealed their deception and they were struck dead (Acts 5:1-13). The Bible says, "You may be sure that your sin will find you out" (Num. 32:23).

What will you do in the day of God's judgment when your sins will be read out? "How does God know that?" you will ask. "And thai? And that? I had almost forgotten it myself." On that day you will be abased, confounded, speechless, and overwhelmed, as God unfolds the records of your sinful past life, page after page and paragraph after paragraph.

"Stop!" you will cry. But it will not stop until every sinful thought, every evil deed, every curse, every theft, every lie, every neglect of what you should have done, is read out and justly judged.

I counsel you: Do not wait for that day. Jesus died so that sinners just like you might be saved from judgment. The way to escape God's judgment is to come to Jesus, to believe on him, trust him, follow him. I tell you on the authority of God's Word that if you believe on Jesus Christ and truly trust him, "you will be saved" (Acts 16:31).

Chapter 173.
The Profound Wisdom of God

Romans 11:33

Not long ago I was returning to Philadelphia from a speaking engagement in Toronto, and while I was waiting for the plane to take off so I could put down the tray table and do some work, I picked up the airline's monthly news magazine and read an article on Pinehurst, North Carolina. It seems that Pinehurst is a golfer's paradise. The main country club has seven courses, but there are more than two dozen other courses scattered about. Over the years, Pinehurst has hosted such celebrities as the Rockefellers, Roosevelts, Crosbys, and Swansons, and many golf greats like Sam Snead, Arnold Palmer, and Jack Nicklaus. Pinehurst is also a ninety-seven-year-old village with about five thousand residents.

I was struck by what one resident had said about the place: "People who don't know Pinehurst ask what it's like, and you can't give them an answer. We as human beings like to compare things, but there's no comparison for this place. It's like no other place in the world. That's what makes it special." But what is God like?

You see the problem at once. Unlike Pinehurst—which, in spite of such public-relations statements as the one I just cited, does have places to which it may actually be compared—God is incomparable. That is, he cannot really be compared with anything. This is preeminently true of his incommunicable attributes, things such as God's self-existence, self-sufficiency, and eternality. But it is also true even of his communicable attributes, those qualities that he shares with us in some fashion. One of these is knowledge, which we looked at in the last study. We, too, have knowledge, but because God's knowledge is perfect, it is infinitely greater and infinitely superior to ours. So we speak of him as being omniscient, as knowing all things. God not only knows all things that were or are; he also knows all that could possibly be. That is, he knows possibilities and potentialities as well as actualities.

Another communicable attribute that is also infinitely above and beyond us is God's wisdom.

The Wisdom of God

What do we mean when we say that God is wise or all-wise? We mean that God is omniscient, of course, since God could not be all-wise unless he was all-knowing. But wisdom is more than mere knowledge, more even than total or perfect knowledge. A person can have a great deal of knowledge—we call it "head knowledge"—and not know what to do with it. He can know a great deal about a lot of things and still be a great fool. And there is also the matter of goodness. What about that? Without morality or goodness, wisdom is not wisdom. Instead, it is what we call cunning. Clearly, wisdom consists in knowing what to do with the knowledge one has and in directing that knowledge to the highest and most moral ends.

Charles Hodge says that God's wisdom is seen "in the selection of proper ends and of proper means for the accomplishment of those ends."

A. W. Tozer wrote, "Wisdom, among other things, is the ability to devise perfect ends and to achieve those ends by the most perfect means. It sees the end from the beginning, so that there can be no need to guess or conjecture. Wisdom sees everything in focus, each in proper relation to all, and is thus able to work toward predestined goals with flawless precision."

J. I. Packer says the same thing but wisely emphasizes goodness:

Wisdom is the power to see, and the inclination to choose, the best and highest goal, together with the surest means of attaining it. Wisdom is, in fact, the practical side of moral goodness. As such, it is found in its fullness only in God. He alone is naturally and entirely and invariably wise. "His wisdom ever waketh," says the hymn, and it is true. Wisdom, as the old theologians used to say, is his essence, just as power and truth and goodness are his essence—integral elements, that is, in his character.... Omniscience governing omnipotence, infinite power ruled by infinite wisdom, is a biblical description of the divine character.

As soon as we begin to think along these lines, we see at once why our human wisdom does not begin to compare with God's and why Paul can say, as he does in writing to the Corinthians, "Where is the wise man? Where is the scholar? Where is the philosopher of this age? Has not God made foolish the wisdom of the world? For since in the wisdom of God the world through its wisdom did not know him, God was pleased through the foolishness of what was preached to save those who believe" (1 Cor. 1:20-21).

The Wisdom of God in Our Salvation

Paul's words take us a step further in understanding God's wisdom, however. For as soon as Paul speaks of God's wisdom as exceeding human wisdom, he thinks of the gospel—since it is there above all that God's perfect wisdom is seen. And that is what we have at the end of Romans 11, too. What draws out Paul's awe at the "riches of [God's] wisdom" is not the wisdom God displayed in the ordering of creation, as wonderful as that may be, but rather his wisdom in saving sinners such as you and me.

And I would say this: If at this point you are not standing in awe of the depth of the riches of God's manifold wisdom in salvation, as Paul was, you have not even begun to understand the first eleven chapters of this letter. Let me show you what I mean.

1. The wisdom of God in justification (Rom. 1-4). The first main section of Romans includes an introduction to the letter (Rom. 1:1-17), an analysis of man's sin (Rom. 1:18-3:20), a statement of the gospel (Rom. 3:21-31), and a proof of the doctrine of justification by grace through faith from the Old Testament (Rom. 4:1-25). The central portion is Paul's statement of the gospel, and the central passage in that is Romans 3:25-26, where Paul writes, "God presented him [Jesus] as a sacrifice of atonement.... to demonstrate his justice, because in his forbearance he had left the sins committed beforehand unpunished—he did it to demonstrate his justice at the present time, so as to be just and the one who justifies those who have faith in Jesus."

Let me illustrate the meaning of these verses by a story. Early in this century, a society for atheism produced a tract in which the life stories of some of the Old Testament heroes were related in lurid detail. One page told the story of Abraham, pointing out that on two occasions he had been willing to sacrifice the honor of his wife to save his own life. Yet the Bible calls Abraham "a friend of God." After pointing this out, the tract asked: What kind of a God is he who can be friends with a cowardly man like Abraham?

The next page told the story of Jacob. Jacob was a cheat. He cheated his brother out of his inheritance. Yet God condescended to refer to himself by the name of Jacob ("the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob"). The tract asked: What kind of God is he who can identify with a scoundrel like Jacob?

Next came Moses. Moses was a great leader and lawgiver, but early in his life Moses had killed a man and buried his body in the sand lest his deed be discovered. Yet God spoke to Moses face to face and called him "my servant." What kind of God could speak face to face with a man who was a murderer?

The last of the atheists' examples was David, their chief witness against God's character. David had committed adultery with Bathsheba, the wife of Uriah the Hittite. Then, when Bathsheba was discovered to be with child by David, David arranged the death of her husband so he could marry Bathsheba and conceal his sin. Yet David is called "a man after God's own heart." The atheists asked: What kind of a heart must God have if David, the adulterer and murderer, was a man who was after it? According to the atheists' reasoning, the mere existence of these stories is sufficient to prove either that God does not exist or that, if he does exist, he does not have a character worth admiring.

The interesting thing about this tract is that the atheists had a good point and that Paul acknowledges its partial validity in Romans 3. They were saying that Abraham, Jacob, Moses, and David were sinners, and they were entirely right to do so. In fact, these men were far greater sinners than the atheists imagined, for their hearts were "deceitful above all things and beyond cure" (Jer. 17:9). It could be said of them, as Paul wrote of the human race in general, that > there is no one who does good, not even one.

>
> Romans 3:10-12; cf. Psalm 14:1-3

What these men deserved from God was hell. Yet for centuries, instead of sending these depraved and godless characters to hell, God had been saving them, and others like them.

How could God do this? I do not mean: Did God have the power to do it? Of course, he did. God is all-powerful. Nor do I mean: Shouldn't God want to do it? We can understand how God might want to save sinners. After all, we ourselves might choose to be merciful to those who actually deserve condemnation. But that is not the point. My question has to do with God's justice. It means: How could God save such sinners and at the same time remain a just and holy God? To use Paul's language, how could he be both "just and the one who justifies" the ungodly? Since God was justifying the ungodly, it would seem that for centuries there was something like a shadow cast over the good name of God.

Although this puzzle is beyond the wisdom of mere men and women, it was not beyond the wisdom of God. Thus it was that in the fullness of time "God sent his Son, born of a woman, born under law, to redeem those under law, that we might receive the full rights of sons" (Gal. 4:4-5). Or, to go back to the text in Romans, "God presented him as a sacrifice of atonement... to demonstrate his justice at the present time." This means that God satisfied the claims of his justice by punishing the innocent Jesus for our sins. Jesus bore the wrath of God in our place. Thus, the demands of God's justice were fully met and, justice being satisfied, the love of God was then free to reach out, embrace, and fully save the sinner.

Who but God could think up such a solution to the sin problem? None of us could have done it. "Oh, the depth of the riches of the wisdom... of God!" God suited the most perfect means to the most desirable of ends, and so he saves sinners like ourselves.

2. The wisdom of God in sanctification (Rom. 5-8). The next section of Romans discusses the permanent nature of salvation, embracing the sinner's need for sanctification. How is the wisdom of God revealed in this area? We have seen that the justification discussed in Romans 1-4 is provided by the work of Christ, which means that it is not of ourselves. It is of grace. But if that is so, what is to stop a justified person from indulging in his or her sinful nature, since the person's salvation has already been secured by Christ's work? Why should we not continue to sin? In fact, why should we not "go on sinning so that grace may increase?" (Rom. 6:1).

Here we are caught on the horns of a dilemma. Either salvation must be by works, which destroys grace; besides which, no one would be saved, since none can provide sufficient good works. Or else, if salvation is of grace, then we must be free to sin greatly.

God solves this problem by showing us that we are never justified apart from being regenerated or being made alive in Christ. This means that Christians have been given a new nature, and this new nature, being the very life of Jesus Christ within, will inevitably produce good works corresponding to the character of God. In fact, this is the only sure proof of our having been saved by him.

Let's look at this another way. Paul writes of our being joined to Christ in what theologians call "the mystical union. "Just as we have been joined to Adam by our natural descent from him, so that when Adam sinned we sinned and when Adam was judged by the penalty of death for sin we, too, were judged, so also, having been joined to Christ, we are now justified by his work and have been made spiritually alive in him. If we have been truly saved, we are different people than we were before. Moreover, since this is the work of God and not our work, it means that we cannot undo it and so somehow go back to being what we were before. Since we cannot go back, the only way we can move is forward. Paul's way of saying this is: "In the same way, count yourselves dead to sin but alive to God in Christ Jesus" (Rom. 6:11).

Here is the way Romans 8:1-4 puts it: "Therefore, there is now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus, because through Christ Jesus the law of the Spirit of life set me free from the law of sin and death. For what the law was powerless to do in that it was weakened by the sinful nature, God did by sending his own Son in the likeness of sinful man to be a sin offering." This means that salvation is utterly of grace. But listen to what follows. "And so he condemned sin in sinful man, in order that the righteous requirements of the law might be fully met in us, who do not live according to the sinful nature but according to the Spirit" (emphasis added).

Who but God could think up a gospel like that? We would never do it, because we do not naturally hold grace and works together. If we emphasize morality, as some persons do, we begin to think that we can be saved by our good works and so strive to do it. We repudiate grace. But if, on the other hand, we emphasize grace, knowing that we cannot possibly be saved by our inadequate and polluted works, we have a natural tendency to do away with works entirely and so slide into Antinomianism. If we hold to grace, we repudiate works, and if we hold to works, we repudiate grace. But God has devised a gospel that is entirely and completely of grace and yet produces the most exceptional works in those who are saved.

No wonder Paul stands in awe of "the depth of the riches of the wisdom... of God" and calls God's judgments "unsearchable" and "his paths beyond searching out" (Rom. 11:33).

3. The wisdom of God displayed in human history (Rom. 9-11). The third main section of Romans is concerned with the acts of God in the flow of historical events. As Paul describes it, the problem is that God made special salvation promises to the Jewish people, and yet, in spite of these promises, the majority of the Jews are not responding to the gospel. Does this indicate that the purposes of God have failed? And what about the Gentiles? There are far less promises for them. Yet in Paul's day the Gentiles seemed to be responding to the apostles' preaching. Does this mean that God has rejected the Jews in favor of the Gentiles? If he has, isn't that wrong? And doesn't it destroy the doctrine of the believer's eternal security? Doesn't it mean that God is fickle?

Paul's answer is a magnificent theodicy in which he justifies the ways of God with men, showing that God has rejected Israel for a time in order that his mercy might be extended to the Gentiles, but adding that Gentile salvation will provoke Israel to jealousy and so in time bring the Jewish people to faith in their Messiah.

Since this is the meaning of history, these chapters are a magnificent exploration of the wisdom of God in the ordering of space/time events. Here is how F. Godet, one of the greatest expositors of Romans, puts it: Never was survey more vast taken of the divine plan of the world's history. First, the epoch of primitive unity in which the human family forms still only one unbroken whole; then the antagonism between the two religious portions of the race, created by the special call of Abraham: the Jews continuing in the Father's house, but with a legal and servile spirit, the Gentiles walking in their own ways. At the close of this period, the manifestation of Christ determining the return of the latter to the domestic hearth, but at the same time the departure of the former. Finally, the Jews, yielding to the divine solicitations and to the spectacle of salvation enjoyed by the Gentiles as children of grace; and so the final universalism in an infinitely higher form [than] the original unity.... The contrast between the Jews and Gentiles appears therefore as the essential moving spring of history. It is the actions and reactions arising from this primary fact which form its key. This is what no philosophy of history has dreamt of and what makes these chapters... the highest theodicy.

Who could devise a plan of that scope for world history? We could not do it: We cannot even understand it apart from the biblical revelation, and even that is difficult for us. But it is not beyond "the depth of the riches of the wisdom... of God."

God's Wisdom and Ours

I said at the beginning of this study that the wisdom of God is so much superior to our wisdom that it may hardly be compared to it. Yet I do not want to minimize the need for us on our part to cultivate wisdom. I want to close on that note.

The Bible has much to say about wisdom. The first nine chapters of Proverbs are a sustained exhortation to us to seek this gift. But there is other wisdom literature in the Old Testament (Job, Ecclesiastes), and the New Testament also makes much of wisdom. Ephesians 5:15-17 says, "Be very careful, then, how you live—not as unwise but as wise, making the most of every opportunity, because the days are evil. Therefore, do not be foolish, but understand what the Lord's will is." Colossians 4:5 says, "Be wise in the way you act toward outsiders; make the most of every opportunity." James, the Lord's brother, promises, "If any of you lacks wisdom, he should ask God, who gives generously to all without finding fault, and it will be given to him" (James 1:5).

We are to seek wisdom, then. But where? How may wisdom be found? First, we must begin with reverence for God. Proverbs 9:10 says, "The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom." Second, we must labor to know God's Word, the Bible. The psalmist wrote, "Your commands make me wiser than my enemies" (Ps. 119:98), and Paul urged his young companion Timothy to continue in his study of the God-breathed Scriptures, since they "are able to make you wise for salvation through faith in Christ Jesus" (2 Tim. 3:15).

If we really believed that God is all-wise and if we really wanted to be wise ourselves, we would do this. But the problem is that we do not really believe in God's wisdom. Martin Luther once said, "We are accustomed to admit freely that God is more powerful than we are, but not that he is wiser than we are. To be sure, we say that he is; but when it comes to a showdown, we do not want to act on what we say."

From our perspective, the workings of God are irregular, and we like events to run like a train on fixed timetables and along predictable tracks. Because they do not, we are always thinking of how we would be able to do things better. What this means is that in the final analysis we do not trust God to order both the ends and the means to them. How foolish, when in the matter of salvation God has ordered the ends and the means to that end so perfectly! That is a far more complicated matter than the details of our little lives. So we need to repudiate our folly, seek wisdom in the Bible, where alone it may be found, and then seize every opportunity to live for and witness to our all-wise God and heavenly Father.

Chapter 174.
The Unsearchable Judgments of God

Romans 11:33

Once, when I was reflecting on the purpose of good sermons, I jotted down the following: (1) the chief end of a sermon is to glorify God; (2) it should be faithful to the Bible; (3) it must say something worth saying; (4) it should say it well; and (5) it should be helpful to those who listen to it. Some sermons achieve those objectives better than others, of course, and some subjects lend themselves to one goal better than another. But I do not know of any subject that lends itself to each of those goals better in sermon form than the doctrine of the divine decrees.

The "decrees" have to do with God's ordering of everything that happens, a truth that is clearly of great importance. Yet it is something hardly mentioned by contemporary preachers.

The Westminster divines were aware of this truth and valued it highly. In fact, the Westminster Confession of Faith deals with the subject early in the document, in the third chapter, immediately after the chapters on the Bible and the Trinity. It begins, "God from all eternity, did, by his most wise and holy counsel of his own will, freely, and unchangeably ordain whatsoever comes to pass: yet so, as thereby neither is God the author of sin, nor is violence offered to the will of the creatures; nor is the liberty or contingency of second causes taken away, but rather established" (par. 1).

Judgments and Decrees

The reason I am talking about God's decrees is that this is the probable meaning of the word judgments in the second sentence of Romans 11:33. It occurs in the sentence "How unsearchable his judgments, and his paths beyond tracing out!"

The Greek word here is krimata. It is generally used in the sense of God's judicial decisions, that is, God's judgments on the wicked. Godet, for one, thinks that this is what it refers to here. But the word is sometimes also used of decisions or determinations, especially in its verbal form (cf.
Rom. 14:13; 1 Cor. 2:2; 7:37; 11:13; 2 Cor. 2:1; Titus 3:12), which fits the context better. Charles Hodge explains the broader usage by saying, "As of old, the ruler was also the judge—to judge often means to rule—[therefore] the same word is used for the decisions of the judge and the decrees or ordinances of the ruler."

The fact that "judgments" occurs in parallel with "paths"—or "ways," KJV—also suggests that Paul is thinking of the acts of God generally and not simply of judicial judgments.

Besides, this is the direction of the apostle's thought in these verses. Paul is marveling at the nature of God's ways. He begins with praise of God's knowledge, which is intuitive and infinite. Wisdom is a step beyond knowledge. It is the ability to perceive the proper, best, and most perfect means to achieve God's perfect ends. Still, at this point knowledge and wisdom are only potentialities. It is only when we get to the next step that the potentialities become actualities, as God's wisdom expresses itself in his decrees, and his decrees determine the path his decisions actually take in human history.

The Nature of God's Decrees

Let's take a moment to think about the nature of God's decrees. What are they like? How do they differ from decisions we might make? And why is it that Paul stands in such awe of them? Here are seven things to bear in mind.

1. The decrees are for God's glory. You and I do not usually think this way. We think first of our needs, and even when we are thinking in terms of biblical theology, we think first in terms of our salvation and our happiness rather than of God's glory. The Bible is different at this point. Let me ask three questions:

Why did God create the heavens and the earth? We answer: To give us a beautiful environment in which to live and work. The Bible says, "The heavens declare the glory of God; / the skies proclaim the work of his hands" (Ps. 19:1).

Why did Jesus Christ come into the world? We answer: To save us from our sins. True enough. But the greater answer was given by Jesus himself when he prayed, saying, "I have brought you glory on earth by completing the work you gave me to do" (John 17:4).

What will the saints be saying when they stand before the throne of God in heaven? We suppose that we will be praising God for being so good to us, and we probably will. But the Bible has them saying, "To him who sits on the throne and to the Lamb / be praise and honor and glory and power, for ever and ever!" (Rev. 5:13).

Do you understand what I am saying? Most of us are hopelessly self-centered and subjective. But the universe and all that happens in it is first of all for God's glory, and not primarily for us, though we benefit from it and God does also have our well-being in view. Surely that is why the doxology in Romans 11 ends as it does. It does not end with man. Rather it ends with God: "For from him and through him and to him are all things. / To him be the glory forever! Amen" (v. 36).

2. The decrees are one. I have been speaking of the "decrees" (plural) of God, because we live within the flow of historical events and can only think of God's acts in sequence. But the Westminster Confession of Faith is closer to the biblical way of speaking when it titles the chapter to which I referred earlier: "Of God's Eternal Decree" (singular). The word decree is singular because God does not see things in sequence, as we do, but rather sees all things as a whole and from the beginning. Besides, what God foresees is only what he has foreordained or planned.

That is why we read in Psalm 2, "I will proclaim the decree [singular] of the LORD" (v. 7). Or in Romans 8, "We know that in all things God works for the good of those who love him, who have been called according to his purpose [singular]" (v. 28). Or in Ephesians 3, "His intent was that now, through the church, the manifold wisdom of God should be made known to the rulers and authorities in the heavenly realms, according to his eternal purpose [singular] which he accomplished in Christ Jesus our Lord" (vv. 10-11). Or in Acts 2, "This man was handed over to you by God's set purpose [singular] and foreknowledge" (v. 23a).

Charles Hodge wrote in his Systematic Theology, "It is inconsistent with the idea of absolute perfection, that the purposes of God are successive, or that he ever purposes what he did not originally intend; or that one part of his plan is independent of other parts. It is one scheme, and therefore one purpose."

3. The decrees are eternal. To think of any of God's decisions as having been made in time is to suppose that some new circumstance, unforeseen by God, has occurred and that God therefore finds it necessary to accommodate himself to it. This would mean that God does not know everything perfectly, and it would make circumstances more powerful than God, since in some form or another they would be dictating to him. If such were the case, God would not be God, and we would be back in paganism, with its impotent and very human gods and goddesses.

The Bible teaches something very different when it says that believers were chosen in Christ "before the creation of the world" (Eph. 1:4), and speaks of Jesus as the Lamb "chosen before the creation of the world" (1 Peter 1:20). It follows, says Hodge, that "history in all its details, even the most minute, is but the evolution of the eternal purposes of God."

4. The decrees are wise. We have already seen how this is so, for we have seen how God's perfect wisdom issues in what he does. This is preeminently the case in salvation matters. It is what I focused on in the last study, following Paul's thought in Romans 1-11. But the wisdom of God's decrees is also evident in every creative act and every historical determination God makes. The psalmist rightly declared, "How many are your works, O LORD! In wisdom you made them all..." (Ps. 104:24).

5. The decrees are free. Our purposes are also free, even when formed under the influence of other minds or circumstances. It is why we insist on free will. The reason why men and women do not seek God (Rom. 3:11) is because they do not want to, not because they are physically incapable of it. But God's freedom is infinitely above our own. We are free, yet our freedom is within a framework of space/time limitations. In God's case, his will determines the framework. So it is correct to say that he is exalted above all ab extra influence, that is, above all influence from without.

Arthur W. Pink expressed this when he wrote, "God was alone when he made his decrees. He was free to decree or not to decree, and to decree one thing and not another. This liberty we must ascribe to him who is supreme, independent, and sovereign in all his doings."

This freedom of God in regard to his decrees is taught in the section of Isaiah from which Paul quotes in Romans 11:34. The full passage says,

> Who has understood the mind [Spirit] of the LORD, > or instructed him as his counselor?
> Whom did the LORD consult to enlighten him, or > who taught him the right way?
> Who was it that taught him knowledge or showed him
> the path of understanding?
> Isaiah 40:13-14

6. The decrees are absolute and unconditional. It follows from the fact of God's perfect freedom that his decrees are all also absolute and unconditional. Hodge adds the word immutable. This means that what God determines to do is not suspended upon any condition that may or may not come to be, or upon any act that you or I may or may not do. God is infinite in knowledge and perfect in power. Therefore, nothing can arise to cause him to do things differently or thwart his design. The psalmist says, "The plans of the LORD stand firm forever, / the purposes of his heart through all generations" (Ps. 33:11). James tells us that God "does not change like shifting shadows" (James 1:17). God says, "My purpose will stand, / and I will do all that I please" (Isa. 46:10b).

Some complain that if the decrees of God are absolute and unconditional, we cannot speak of free will and responsibility on the part of men and women. But that is not correct. It would be true if (1) God and man were on the same level, operating as equals, and (2) the choices we make were not determined by our sinful natures. Neither is the case. We decide as we do because we are sinners, which means we are responsible. God exercises his will toward us in this area by allowing sin to operate, just as he also exercises his will in other cases by intervening to save us from sin and turn us away from such actions. As to the first condition, we are not on God's level, which means that while our choices embrace only our own choices, God's decrees embrace not only his will but also the contrary wills of sinful and rebellious subjects.

7. The decrees are effective. Theologians make a distinction between God's efficient decrees, that is, what he specifically wills, and God's permissive decrees, that is, what he does not specifically will himself but nevertheless permits to come to pass. The entrance of sin into the world and all sinful acts are in the latter category. We say that God does good but permits evil. He is the direct author of one, though not the other. This is a valid distinction, but it has nothing to do with the certainty of coming events. Whatever God ordains, whether actively or passively, is certain.

Election and Reprobation

Many years ago, B. B. Warfield, the great Professor of Didactic and Polemic Theology at Princeton Theological Seminary (1887-1921), wrote an article for The Presbyterian Banner on the Westminster Confession's chapter on "God's Eternal Decree." Like Paul, Warfield marveled at the doctrine. But he also marveled at the confessional statement, praising the sparse yet precise language with which the authors set forth the doctrine. Religiously, the confession assures us that despite all contrary appearances the arm of God is stretched out beneath us to uphold us and teaches that everything does work for good for those who love God. Philosophically, the confession affirms that the universe has a divine purpose and that nothing will thwart what God is doing.

But what Warfield most marveled at is that the confession does not bog down in fruitless speculation about how God's decree operates in human life, particularly in regard to free will, but instead passes directly to the way the decree operates for our salvation.

This is true if you look at the confession. There are eight paragraphs that deal with God's decree. The first two occupy only ten lines in my edition; they cover the points I have made at greater length in this study. But from that point on, the chapter turns to the matter of election and the accompanying steps that accomplish and then assure our salvation. The confession says:

Those of mankind that are predestined unto life, God, before the foundation of the world was laid, according to his eternal and immutable purpose, and the secret counsel and good pleasure of his will, hath chosen, in Christ, unto everlasting glory, out of his mere free grace and love, without any foresight of faith, or good works, or perseverance in either of them, or any other thing in the creature, as conditions, or causes moving him thereunto: and all to the praise of his glorious grace.

As God hath appointed the elect unto glory, so hath he, by the eternal and most free purpose of his will, foreordained all the means thereunto. Wherefore, they who are elected, being fallen in Adam, are redeemed by Christ, are effectually called unto faith in Christ by his Spirit working in due season, are justified, adopted, sanctified, and kept by his power, through faith unto salvation. Neither are any other redeemed by Christ, effectually called, justified, adopted, sanctified, and saved, but the elect only. [pars. v, vi]

The final paragraph encourages us to handle the truth of predestination with care, knowing nevertheless that it affords "matter of praise, reverence, and admiration of God; and of humility, diligence, and abundant consolation to all that sincerely obey the gospel" (par. viii).

Two Profitable Questions I close by asking two questions.

First, isn't this how Paul has himself been handling the doctrine of God's decrees in Romans 911? He has handled it with humility, confessing at the end of his discussion the unsearchable nature of God's judgments and the untraceable pattern of his paths. He has also ended with "praise, reverence, and admiration" for God, who has designed and accomplished such a marvelous salvation. It is why Paul is praising him.

We must do the same. We must confess our inability to probe the depths of God's infinitely wise decrees. Like the nineteenth-century hymnwriter Ray Palmer (1858), we may say:

> Lord, my weak thought in vain would climb
> To search the starry vault profound; In vain would wing her flight sublime To find creation's utmost bound.
>
> But weaker yet that thought must prove
> To search thy great eternal plan,
> Thy sovereign counsels, born of love, Long ages ere the world began.

But we may rejoice in God's decrees, too, as Palmer also did,

> Be this my joy, that evermore
> Thou rulest all things at thy will;
> Thy sovereign wisdom I adore,
> And calmly, sweetly, trust thee still.

No one who knows the reality and joy of salvation can do less.

My second question is this: Despite the way God's eternal decree puzzles us and the little about it we truly understand, would we really wish it to be otherwise? Would we prefer that our salvation depended on something we did or decided, rather than on God's decree and choice? Here is the way Warfield asked these questions at the end of the essay I referred to earlier:

Do we really wish it to be true that no man in the eternal counsel of God is particularly predestined unto eternal life? That no man who is predestined unto life is unchangeably predestinated unto eternal life? Do we really wish it were dependent on our own strength whether we ourselves enter into life, or having entered, abide in life? Do we really wish that it were only a vague and uncertain number—it may be many, it may be few; experience only can decide—who are predestinated unto eternal life? Do we really care little or nothing whether it be the everlasting arms or merely our own weak arms that we rest on in our Christian life? Do we really care nothing whether we can make our own that noble paean which the apostle sings at the close of the eighth chapter of Romans, the keynote of which is the great declaration that if God is for us nothing can be against us?... Or do we really fancy that we can believe all these things are really ours, if we hold it false or doubtful that God's people are particularly and unchangeably designed to glory and their number is certain and definite and cannot be diminished—in accordance with our Savior's words that they shall never perish, and no one is able to snatch them out of the Father's hand —that they have been given him of the Father, and he will lose none of them, but raise them up at the last day?

I do not think any of us really want that, or would if we stopped to think about it clearly. So let's rejoice instead, knowing that "God from all eternity, did, by the most wise and holy counsel of his own will, freely and unchangeably ordain whatsoever comes to pass."

Even more important, let us say with Paul, "Oh, the depth of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable his judgments, and his paths beyond tracing out!"

Chapter 175.
The Amazing Ways of God

Romans 11:33

Because God did "unchangeably ordain whatsoever comes to pass," he obviously has ordained a path for us to walk in. But we have trouble with that path because (1) we are not always convinced that it is ordained; (2) we do not know where it is going; and (3) it does not always work out as we believe it should.

God's Painful Paths

Let me tell you about Elisabeth Elliot, who as a young woman went to the jungles of Ecuador to be a missionary. After studying Spanish for a year, she was invited to work with two other lady missionaries who were trying to reduce the language of the Colorado Indians to writing so they could translate the Bible into it. Elisabeth Howard—for that was her name then—prayed for an informant, someone who knew the Colorado language and would help her learn it, and the Lord supplied what seemed to be a perfect individual. His name was Macario. He was bilingual in both Spanish and Colorado, and he was delighted to have the interpreter's job. One day, shortly after they had begun the work, Macario was murdered. It was a pointless, terrible setback to what was apparently a sacrificial and spiritual endeavor. But there it was! No explanation. It was simply something that God, for whatever reason, had allowed to happen.

Elisabeth went on with the work, and at the end of a year she had accumulated thousands of vocabulary cards and done a preliminary analysis of the Colorado language. She had reduced it to a phonemic alphabet and was teaching the other two missionaries to use it. One day when she was away, all her materials were stolen. The women prayed about it, of course, but the materials were never recovered. The year's work was lost, gone. It had been for nothing.

The next stage in this story is better known to us. Elisabeth Howard married Jim Elliot, who in a similar manner had been trying to rebuild a missionary outpost called Shandia station but who had a year's work washed down the river one night by a surprise flood. The couple worked with the Quichua Indians. After only twenty-seven months of marriage, Jim Elliot was speared to death by Auca Indians, whom he and four missionary companions had been trying to reach with the gospel. Again, it was all so pointless and painful. It was "unsearchable... beyond tracing out."

And that was not all. After some years Elisabeth married Addison Leitch, a former president of Pittsburgh Theological Seminary. But not long after, he died slowly and painfully from cancer.

What is Elisabeth Elliot's testimony? She says, "The experiences of my life are not such that I could infer from them that God is good, gracious and merciful necessarily. To have one husband murdered and another one disintegrate body, soul and spirit, through cancer, is not what you would call a proof of the love of God. In fact, there are many times when it looks like just the opposite. But my belief in the love of God is not by inference or instinct. It is by faith. To apprehend God's sovereignty working in that love is—we must say it—the last and highest victory of the faith that overcomes the world."

Secret Things and Things Revealed

This is exactly what we are dealing with in Romans 11:33, of course, a text that has already occupied us for three studies. It tells us that God's wisdom and knowledge are perfect and that his decrees and paths, which flow from that wisdom and knowledge, are beyond tracing out.

But this is a truth we find hard to come to grips with, as I said at the beginning. In the last study we were looking at God's judgments or decrees. We explored the meaning of the "eternal decree" together, and at the end we were left with two results: (1) humility at our inability to comprehend God's decrees, and (2) awe of them, coupled with praise of God for his greatness. That response carries over into the fourth of the items cited and to which we come now, God's "paths."

"Judgments" refers to God's decrees, flowing from his infinite knowledge and perfect wisdom. "Paths" refers to the course these judgments actually take in human history.

Yet the two terms are closely parallel, and what Paul says of them is exactly parallel. He says that God's judgments "cannot be searched to the bottom" (the Greek word is anexereunêtos) and that his paths "cannot be followed to the end" (the Greek is anexichniastos).

Paul does not mean that we can never know anything about God's ways, particularly since he has just been explaining some of them. What he means is that God's ways cannot be figured out by us apart from revelation.

Some things God has revealed. That is why we know he has a plan and that events do not happen simply by accident. Paul says, "'No eye has seen, / no ear has heard, / no mind has conceived / what God has prepared for those who love him'—but God has revealed it to us by his Spirit" (1 Cor. 2:9-10). But God does not reveal all things, particularly the detailed circumstances or events of our lives, and in these areas we must live by faith in his sovereign and loving purposes, as Elisabeth Elliot does. The Bible says, "The secret things belong to the LORD our God, but the things revealed belong to us and to our children forever..." (Deut. 29:29).

God's Footprints

There is a very interesting image involved in the single Greek word rendered "beyond tracing out." This word, anexichniastos, is based on the noun ichnos, which means "footprint." It suggests that although we do not know where God is coming from or where he is going, we nevertheless do see his footprints, and it is these that puzzle us.

Let me direct you to the sandy beach of history to show you some of the untraceable footprints of God.

1. Abraham. I start with the story of Abraham, because that is where the story of God's preparation of a special people through whom the Messiah should come begins. God called Abraham out of Ur of the Chaldeans to go to Canaan, promising him that he would become the father of a great nation: "I will make you into a great nation and I will bless you; / I will make your name great, and you will be a blessing" (Gen. 12:2). But Abraham did not become the father of a great nation in his lifetime. In fact, for years he and his wife had no children at all, and it was a source of continual embarrassment to them, particularly in view of God's promise.

Abraham's original name was Abram and it means "father of many." But Abram went through most of his life with no children. It was only when he was a hundred years old and Sarah was ninety years old, that is, when both were past the age at which they might expect to have children, that God intervened and caused Isaac, the son of the promise, to be born.

What was God thinking of? Why the long delay? Why didn't the birth take place sooner and naturally? There is no easy answer. All we can say is that the paths of God are beyond our tracing out.

2. Moses. The great emancipator and lawgiver of Israel is my next example. Moses must have understood that God's hand was upon him and that it was time for the deliverance of the people from Egypt, which God had promised many years before (cf. Gen. 15:12-16). But when he started what he thought would be a successful rebellion by killing an Egyptian, the plan backfired and he had to flee Egypt. Moses was forty years old when he left Egypt, and for the next forty years this talented and highly educated man lived on the backside of the desert, working as a shepherd. He must have believed that his life was an utter failure.

At the end of this time, when he was eighty years old, God sent him to Egypt with the command to Pharaoh, "Let my people go." When they were set free, Moses led the people in the wilderness for an additional forty years. Forty years! And what of the earlier eighty years? How wasted they seemed to be! In this case, too, God's decrees were unsearchable, and his paths beyond tracing out!

3. Israel. What about God's dealings with Israel, especially during those wilderness years? J. I.

Packer writes, "God guided Israel by means of a fiery cloudy pillar that went before them (Exod. 13:21f.); yet the way which he led them involved the nerve-shredding cliff-hanger of the Red Sea crossing, long days without water and meat in 'that great and terrible wilderness' (Deut. 1:19, cf. 31-33), and bloody battles with Amalek, Sihon and Og (Exod. 17:8-13; Numb. 21:21ff.), and we can understand, if not excuse, Israel's constant grumbling (cf. Exod. 14:10ff, 16:3, Numb. 11:4ff., 14:3ff., 20:3ff., 21:4ff.)."

Wasn't there an easier way to do it? What was the point of the many battles, delays, and deprivations? If there was a purpose to this history, surely it is unsearchable to our limited understanding.

4. David. I think, too, of David, Israel's great king. God had rejected Saul, David's predecessor, and had sent the prophet Samuel to anoint David to be the next king. But years went by in which David first served Saul and then was chased all over the country by him, since Saul saw David as a rival and wanted to put him to death. David did not become king until after Saul's death, when he was thirty-three years old. And even then he did not become king over the entire country. He was king only in Hebron, that is, over the southern territories, where he reigned seven years. He did not become king of the entire land until he was forty.

Whatever could God have had in mind by allowing Saul to reign so long, particularly when a man of David's exceptional character and leadership ability was waiting patiently in the wings? Surely God's ways are not our ways, nor are his thoughts our thoughts. His paths are beyond tracing out.

5. Paul. Paul is my next example. We have no difficulty with the story of Paul's remarkable conversion. It is a clear example of God's direct and effective intervention in history. It is what we expect God to be doing always. But think of Paul's career after that. First, three years in the wilderness with no apparent accomplishments during that time, as far as we know (Gal. 1:17-18). Then there were years in Tarsus, his hometown. It is not until mid-life that he is called to active missionary work, and even then it is mostly in the hinterlands of Asia Minor. Paul wanted to get to Rome, which he did eventually. But he arrived in Rome as a prisoner, spent most of his time there in chains and eventually died there by Nero's order.

Here is how Paul described his missionary years:

Five times I received from the Jews the forty lashes minus one. Three times I was beaten with rods, once I was stoned, three times I was shipwrecked, I spent a night and a day in the open sea, I have been constantly on the move. I have been in danger from rivers, in danger from bandits, in danger from my own countrymen, in danger from Gentiles; in danger in the city, in danger in the country, in danger at sea; and in danger from false brothers. I have labored and toiled and have often gone without sleep; I have known hunger and thirst and have often gone without food; I have been cold and naked. Besides everything else, I face daily the pressure of my concern for all the churches.

2 Corinthians 11:24-

"Troubles, hardships and distresses... beatings, imprisonments and riots... hard work, sleepless nights and hunger" (2 Cor. 6:4-5). Why should that be? Why should the work be so hard? Couldn't God have worked out some of those problems so that Paul would not have had to be beaten, not have had to go hungry, and would have escaped the three shipwrecks and the other dangers? Couldn't God have lessened the burden of Paul's concern for the churches entrusted to him? Or didn't God care?

No, we must not say that. We know that God cares. Yet why should God be planting his steps in history in that precise way? Surely his judgments are unsearchable to us and his paths beyond tracing out.

6. Jesus. My last example is Jesus. No individual in all history more evidently had the hand of God upon him. God said of him, "This is my Son, whom I love; with him I am well pleased" (Matt. 3:17). But what a life! J. I. Packer writes:

No human life has ever been so completely guided by God, and no human life has ever qualified so comprehensively for the description "a man of sorrows." Divine guidance set Jesus at a distance from his family and fellow-townsmen, brought him into conflict with all the nation's leaders, religious and civil, and led finally to betrayal, arrest, and the cross....

By every human standard of reckoning, the cross was a waste—the waste of a young life, a prophet's influence, a leader's potential. We know the secret of its meaning and achievement only from God's own statements.

Ah, but we do know its meaning and achievement from God's statements. That is, we know that the most miserable of lives was actually the greatest of God's achievements. It was the means by which God accomplished the salvation of our lost race. That "waste," that loss, that suffering, was actually the focal point of history and the highest of achievements. And because we know that, we know that each of the other stories, including our own, is also part of a plan that— though beyond our complete tracing out—is nevertheless a sure and perfect plan, which will have a grand and blessed consummation.

A Crown Beyond the Cross

I am sure you see what I am getting at by this rehearsal of the biblical history. At least I am sure you saw it by the time I reviewed the life of Jesus. Each of these stories involves the incomprehensible. From the perspective of our own wisdom, each is utterly inexplicable. Yet each was part of God's perfect plan. Though beyond our ability to trace out, each was also part of God's unfolding march through history.

Why was the birth of Abraham's son Isaac so long delayed? Abraham could hardly have known the answer, except perhaps dimly and by revelation. But we look back and by that revelation can see how Isaac was a type of Jesus Christ. And we can see how Abraham's steadfast faith in the God who was able to do miracles becomes a model for our faith and an encouragement when we are called to go through difficult times.

Why did Moses have to spend so many years in the wilderness? Why did Israel have such a difficult journey? Why was David's reign so long delayed? As we read these stories, we can see that in each case God was developing character in his people, and that he was showing himself to be more than adequate to their every human need.

As for Paul, he said, "[These things] happened that we might not rely on ourselves but on God, who raises the dead" (2 Cor. 1:9), and "we have this treasure [the gospel] in jars of clay to show that this all-surpassing power is from God and not from us" (2 Cor. 4:7). He added, "Therefore we do not lose heart. Though outwardly we are wasting away, yet inwardly we are being renewed day by day. For our light and momentary troubles are achieving for us an eternal glory that far outweighs them all. So we fix our eyes not on what is seen, but on what is unseen. For what is seen is temporary, but what is unseen is eternal" (2 Cor. 4:16-18).

"Therefore we do not lose heart."

Perhaps you are one who has been losing heart. You began the Christian life with confidence some years ago, but the details of your life have not worked out as you expected. As far as you can tell, you have not become a great saint. You are no great model of what it is to be a prayer warrior, neither have you been terribly effective as an evangelist. Even your personal relationships have not gone as smoothly or as triumphantly as you had hoped. And much of your work, even your Christian work, seems wasted. Don't lose heart! God knows what he is doing with your life. You cannot search out his eternal decrees or judgments or perceive the end of the path on which he has been leading you, but this does not mean that God is confused, the outcome doubtful, or the final achievement vague. Fix your eyes on what is not seen—on God. Trust him and go on.

"Outwardly we are wasting away."

That is literally true for some. Perhaps cancer or some other debilitating disease has invaded your body, and you suspect that you do not have a very long time to live. "What a waste," you are saying. "Why can't I be strong and healthy and live a long, long life?" I do not know the answer to that. What God does with us in detail is not revealed in Scripture. It is one of the secret things that belong to God only. But that does not mean the painful path he calls you to walk has no purpose. It is how you conduct yourself in such "wasting times" that is the stuff of victory.

Set an example for us by lifting your eyes from what is material and tangible and passing away, and point us to him who is invisible and who does everything well. Show us how light and momentary these earthly troubles are. We need to know that. Show us how they are achieving for us an eternal glory that far outweighs them all.

There is a hymn by the English writer W. H. Burleigh that we do not sing much because it is not in most of our hymnbooks. It is one of my favorite hymns. I learned it from that remarkable original hymnbook prepared by InterVarsity. It goes like this.

Still will we trust, though earth seem dark and dreary,
And the heart faints beneath his chast'ning rod;
Though rough and steep our pathway, worn and weary, Still will we trust in God.
Our eyes see dimly 'til by faith anointed,

And our blind choosing brings us grief and pain;
Through him alone, who hath our way appointed, We find our peace again.
Choose for us, God, nor let our weak preferring
Cheat us of good thou hast for us designed;
Choose for us, God; thy wisdom is unerring, And we are fools and blind.
Let us press on, in patient self-denial,
Accept the hardship, shrink not from the loss;
Our portion lies beyond the hour of trial, Our crown beyond the cross.

That is it exactly, isn't it? We have a crown laid up for us in heaven, just as Paul had a crown of righteousness "in store" for him (2 Tim. 4:8). But it is not on this side of suffering. It is beyond it. It is beyond the sickness, beyond the disappointments, beyond the pain. It is beyond the cross.

Chapter 176.
The Inscrutable God

Romans 11:34

William Beebe (1877-1962) was a biologist, explorer, and author, and he was also a personal friend of Theodore Roosevelt (1858-1919), the twenty-sixth president of the United States. He used to visit Roosevelt at Sagamore Hill, his home near Oyster Bay, Long Island, and he tells of a little game they used to play together. After an evening of talk, they would go outside onto the lawn surrounding the great house and search the sky until they found the faint spot of light beyond the lower left corner of the great square of Pegasus. One of them would recite: "That is the Spiral Galaxy in Andromeda. It is as large as the Milky Way. It is one of a hundred million galaxies. It consists of one hundred billion suns, each larger than our sun."

Then Roosevelt would grin at Beebe and say, "Now I think we are small enough! Let's go to bed."

Our Smallness before God

I think of that story as we come to the last thoughts of Romans 11, following the apostle Paul's exclamation of wonder at the unsearchable depths of the riches of the wisdom, knowledge, judgments, and paths of God in verse 33. He is still thinking of God and marveling at God. But Paul's glance shifts, as it were, to the man who is doing the thinking and marveling, and he makes a contrast between God's unsearchable grandeur, on the one hand, and the poverty of man's small knowledge, on the other. In verse 34 he queries, "Who has known the mind of the Lord? Or who has been his counselor?" In verse 35 he adds, "Who has ever given to God, that God should repay him?"

Each of these verses is a quotation from the Old Testament, which reminds us that this is Paul's characteristic way of wrapping up an argument. We have already seen several examples of this in the letter, Romans 3:10-18, for example. Those verses contain Old Testament quotations that summarize Paul's arguments for the depravity of the race developed in chapters 1-3. We have the same thing in chapters 4, 9, 10, and earlier in chapter 11. To give a contrary example, the apostle Peter argued by beginning with the text, then providing what we would call an exposition (cf. Acts 2).

The quotation we are looking at in this study is from Isaiah 40:13, but it may have elements of several other passages (cf. Job 15:8; Jer. 23:18).

"Who has known the mind of the Lord? Or who has been his counselor?" Although drawn mostly from Isaiah, this was essentially the question put to Job when God interrogated him toward the end of that great Old Testament story. The bottom line is that no human being, however wise, has anything to offer to God in the matters of his knowledge and wisdom. The question fits Paul's context beautifully, for it links up with his earlier reference to "wisdom" and "knowledge" in verse 33, though in reverse order. As F. Godet observed, "The first question contrasts the always limited knowledge of man with the infinite knowledge of God.... The second goes further, it bears on the relation between human and divine wisdom. It is no longer merely the discovery of the secrets of God by the study of his works which is in question, but some good counsel which man might have been called to give to the Creator in the organizing of his plans."

As I say, Paul is still thinking about God in this verse. But here he also turns our attention from God's attributes—the perfection of his wisdom, knowledge, judgments, and ways—to our limitations as measured by them. He tells us once again that we are not like God.

Isn't it interesting that Paul should have to do this, especially now, at this point in our studies of Romans 11? You may recall the distinction I made earlier between God's incommunicable attributes, those he does not share with us because he cannot, and God's communicable attributes, which he does share with us. The latter category contains such attributes as we have been studying here: knowledge, wisdom, the ability to make plans and decisions, and the capacity to act. We understand what we are talking about when we say that God has these attributes or possesses these abilities, because we have them ourselves. We, too, know things, possess a measure of wisdom, make decisions or plans, and act on them.

But even in this area we do not measure up to God. In fact, our knowledge, wisdom, planning, and acting are so far from his knowledge, wisdom, planning, and acting that it is even less than the equivalent of comparing ourselves to the billions of suns in the great galaxy of Andromeda or to the many other galaxies. To put it another way, the only things we know, we know because God has known them first and has revealed them to us. Because we are so small, the knowledge we have is itself also pitifully small. Or to put it still another way, we have nothing to contribute to God in any area.

How Little We Know

The way we need to explore this is to look at that part of the biblical writings known as "wisdom literature," particularly Job, Ecclesiastes, and Proverbs. I begin with Job, because that book deals directly with the extreme limitations of our knowledge.

We know Job's story. It is one of the great stories of all time. Job was a fortunate individual in many ways. He was wealthy; he had a wonderful family; he enjoyed good health. Moreover, he was a godly man. Even God called attention to Job's character: "Have you considered my servant Job? There is no one on earth like him; he is blameless and upright, a man who fears God and shuns evil" (Job. 1:8). But within a very short time everything Job had was taken away from him, except his character. His goods were plundered or destroyed; his ten children were killed; and he was afflicted with painful sores that covered him from the soles of his feet to his scalp. He was reduced to abject and utter misery. He sat in ashes, suffering both within (in his soul) and without (in his body).

At this point Job's three close friends, Eliphaz the Temanite, Bildad the Shuhite, and Zophar the Naamathite, came to him to sympathize and offer counsel. The bulk of the book consists of their attempts to explain what had happened, followed by Job's responses to their words.

To put it in our terms, what they were trying to explain is "why bad things happen to good people." And by our standards they did pretty well at it. They rightly assumed that this is a moral universe of cause-and-effect events and that God, who has created the universe and who guides its destiny, is a moral God. Everything has a purpose, they argued, and because this purpose is God's purpose, it must be good. Evil does not triumph. Virtue is rewarded. All this is entirely right, of course. In fact, if you were reading carefully, you will have recognized that these are the exact points I was making when I was speaking about the wisdom, decrees, and paths of God in the preceding studies.

What, then, was wrong with the counsel of Job's friends? And why was God so unhappy with them?—as he reveals himself to be later ("Who is this that darkens my counsel with words without knowledge?" [Job 38:2]).

The problem was not with their starting point or principles, for they were the very things that are revealed about the nature of reality in Scripture. Instead the problem was that these men, wise as they were, lacked sufficient knowledge to discern what God was doing. As the story points out at the beginning, God was waging war against the slanders and lies of Satan. Satan claimed that Job served God only because of what he got out of it, a standard utilitarian argument. God maintained that Job loved God because of who God was, regardless of what it might bring to him personally. Satan said, "Does Job fear God for nothing?... Have you not put a hedge around him and his household and everything he has? You have blessed the work of his hands, so that his flocks and herds are spread throughout the land. But stretch out your hand and strike everything he has, and he will surely curse you to your face" (Job. 1:9-11).

God allowed Satan to strike at Job's possessions and family, but though Job was personally crushed by these disasters, Job worshiped God, saying,

> Naked I came from my mother's womb, and naked I will depart.
> The LORD gave and the LORD has taken away; may the name of the LORD be praised.
>
> Job 1:21

Next Satan wanted to strike at Job's health. "Stretch out your hand and strike his flesh and bones, and he will surely curse you to your face," Satan said to God (Job 2:5). But when God allowed Satan to be the instrument of devastating physical affliction for Job, Job said to his wife, "Shall we accept good from God, and not trouble?"—and the text points out that "in all this Job did not sin in what he said" (v. 10).

Job's friends knew none of this, of course. They had not the faintest idea of what was going on at the cosmic level. Therefore, although they had begun at the right starting place and had the right principles, what they actually had to say to Job turned out to be mere nonsense, which is why God rebuked them.

Moreover, notice the nature of God's rebuke. Their problem was that they were not aware of the invisible, cosmic nature of this struggle. But when God rebuked them (and Job, too) for their ignorance, he rebuked them not because they did not know the invisible dimensions of the struggle—what was going on between himself and Satan—but because they did not understand or know even the things they could see. God chided them for being unable to explain the origins of the earth ("Where were you when I laid the earth's foundation?" [Job. 38:4]). Scientists are not much closer to explaining that today. He chided them for being unable to explain or control the sea ("Who shut up the sea behind doors when it burst forth from the womb?" [v. 8]). Today, with all our scientific advances we cannot even predict the movement of the sea's storms accurately, let alone control either it or them. Chapter after chapter, God chides Job and his friends for their profound and extensive ignorance of all natural forces—light and darkness; rain, snow, wind; the intricacies of the heavens; animal instincts and behavior; the migration patterns of birds and fish; and countless other observable phenomena.

But here is the point: If these people could not explain what they could see, how could they hope to understand and explain what they could not see? Obviously, not at all. They could not contribute to God's perfect knowledge in any respect. The only thing they could possibly do is what Job does at the end of the story—he shuts his mouth and admits his utter ignorance:

Then Job replied to the Lord:

> "I know that you can do all things; no plan of yours can be thwarted.

You asked, 'Who is this that obscures my counsel without knowledge?' Surely I spoke of things I did not understand, things too wonderful for me to know.
You said, 'Listen now, and I will speak; I will question you, and you shall answer me.'
My ears had heard of you but now my eyes have seen you.
Therefore I despise myself and repent in dust and ashes.'"

Job 42:1-6

I have previously described the effect of our thinking about God and his "eternal decree" as (1) humility at our incomprehension and (2) awe before God and praise of him. We find both responses in Job's final words, as well as in the closing section of Romans 11.

Fools, and Blind

The second half of verse 34 goes an important step beyond what I have been describing up to this point. I have been writing about our extreme lack of knowledge, which is what "Who has known the mind of the Lord?" refers to. But the next words are also significant, for they add, "Or who has been his counselor?" This part deals with wisdom and how little of it we possess.

I turn here to the Book of Ecclesiastes. This is a short book; it has only twelve chapters. Yet Ecclesiastes is a high point of the wisdom literature in the sense that it shows the limits of man's earthbound wisdom, just as Job shows the limits of man's knowledge. Ecclesiastes is essentially a sermon on one text: "'Meaningless! Meaningless!' says the Teacher. / 'Utterly meaningless! Everything is meaningless'" (Eccles. 1:2). As anyone can tell just by looking at the subheads in the New International Version, the preacher develops the text to make these points: (1) wisdom is meaningless; (2) pleasures are meaningless; (3) wisdom and folly are meaningless; (4) toil is meaningless; (5) advancement is meaningless; and (6) riches are meaningless.

But surely we don't believe that, do we?

Haven't we been saying that God is sovereign over the affairs of his creation, that he has a single supreme purpose in all he does, and that this purpose is a good purpose because he is a good God? Of course, we have. Then how are we to understand Ecclesiastes? Is this merely the last words of an embittered cynic, which we can completely discount? Some Christian leaders have taught that. One of them once told me, "You can never preach a sermon from Ecclesiastes."

We know that is not correct, because "All Scripture is God-breathed and is useful..." (2 Tim. 3:16). But how, then, is Ecclesiastes to be taken?

The answer is that this book shows us the limits and hence the folly of human wisdom apart from revelation. Here is the way J. I. Packer, who has done several helpful studies of Ecclesiastes, puts it:

Look (says the preacher) at the sort of world we live in. Take off your rose-colored spectacles, rub your eyes, and look at it long and hard. What do you see? You see life's background set by aimlessly recurring cycles in nature (1:4ff.). You see its shape fixed by times and circumstances over which we have no control (3:1ff.; 9:11f.). You see death coming to everyone sooner or later, but coming haphazard; its coming bears no relation to good or ill desert (7:15; 8:8). Men die like beasts (3:19f.), good men like bad, wise men like fools (2:14, 17; 9:2f.). You see evil running rampant (3:16; 4:1; 5:8; 8:11; 9:3); rotters get on, good men don't (8:14). Seeing all this, you realize that God's ordering of events is inscrutable; much as you want to make it out, you cannot do so (3:11; 7:13f.; 8:17 RV; 11:5). The harder you try to understand the divine purpose in the ordinary providential course of events, the more obsessed and oppressed you grow with the apparent aimlessness of everything, and the more you are tempted to conclude that life really is as pointless as it looks.

But once you conclude that there really is no rhyme or reason in things, what "profit"—value, gain, point, purpose—can you find henceforth in any sort of constructive endeavor (1:3; 2:11, 22; 3:9; 5:16)? If life is senseless, then it is valueless; and in that case, what use is it working to create things, to build a business, to make money, even to seek wisdom —for none of this can do you any obvious good (2:15f., 22f.; 5:11); it will only make you an object of envy (4:4); you can't take any of it with you (2:18ff.; 4:8; 5:15f.); and what you leave behind will probably be mismanaged after you have gone (2:19). What point is there, then, in sweating and toiling at anything? Must not all man's work be judged "vanity (emptiness, frustration) and a striving after wind" (1:14 RV)?

That is true, isn't it? Apart from what God is doing in Jesus Christ and in our lives, the last part of which is at best only partially revealed to us, everything is indeed "meaningless." There is more, of course. There is what God is doing, what he reveals. But before we can see those things, we need to see that there is no meaning in anything apart from them. One of the great proofs of our lack of wisdom is that we do not see even this fundamental point of earthly wisdom clearly.

Even Christians don't. Otherwise, why would they spend so much of their time and energy working for things that do not satisfy at any significant level and, in fact, will never do so?

Why do they spend their time acquiring houses and cars and television sets and fine furniture, which will eventually depreciate and decay?

Why do they work for increasingly larger paychecks and bank accounts, which they will not be able to take with them to heaven when they die?

Why do they yearn for earthly recognition, which can vanish in a flash?

Why do we do these things? We do them because we have not learned even the rudimentary earthly wisdom of the Book of Ecclesiastes, let alone the infinitely more profound wisdom of the revealed counsels of God. Yet we presume to suppose that we can criticize God for what he is doing in our lives. We think that we could tell him how to do things better, if we only had the chance. What folly! What utter folly! We who think we are teachers need to learn again the first principles of the oracles of God.

Paul asks the Corinthians, "Where is the wise man? Where is the scholar? Where is the philosopher of this age? Has not God made foolish the wisdom of the world?" (1 Cor. 1:20). We need to learn that again. We need to hear again Paul's implied rebuke as he wisely asks the Romans "'Who has known the mind of the Lord? Or who has been his counselor?'"

The answer clearly is "no one." Not you, not me. No one. Not one of us can contribute to the knowledge or wisdom of God in any respect.

Humility and Wisdom

So where does this leave us? Obviously, it is not intended to leave us in our folly. We are not called upon to be either ignorant or foolish. On the contrary, we are to trust God, work to develop our minds, and grow in true spiritual wisdom and understanding. How? Let me suggest these points.

1. Learn that there is no true wisdom except in God. That is why Proverbs 9:10 says rightly, "The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom, / and knowledge of the Holy One is understanding." We can know because God is a God who knows, and we can acquire wisdom because God is a God of wisdom. But we will achieve neither unless we begin with him.

2. Learn that even though you begin with God, you will never fully understand God and therefore you will never fully understand his ways. God says, "My thoughts are not your thoughts, / neither are your ways my ways" (Isa. 55:8). Moreover, since God's thoughts direct God's actions, clearly it will be his ways rather than yours that will be accomplished, for "Many are the plans in a man's heart, / but it is the LORD'S purpose that prevails" (Prov. 19:21).

3. Finally, learn to trust God and follow hard after him. This leads me to the wisest saying of all: "Trust in the LORD with all your heart and lean not on your own understanding; / in all your ways acknowledge him, and he will make your paths straight" (Prov. 3:5-6). If you do not do that, your pitifully small knowledge and faulty wisdom will lead you eventually either to arrogance or despair. But if you acknowledge your ignorance and foolishness and learn to trust God, you will find that God will provide all the knowledge you need—you will find it in Scripture—and if you ask him, he will give abundant wisdom, too (James 1:5).

Chapter 177.
The Ail-Sufficient God

Romans 11:35

One thing most people think about preachers is that they love to take offerings, and I suppose they do, especially if the offerings are for some great cause and the response is generous. I have been part of a few such offerings. My most common examples are the "Easter Sacrificial Offerings" of Tenth Presbyterian Church, which we receive each year for some area of special social need throughout the world. The giving is always generous.

But there was never an offering like the one I am going to discuss now. Israel's great King David was coming to the end of his reign, and his young son Solomon was being left behind to rule the kingdom and build a magnificent temple in Jerusalem. The temple had been David's great dream, what he hoped to leave behind as the capstone of his reign. But God had told David that the task would not be his because he was a man of war and that the temple would be built by Solomon instead. So David contented himself with making preparations for the temple's construction, collecting all the gold, silver, bronze, iron, and precious stones that would be needed.

To do that he took an offering. For his personal share he gave 3,000 talents of gold and 7,000 talents of silver. That converts to 110 metric tons of gold and 260 metric tons of silver. Then the leading families of the nation gave gifts, too. They gave 5,000 talents of gold, 10,000 talents of silver, 18,000 talents of bronze, and 100,000 talents of iron, plus many of the precious stones in their possession. It is difficult to convert these amounts into dollars, and scholars differ on what today's equivalents would be, but the amounts add up to hundreds of millions of dollars at least. So it really was an enormous offering, perhaps the greatest single offering that has ever been taken for a religious work by anyone in any period of history.

For many, the success of a campaign like this would be a cause for self-congratulation. But not for David! Instead of congratulating either himself or the people, David praised God, acknowledging that it was because of him that the people had been able to give as they had given. His prayer of dedication said, > Praise be to you, O LORD, God of our father Israel, from everlasting to everlasting.

> Yours, O LORD, is the greatness and the power and the glory and the majesty and the splendor, for everything in heaven and earth is yours.
> Yours, O LORD, is the kingdom; you are exalted as head over all.
> Wealth and honor come from you; you are the ruler of all things.
> In your hands are strength and power to exalt and give strength to all.
> Now, our God, we give you thanks, and praise your glorious name.
> 1 Chronicles 29:1013

David continued wisely, "But who am I, and who are my people, that we should be able to give as generously as this? Everything comes from you, and we have given you only what comes from your hand" (v. 14).

This was a very important acknowledgement, meaning, to put it in slightly different language, "The people have given generously, but we have been able to do so only by your grace and by returning to you what you have first seen fit to give us."

Three Rhetorical Questions

I begin our study of Romans 11:35 by referring to this, because the manner in which David responded to the generous offerings of the people for building the Jerusalem temple brilliantly illustrates our text. In this section of Romans 11, Paul has been praising God for his infinite superiority to his creatures in all areas, and he has made these contrasts graphic by three rhetorical questions, each of which implies a negative answer.

Question number one: "Who has known the mind of the Lord?" (v. 34a).

Answer: No one! None of us even begins to come close to knowing what God knows. His knowledge is infinitely beyond ours.

Question number two: "Who has been his counselor?" (v. 34b).

Again, the answer is: No one! No one can possibly advise God so that he can do the job of governing the world better or more efficiently.

This brings us to question number three, the text for this study: "Who has ever given to God, that God should repay him?" (v. 35).

Again, the answer is: No one! We may give to God, as the people did when David appealed to them for offerings for the temple. But what we give is only what God has first given to us, as David knew and stated. One of our hymns also states this correctly.

> We give thee but thine own,
> Whate'er the gift may be;
> All that we have is > thine alone, A trust,
> O Lord, from thee.

Together these questions remind us of the self-sufficiency, sovereignty, and independence of God—the attributes of God that Paul has been teaching us to appreciate—and they show us that we have nothing to contribute. We have nothing to add either to who God is or to what he does.

And there is this additional point to the third question: We cannot place God under obligation to ourselves by giving to him. That is so important that I want to repeat it: We cannot place God under obligation to ourselves by giving to him.

Our Contribution Equals Nothing

That we have nothing to give to God is something Paul has already taught many times in the earlier parts of this letter. So we should understand it very well by now. Let me review his teaching briefly.

1. We are justified by grace apart from human works. This is the point of the first four chapters of the letter, in which Paul explains the depth of human depravity and impotence and shows how God has reached out to save us in Jesus Christ completely apart from anything in us. In our sin we imagine that God can be won over by some good work in us, grading us on the curve and saving us on the basis of some passing moral mark, as it were. Indeed, even after they have become Christians, there are people who suppose that they were saved because, although no one can be saved by works, they were nevertheless singled out by God because of something that was found in them—some aptitude for God, perhaps, or just faith.

Romans teaches that we are saved by none of these things, not even by faith. True, we are saved through faith. No one is saved without it. But even faith is God's gift, so that there will be no boasting on the day when the redeemed of the Lord stand before him. We do not contribute to our justification in any way.

2. We are sanctified by the Holy Spirit apart from works. This is the point of the second main section of Romans, chapters 5 through 8. It means that just as we have nothing to contribute to our justification, so also do we have nothing to contribute to our sanctification. It is true that there are things we are to do because we have been saved and that we will do them if we truly are. But that does not mean that we give anything to God in this area. What we do is a response to what he has already done. It is because God has taken us out of Adam and placed us in Christ, giving us a new nature that possesses new desires, that we therefore follow after Jesus and grow in the grace God freely supplies.

In fact, when Paul gets to the end of this section, in Romans 8, and reflects on the certainty of our persevering in faith, he is thinking not of anything in us, but of God and what he has done for us. This is why we read, "And we know that in all things God works for the good of those who love him, who have been called according to his purpose. For those God foreknew he also predestined to be conformed to the likeness of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brothers. And those he predestined, he also called; those he called, he also justified; those he justified, he also glorified" (Rom. 8:28-30, emphasis added).

The next verses tell us that God is for us (v. 31), that he gave his Son for us (v. 32), that he will give us all things (v. 32), that he has justified us (v. 33), that Jesus is interceding for us (v. 34), and that nothing will ever separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus (vv. 35-39). It is all of God from the beginning to the end.

3. We are chosen apart from works. The third section of Romans, chapters 9 through 11, teaches that what God is doing in history does not depend on us either, not even in the sense that God is primarily obliged to make us happy. On the contrary, Paul teaches that history unfolds to reveal God's attributes—his love and grace, of course, but also such things as his power, justice, and wrath—and to manifest his glory.

What a transformation that would mean for most of today's Christians, if they could only see it. I have a good friend named Mike Horton, who has written about this well in a book entitled Made in America: The Shaping of Modern American Evangelicalism. He says:

The older theology tended to produce character.... By the end of the twentieth century, we have become God's demanding little brats. In church, we must be entertained. Our emotions must be charged.... We must be offered amusing programs—we gave up a lot to become Christians and what little teaching we do get must cater to our pragmatic, self-centered interests. The preaching must be filled with clever anecdotes and colorful illustrations, with nothing more than passing references to doctrine: "I want to know what this means for me and my daily experience!"

We have forgotten that God is a monarch. He is the King by whom and for whom all things were made, and by whose sovereign power they are sustained. We exist for his pleasure, not he for ours; we are on this earth to entertain him, please him, to adore him, to bring him satisfaction, excitement and joy. Any gospel which seeks to answer the question, "What's in it for me?" has it all backwards. The question is, "What's in it for God?"

Of course, that brings us back to our text, where Paul asks, "Who has ever given to God, that God should repay him?" None of us has. Therefore, God is in debt to no one to do what he or she desires.

We Cannot Put God in Debt

Yet we continue to think like this, often even after we have become Christians, even after we have received the kind of teaching we have studied so carefully in Romans. Think with me how we suppose we put God in our debt.

1. We do so when we think we have caught God in some fault. Most would not put it this way. But every time we are critical of God or complain to God about something, we are telling him indirectly, and sometimes quite directly, that we believe he has made a mistake and should correct it.

"I think he made me too short. I should be taller."

"Life would be better for me if I were only better-looking."

"God has me stuck in a dead-end job, when I could be accomplishing something important. He should have given me opportunities I did not have or promotions that were given to someone else."

"He made a mistake not giving me a husband."

Or "... giving me the one I have."

Whenever we find ourselves thinking along these lines, what we are doing is supplying God with what we suppose is the knowledge or wisdom he lacks and saying that he should acknowledge his mistake and thank us for straightening him out. Moreover, we believe that he is now indebted to us for supplying that particular bit of wisdom and should reciprocate accordingly. Isn't it true that you have often thought like that? Isn't it foolish?

Remember our text the next time you find yourself slipping into such a moronic thought pattern. "Who has ever given to God, that God should repay him?" Job experienced terrible tragedies, but he said, "Surely I spoke of things I did not understand" (Job 42:3).

2. We do so when we think we have caught God in an injustice. This mistake is closely related to what I just said, but it is a step further along the sad path of human pride and rebellion. The key to this erroneous line of thought is finding ourselves saying that what God is doing is not right.

"It's not right that I should be sick when my friends are all well."

"It's not right that she should have gotten the prize rather than myself. I worked harder for it."

"It is not right for God to let me go on like this without answering my prayers as I would like or doing what I have repeatedly asked him to do." I am sure you get the idea.

When we find ourselves thinking like this, we must remember how Abraham pleaded to God for the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah. He knew that his nephew Lot had gone to live in those cities and that, if God destroyed them, his nephew and his family would also be destroyed. So Abraham pleaded, "Will you sweep away the righteous with the wicked? What if there are fifty righteous people in the city? Will you really sweep it away and not spare the place for the sake of the fifty righteous people in it? Far be it from you to do such a thing—to kill the righteous with the wicked, treating the righteous and the wicked alike. Far be it from you! Will not the Judge of all the earth do right?" (Gen. 18:23-25).

It was basically a good argument, for the Judge of all the earth must do right. The trouble with it is that there were none righteous. So although God did spare Lot and his wife from destruction, the destruction nevertheless did come. The cities were blotted out and their inhabitants were killed. You cannot put God in your debt by crying, "Justice!" Justice condemns! Justice sends people to hell! It is not justice we need from God. It is grace, and grace is the very opposite of debt.

If you think God owes you justice, remember our text: "Who has ever given to God, that God should repay him?" The only thing we have ever earned from God is condemnation.

3. We do so when we think we have obligated God by some service. This is a third way Christians sometimes think they have placed God in their debt. They suppose that they have earned credits with him by some acts of self-sacrifice or service. One of my favorite stories along this line was told by R. A. Torrey. He was in Melbourne, Australia, and one afternoon at a meeting for businessmen a note was handed to him. It said, Dear Dr. Torrey:

I am in great perplexity. I have been praying for a long time for something that I am confident is according to God's will, but I do not get it. I have been a member of the Presbyterian Church for thirty years, and have tried to be a consistent one all that time. I have been Superintendent in the Sunday School for twenty-five years, and an elder in the church for twenty years; and yet God does not answer my prayer and I cannot understand it. Can you explain it to me?

Torrey read the note from the platform and replied, "It is very easy to explain it. This man thinks that because he has been a consistent church member for thirty years, a faithful Sunday School Superintendent for twenty-five years, and an elder in the church for twenty years, that God is under obligation to answer his prayer. He is really praying in his own name, and God will not hear our prayers when we approach him in that way."

After Torrey had finished speaking, a man came up to him and admitted that he had written the note. He said, "You have hit the nail square on the head. I see my mistake."

Many people make that mistake. But even in the area of Christian service we need to see that God cannot be put in our debt by anything you or I do. "Who has ever given to God, that God should repay him?" The answer is: No one, not even the most dedicated, most self-sacrificing, most consistent, most devout, most exemplary Christian. Nothing flows to us from God because of debt. A great deal comes to us, but it is all of grace, and grace is a different category entirely.

Living by Grace

So let's talk about grace again. As soon as we abandon any thought of bringing God down to our level so he becomes answerable to our ideas of what is wise or just, and when we give up thoughts of earning anything from him by our service, we are ready to live the Christian life as he has planned it for us and can discover what living by grace is.

It starts with humility, as we have seen several times already in these studies: humility before God, who is infinitely great, but also humility in terms of our own weak service. We remember that Jesus said, "Suppose one of you had a servant plowing or looking after the sheep. Would he say to the servant when he comes in from the field, 'Come along now and sit down to eat'? Would he not rather say, 'Prepare my supper, get yourself ready and wait on me while I eat and drink; after that you may eat and drink'? Would he thank the servant because he did what he was told to do? So you also, when you have done everything you were told to do, should say, 'We are unworthy servants, we have only done our duty'" (Luke 17:7-10).

We will never get anywhere unless we remember the primary relationships of Creator to creature and Master to servant.

But that is not all that can be said, of course, for we also remember that Jesus told his disciples, "I no longer call you servants, because a servant does not know his master's business. Instead, I have called you friends..." (John 15:15). "You are my friends if you do what I command" (v. 14). God owes us nothing. All is of grace. But God, for the sake of his own good pleasure, has rescued us from our sin and has raised us from the status of mere servants to being sons and daughters of God, co-workers with Jesus Christ and heirs of all God is and has. That leads to thanksgiving and also to love for the one who has been so gracious to us.

And one more thing: It leads to service. For although we cannot put God in our debt by our contributions to his knowledge or wisdom or ideas about how things should run or even by our Christian service, as soon as we realize this and understand that we cannot earn God's favor but receive it by grace alone, that truth propels us to service. For what we most want to do when we understand that is to live for God's glory, which is what the start of the next chapter in Romans is about. It is where we will pick up in the next volume of this series: "Therefore, I urge you, brothers, in view of God's mercy, to offer your bodies as living sacrifices, holy and pleasing to God—this is your spiritual act of worship. Do not conform any longer to the pattern of this world, but be transformed by the renewing of your mind. Then you will be able to test and approve what God's will is—his good, pleasing and perfect will" (Rom. 12:1-2).

Let me say it again: God is not obliged to give you anything. Yet he gives you everything, if you will receive it in Christ. The great wonder is that the people who know this, who know they cannot give God anything that he has not first given them, nevertheless give him everything.

Chapter 178.
A Christian World-View

Romans 11:36

One thing we have a lot of today is buzz words. "Buzz word" is itself a buzz word. But there are also buzz words in psychology (Freudian slip, guilt complex); politics (Reaganomics, sound bytes, a thousand points of light); education (political correctness); computer technology (input, down time); and business (bottom line, bullish or bearish, and market driven). One of my favorites is "paradigm shift." A paradigm is a complete model or pattern, originally referring to a list of all the inflectional forms of a verb or noun, showing its complete conjugation or declension. A paradigm shift is a total reordering of how one looks at or evaluates something.

If you love someone and then for some reason cease to love that person and begin to hate him or her instead, that is a paradigm shift. If you began as a communist, as the leaders of the Eastern Bloc countries all originally did, and then become a capitalist, that is a paradigm shift of great proportions.

What is the greatest of all paradigm shifts? The greatest paradigm shift is the one that takes place when a person becomes a Christian—or at least that is when it begins to take place. In our unsaved, unregenerate state, everything revolves around ourselves. We are the measure of all things. Everything in the universe is for us and for our glory. When we become Christians, we see that the world and all that is in it is actually from God, is governed by him, and exists for his glory. It is what the last verse of Romans 11 expresses when it says of God, "For from him and through him and to him are all things. To him be the glory forever! Amen."

Let me do something unusual here. Let me give a second introduction to this study. It is in the form of a trivia question: What was the last song recorded by the Beatles before their breakup in the seventies? Answer: "I, Me, Mine." That "last song" is actually the first song as well as the last song of the unregenerate heart. But—in significant and radical contrast—the song of the redeemed is Romans 11:36.

Secular Humanism Is Not New

If we think that the universe revolves around ourselves or that we are the only valid measure of all that is, we are "secular humanists." That is a buzz word, too, of course. It is particularly popular with fundamentalists and television preachers, who speak of secular humanism as if it were the unique and particularly dangerous enemy of our time. But it is not new at all. In fact, it is the ancient, natural inclination of the unsaved mind and heart.

I have always thought that the very best statement of secular humanism is to be found in the Bible, in the Book of Daniel. Nebuchadnezzar was king in Babylon at this time. One day, when he was walking on the roof of his royal palace he looked out over the great capital city of his empire and took unto himself all the glory for its existence. He said—this is the classic statement I referred to—"Is not this the great Babylon I have built as the royal residence, by my mighty power and for the glory of my majesty?" (Dan. 4:30). Nebuchadnezzar was saying that the great city of Babylon and its empire, which he admired (and desired) more than anything else in the world, was from him (he "built" it), through him ("by my mighty power") and for him ("for the glory of my majesty").

God did not look at it that way, of course. So the next paragraph tells how Nebuchadnezzar was judged by God with insanity and was driven away to live with the wild animals, to look like and behave like them. He was insane for seven years, until he came to his senses both mentally and spiritually, which was God's way of saying that secular humanism is a crazy way of looking at the world.

Anyone who thinks he or she is the center of the universe is spiritually insane. A person who thinks like this is out of his or her mind.

The Regenerate Mind

The regenerate mind is a renewed mind, as Paul is going to make clear at the beginning of the next chapter: "Do not conform any longer to the pattern of this world, but be transformed by the renewing of your mind" (Rom.

12:2a). This mind thinks differently about things. But specifically how? What form does a renewed mind take? Or, to express it differently, what is a genuinely Christian world-view?

Here is an initial statement of what is involved, made by A. W. Tozer in a chapter in The Pursuit of God called "Restoring the Creator-Creature Relation." Tozer says,

The moment we make up our minds that we are going on with this determination to exalt God over all we step out of the world's parade. [I think that is a great expression: "out of the world's parade."] We shall find ourselves out of adjustment to the ways of the world, and increasingly so as we make progress in the holy way. We shall acquire a new viewpoint; a new and different psychology will be formed within us; a new power will begin to surprise us by its upsurgings and its outgoings.

Our break with the world will be the direct outcome of our changed relation to God. For the world of fallen men does not honor God. Millions call themselves by his name, it is true, and pay some token respect to him, but a simple test will show how little he is really honored among them. Let the average man be put to the proof on the question of who is above, and his true position will be exposed. Let me be forced into making a choice between God and money, between God and men, between God and personal ambition, God and self, God and human love, and God will take second place every time. Those other things will be exalted above. However the man may protest, the proof is in the choices he makes day after day throughout life.

"Be thou exalted" is the language of victorious spiritual experience. It is the little key to unlock the door to great treasures of grace.

A Christian World-View Text

Romans 11:36 is what I call a Christian world-view text. That is, it expresses in classic language this altered understanding of who God is and who we are and what we owe to God.

It is not the only verse in Paul's writings that is along these lines, of course. I think also of 1 Corinthians 8:6 ("Yet for us there is but one God, the Father, from whom all things came and for whom we live; and there is but one Lord, Jesus Christ, through whom all things came and through whom we live") or Ephesians 4:4-6 ("There is... one God and Father of all, who is over all and through all and in all") or Colossians 1:16 ("For by him all things were created: things in heaven and on earth, visible and invisible, whether thrones or powers or rulers or authorities; all things were created by him and for him"). Yet Romans 11:36 stands out from these other verses as a particularly succinct statement of the Christian outlook: "For from him and through him and to him are all things. To him be the glory forever! Amen."

There are two areas in which we specifically need to think through what this means.

1. God and creation. We think of the creation first because of the words "all things"—"For from him and through him and to him are all things." "All things" means "all that is," the entire universe. Romans 11:36 teaches that everything in the universe is from God; it has come into existence and is then sustained through God's creative power, and it is for God's glory. John Murray unfolds the meaning of the verse like this: God "is the source of all things in that they have proceeded from him; he is the Creator. He is the agent through whom all things subsist and are directed to their proper end. And he is the last end to whose glory all things will redound."

There was a time when God was alone. In that time before all time, when even space did not exist, God, the great "I am," existed and was as perfect, glorious, and blessed in his eternal existence as he is now. Before there was a sun, the Triune God—Father, Son, and Holy Spirit—dwelt in light ineffable. Before there was an earth on which to rest it, the throne of God stood firm. If that great God, dwelling in perfect solitude, chose to create anything at all, whether the universe of which we are a part or any other possible universe, it is clear that the conception of it and plans for it must have come from him, since there was no other from whom they could have come.

But it is not only the plan that has come from God. The actualization of the plan was through him as well. That is, he is also the Creator and then the Sustainer of the universe. When God set out to create the heavens and earth, he did not call for help, since there were none to help him. He did not even make use of existing matter, for matter itself did not exist. God created everything out of nothing. "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth" (Gen. 1:1). That means creation ex nihilo (out of nothing). It is one of the most profound statements ever written, for it is based on the inescapable assumption that if anything exists, then God, the uncaused First Cause, must exist and be the Creator of it all.

For what were the heavens and earth created? That is, what was the purpose of creation? We think of the universe as being made for us. But since God is a purposeful God and planned the universe for an altogether wise and noble purpose before any of us existed, even in his own mind, it is clear that he could not have taken as his purpose a creature that did not then exist. And that means that his motive must be entirely in himself. Creation must be for his glory.

The text is right when it tells us "to him are all things." And Albert Barnes is right in his Notes on the New Testament when he says, "The reason or end for which all things were formed... is to promote his honor and glory.... It is not to promote his happiness, for he was eternally happy; not to add anything to him, for he is infinite; but that he might act as God, and have the honor and praise that is due to God."

This should humble us since, if we understand it, we will understand that even the ability to dispute with God or, for that matter, to deny his existence comes from him. This is a point that got through to that brilliant English professor C. S. Lewis and led in part to his conversion. Lewis wrote, "In the very act of trying to prove that God did not exist—in other words, that the whole of reality was senseless—I found that I was forced to assume that one part of reality— namely my idea of justice—was full of sense. Consequently atheism turns out to be too simple. If the whole universe has no meaning, we should never have found out that it has no meaning: just as, if there were no light in the universe and therefore no creatures with eyes, we should never know it was dark. "

We could pursue this at greater length, but it should be clear from what I have said how important Romans 11:36 is, when it teaches that the entire universe is from God, through God, and to God. If you have been thinking differently and come at last to think in this biblical way, it will be a paradigm shift of huge proportions.

2. God and the gospel. This is the second area in which we need to think through the meaning of Romans 11:36. Like the first, this is obvious, since it is the gospel of salvation by grace that Paul has been concerned about in this letter, and with this context we cannot miss that the way of salvation is also from God, through God, and for his glory.

It is from him, for he has planned it all. Who else could have planned it? No priest. No rabbi. No shaman. No guru. Only God could have planned a way of salvation that meets the austere requirements of his unyielding justice and yet also justifies sinners. Only God could have planned a salvation that is apart from human merit or good works—it is all of grace—and yet be able to transform those who are saved so they achieve a level of righteousness and produce good works that surpass the righteousness and good works of those who are trying to be saved by them.

Even the timing of salvation is of God. He ordained the precise moment in history when the Savior should be born in Bethlehem (Gal. 4:4). He planned the moments of his appearance to the people, his identification by John the Baptist, his years of teaching and healing, his betrayal, trial, and crucifixion. And God ordained the precise time of the resurrection and of Jesus' ascension into heaven.

The accomplishment of our salvation was through him, that is, through what Jesus Christ has done. Salvation is not achieved through anything you or I have done or can do. We can do nothing. Jesus did it all. We rightly sing:

> There was no other good enough
> To pay the price of sin;
> He only could unlock the gate
> Of heaven and let us in.

Moreover, that plan of salvation is to his glory. To be sure, it also achieves an eternity of blessing for those who are redeemed. We benefit greatly and will praise God forever, thanking him for what he has done for us. But if you understand what Paul has been writing about in Romans 9-11, you will know that our happiness is not God's chief purpose in ordering the plan of salvation as he has. All you have to ask is: "Why are some chosen to be saved while others are passed over? Why are some brought to faith while others are rejected?" The answer is that salvation is for God's glory and that God is glorified in each case. In the case of the elect, the love, mercy, and grace of God are abundantly displayed. In the case of the lost, the patience, power, and wrath of God are equally lifted up.

Give God the Glory

The final thing I want to accomplish in this study is to make Romans 11:36 very personal for you. For it is obvious that if the entire creation is "from him and through him and to him" and if the way of salvation is likewise "from him and through him and to him," then you, as a part of that creation (especially if you are a part of that redeemed creation), are "from him and through him and to him" as well. You also exist for his glory and should give it to him.

Let me start with your natural endowments or talents. Where do they come from? That keen mind, those winsome aspects of personality, that attractive appearance and gracious disposition, that smile that you possess—they all come from God. They have been designed for you by his sovereign decree and imparted to you by his providential working.

But they are for his glory, not for yours. The Corinthians were a particularly vain people, boasting of their individual superiorities to other people. Paul called them arrogant. But he asked them, "Who makes you different from anyone else? What do you have that you did not receive? And if you did receive it, why do you boast as though you did not?" (1 Cor. 4:7).

You are no different. Therefore, glorify God.

Let's move to salvation. We have seen that the plan of salvation was conceived by God, that it was accomplished through the life and death of Jesus Christ, that its ultimate goal is God's glory. If that is so, and it is, you should abandon the arrogant assumption that getting saved was your idea or that it was accomplished by you, even in part, or that it is meant to honor you. It is not for your honor, but for God's glory.

Do you think God saved you because of any righteousness you possess or might one day acquire by your efforts? The Bible says, "He saved us, not because of righteous things we had done, but because of his mercy" (Titus 3:5).

Do you think it was because of some little germ of faith that God was able to find in you but not in some other less deserving person? The Bible says, "It is by grace you have been saved, through faith—and this not from yourselves, it is the gift of God—not by works, so that no one can boast" (Eph. 2:8-9).

Have you had any longings after God? Do you want to pray? Do you find that you want to read God's Word and come to understand it better? Do you seek to worship God? Are you attracted to the company of other Christian people? If those things are true of you, let me ask: Where do you think those desires came from if not from God? They are not from you. You are sinful. In yourself you have no aspirations after God. Holy desires come from a holy God and are present in you through the working of his divine Spirit. They are for his glory.

Therefore, glorify God. Praise him for them.

What about temptation? We live in a world in which sin and evil bombard us and in which we are attacked even by the powers of evil themselves. What keeps you from falling? What is it that enables you to stand your ground against Satan's forces? It is God, God alone. The Bible says, "... God is faithful; he will not let you be tempted beyond what you can bear. But when you are tempted, he will also provide a way out so that you can stand up under it" (1 Cor. 10:13).

It is God who keeps you. Therefore, glorify God.

Finally, I ask you to think about your work, particularly your work for God as a Christian. Perhaps you say, "Surely that at least belongs to me, is achieved by me, and can be for my honor." Really? If in your unsaved state you had no righteousness of your own, understood nothing of spiritual things, and did not seek God (as Romans 3:10-11 tells us), how could you even have had a desire to work for God unless God himself put it there? Our work for God flows from our love of God. But "we love because he first loved us" (1 John 4:19). How can anything be achieved except through God? Even the ability to plan a secular project or the strength to dig a ditch comes from him, since all is from God. If that is true of even secular efforts, how much more true must it be of Christian work? Spiritual work must be accomplished through God's Spirit. So it is not you or I who stir up a revival, build a church, or convert even a single soul. Rather, it is as we work, being led in the work by God, that God himself by the power of his Holy Spirit converts and sanctifies those whom he chooses to call to faith.

Do not take the glory of God to yourself. It is fatal to do that in any work, but especially in Christian work. Instead, glorify God.

I end with these words from Charles Spurgeon:

"To whom be glory forever." This should be the single desire of the Christian.... He may desire to see his family well brought up, but only that "To God may be glory forever." He may wish for prosperity in his business, but only so far as it may help him to promote this—"To whom be glory forever." He may desire to attain more gifts and more graces, but it should only be that "To him may be glory forever."

At my work behind the counter, or in the exchange, let me be looking out to see how I may glorify him. If I be walking in the fields, let my desire be that the trees may clap their hands in his praise.... Never be silent when there are opportunities, and you shall never be silent for want of opportunities. At night fall asleep still praising your God; as you close your eyes let your last thought be, "How sweet to rest upon the Savior's bosom!" In afflictions praise him; out of the fires let your song go up; on the sick-bed extol him; dying, let him have your sweetest notes. Let your shouts of victory in the combat with the last great enemy be all for him; and then when you have burst the bondage of mortality, and come into the freedom of immortal spirits, then, in a nobler, sweeter song, you shall sing unto his praise. Be this, then, your constant thought—"To him be glory forever."

What is the chief end of man? The answer comes from The Westminster Shorter Catechism: "Man's chief end is to glorify God and to enjoy him forever."

Chapter 179.
Soli Deo Gloria

Romans 11:36

The title of this study is not an exact translation of the second half of Romans 11:36, but I have selected it because it is the way the Protestant Reformers expressed what this verse is about and because the words, though in Latin, are well known. Soli Deo Gloria means "To God alone be the glory." Soli Deo—"to God alone." Gloria—"the glory." These words stand virtually as a motto of the Reformation.

The Reformers loved the word solus ("alone").

They wrote about sola Scriptura, which means "Scripture alone." Their concern in using this phrase was with authority, and what they meant to say by it was that the Bible alone is our ultimate authority—not the pope, not the church, not the traditions of the church or church councils, still less personal intimations or subjective feelings, but Scripture only. These other sources of authority are sometimes useful and may at times have a place, but Scripture is ultimate. Therefore, if any of these other authorities differ from Scripture, they are to be judged by the Bible and rejected, rather than the other way around.

The Reformers also talked about sola fide, meaning "faith alone." At this point they were concerned with the purity of the gospel, wanting to say that the believer is justified by God through faith entirely apart from any works he or she may have done or might do. Justification by faith alone became the chief doctrine of the Reformation.

The Reformers also spoke of sola gratia, which means "grace alone." Here they wanted to insist on the truth that sinners have no claim upon God, that God owes them nothing but punishment for their sins, and that, if he saves them in spite of their sins, which he does in the case of the elect, it is only because it pleases him to do so. They taught that salvation is by grace only.

There is a sense in which each of these phrases is contained in the great Latin motto Soli Deo Gloria. In Romans 11:36, it follows the words "for from him and through him and to him are all things," and it is because this is so, because all things really are "from him and through him and to him," that we say, "To God alone be the glory." Do we think about the Scripture? If it is from God, it has come to us through God's agency and it will endure forever to God's glory.
Justification by faith? It is from God, through God, and to God's glory. Grace? Grace, too, has its source in God, comes to us through the work of the Son of God, and is to God's glory.

Many Christian organizations have taken these words as their motto or even as their name. I know of at least one publishing company today that is called Soli Deo Gloria. It is also an appropriate theme with which to end these studies of the third main (and last doctrinal) section of Paul's letter to the Romans. Indeed, what greater theme could there be? For what is true of all things—that they are "from" God, "through" God, and "to" God—is true also of glory. Glory was God's in the beginning, is God's now, and shall be God's forever. So we sing in what is called the Gloria Patri.

Glory be to the Father, and to the Son and to the Holy Ghost;
As it was in the beginning, is now and ever shall be:
World without end. Amen.

Haldane's Revival

At the beginning of this series—in volume 1, chapter 2-177 studies ago, I mentioned a revival that took place in Geneva, Switzerland, under the leadership of a remarkable Scotsman named Robert Haldane (1764-1842). He was one of two brothers who were members of the Scottish aristocracy in the late eighteenth and early-nineteenth centuries. His brother, James Haldane (1768-1851), was a captain with the British East India Company. Robert was the owner of Gleneerie and other estates in Perthshire. When he was converted in the decade before 1800, Robert sold a major part of his lands and applied the proceeds to advancing the cause of Jesus Christ in Europe. James became an evangelist and later an influential pastor in Edinburgh, where he served for fifty-two years.

In the year 1815, Robert Haldane visited Geneva. One day when he was in a park reading his Bible, he got into a discussion with some young men who turned out to be theology students.
They had not the faintest understanding of the gospel, so Haldane invited them to come to his rooms twice a week for Bible study. They studied Romans, and the result of those studies was the great Exposition of Romans by Haldane from which I so often quote.

All those students were converted and in time became leaders in church circles throughout Europe. One was Merle d'Aubigné, who became famous for his classic History of the Reformation in the Sixteenth Century. We know the first part of it as The Life and Times of Martin Luther. Another of these men was Louis Gaussen, author of Theopneustia, a book on the inspiration of the Scriptures. Others were Frédéric Monod, the chief architect and founder of the Free Churches in France; Bonifas, who became an important theologian; and César Malan, another distinguished leader. These men were so influential that the work of which they became a part was known as Haldane's Revival.

What was it that got through to these young men, lifting them out of the deadly liberalism of their day and transforming them into the powerful force they became? The answer is: the theme and wording of the very verses we have been studying, Romans 11:33-36. In other words, a proper understanding of God's sovereignty.

We know this because of a letter from Haldane to Monsieur Cheneviere, a pastor of the Swiss Reformed Church and Professor of Divinity at the University of Geneva. Cheneviere was an Arminian, as were all the Geneva faculty, but Haldane wrote to him to explain how appreciation of the greatness of God alone produced the changes in these men. Here is his explanation:

There was nothing brought under the consideration of the students of divinity who attended me at Geneva which appeared to contribute so effectually to overthrow their false system of religion, founded on philosophy and vain deceit, as the sublime view of the majesty of God presented in the four concluding verses of this part of the epistle: Of him, and through him, and to him, are all things. Here God is described as his own last end in everything that he does. Judging of God as such an one as themselves, they were at first startled at the idea that he must love himself supremely, infinitely more than the whole universe, and consequently must prefer his own glory to everything besides. But when they were reminded that God in reality is infinitely more amiable and more valuable than the whole creation and that consequently, if he views things as they really are, he must regard himself as infinitely worthy of being more valued and loved, they saw that this truth was incontrovertible.

Their attention was at the same time directed to numerous passages of Scripture, which assert that the manifestation of the glory of God is the great end of creation, that he has himself chiefly in view in all his works and dispensations, and that it is a purpose in which he requires that all his intelligent creatures should acquiesce, and seek and promote it as their first and paramount duty.

A testimony like that leads me to suggest that the reason we do not see great periods of revival today is that the glory of God in all things has been largely forgotten by the contemporary church. It follows that we are not likely to see revival again until the truths that exalt and glorify God in salvation are recovered. Surely we cannot expect God to move among us greatly again until we can again truthfully say, "To him [alone] be the glory forever! Amen."

To Him Be the Glory

Romans 11:36 is the first doxology in the letter. But it is followed by another at the end, which is like it, though more complete: "To the only wise God be glory forever through Jesus Christ! Amen" (Rom. 16:27). It is significant that both doxologies speak of the glory of God, and that forever. Here are two questions to help us understand them.

1. Who is to be glorified?

The answer is: the sovereign God. For the most part, we start with man and man's needs. But Paul always started with God, and he ended with him, too. In fact, the letter to the Romans is so clearly focused on God that it can be outlined accurately in these terms. Donald Grey Barnhouse published ten volumes on Romans, and he reflected Paul's focus in the titles for these ten volumes, all but the first of which has God in the title. Volume one was Man's Ruin. But then came God's Wrath, God's Remedy, God's River, God's Grace, God's Freedom, God's

Heirs, God's Covenants, God's Discipline, and God's Glory. We say with Paul, "To God be the glory forever! Amen."

2. Why should God be glorified?

The answer is that "from him and through him and to him are all things," particularly the work of salvation. Why is man saved? It is not because of anything in men and women themselves but because of God's grace. It is because God has elected us to it. God has predestinated his elect people to salvation from before the foundation of the world. How is man saved? The answer is by the redeeming work of the Lord Jesus, the very Son of God. We could not save ourselves, but God saved us through the vicarious, atoning death of Jesus Christ. By what power are we brought to faith in Jesus? The answer is by the power of the Holy Spirit through what theologians call effectual calling. God's call quickens us to new life. How can we become holy? Holiness is not something that originates in us, is achieved by us, or is sustained by us. It is due to God's joining us to Jesus so that we have become different persons than we were before he did it. We have died to sin and been made alive to righteousness. Now there is no direction for us to go in the Christian life but forward. Where are we headed? Answer: to heaven, because Jesus is preparing a place in heaven for us. How can we be sure of arriving there? It is because God, who began the work of our salvation, will continue it until we do. God never begins a work that he does not eventually bring to a happy and complete conclusion.

"To him be the glory forever! Amen."

The great Charles Hodge says of the verse we are studying;

Such is the appropriate conclusion of the doctrinal portion of this wonderful epistle, in which more fully and clearly than in any other portion of the Word of God, the plan of salvation is presented and defended. Here are the doctrines of grace, doctrines on which the pious in all ages and nations have rested their hopes of heaven, though they may have had comparatively obscure intimations of their nature. The leading principle of all is that God is the source of all good, that in fallen man there is neither merit nor ability, that salvation, consequently, is all of grace, as well satisfaction as pardon, as well election as eternal glory. For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things; to whom be glory forever. Amen.

So let us give God the glory, remembering that God himself says:

> I am the LORD; that is my name! I will not give my glory to another or my praise to idols.
>
> Isaiah 42:8 and
>
> For my own sake, for my own sake, I do this.
> How can I let myself be defamed?
> I will not yield my glory to another.
>
> Isaiah 48:11

People Who Give God Glory

What of the objections? What of those who object to the many imagined bad results of such God-directed teaching? Won't people become immoral, since salvation, by this theory, is by grace rather than by works? Won't they lose the power of making choices and abandon all sense of responsibility before God and other people? Won't people cease to work for worthwhile goals and quit all useful activity? Isn't a philosophy that tries to glorify God in all things a catastrophe?

A number of years ago, Roger R. Nicole, professor of systematic theology at Gordon-Conwell Divinity School in South Hamilton, Massachusetts, and now at Reformed Theological Seminary in Orlando, Florida, answered such objections in a classic address for the Philadelphia Conference on Reformed Theology (1976), basing his words on an earlier remarkable address by Emile Doumergue, a pastor who for many years was dean of an evangelical seminary in southern France. Nicole's address was likewise titled "Soli Deo Gloria." The quotations below are from his answers to three important questions.

1. Doesn't belief in the sovereignty of God encourage evil by setting people free from restraints? Doesn't it make morality impossible?

"I suppose one could proceed to discuss this in a theological manner—to examine arguments, consider objections, and line up points in an orderly disposition. I would like, however, instead of going into a theological discussion, to challenge you in terms of an historical consideration. In the Reformation, there was a group of men who made precisely these assertions. Over against the prevailing current, they said that man is radically corrupt and is therefore totally unable by himself to please God. He is incapable of gathering any merits, let alone merit for others. But did these assertions damage morality? Were these people a group of scoundrels who satisfied their own sinful cravings under the pretense of giving glory to God? One does not need to be very versed in church history to know that this was not so. There were at that time thefts, murders, unjust wars. Even within the church there was a heinous and shameful trafficking of sacred positions.

"But what happened?

"These people, who believed that man is corrupt and that only God can help him, came forward like a breath of fresh air. They brought in a new recognition of the rights of God and of his claim upon the lives of men. They brought in new chastity, new honesty, new unselfishness, new humbleness, and a new concern for others. "Honest like the Huguenots," they used to say.... Immorality was not promoted; it was checked by the recognition of the sovereignty of God.

"That is impossible,' some say. Yet it happened."

2. Doesn't belief in the sovereignty of God eliminate man's sense of responsibility and destroy human freedom? Doesn't it destroy potential?

"Again, rather than going into the arguments of the matter, let us merely examine what happened in the sixteenth century when the sovereignty of God was asserted. Did the people involved allow themselves to be robbed of all initiative? Were they reduced to slavery under the power of God? Not at all! On the contrary, they were keenly aware of their responsibility. They had the sense that for everything they were doing, saying and thinking they were accountable to God. They lived their lives in the presence of God, and in the process they were pioneers in establishing and safe-guarding precious liberties—liberty of speech, religion and expression—all of which are at the foundation of the liberties we cherish in the democratic world.

"Far from eclipsing their sense of freedom, the true proclamation of the sovereignty of God moved them toward the recognition and expression of all kinds of human freedoms which God has himself provided for those whom he has created and redeemed.

"'It is impossible that this should happen,' we are told. Perhaps! But it happened."

3. Doesn't commitment to God's sovereignty undercut strenuous human activity? Doesn't it make people passive?

"We may make an appeal to history. What did these people—Calvin, Farel, Knox, Luther—what did they do? Were they people who reclined on a soft couch, saying, 'If God is pleased to do something in Geneva, let him do it. I will not get in his way'? Or, 'If God wants to have some theses nailed to the door of the chapel of Wittenberg Castle, let him take the hammer. I will not interfere'? You know very well that this is not so. These were not people lax in activity. They were not lazy. Calvin may be accused of many things, but one thing he has seldom been accused of is laziness. No, when the sovereignty of God is recognized, meaningfulness comes to human activity. Then, instead of seeing our efforts as the puny movements of insignificant people unable to resist the enormous momentum of a universe so much larger than ourselves, we see our activity in the perspective of a sovereign plan in which even small and insignificant details may be very important. Far from undermining activity, the doctrine of the sovereignty of God has been a strong incentive for labor, devotion, evangelism and missions.

"'Impossible!' Yet it happened."

God's Blessings for Our World

Nicole continues: "In the first century the world was in a frightful condition. One does not need to be a great authority on Roman history to know that. There were signs of the breakdown of the Roman Empire —rampant hedonism and a dissolution of morals. But at that point God was pleased to send into the world that great preacher of the sovereignty of God, the apostle Paul, and this introduced a brand new principle into the total structure. The preaching of Paul did not avert the collapse of the Roman Empire, but it postponed it. Moreover, it permitted the creation of a body of believers that persisted through the terrible invasions of the barbarian hordes, and even through the Dark Ages....

"In the sixteenth century... the church had succumbed to deep corruption. It was corrupt 'in its head and members.' In many ways it was a cesspool of iniquity. People did not know how to remedy the situation. They tried councils, internal purges, monastic orders. None of these things seemed to work. But God again raised up to his glory men who proclaimed the truth of his sovereignty, the truth of God's grace. In proclaiming this truth they brought a multitude of the children of God into a new sense of their dependence upon and relationship to Christ. In proclaiming this truth they benefited even the very people who opposed them in the tradition of the church. They are small, these men of the Reformation. They had little money, little power and little influence. One was a portly little monk in Germany. Another was a frail little professor in Geneva. A third was a ruddy but lowly little man in Scotland. What could they do? In themselves, nothing. But by the power of God they shook the world.

> Radically corrupted, but sovereignly purified! Radically enslaved, but sovereignly emancipated! Radically unable, but sovereignly empowered!

"These men were the blessing of God for our world.

"To God alone be glory!" To those who do not know God that is perhaps the most foolish of all statements. But to those who do know

God, to those who are being saved, it is not only a right statement, it is a happy, wise, true, inescapable, and highly desirable confession. It is our glory to make it. "To him be the glory forever! Amen."

Preface

It is always deeply satisfying to come to the end of an important task, especially one that has taken a long time, as these expositions of Paul's letter to the Romans have for me. I began teaching through the Book of Romans in the fall of 1986 and worked on these studies as the major part of my weekly preaching ministry at Tenth Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia for the next eight years. Two years of preaching have gone into each of the four volumes of the series.

But it is not only a sense of satisfaction I feel as I come to the close of this work. I have a deep gratitude to God for allowing me to finish such an important and lengthy exposition, and also anticipation of what God may be pleased to accomplish through it in the lives of those who will be helped into the great doctrines of the Epistle by this gateway.

We live in mindless times, a point I make extensively in the studies dealing with Romans 12:1-2. This is because of the fast pace of modern life, which does not give people sufficient time to think; our materialism, which binds us to things rather than freeing our minds for ideas; skepticism in philosophy, which tells us that there is nothing to be gained by thinking anyway; and above all the pervasiveness of television, which is destructive to rational thought processes. But we need to think! And we need to think biblically! This is why the last section of Paul's letter (chapters 12-16), dealing with the application of the gospel treated in earlier chapters to various aspects of our lives, begins with the need for mind renewal. Paul knew that if we are to act as Christians we must first learn to think as Christians, since how we think will determine what we do.

In our day people do not think deeply and seldom think about the truths of Christianity. Unbelievers move through life in a spiritual daze unaware that they have precious but impoverished and dying souls. Believers are often in a daze too. There is very little measurable difference in thought and action between believers and their unbelieving counterparts. One observer of the contemporary scene says that God lies weightlessly upon them and that Christian doctrines seem to have no consequences.

If a study of this nature helps people begin thinking about the great doctrines of Christianity and what they should mean for the living of our daily lives, then the benefit to them, their families, and their churches could be enormous. It is certainly what Paul intended when he wrote these chapters.

Think of what Paul covers in this application section. He writes about the need for mind renewal in 12:1-2; the Christian's relationship to other people, especially the need for love, in 12:3-21; issues involving the role of the state and a believer's relationship to it in 13:1-7; the law of love in 13:8-14; and Christian liberty, particularly how those who think they are theologically and spiritually strong are to treat their "weaker" brothers, in 14:1-15:33. Then there are closing sections dealing with Paul's plans for future ministry in 15:14-33, and final greetings from Christians in the church at Corinth to Christians in the church at Rome in 16:1-27.

It would make a tremendous difference to the lives of our churches and the impact of Christians on our world if we would just master and live by these teachings.

In each of my books I thank the elders and congregation of Tenth Presbyterian Church who encourage me to spend so much of my time in sermon preparation. Not all ministers have an inclination to study, nor are they encouraged by their congregations to spend substantial time doing it. I have had the benefit of this encouragement and have tried to take advantage of the time given. I believe this has been beneficial to the church, and I know has been beneficial to me.

Twice in the last two sections of Romans Paul writes that the goal of all things must be the glory of God. At the end of chapter eleven he says, "For from him and through him and to him are all things. To him be the glory forever! Amen" (Rom. 11:36). At the end of chapter 16 he likewise declares, "To the only wise God be glory forever through Jesus Christ! Amen" (Rom. 16:27). That is the purpose of all things, and it was Paul's deepest desire that everything he did and every thought he had might be to the glory of the great, sovereign, wise, holy, and compassionate God who had saved him through the gospel of his Son, Jesus Christ.

That is my desire too. And it is my special desire for this specific attempt to teach Romans. May God bless it to many people now and for many years to come. May it help them to come to know him better and obey him. To God alone be the glory.

Part Sixteen. Applied Christianity

Chapter 180.
How Should We Then Live?

Romans 12:1-2

With the start of chapter 12 we come in our study of Paul's letter to the practical section of the book. I am sure it is a point for which many readers have been eagerly waiting, since ours is a practical age and most people want practical teaching. But I begin by saying that I do not like this way of talking about the material in chapters 12-16. This is because to call these chapters practical suggests that the doctrinal sections are not practical, and whenever we find ourselves thinking along those lines we are making a mistake and contributing to great misunderstanding.

Doctrine is practical, and practical material must be doctrinal if it is to be of any help at all. A far better way to talk about Romans 12-16 is to say that these chapters contain applications of the very practical teaching Paul presented earlier.

John Murray, one of the best modern interpreters of Romans, uses the word application in his introduction to this section of the book. He says, "At this point the apostle comes to deal with concrete practical application."

Perhaps an even better word is consequences. It occurs to me because of the compelling slogan of the Hillsdale College newsletter, Imprimis: "Because Ideas Have Consequences." We have had lots of ideas in the first great sections of Romans—truthful ideas, stirring ideas, ideas that have come to us by means of an inerrant and authoritative revelation. Now we are to explore their many important consequences.

Whose Values? And Why?

Let me make this point still another way by saying that this is the significance of the word then in the title of Francis Schaeffer's well-known study of the rise and fall of western culture, How Should We Then Live? Schaeffer had a gift for using words well, and this is nowhere seen more clearly than in this book's title. Then is a very simple word. We hardly think twice about our use of it. But when you reflect on the word in How Should We Then Live? it is clear at once that it is the most important word. Suppose the book were called How Should We Live? There would be nothing remarkable about that. How should we live? is a common question. It's not much different from asking, What shall we do today? or Where shall we have dinner tonight? But put then into the title, and the question becomes, How shall we live in light of the fact that God has redeemed us from sin's penalty by the death of Jesus Christ and freed us from sin's tyranny by the power of the Holy Spirit?

Schaeffer is very clear about where he thinks Western culture is headed. He looks at such current trends as increasing economic breakdown, violence in all areas of life and all countries, extreme poverty for many of the Third World's peoples, a love of affluence, and the underlying relativism of Western thought. He concludes that the choice before us is either totalitarianism—an imposed but arbitrary social order—or "once again affirming that base which gave freedom without chaos in the first place—God's revelation in the Bible and his revelation through Christ."

Schaeffer's point is that those who have received this revelation must also act upon it, because that is the very nature of the revelation. It demands application. Writes Schaeffer, "As Christians we are not only to know the right world view, the world view that tells us the truth of what is, but consciously to act upon that world view so as to influence society in all its parts and facets across the whole spectrum of life, as much as we can to the extent of our individual and collective ability."

We are hearing a great deal about "family values" today, particularly in popular political campaigns. It was a Republican theme in the 1992 campaign, because the Republicans were using it to question Bill Clinton's morality. I believe in family values. I also supported Dan Quayle in what he said about them in that campaign. I think he wanted the right thing. But I must add that in the current political climate an appeal to "family values" without a corresponding acknowledgment of God's existence, God's law, and biblical revelation as a basis for all values will always have a hollow ring and sound purely political and manipulative.

Unless we acknowledge God and God's saving acts as the source and basis for our values, anyone who thinks clearly may refute our concern with such questions as these: What kind of family values are we talking about? A nuclear family? A single-parent family? A homosexual family? Why should any one be preferred above another? Or why should we want families at all? In other words, the call for values always invites these rejoinders: Whose values are we taking about? and Why those?

During a meeting of college educators at Harvard University in 1987, President Frank Rhodes of Cornell University suggested in an address on educational reforms that it was time for the universities to pay attention to values and the students' "moral well-being."

At once there were gasps from the audience, and one student jumped to his feet, demanding indignantly, "Whose values are to be taught? And who is to teach us?" The audience applauded loudly, which meant that in its judgment the student had rendered the president's suggestion foolish by these unanswerable questions.

President Rhodes sat down without even trying to answer them.

A generation or so ago, it would have been natural for an educator to at least point to the accumulated wisdom of more than two millennia of Western history—to the writings of philosophers like Plato, Socrates, and Aristotle and to historians and modern thinkers, even if not to the Bible, though many would have included it as well. It is for a return to precisely this type of education that Allan Bloom called so eloquently in his book The Closing of the American Mind. But all this has been forfeited today, as President Rhodes's capitulation showed. And it is not just that times have changed or that people today are skeptical. The problem is that without the absolutes provided by God's revelation of himself and his ways, all views are relative and there is no real reason for doing one thing rather than another—except for selfish, personal reasons, which obviously destroy morality rather than establish it. In other words, our days have become like the times of the Jewish judges when there was no king, the law was forgotten and, as a result, "everyone did as he [or she] saw fit" (Judg. 21:25).

If revelation is the basis for social morality and ethics, then it is impossible to have valid, effective or lasting morals without it. We must have Romans 1-11 in order to have Romans 1216.

John Calvin spoke about this at the start of his lectures on Romans 12, only he was comparing Christianity and philosophy. He said, "This is the main difference between the Gospel and philosophy. Although the philosophers speak on the subject of morals splendidly and with praiseworthy ability, yet all the embellishment which shines forth in their precepts is nothing more than a beautiful superstructure without a foundation, for by omitting principles, they propound a mutilated doctrine, like a body without a head.... Paul [in Romans 12:1-2] lays down the principle from which all the parts of holiness flow."

"Therefore"

Above I commented on Francis Schaeffer's How Should We Then Live?, saying that then is the all-important word. When we come to the first verse of Romans 12 we discover exactly the same thing, only in this case the important word is therefore. "Therefore, I urge you, brothers, in view of God's mercy, to offer your bodies as living sacrifices." Paul means, "In view of what I have just been writing, you must not live for yourselves but rather give yourselves wholly to God."

I am sure you have heard some teacher say at one time or another that when you come to the word "therefore" in the Bible you should always pay close attention to it, because it is "there for" a purpose. Therefore always points back to something else, and this means that we can never understand the importance of what is coming or the connection between what is coming and what has been said until we know exactly what the "therefore" is referring to. We have already had to think this through several times in our study of Romans, because a couple of important therefores have already occurred: in 2:1, basing the condemnation of the allegedly moral person on the failure of the entire race as described in Romans 1; and in 5:1, linking the permanence of God's saving work as expounded in Romans 5-8 to the nature of that work as described in Romans 3 and 4.

These earlier therefores were important, but the therefore of 12:1 is more significant still.

What does the therefore of Romans 12:1 refer to? The immediately preceding verses, the doxology that ends Romans 11? The whole of the eleventh chapter, in which Paul explains the wisdom of God's saving acts in history and argues for the eventual restoration of Israel? Chapter 8, with its stirring assertion that nothing in heaven or earth will be able to separate us from the love of God in Christ Jesus? Or, to go back even further, the doctrine of justification by faith expounded in chapters 1-4?

There have been able defenders of each of these views, and with reason. Each can be defended by good arguments.

One summer, after I had been teaching the Book of Romans to a group of teaching leaders from Bible Study Fellowship, I received a letter in which a woman thanked me for the series and explained how she had come to understand the importance of God's grace in election for the first time. She wrote that for years she had considered election strange and dangerous but that her eyes had been opened. She wrote, "Not only was my mind opened, my heart was touched. The tears were impossible to restrict several times as I realized what a privileged and totally undeserving recipient of his grace I am. I can hardly believe what a gift I have received from him. It truly brings me to say, 'Yes, yes, yes' to Romans 12:1-2. It's the very least and only rational thing we can do in light of God's unimaginable gift."

This woman was moved by the doctrine of election, which is taught in Romans 9-11. But the answer to what the therefore of Romans 12:1 refers is probably everything in Romans that precedes it.

Charles Hodge summarizes this way: "All the doctrines of justification, grace, election, and final salvation, taught in the preceding part of the epistle, are made the foundation for the practical duties enjoined in this."

This is Paul's normal pattern in his letters, of course. In the Book of Ephesians the first three doctrinal chapters are followed by three chapters dealing with spiritual gifts, morality, personal relationships, and spiritual warfare. In Galatians the doctrinal section in chapters 3 and 4 is followed in chapters 5 and 6 by material on Christian liberty, spiritual fruit, love, and the obligation to do good. In Colossians the doctrinal material is in 1:1-2:5. The application is in 2:54:18. The same pattern occurs in 1 and 2 Thessalonians. It is also in 1 and 2 Corinthians and Philippians, though it is not so apparent in those books. (Strikingly, this does not seem to be the case with the other New Testament writers, such as Peter and John. It seems to have been unique to Paul.)

Leon Morris says, "It is fundamental to [Paul] that the justified man does not live in the same way as the unrepentant sinner."

Outline of Chapters 12-16

Therefore is a linking word, as I have said. We have looked back to what it refers to. Now we should look forward to see what the doctrinal material of chapters 1-11 connects with. In this fourth volume of studies I am handling it in seven sections.

1. Applied Christianity (12:1-2). Just as God is the basis of reality so that everything flows from him and takes its form from him ("For from him and through him and to him are all things," Rom. 11:36), so also our relationship to God is the basis of all other relationships and our duty to him the basis of all other duties. Because this is so, Paul sets out the principles that should govern our relationship to God in verses 1 and 2. He reminds us that we are not our own and that we should therefore present ourselves to God as willing and living sacrifices.

2. The Christian and other people (12:3-21). There are three basic areas of application for the gospel, and they each involve relationships. The first two verses have outlined the right relationship of a Christian to God. The remainder of the chapter shows us: (1) the right relationship of a Christian to himself (he is not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think, but rather to be humble) and (2) the right relationship of a Christian to other people. The first is treated briefly, in verse 3. The second is dealt with at greater length, in verses 4-21.

3. Church and state (13:1-7). The Christian does not have a relationship only to other individuals, however. He also has a relationship to institutions, particularly the state. What is the believer's relationship to the state to be? Is he to oppose it as an incorrigibly secular and godless entity? Is he to try to escape from it? Should the Christian submit to it? If we are to submit, is that submission to be without any qualification, regardless of what the state may do or ask us to do? Or are there limits? If there are limits, what are they? We know from history that these became very important matters for the early Christians, especially in the years when the emperors persecuted them, trying to abolish Christianity.

Paul answers many of these questions in the first half of chapter 13, providing a strong case for the validity and worth of secular governments.

4. The law of love (13:8-14). Jesus said that the sum of morality is this: (1) that we love God with all our hearts, minds, souls, and strength and (2) that we love our neighbor as ourselves (cf. Matt. 22:34-40). Paul, who seems to reflect the explicit teaching of Jesus many times in these chapters, unfolds what that means in this section.

5. Christian liberty (14:1-15:13). The longest part of these final chapters concerns Christian liberty. At first glance this seems surprising, given the many great personal, social, and cultural problems that existed in Paul's day as well as our own. Why did Paul not condemn slavery, develop a Christian view of economics, or comment on war? We cannot know with certainty why Paul chose to ignore these matters and address others, but his decision to deal with personal liberty at least indicates how important this matter was for him. He does not allow Christians to disobey God's moral law, and he offers no low standard of ethics. The standard is the highest: the yielding of our entire selves to God as living sacrifices. But Paul was nevertheless firmly opposed to one group of Christians imposing extrabiblical (or nonbiblical) standards on other Christians.

The fact that Paul wrote the entire letter to the Galatians to defend the believer's liberty shows how strongly he felt about this. His advice to the Galatians was to "stand firm" in the liberty Christ has given us and not to be "burdened again by a yoke of slavery" (Gal. 5:1).

6. Paul's personal ministry and plans (15:14-33). Having discussed the believer's personal liberty, Paul drops his ethical counsel and writes of his future plans. In these verses he picks up on matters he introduced at the start of the letter, explaining that he wants to come to Rome, why he has been hindered in coming earlier, and what he hopes to receive from the Romans when he does get to them.

7. Final greetings (16:1-27). The last chapter of the book is often overlooked as little more than a list of names, but it is more important than that. The names in this chapter reveal much about the churches in Rome and Corinth and show how involved Paul was with the individuals who made up these early Christian communities. They show that Paul himself practiced the concern for others that he has been urging all along.

The New Humanity

As we plunge into the great forest of these remaining chapters we shall be looking very closely at the trees. But in this study we have been doing something equally valuable. We have been looking at the forest, and the bottom line of our study is that truth is a whole. Since we are talking about God's saving work for us, this means that everything God has done for us in salvation has bearing on everything we should do, on all of life. We must be different people because God has saved us from our sins.

And Christians are different. A number of years ago the Gallup Poll organization devised a scale to sort out those for whom religion seemed to be important and find out if it made any difference in their lives. America claims to be a very religious country, but the nation is increasingly immoral. Gallup wanted to know if serious religion made a difference for those who considered themselves to be "highly spiritually motivated" or committed.

He found that 12.5 percent of Americans are in this category, one person in eight. And he found that they really are different, so much so that he called them "a breed apart." He found that these people differed from the rest of the population in at least four key areas:

1. They are more satisfied with their lot in life. They are happier. Sixty-eight percent say they are "very happy" as compared with only 30 percent of those who are uncommitted.
2. Their families are stronger. The divorce rate among this group is far lower than among the less committed.
3. They tend to be more tolerant of persons of different races and religions. This is exactly opposite from what the media suggest when dealing with religion or religious leaders.
4. They are more involved in charitable activities than are their counterparts. A total of 46 percent of the highly spiritually > committed say they are presently working among the poor, the infirm, and the elderly, compared to only 36 percent among the moderately committed, 28 percent among the moderately uncommitted, and 22 percent among the highly uncommitted.

True conversion makes a difference in a person's life. If there are no differences, there is no genuine conversion. These differences are explained in the remaining chapters of this letter. Laws in themselves change little. Changed people change everything. And the only thing that ever really changes people is God himself through the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. If you have been called to faith in Jesus Christ, you are part of a radically changed community, the new humanity. It is your privilege to begin to make changes in our world.

Chapter 181.
Dying, We Live

Romans 12:1

I do not like the word paradox used in reference to Christian teachings, because to most people the word refers to something that is self-contradictory or false. Christianity is not false. But the dictionary also defines paradox as a statement that seems to be contradictory yet may be true in fact, and in that sense there are paradoxes in Christianity. The most obvious is the doctrine of the Trinity. We speak of one God, but we also say that God exists in three persons: God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Spirit. We know the doctrine of the Trinity is true because God has revealed it to be true, but we are foolish if we think we can understand or explain it fully.

One of the great paradoxes of Christianity concerns the Christian life: We must die in order to live. We find this teaching many places in the Bible, particularly in the New Testament, but the basic, foundational statement is by Jesus, who said, "If anyone would come after me, he must deny himself and take up his cross daily and follow me. For whoever wants to save his life will lose it, but whoever loses his life for me will save it" (Luke 9:23-24).

It was these words that inspired this well-known prayer of Saint Francis of Assisi:

> O Divine Master, grant that I may not so much
> Seek to be consoled as to console,
> To be understood as to understand,
> To be loved as to love.
> For it is by giving that we receive.
> It is in pardoning that we are pardoned,
> And it is by dying that we are born to eternal life.

I would not vouch for the theology implied in each of those impassioned sentences, but as a statement of principles governing the Christian life they are helpful.

More important, they are an expression of what Paul sets down at the start of Romans 12 as a first principle for learning to live the Christian life—self-sacrifice. "Therefore, I urge you, brothers, in view of God's mercy, to offer your bodies as living sacrifices, holy and pleasing to God—this is your spiritual act of worship." In Paul's culture a sacrifice was always an animal that was presented to a priest to be killed. So Paul is saying by this striking metaphor that the Christian life begins by offering ourselves to God for death. The paradox is that by offering ourselves to God we are enabled to live for him.

Therefore, it is by dying that we are enabled to live, period. For as Jesus said, trying to live, if it is living for ourselves, is actually death, while dying to self is actually the way to full living. What should we call this paradox? I call it "life-by-dying" or, as I have titled this study, "Dying, We Live."

Bought at a Price

This principle is so foundational to the doctrine of the Christian life that we must be very careful to lay it out correctly. After that we will go on to look at (1) the specific nature of this sacrifice, that it is an offering of our bodies presented to God as something holy and pleasing to him and (2) the specific motive for this sacrifice—why we should make it.

The first truth of this foundational teaching is that we are not our own but rather belong to Jesus, if we are truly Christians. Here is the way Paul puts it in 1 Corinthians: "Do you not know that your body is a temple of the Holy Spirit, who is in you, whom you have received from God? You are not your own; you were bought at a price" (1 Cor. 6:19-20). Again, just a chapter later, he says: "You were bought at a price; do not become slaves of men" (1 Cor. 7:23). Then, if we ask what that price is, well, the apostle Peter tells us in his first letter: "You know that it was not with perishable things such as silver and gold that you were redeemed from the empty way of life handed down to you from your forefathers, but with the precious blood of Christ, a lamb without blemish or defect" (1 Peter 1:18-19).

In that passage Peter uses the important word redemption, which means to buy back or to be bought again. It is one of the key words for describing what the Lord Jesus Christ accomplished for us by his death on the cross.

Since redemption refers to buying something or someone, the image is of a slave market in which we who are sinners are being offered to whomever will bid the highest price for us. The world is ready to bid, of course, particularly if we are attractive or in some other way seen as valuable. The world bids the world's currency.

It bids fame. Some people sell their souls to be famous; they will do almost anything to become well-known.

It bids wealth. Millions think that making money is the most important thing any person can do; they think that money will buy anything.

It bids power. Masses of people are on a power trip. They will wheel and deal and cheat and even trample on others to get to the top of the pyramid. It bids sex. Many have lost nearly everything of value in life for just a moment's indulgence.

But into the midst of this vast marketplace Jesus comes, and the price he bids to rescue enslaved sinners is his blood. He offers to die for them. God, who controls this auction, says, "Sold to the Lord Jesus Christ for the price of his blood." As a result we become Jesus' purchased possession and must live for him rather than ourselves, as Paul and Peter indicate.

The great preacher and biblical theologian John Calvin said rightly and precisely, "We are redeemed by the Lord for the purpose of consecrating ourselves and all our members to him."

We need to remember that we are in the application section of Romans. Redemption was introduced earlier in the book, in chapter 3 (v. 24). So what we are finding here is an example of the truth that doctrine is practical and that practical material must be doctrinal if it is to be of any help at all. We are dealing with the practical question of "How should we then live?" But the very first thing to be said to explain how we should live is the meaning and implication of redemption. In other words, we cannot have true Christian living without the gospel.

Death to Our Past

Redemption from sin by Christ is not the only doctrine the Christian life of self-sacrifice is built on, however. A second truth is that we have died to the past by becoming new creatures in Christ, if we are truly converted. We studied this teaching in Romans 6, where Paul argued that because we have "died to sin" we are unable to "live in it any longer" (v. 2). Therefore, instead of offering the parts of our bodies "to sin, as instruments of wickedness," as we used to do, we must instead offer ourselves "to God, as those who have been brought from death to life; and... the parts of [our] bodies to him as instruments of righteousness" (Rom. 6:13).

When we studied this passage earlier I pointed out that it does not mean that we have become unresponsive to sin or that we should die to it or that we are dying to it day by day or that we have died to sin's guilt. The verb die is an aorist, which refers to something that has been done once for all. Here it refers to the change that has come about as a result of our being saved. "We died to sin" means that as a result of our union with Jesus Christ by the work of the Holy Spirit we have become new creatures in Christ so that we can never go back to being what we were. We are to start the Christian life with that knowledge. If we cannot go back, then we must go forward.

Let me review this teaching by summarizing what I wrote in my study of Romans 6:11 in volume 2. Dying to sin does not mean:

1. That it is my duty to die to sin.
2. That I am commanded to die to sin.
3. That I am to consider sin as a dead force within me.
4. That I am dead to sin so long as I am gaining mastery over it.
5. That sin in me has been eradicated.
6. That counting myself dead to sin makes me insensitive to it.

What Paul is saying is that we have already died to sin in the sense that we cannot successfully return to our old lives. Therefore, since that is true, we might as well get on with the task of living for the Lord Jesus Christ. We need to forget about sinning and instead present our bodies as "living sacrifices" to God.

Dying to Live

The third foundational teaching for what it means to live by dying is the paradox itself, namely that it is by dying to our own desires in order to serve Christ that we actually learn to live.

It is not difficult to understand what this means. We understand only too well that dying to self means putting personal desires behind us in order to put the desires of God for us and the needs of other people first. We understand the promise too! If we do this, we will experience a full and rewarding life. We will be happy Christians. The problem is not with our understanding. The problem is that we do not believe it, or at least not in regard to ourselves. We think that if we deny ourselves, we will be miserable. Yet this is nothing less than disbelieving God. It is a failure of faith.

So I ask, Who are you willing to believe? Yourself, as reinforced by the world and its way of thinking? Or Jesus Christ?

I say Jesus specifically because I want to remind you of his teaching from the Sermon on the Mount. He speaks there about how to be happy. Indeed, the word is even stronger than that. It is the powerful word blessed, meaning to be favored by God:

> Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.
> Blessed are those who mourn, for they will be comforted.
> Blessed are the meek, for they will inherit the earth.
> Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for righteousness, for they will be filled.
> Blessed are the merciful, for they will be shown mercy.
> Blessed are the pure in heart, for they will see God.
> Blessed are the peacemakers, for they will be called sons of God.
> Blessed are those who are persecuted because of righteousness, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven.
> Matthew 5:3-10

We call these statements the Beatitudes, which means the way to happiness or blessing. But this is not the way the world thinks one finds happiness. If a director of one of today's popular television sitcoms or the editor of a widely circulating fashion magazine were to rewrite the Beatitudes from a contemporary point of view, I suppose they would go like this: "Blessed are the rich, for they can have all they want; blessed are the powerful, for they can control others; blessed are the sexually liberated, for they can fully satisfy themselves; blessed are the famous, because they are envied." Isn't that the world's way, the way even Christians sometimes try to go, rather than the way of sacrifice?

But think it through carefully. The world promises blessings for those who follow these standards. But is this what they find? Do they actually find happiness?

Take for example a person who thinks that the way to happiness is wealth. He sets his heart on earning one hundred thousand dollars. He gets it, but he is not happy. He raises his goal to two hundred thousand dollars. When he gets that he tries to accumulate a million dollars, but still he is not happy. John D. Rockefeller, one of the richest men in the world in his day, was asked on one occasion, "How much money is enough?"

He was honest enough to answer wryly, "Just a little bit more."

A Texas millionaire once said, "I thought money could buy happiness. I have been miserably disillusioned."

Another person thinks that he will find happiness through power, so he goes into politics, where he thinks power lies. He runs in a local election and wins. After that he sets his sight on a congressional seat, then on a place in the Senate. If he is talented enough and the circumstances are favorable, he wants to be president. But power never satisfies. One of the world's great statesmen once told Billy Graham, "I am an old man. Life has lost all meaning. I am ready to take a fateful leap into the unknown."

Still another person tries the path of sexual liberation. She launches into the swinging singles scene, where the average week consists of "happy hours," Friday night parties, weekend overnight escapes into the country, and a rapid exchange of partners. But it does not work. Several years ago CBS did a television documentary on the swinging singles lifestyle in southern California, interviewing about half a dozen women who all said essentially the same thing: "We were told that this was the fun way to live, but all the men want to do is get in bed with you. We have had enough of that to last a lifetime."

Does the world's "me first" philosophy lead to happiness? Is personal indulgence the answer? You do not have to be a genius to see through that facade. It is an empty promise. Paul calls it "a lie" (Rom. 1:25).

So wake up, Christian. And listen to Paul when he pleads, "Therefore, I urge you, brothers, in view of God's mercy, to offer your bodies as living sacrifices, holy and pleasing to God—this is your spiritual act of worship. Do not conform any longer to the pattern of this world, but be transformed by the renewing of your mind. Then you will be able to test and approve what God's will is—his good, pleasing and perfect will" (Rom. 12:1-2).

God does not lie. His word is utterly reliable. You will find his way to be "good, pleasing, and perfect" if you will bend to it.

The Victim and the Priest

That brings us to the fourth and final foundational truth. The first two concerned what God has done for us in redeeming us and joining us to Jesus Christ by the Holy Spirit so that we become new creatures. The third point was the apparent paradox: life by dying. This last point is an urgent appeal for us to offer ourselves as living sacrifices to God. This is not done for us. It is something we must do.

This is the "obedience that comes from faith" that Paul wrote about early in the letter, saying, "Through him and for his name's sake, we received grace and apostleship to call people from among all the Gentiles to the obedience that comes from faith" (Rom. 1:5). So again we are back to one of the great doctrinal teachings.

What an interesting mental picture Paul creates for us in Romans 12:1. A sacrifice is something offered to God by a priest. A priest would take a sacrifice offered by a worshiper, carry it to the altar, kill it, pour out the blood, and then burn the victim's body. In that procedure the priest and the offering were two separate entities. But in this arresting image of what it is to live a genuinely Christian life, Paul shows that the priest and the offering are the same. Furthermore, we are the priests who present the offering, and the offerings we present are our own bodies.

Is there a model for this in Scripture? Of course. It is the model of Jesus himself, for he was both the sacrifice and the priest who made the sacrifice. We have a statement of this in one of our great communion hymns, translated from a sixth-century Latin text by the Scotsman Robert Campbell in 1849:

> At the Lamb's high feast we sing
> Praise to our victorious King,
> Who hath washed us in the tide
> Flowing from his pierced side;
> Praise we him whose love divine
> Gives his sacred blood for wine,
> Gives his body for the feast,
> Christ the Victim, Christ the Priest.

Yes, there is an enormous difference between the sacrifice Jesus made for us and our own sacrifices of ourselves. Jesus' sacrifice was an atoning sacrifice. He died in our place, bearing the punishment of God for our sin so that we might not have to bear it. His death was substitutionary. Our sacrifices are not at all like that. They are not an atonement for sin in any sense. Still, they are like Christ's sacrifice in that we are the ones who make them and that the sacrifices we offer are ourselves.

Another distinction is that in the Old Testament the priests made different kinds of sacrifices. There were sacrifices for sin, of course; they looked forward to the death of Jesus Christ and explained it as a substitutionary atonement. These were fulfilled by Jesus' death and are not repeatable. In this sense "we have been made holy through the sacrifice of the body of Jesus Christ once for all," as the author of Hebrews says (Heb. 10:10). But in addition to the sacrifices for sin there were also sacrifices of thanksgiving, offerings by worshipers who simply wanted to thank God for some great blessing or deliverance. It is this kind of a sacrifice that we offer when we offer God ourselves.

Sacrifice is an utterly unpleasant word in our day! No one wants to be a sacrifice. In fact, people do not want to sacrifice even a single little thing. We want to acquire things instead.
Nevertheless, this is where the Christian life starts. It is God's instruction and desire for us, and it is "good, pleasing and perfect" even if it does not seem to be.

Will you trust God that he knows what he is doing? Will you believe him in this as in other matters? If you will believe him, you will do exactly what Paul urges you to do in Romans 12. You will offer your body as a "living sacrifice" to God and thereby prove that his will for you is indeed perfect.

Chapter 182.
Living Sacrifice: Its Nature

Romans 12:1

Not long ago I reread parts of Charles Dickens's wonderful historical novel, A Tale of Two Cities. The cities are Paris and London, of course, and the story is set in the years of the French Revolution when thousands of innocent people were being executed on the guillotine by followers of the revolution. As usual with Dickens's stories, the plot is complex, but it reaches a never-to-be-forgotten climax when Sydney Carton, the disreputable character in the story, substitutes himself for his friend Charles Darney, who is being held for execution in the Bastille prison. Darney, who has been condemned to die, goes free, and Carton goes to the scaffold for him, saying, "It is a far, far better thing I do, than I have ever done; it is a far, far better rest I go to, than I have ever known." The tale is so well written that it still moves me to tears every time I read it.

Few things move us to hushed awe so much as a person's sacrifice of his or her life for someone else. It is the ultimate proof of true love.

We are to sacrifice ourselves for Jesus if we love him. Jesus said, "Greater love has no one than this, that he lay down his life for his friends" (John 15:13), and he did it for us. The sacrifice of Sydney Carton for his friend Darney is only a story, albeit a moving one, but Jesus actually died on the cross for our salvation. Now, because he loved us and gave himself for us, we who love him are likewise to give ourselves to him as "living sacrifices."

But there is a tremendous difference. As I said in the last study, Jesus died in our place, bearing the punishment of God for our sin so that we would not have to bear it. Our sacrifices are not at all like that. They are not an atonement for sin in any sense. But they are like Christ's in this at least, that we are the ones who make them and that the sacrifices we make are ourselves. It is what Paul is talking about in Romans 12 when he writes, "Therefore, I urge you, brothers, in view of God's mercy, to offer your bodies as living sacrifices, holy and pleasing to God—this is your spiritual act of worship" (Rom. 12:1).

I introduced the matter of sacrifice in the last chapter. In this study I want to explore what exactly is meant by sacrifice, and how we are to do it.

Living Sacrifices

The first point is the obvious one: The sacrifice is to be a living sacrifice rather than a dead one. This was quite a novel idea in Paul's day, when sacrifices were always killed. The animal was brought to the priest. The sins of the person bringing the sacrifice were confessed over the animal, thereby transferring them to it symbolically. Then the animal was put to death. It was a vivid way of reminding everyone that "the wages of sin is death" (Rom. 6:23) and that the salvation of sinners is by substitution. In these sacrifices the animal died in place of the worshiper. It died so that he or she might not have to die. But now, with a burst of divinely inspired creativity, Paul reveals that the sacrifices we are to offer are not to be dead but rather living. We are to offer our lives to God so that, as a result, we might "no longer live for [ourselves] but for him who died for [us] and was raised again" (2 Cor. 5:15).

We are to be living sacrifices, yes. But with what life? Certainly not our old sinful lives in which, when we lived in them, we were dead already. Rather, we are to offer our new spiritual lives that have been given to us by Christ.

Robert Smith Candlish was a Scottish pastor who lived over a hundred years ago (1806-73) and who left us some marvelous studies of the Bible. In his study of Romans 12, he reflects on the nature of the life we are to offer God. "What life?" he asks. "Not merely animal life, the life that is common to all sentient and moving creatures; not merely, in addition to that, intelligent life, the life that characterizes all beings capable of thought and voluntary choice; but spiritual life: life in the highest sense; the very life which those on whose behalf the sacrifice of atonement is presented lost, when they fell into that state which makes a sacrifice of atonement necessary."

What this means, among other things, is that we must be Christians if we are to give ourselves to God as he requires. Other people may give God their money or time or even take up a religious vocation, but only a Christian can give back to God that new spiritual life in Christ that he has first been given. Indeed, it is only because we have been made alive in Christ that we are able to do this or even want to.

Offering Our Bodies

The second thing we need to see about the nature of the sacrifice God requires is that it involves the giving to God of our bodies. Some of the earlier commentators stress that offering our bodies really means offering ourselves, all we are. Calvin wrote, "By bodies he means not only our skin and bones, but the totality of which we are composed." But although it is true that we are to offer God all we are, most commentators today rightly refuse to pass over the word bodies quite this easily because they recognize how much the Bible stresses the importance of our bodies.

For example, Leon Morris says, "Paul surely expected Christians to offer to God not only their bodies but their whole selves.... But we should bear in mind that the body is very important in the Christian understanding of things. Our bodies may be 'implements of righteousness' (6:13) and 'members of Christ' (1 Cor. 6:15). The body is a temple of the Holy Spirit (1 Cor. 6:19); Paul can speak of being 'holy both in body and in spirit' (1 Cor. 7:34). He knows that there are possibilities of evil in the body but that in the believer 'the body of sin' has been brought to nothing (6:6)."

In a similar manner, Robert Haldane says, "It is of the body that the apostle here speaks, and it is not proper to extract out of his language more than it contains.... This shows the importance of serving God with the body as well as with the soul."

Paul does not elaborate upon what he means by presenting our bodies to God as living sacrifices in Romans 12, but has already presented this idea in chapter 6. There he said, "Therefore do not let sin reign in your mortal body so that you obey its evil desires. Do not offer the parts of your body to sin, as instruments of wickedness, but rather offer yourselves to God, as those who have been brought from death to life; and offer the parts of your body to him as instruments of righteousness. For sin shall not be your master, because you are not under law, but under grace"
(vv. 12-14). Paul is making the same point there, where he first begins to talk about sanctification, that he makes in 12:1—we are to serve God by offering him our bodies.

Sin can control us through our bodies, but it does not need to. So rather than offering our bodies as instruments of sin, we are to offer God our bodies as instruments for doing his will. This concerns specific body parts.

1. Our minds. Although we often think of our minds as separate from our bodies, our minds actually are parts of our bodies and the victory we need to achieve begins here. I will not dwell on this here because I will be treating it more fully later when I talk about mind renewal. But I remind you that this is the point at which Paul himself begins in verse 2: "Do not conform any longer to the pattern of this world, but be transformed by the renewing of your mind."

Have you ever considered that what you do with your mind will determine a great deal of what you will become as a Christian? If you fill your mind only with the products of our secular culture, you will remain secular and sinful. If you fill your head with trashy novels, you will begin to live like the characters you read about. If you do nothing but watch television, you will begin to act like the scoundrels on television. On the other hand, if you feed your mind on the Bible and Christian books, train it by godly conversation, and discipline it to critique what you see and hear by applying biblical truths to the world's ideas, you will grow in godliness and become increasingly useful to God.

When I wrote on this subject in my earlier study of Romans 6:12-14, I set out a simple goal in this area: "For every secular book you read, make it your goal also to read one good Christian book, a book that can stretch your mind spiritually."

2. Our eyes and ears. The mind is not the only part of our body by which we receive impressions and that must therefore be offered to God as an instrument of righteousness. We also receive impressions through our eyes and ears, and these must be surrendered to God too.

Sociologists tell us that by the age of twenty-one the average young person has been bombarded by three hundred thousand commercial messages, all arguing from the assumption that personal gratification is the dominant goal in life. Television and other modern means of communication put the acquisition of things before godliness; in fact, they never mention godliness at all. How are you going to grow in godliness if you are constantly watching television or reading printed ads or listening to secular radio?

I am not advocating an evangelical monasticism in which we retreat from the culture, though it is far better to retreat from it than perish in it. But somehow the secular input must be counterbalanced by the spiritual. As I wrote earlier, "Another simple goal might be for you to spend as many hours studying your Bible, praying, and going to church as watching television."

3. Our tongues. The tongue is also part of our body, and what we do with it is important either for good or evil. James, the Lord's brother, wrote, "The tongue is... a world of evil among the parts of the body. It corrupts the whole person, sets the whole course of his life on fire, and is itself set on fire by hell" (James 3:5-6). If your tongue is not given to God as an instrument of righteousness in his hands, this will be true of you. You do not need to be a Hitler and plunge the world into armed conflict to do evil with your tongue. A little bit of gossip or slander will suffice.

What you need to do is use your tongue to praise and serve God. For one thing, you should learn how to recite Scripture with it. You probably know the popular songs. Can you not also use your tongue to speak God's words? And how about worship? You should use your tongue to praise God by means of hymns and other Christian songs. Above all, you should use your tongue to witness to others about the person and work of Christ.

Here is another goal for you if you want to grow in godliness: Use your tongue as much to tell others about Jesus as for idle conversation.

4. Our hands and feet. There are several important passages about our hands and feet. In 1 Thessalonians 4:11-12, Paul tells us to work with our hands so that we will be self-supporting and not dependent on anybody: "Make it your ambition to lead a quiet life, to mind your own business and to work with your hands, just as we told you, so that your daily life may win the respect of outsiders and so that you will not be dependent on anybody." In Ephesians 4:28 he tells us to work so that we will have something to give to others who are in need: "He who has been stealing must steal no longer, but must work, doing something useful with his own hands, that he may have something to share with those in need."

As far as our feet are concerned, in Romans 10 Paul writes of the need others have for the gospel, saying, "How can they hear without someone preaching to them? And how can they preach unless they are sent? As it is written, 'How beautiful are the feet of those who bring good news!'" (Rom. 10:14-15).

What do you do with your hands? And where do your feet take you? Do you allow them to take you to where Christ is denied or blasphemed? To where sin is openly practiced? Are you spending most of your free time loitering in the hot singles clubs? You will not grow in godliness there. On the contrary, you will fall from righteous conduct. Let your feet carry you into the company of those who love and serve God. Or, if you go into the world, let it be to serve the world and witness to it in Christ's name. Use your feet and hands for him.

Here is another goal taken from the earlier study: "For every special secular function you attend, determine to attend a Christian function also. And when you attend a secular function, do so as a witness by word and action for the Lord Jesus Christ."

Holiness

The third word Paul uses to indicate the nature of the sacrifices we are to offer God is holy. Any sacrifice must be holy, without spot or blemish and consecrated entirely to God. Anything less is an insult to the great and holy God we serve. How much more must we be holy who have been purchased "not with perishable things such as silver or gold... but with the precious blood of Christ" (1 Peter 1:18-19). Peter wrote, "But just as he who called you is holy, so be holy in all you do; for it is written: 'Be holy, because I am holy'" (1 Peter 1:15-16). The author of Hebrews said, "Without holiness no one will see the Lord" (Heb. 12:14).

This is the very heart of what we are talking about when we speak of living sacrifices: Holiness is the end of the matter, the point to which the entire Epistle of Romans has been heading. Romans is about salvation. But as someone wise has noted, salvation does not mean that Jesus died to save us in our sins but to save us from them.

Handley C. G. Moule expressed this well: "As we actually approach the rules of holiness now before us, let us once more recollect what we have seen all along in the Epistle, that holiness is the aim and issue of the entire Gospel. It is indeed an 'evidence of life,' infinitely weighty in the enquiry whether a man knows God indeed and is on the way to his heaven. But it is much more; it is the expression of life; it is the form and action in which life is intended to come out.... We who believe are 'chosen' and 'ordained' to 'bring forth fruit' (John 15:16), fruit much and lasting." I don't think any subject is more generally neglected among evangelicals in America in our day than holiness. Yet there was a time when holiness was a serious pursuit of anyone who called himself or herself a Christian, and how one lived and who one was inside was important.

England's J. I. Packer has written a book called Rediscovering Holiness in which he calls attention to this fact: "The Puritans insisted that all life and relationships must become 'holiness to the Lord.' John Wesley told the world that God had raised up methodism 'to spread scriptural holiness throughout the land.' Phoebe Palmer, Handley Moule, Andrew Murray, Jessie PennLewis, F. B. Meyer, Oswald Chambers, Horatius Bonar, Amy Carmichael, and L. B. Maxwell are only a few of the leading figures in the 'holiness revival' that touched all evangelical Christendom between the mid-nineteenth and mid-twentieth centuries."

But today? Today holiness is largely forgotten as being important for Christians. We do not try to be holy, and we hardly know what holiness means. And we do not look for holiness in others. The great parish minister and revival preacher Robert Murray McCheyne once said, "My people's greatest need is my personal holiness." But pulpit committees hardly look for holiness in a new pastor today. They look for a winsome personality, communication skills, administrative ability, and other such things.

As for ourselves, we do not seek out books or tapes on holiness or attend seminars designed to draw us closer to God. We want seminars entitled "How to Be Happy," "How to Raise Children," "How to Have a Good Sex Life," "How to Succeed in Business," and so on.

Fortunately, this lack has begun to be noticed by some evangelical leaders who are disturbed by it and have begun to address the subject. I commend Packer's book, as well as a book written several years ago by Jerry Bridges called The Pursuit of Holiness. There is also the older classic by the English Bishop John Charles Ryle by the same title.

Pleasing to God

The final word Paul uses to describe how we should present our bodies to God as living sacrifices is pleasing. If we do what Paul has urged us to do—offer our "bodies as living sacrifices, holy... to God"—then we will also find that what we have done is pleasing and acceptable to him.

That is an amazing thing to me, that God could find anything we might do to be pleasing. But it is so! I notice that the word pleasing occurs twice in this short paragraph. The first time, which is what we are looking at here, it indicates that our offering of ourselves to God pleases God. The second time, at the end of verse 2, it indicates that when we do this we will find God's will for our lives to be pleasing as well as good and perfect. That God's will for me should be pleasing, pleasing to me—that I understand. How could it be otherwise if God is all-wise and all-good? He must will what is good for me. But that my offering of myself to him should somehow also please him when I know myself to be sinful and ignorant and half-hearted even in my best efforts—that is astonishing.

But so it is! The Bible tells me that at my best I am to think of myself as an "unworthy" servant (Luke 17:10). But it also says that if I live for Jesus, offering back to him what he has first given to me, then one day I will hear him say, "Well done, good and faithful servant!... Come and share your master's happiness!" (Matt. 25:21).

Living for Christ may be hard. It always will be in this sinful, God-defying world. I may not understand what good it does either for me or for other people. But that commendation, the praise of the Lord Jesus Christ, will be enough for me. It will make it worthwhile.

Chapter 183.
Living Sacrifice: Its Motive

Romans 12:1

What is it that motivates people to be "the best they can be," as the Army recruitment ads say? There are a number of answers.

One way to motivate people is to challenge them. Dale Carnegie, the author of How to Win Friends and Influence People, tells of a mill manager whose workers were not producing. The owner was named Charles Schwab, and he asked the manager what was wrong. "I have no idea," the manager said. "I've coaxed the men; I've pushed them; I've sworn and cussed; I've threatened them with damnation and being fired. Nothing works. They just won't produce." "How many heats did your shift make today?" Schwab asked.

"Six."

Without saying anything else, Schwab picked up a piece of chalk and wrote a big number "6" on the floor. Then he walked away.

When the night shift came in they saw the "6" and asked what it meant. "The big boss was here today," someone said. "He asked how many heats the day shift made, and we told him six. He chalked it on the floor."

The next morning Schwab walked through the mill again. The night shift had rubbed out the "6" and replaced it with an even bigger "7."

When the day shift reported the next day they saw the "7." So the night shift thought they were better than the day shift, did they? They'd show them. They pitched in furiously, and before they had left that evening they had rubbed out the "7" and replaced it with a "10." Schwab had increased production 66 percent in just twenty-four hours simply by throwing down a challenge.

Napoleon said that men are moved by trinkets. He was referring to medals, and he meant that soldiers would risk even death for recognition.

Winston Churchill, the great British statesman and prime minister during the hard days of the Second World War, motivated the British people by his vision of victory and by brilliant speeches. We can remember some of his words today: "blood, toil, tears and sweat," "victory— victory at all costs, victory in spite of all terror; victory however long and hard the road may be," "their finest hour."

Moved by Mercy

What is it that motivates Christians to live a Christian life? Or to use Paul's language in Romans 12:1, what is it that motivates them "to offer [their] bodies as living sacrifices... to God"?

If you and I were as rational as we think we are and sometimes claim to be, we would not need any encouragement to offer our bodies to God as living sacrifices because it would be the most reasonable thing in the world for us to do it. God is our Creator. He has redeemed us from sin by the death of Jesus Christ. He has made us alive in Christ. He loves us and cares for us. It is reasonable to love God and serve him in return. But we are not as rational as that and do need urging, which is why Paul writes as he does in Romans 12. In verse 1 Paul urges us to offer our bodies to God as living sacrifices, and the motivation he provides is God's mercy: "Therefore, I urge you, brothers, in view of God's mercy, to offer your bodies as living sacrifices, holy and pleasing to God—this is your spiritual act of worship."

Romans 12:1 is an amazing verse. It is one of those portions of the Bible that is literally packed with meaning, which is why I have been trying to unpack it carefully in these opening studies.

I began by studying the word therefore, which links the urging of verses 1 and 2 to everything that Paul has already written about in the letter. Next we looked at the idea of sacrifice, finding that in genuine Christianity we live by dying to self, as strange as that may seem. Third, we explored the nature of these sacrifices, seeing that: (1) they are to be living, (2) they involve giving the specific individual parts of our bodies to God for his service, (3) they must be holy, and (4) if they are these things, they will be acceptable to God.

But why should we present our bodies as living sacrifices? The answer is simple: "In view of [or because of] God's mercy." In the Greek text the word mercy is plural rather than singular, so the reason for giving ourselves to God is literally because of God's manifold mercies—that is, because he has been good to us in many ways.

This is entirely different from the way the world looks at things. Assuming that people in today's world should even get concerned about living righteously—and it is doubtful that very many could—they would probably say, "The reason to live a moral life is because you are going to get in trouble if you don't." Or to give secular thinking the greatest possible credit, perhaps they might say, "Because it is good for you." That is not what we have here.

In Rediscovering Holiness, J. I. Packer says,

The secular world never understands Christian motivation. Faced with the question of what makes Christians tick, unbelievers maintain that Christianity is practiced only out of self-serving purposes. They see Christians as fearing the consequences of not being Christians (religion as fire insurance), or feeling the need of help and support to achieve their goals (religion as a crutch), or wishing to sustain a social identity (religion as a badge of respectability). No doubt all these motivations can be found among the membership of churches: it would be futile to dispute that. But just as a horse brought into a house is not thereby made human, so a self-seeking motivation brought into the church is not thereby made Christian, nor will holiness ever be the right name for religious routines thus motivated. From the plan of salvation I learn that the true driving force in authentic Christian living is, and ever must be, not the hope of gain, but the heart of gratitude.

That is exactly what Paul is teaching. As John Calvin wrote, "Paul's entreaty teaches us that men will never worship God with a sincere heart, or be roused to fear and obey him with sufficient zeal, until they properly understand how much they are indebted to his mercy."

What Is Mercy?

This is not the first time we have had to think about mercy in studying Romans. Mercy is one of three words often found together: goodness, grace and mercy. Goodness is the most general term, involving all that emanates from God: his decrees, his creation, his laws, his providences. It extends to the elect and to the nonelect, though not in the same way. God is good, and everything he does is good. Grace denotes favor, particularly toward the undeserving. There is common grace, the kind of favor God shows to all persons in that he sends rain on the just and unjust alike. There is also special, or saving, grace, which is what he shows to those he is saving from their sins. Mercy is an aspect of grace, but the unique quality of mercy is that it is given to the pitiful.

Arthur W. Pink says, "Mercy... denotes the ready inclination of God to relieve the misery of fallen creatures. Thus 'mercy' presupposes sin." Let me show how this works by three examples.

In the Beginning

The first is Adam. Try to put yourself in Adam's position at the very beginning of human history and imagine how he must have felt when God came to him in the garden after he and Eve had sinned by eating from the forbidden tree. God had warned Adam about eating, saying, "You are free to eat from any tree in the garden; but you must not eat from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, for when you eat of it you will surely die" (Gen. 2:16-17). The Hebrew text actually says, "On the day you eat of it you will die." But Adam and Eve had eaten of it, and now God had come to them to demand an accounting and pronounce judgment.

"Where are you?" God called.

Adam and his wife had hidden among the trees when they heard God coming; they were terrified. God had said that they would die on the day they ate of the forbidden tree. Eve must have expected to die. Adam must have expected to die. "I heard you in the garden, and I was afraid because I was naked; so I hid," Adam said.

"Who told you that you were naked?" God asked. "Have you eaten from the tree that I commanded you not to eat from?"

Adam confessed that he had eaten, though he blamed the woman for getting him to do it.

God addressed the woman. "What is this you have done?" Eve blamed the serpent (Gen. 3:9-13).

At last God began his judgments, beginning with the serpent:

> Cursed are you above all the livestock and all the wild animals!
> You will crawl on your belly and you will eat dust all the days of your life.
> And I will put enmity between you and the woman, and between your offspring and hers;
> he will crush your head, and you will strike his heel.
>
> Genesis 3:14-15

God spoke to Eve next, foretelling pain in childbirth and harsh struggle within the marriage. We call it the battle of the sexes. Finally, God addressed Adam:

Cursed is the ground because of you; through painful toil you will eat of it all the days of your life.
It will produce thorns and thistles for you, and you will eat the plants of the field.
By the sweat of your brow you will eat your food until you return to the ground, since from it you were taken;
for dust you are and to dust you will return.

Genesis 3:17-19

Imagine yourself in Adam's place, living through what I have described. God had told Adam and Eve that they would die, but they had not died. There had been judgments, of course, consequences. Sin always has consequences. But they had not been struck down; and, in fact, God had even announced the coming of a Redeemer who one day would crush Satan's head and undo his work. Even more, God had illustrated the nature of Christ's atonement by killing animals, the innocent dying for the guilty, and then by clothing Adam and Eve with the animals' skins. It was a picture of imputed righteousness.

Adam must have been overwhelmed by an awareness of God's mercy. Adam deserved to die, but instead of killing him, God spared him and promised a Savior instead.

No wonder Adam then named his wife "Eve," meaning life-giver or mother. It was his way of expressing faith in God's promise, for God had said that it was from the seed of the woman that the Redeemer would come. The memory of God's mercy must have kept Adam looking to God in faith and living for God by faith through his long life from that time forward, for Adam lived to be eight hundred years old and was the father of the line of godly patriarchs that extended from him through his third son Seth to Noah.

The Worst of Sinners

My second example is Paul. In his earlier days Paul was called Saul, and he was a fierce opponent of Christianity. He was a Pharisee, the strictest sect of the Jews, and he was zealous for the traditions of his fathers. This led him to participate in the martyrdom of Stephen, and he followed that by arresting and otherwise persecuting many of the early Christians. Having done what he could in Jerusalem, Paul obtained letters to the leaders of the synagogues in Damascus and went there to arrest any Christians he could find and carry them off to Jerusalem for trial and possible execution.

On the way Jesus stopped him. There was a bright light from heaven, and when Saul fell to the ground, blinded by the light, he heard a voice speaking to him. "Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me?"

"Who are you, Lord?" Saul asked.

"I am Jesus, whom you are persecuting," the voice replied.

At this point Paul must have had feelings similar to those of Adam when God had appeared to him in the garden of Eden. True, God had not told Paul that he would die if he persecuted Christians. He was persecuting them in ignorance, supposing that he was serving God. But he had been terribly mistaken. He had done great harm, and he had even participated in the killing of Stephen. In that first moment of Paul's dawning apprehension, when he recognized that it was Jesus of Nazareth who was speaking to him, he must have thought that Jesus had appeared to him to judge him. He certainly deserved it. He must have expected to have been struck down and to die.

Instead Jesus sent him to Damascus, where he was to be told what he should do. When the message came to him by a disciple named Ananias, it was that he was to be God's "chosen instrument to carry [God's] name before the Gentiles and their kings and before the people of Israel" (Acts 9:1-15).

Mercy? I should say it was. Paul never forgot it.

That is why, years later, he could write to his young friend and co-worker Timothy, saying, "Here is a trustworthy saying that deserves full acceptance: Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners—of whom I am the worst. But for that very reason I was shown mercy so that in me, the worst of sinners, Christ Jesus might display his unlimited patience as an example for those who would believe on him and receive eternal life" (1 Tim. 1:15-16). It was because he knew himself to be a sinner saved only by the mercy and grace of God that Paul joyfully gave himself to God as a living sacrifice and worked tirelessly to please him.

A Slave of Slaves

My third example is John Newton. Newton ran away to sea as a young boy and eventually went to Africa to participate in the slave trade. His reason for going, as he later wrote in his autobiography, was that he might "sin his fill." Sin he did! But the path of sin is downhill, and Newton's path descended so low that he was eventually reduced to the position of a slave in his master's African compound. This man dealt in slaves, and when he went off on slaving expeditions Newton fell into the hands of the slave trader's African wife, who hated white men and vented her venom on Newton. Newton was forced to eat his food off the dusty floor like a dog, and at one point he was actually placed in chains. Sick and emaciated, he nearly died.

Newton escaped from this form of his slavery eventually. But he was still chained to sin and again went to sea transporting slaves from the west coast of Africa to the New World. It was on his return from one of these slave voyages that Newton was wondrously converted.

The ship was overtaken by a fierce storm in the north Atlantic and was nearly sinking. The rigging was destroyed; water was pouring in. The hands tried to seal the many leaks and brace the siding. Newton was sent down into the hold to pump water. He pumped for days, certain that the ship would sink and that he would be taken under with it and be drowned. As he pumped water in the hold of that ship, God brought to Newton's mind verses he had learned from his mother as a child, and they led to his conversion. When the ship survived the storm and the sailors were again in England, Newton left the slave trade, studied for the Christian ministry, and finally became a great preacher. He even preached before the queen.

What was Newton's motivation? It was a profound awareness of the grace and mercy of God toward him, a wretched sinner. Newton wrote these words:

> Amazing grace—how sweet the sound—
> That saved a wretch like me! I once was lost, but now am found— Was blind, but now I see.

Newton never forgot God's mercy to him. Once a friend was complaining about someone who was resistant to the gospel and living a life of great sin. "Sometimes I almost despair of that man," the friend remarked.

"I never did despair of any man since God saved me," said Newton.

In his most advanced years Newton's mind began to fail and he had to stop preaching. But when friends came to visit him he frequently remarked, "I am an old man. My mind is almost gone. But I can remember two things: I am a great sinner, and Jesus is a great Savior." Certainly the mercy of God moved Newton to offer his body as a living sacrifice to God and to seek to please him.

Love So Amazing

Now I come to you. Up to this point I have been asking you to put yourself in the place of Adam, Paul, and John Newton, trying to feel what they must have felt as an awareness of the greatness of the mercy of God swept over them. But if you are a Christian, you should be feeling the same things yourself even without reference to Adam or Paul or other characters.

Ephesians 2 describes your experience. It says that before God revealed his mercy to you, you were "dead in your transgressions and sins" (v. 1). You "followed the ways of this world and of the ruler of the kingdom of the air" (v. 2) and were "by nature [an object of God's] wrath" (v. 3).

"You were separate from Christ, excluded from citizenship in Israel and [a foreigner] to the covenants of the promise, without hope and without God in the world" (v. 12). That was your condition.

But now listen to what God did.

"Because of his great love for us, God, who is rich in mercy, made us alive with Christ even when we were dead in transgressions—it is by grace you have been saved. And God raised us up with Christ and seated us with him in the heavenly realms in Christ Jesus, in order that in the coming ages he might show the incomparable riches of his grace, expressed in his kindness to us in Christ Jesus" (vv. 4-7).

That is the nature of the goodness, love, grace, and mercy of our great God. If you are a Christian, shouldn't it motivate you to the most complete offer of your body to him as a living sacrifice and to the highest possible level of obedience and service? How can it do otherwise? In my opinion, you can never understand and accurately appreciate what God has done in showing you mercy in Christ without replying wholeheartedly, as did Isaac Watts in his great hymn "When I Survey the Wondrous Cross" (1709):

> Love so amazing, so divine,
> Demands my soul, my life, my all.

Chapter 184.
Service That Makes Sense

Romans 12:1

The Greek words of the last phrase of Romans 12:1 are ambiguous and have been translated different ways. For example, there are two different ways the words spiritual act of worship in Romans 12:1 may be understood. The noun translated worship is latreia, which can mean either service or worship. The plural of latreia can even mean rites or duties. The adjective in this important combination of words is logikos, however, which can mean either spiritual or rational, and when it is coupled to the noun two rather different meanings are possible.

One meaning is preserved in the King James Version: "your reasonable service." The newer translation is "your spiritual worship," which appears in the New International Version.

What is it? Is it "reasonable service" or "spiritual act of worship"? One answer is that the Greek words may actually embrace both ideas at the same time, spiritual worship being thought of also as rational service. But if I am forced to make a choice, I find myself siding with John Murray, who notes that "reasonable or rational is a more literal rendering." Logikos has given us the English word logical, which means reasonable or according to reason, and this should also be the preferred meaning, if for no other reason than because in the next verse Paul talks about Christians being transformed by "the renewing of [their] mind[s]."

So Paul really is talking about something reasonable, saying that the living sacrifice that he is urging upon us here is logical.

Even more, the service itself is to be performed reasonably, or with the mind. "The service here in view is worshipful service and the apostle characterizes it as 'rational' because it is worship that derives its character as acceptable to God from the fact that it enlists our mind, our reason, our intellect. It is rational in contrast with what is mechanical or automatic.... The lesson to be derived from the term 'rational' is that we are not 'spiritual' in the biblical sense except as the use of our bodies is characterized by conscious, intelligent, consecrated devotion to the service of God."

To understand these words well we must comprehend two things. First, we must understand the kind of service that is required. Second, we need to see why such demanding service is so reasonable.

Giving God Ourselves

As far as the first of these two matters is concerned, we have already spent a good bit of time exploring what this kind of service is about. It concerns what Paul calls "sacrifice." When we were looking at it in detail earlier we saw that it involves three things. First, it must be a living sacrifice. That is, our lives are to be given to God in active, continuing service. Second, it involves the offering of our bodies. In other words, we must give God the use of our minds, eyes, ears, tongues, hands, feet, and other body parts. Third, we must be holy. Moreover, we saw that if we do this, then the sacrifices we make to God will be pleasing to him.

Our problem, of course, is that we do not want to give God ourselves. We will give him things. It is relatively easy to give God money, though even here we are frequently far less than generous. We will even give God a certain amount of our time. We will volunteer for charitable work. But we will not give ourselves. Yet without ourselves these other "gifts" mean nothing to the Almighty.

You will begin to understand the Christian life only when you understand that God does not want your money or your time without yourself. You are the one for whom Jesus died. You are the one he loves. So when the Bible speaks of reasonable service, as it does here, it means that you are the one God wants. It is sad if you try to substitute things for that, the greatest gift.

A wonderful illustration of how we do sometimes substitute things for ourselves is the story of Jacob's return to his own country as related in Genesis 32. He had cheated his brother Esau out of his father Isaac's blessing about twenty years before, and he had been forced to run away because his brother was threatening to kill him. Twenty years is a long time. Over those two decades Jacob had gradually forgotten his brother's threats. But when it came time to go home, which is what this chapter describes, Jacob began to remember the past and grew increasingly fearful of what might happen.

Moving along toward Canaan with Laban behind him and his own country in front of him, Jacob had time to think. He remembered his own disreputable conduct. He recollected Esau's murderous threats. Every step became more difficult. Finally he came to the brook Jabbok that marked the border of his brother's territory, looked across to where Esau lived, and was terrified.
If he could have gone back, he would have. But there was no way to go except forward.

What was he to do?

The first thing he did was send some servants ahead to see if they could find Esau and perhaps get a feeling for what he was planning to do. They had not gone very far when they ran into Esau, who was actually coming to meet Jacob. Unfortunately, he had four hundred men with him. This was a huge army from Jacob's point of view, and he could only assume the worst—that Esau was coming to kill him. He thought quickly, then divided his family, servants, and flocks into two groups, reasoning that if Esau attacked one group, the other might escape.

Ah, but what if Jacob was in the group Esau attacked?

On second thought, that didn't seem to be a very good plan, so he decided to appease his brother with gifts. First he sent him a present of two hundred female goats. He sent a servant along to drive the herd, and he gave the servant these instructions: "When my brother Esau meets you and asks, 'To whom do you belong, and where are you going, and who owns all these animals in front of you?' then you are to say, 'They belong to your servant Jacob. They are a gift to my lord Esau, and he is coming behind us'" (Gen. 32:17-18).

After this he sent another group of twenty male goats, and he gave the servant in charge of this flock the same instructions, to say that they belonged to Jacob and were being sent as a gift to Esau, with Jacob to come after them.

Just in case Esau was not satisfied with the goats, Jacob decided to send two hundred ewes, then twenty rams. After this he sent over the rest of his livestock: "thirty female camels with their young, forty cows and ten bulls, and twenty female donkeys and ten male donkeys" (v. 15). Each group had its servants in charge, and to each servant he gave the same message. It must have been an amusing picture—all Jacob's possessions stretched out across the desert going toward Esau.

But there was more. After he had sent the animals Jacob sent his least favored wife Leah with her children ahead of him across the Jabbok, followed by his favored wife Rachel with her children. Then there was the Jabbok. And then there at last, all alone and trembling, was Jacob.

I suppose that if he had known the chorus, he might have been singing "I surrender all." All the goats, that is. All the sheep. All the camels. All the cows. All the bulls. All the donkeys. He had given up everything, but he had still not given himself. That is what some of us do. We tell God that we will give him some time. We volunteer to help with something around the church. We give him our money. We do not give ourselves.

That night the angel came and wrestled with Jacob to bring him to the point of personal submission, after which this scheming, stiff-necked man was never the same again. When is the angel going to come and wrestle with you? Does he need to?

Why Is It Reasonable?

Let's not wait for the angel. Let's deal with this matter of sacrificial service to God now. Let's examine why it is reasonable to serve God sacrificially.

1. It is reasonable because of what God has already done for us. We touched on this point in the first of our studies of Romans 12, because it is implied in the word with which Paul begins this final major section of the letter: therefore. Therefore refers back to everything Paul said earlier. He discussed our need as sinners. We are under the wrath of God, on a destructive downhill path and unable to help ourselves. Paul has shown that we are not even inclined to help ourselves. Instead of drawing close to God, who is our only hope, we run away from him, suppressing even the truths about God known from the revelation of himself in nature.

Yet God has not let it go at that. God intervened to save us by the work of Jesus Christ, who died for us, and by the work of the Holy Spirit, who enables us to understand what Jesus has accomplished, repent of our sin, and trust him for our salvation. Then he has also joined us to Jesus Christ to make us different people from what we were before. Paul expounded on that in the letter's first eleven chapters. So now, when he gets to chapter 12, he says, "Look what God has done. Is it not reasonable to give yourself utterly and sacrificially to a God who has given himself utterly and sacrificially for you?"

Let me make that personal. Are you a believer in Jesus Christ? Are you trusting him for your salvation? Has the Holy Spirit made you alive in Jesus Christ? If he has, what can be more reasonable than to give yourself to him? What is more logical than to serve God wholeheartedly in this way?

2. It is reasonable because of what God is continuing to do. The salvation of a Christian is not just a past thing. It is also a present experience, because God is continuing to work in those whom he has brought to faith in Jesus Christ. It is difficult to make changes in our lives, break destructive habits, form new ways of thinking, and please God. But this is exactly what God is doing in us. It is what this text is about. God does not start a thing and abandon it. When God starts something he always brings it to completion. He is doing this with you. Therefore, it is absurd to oppose his purposes. It is futile. The only reasonable thing is to join God and get on with what he is enabling you to do.

3. It is reasonable because such service is God's will for us, and his is a good, pleasing and perfect will. This point anticipates Romans 12:2, which says, "Do not conform any longer to the pattern of this world, but be transformed by the renewing of your mind. Then you will be able to test and approve what God's will is—his good, pleasing and perfect will."

Christians often get greatly hung up on the idea of discovering what God's specific will is for their lives. There has been great debate on this, some of which I reviewed earlier in my study of Romans 8. In my judgment, there clearly are specific plans for our lives that God had determined in advance, because he has predetermined all things. The difficulty is that he has not revealed these to us. They are part of the hidden counsels of God, and they are not known by us simply because they are hidden. But although these specific details are not made known, general but very important things are, and the most important of these is that God wants us to be like Jesus Christ.

This is what Romans 8:28-29 says. "We know that in all things God works for the good of those who love him, who have been called according to his purpose. For those God foreknew he also predestined to be conformed to the likeness of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brothers." This is what Romans 12:2 is getting at as well.

Sometimes we also get hung up on the idea that God's will must be something hard, difficult, or irrational. Paul corrects that error by giving us three adjectives to describe the nature of God's will.

It is good, he says. God is the master of the understatement. So if God says his will is good, he means good with a capital G. He means that his will for us is the best thing that could possibly be.

God's will is also acceptable, says Paul. This means acceptable to us, since the fact that God's will is acceptable to God goes without saying. Do not say that the will of God is hard. Or difficult. Or irrational. If you are thinking along those lines, it is because you have not yet learned to surrender to it. Those who do surrender to God's will, offering their whole selves as sacrifices to him, find that the will of God is the most acceptable thing there can be.

Finally, Paul argues that the will of God is perfect. No one can say more than that. Our ways are not perfect. They can always be improved upon and often must be corrected. God's ways are perfect. They can never be made better. So isn't it the most reasonable thing in the world to serve God and to do so without reservation, with all your heart?

4. It is reasonable because God is worthy of our very best efforts. We read in Revelation 4:11:

> You are worthy, our Lord and God, to receive glory and honor and power, > for you created all things, and by your will they were created and have their being.

And again, of Jesus in Revelation 5:9-10:

> You are worthy to take the scroll and to open its seals, > because you were slain, and with your blood you purchased men for God from every tribe and language and people and nation.
> You have made them to be a kingdom and priests to serve our God, and they will reign on the earth.

And yet again in Revelation 5:12:

> Worthy is the Lamb, who was slain,
> to receive power and wealth and wisdom and strength and honor and glory and praise!

That is the testimony of the elders, the four living creatures, the angels, and the entire company of the redeemed. It means that God is worthy of all honor, including the very best we have to offer. Do you believe that?

I think that is the problem. If we did believe it, we would judge it reasonable to live for Jesus now and we would do it. Instead, in many cases we only say, "Jesus is worthy of all honor," and then go out and fail to live for him. Our actions refute our profession. On the other hand, if you do live for him, giving God all you can ever hope to be, then you are testifying that God truly is a great God and that he is worthy of the best you or anyone else can offer.

5. It is reasonable because only spiritual things will last. My last point is that it is reasonable to give everything you have for God because in the final analysis only that which is spiritual will last. Everything else—everything we see and touch and handle—will pass away. Jesus said, "Heaven and earth will pass away" (Matt. 24:35). If that is true of the heavens and the earth, it is certainly true of the small perishable things you and I give so much of our lives for.

Although "the world and its desires pass away," we are also told that the one who "does the will of God lives forever" (1 John 2:17). And so do his works! The Bible says, "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord.... They will rest from their labor, for their deeds will follow them" (Rev. 14:13). Learning to think this way is part of what it means to think spiritually. It is a start in developing a truly Christian mind.

I close with two illustrations. Jim Elliot wrote as a young missionary, "He is no fool who gives what he cannot keep to gain what he cannot lose." He gave his life to God in what he judged to be the most reasonable service, and he gained a spiritual inheritance forever.

Another missionary, William Borden, came from a wealthy privileged family, was a graduate of Yale University, and had the promise of a wonderful and lucrative career before him. But he felt a call to serve God as a missionary in China and left for the field even though his family and friends thought him a fool for going. After a short time away and even before he reached China, Borden contracted a fatal disease and died. He had given up everything to follow Jesus. He died possessing nothing in this world. But Borden of Yale did not regret it. We know this because he left a note as he lay dying that said, "No reserve, no retreat, and no regrets." Like so many others, he found the service of Christ to be eminently reasonable, and he gained a lasting reward.

Chapter 185.
The Pattern of This Age

Romans 12:2

Some verses in the Bible are enriched when we read them in several translations, and Romans 12:2 is one of them. In the New International Version the first part of Romans 12:2 says, "Do not conform any longer to the pattern of this world."

This verse has two key words: world, which in Greek is literally age (aiôn, meaning this present age, in contrast to "the age to come"), and do not conform, which is a compound having at its root the word scheme. So the verse means "Do not let the age in which you live force you into its scheme of thinking and behaving." This is what some of the translations try to bring out. The New American Catholic Bible says, "Do not conform yourselves to this age." The Jerusalem Bible says, "Do not model yourselves on the behaviour of the world around you." The Living Bible reads, "Don't copy the behavior and customs of this world." Best known of all is the paraphrase of J. B. Phillips, which states, "Don't let the world around you squeeze you into its own mold."

The idea in each of these renderings is that the world has its ways of thinking and doing things and is exerting pressure on Christians to conform to them. But instead of being conformed, Christians are to be changed from within to be increasingly like Jesus Christ.

What Is Worldliness?

The first phrase of verse 2 is a warning against worldliness. But as soon as we say worldly we have to stop and make clear what real worldliness is. When I was growing up in a rather fundamentalist church I was taught that worldliness was following such "worldly" pursuits as smoking, drinking, dancing, and playing cards. A Christian girl would say:

> I don't smoke, and I don't chew,
> And I don't go with boys who do.

That is not what Romans 12:2 is about, however. To think of worldliness only in those terms is to trivialize what is a far more serious and far more subtle problem.

The clue to what is in view here is that in the next phrase Paul urges, as an alternative to being "conformed" to this world, being "transformed by the renewing of your mind." This means that he is concerned about a way of thinking rather than merely behaving, though right behavior will follow naturally if our thinking is set straight. In other words, the worldliness we are to break away from and repudiate is the world's "worldview," what the Germans call Weltanschauung, a systematic way of looking at all things. We are to break out of the world's way of thinking and instead let our minds be molded by the Word of God.

In our day Christians have not done this very well, and that is the reason why they are so often "worldly" in the other senses too. In fact, it is a sad commentary on our time, verified by surveys, that American Christians in general have mostly the same values and behavior patterns as the world around them.

Secularism: "The Cosmos Is All That Is"

If worldliness is not smoking, drinking, dancing, and playing cards, what is it? If it is a way of thinking, what is a worldly worldview? There is no single word that perfectly describes how the world thinks, but secularism is good for general purposes. It is an umbrella term that covers a number of other "isms," like humanism, relativism, pragmatism, pluralism, hedonism, and materialism. Secularism, more than any other single word, aptly describes the mental framework and value structure of the people of our time.

The word secular also comes closest to what Paul says when he refers to "the pattern of this world." Secular is derived from the Latin word saeculum, which means age. And the word found in Paul's phrase in verse 2 is the exact Greek equivalent. The NIV uses the word world, but the Greek actually says, "Do not be conformed to this age." In other words, "Do not be 'secularist' in your worldview."

There is a right way to be secular, of course. Christians live in the world and are therefore rightly concerned about the world's affairs. We have legitimate secular concerns. But secularism (note the "ism") is more than this. It is a philosophy that does not look beyond this world but instead operates as if this age is all there is.

The best single statement of secularism I know is something Carl Sagan said in the television series Cosmos. He was pictured standing before a spectacular view of the heavens with its many swirling galaxies, saying in a hushed, almost reverential tone of voice, "The cosmos is all that is or ever was or ever will be." That is bold-faced secularism. It is bound up entirely by the limits of the material universe, by what we can see and touch and weigh and measure. If we think in terms of our existence here, it means operating within the limits of life on earth. If we are thinking of time, it means disregarding the eternal and thinking only of the now.

We have it expressed in popular advertising slogans like "You only go around once" and Pepsi's "Now Generation." These slogans dominate our culture and express an outlook that has become increasingly harmful. If now is the only thing that matters, why should we worry about the national debt, for example? That's not our problem. Let our children worry about it. Or why should we study hard preparing to do meaningful work later on in life, as long as we can have a good time now? Most important, why should I worry about God or righteousness or sin or judgment or salvation, if now is all that really matters?

R. C. Sproul writes, "For secularism, all life, every human value, every human activity must be understood in light of this present time.... What matters is now and only now. All access to the above and the beyond is blocked. There is no exit from the confines of this present world. The secular is all that we have. We must make our decisions, live our lives, make our plans, all within the closed arena of this time—the here and now."

Each of us should understand that description instantly, because it is the viewpoint we are surrounded with every single day of our lives and in every conceivable place and circumstance.

Yet that is the outlook to which we must refuse to be conformed. Instead of being conformed to this world, as if that is all there is, we are to see all things as relating to God and to eternity. Here is the contrast, as expressed by Harry Blamires: "To think secularly is to think within a frame of reference bounded by the limits of our life on earth; it is to keep one's calculations rooted in thisworldly criteria. To think Christianly is to accept all things with the mind as related, directly or indirectly, to man's eternal destiny as the redeemed and chosen child of God."

Humanism: "You Will Be Like God"

There is a proper kind of humanism, meaning a proper concern for human beings.
Humanitarianism is a better word for it. People who care for other people are humanitarians. But there is also a philosophical humanism, which is a way of looking at people, particularly ourselves, apart from God, and this is wrong and harmful. This is a secular way of looking at them, which is why we so often speak not just of humanism but of "secular humanism."

The best example of secular humanism I know is in the Book of Daniel. One day Nebuchadnezzar, the great king of Babylon, was on the roof of his palace looking out over his splendid hanging gardens to the prosperous city beyond. He was impressed with his handiwork and said, "Is this not the great Babylon I have built as the royal residence, by my mighty power and for the glory of my majesty?" (Dan. 4:30). It was a statement that everything he saw was "of him, "by" him, and "for" the glory of his majesty, which is humanism. Humanism says that everything revolves around man and exists for man's glory.

God would not tolerate this arrogance. So he judged Nebuchadnezzar with insanity, indicating that this is a crazy philosophy. Nebuchadnezzar was then driven out to live with the beasts and acted like a beast until at last he acknowledged that God alone is the true ruler of the universe and that everything exists for his glory rather than ours.

I, Nebuchadnezzar, raised my eyes toward heaven, and my sanity was restored. Then I praised the Most High; I honored and glorified him who lives forever.

> His dominion is an eternal dominion....
> He does as he pleases with the powers of heaven and the peoples of the earth.

Daniel 4:34-35

Humanism is opposed to God and hostile to Christianity. This has always been so, but it is especially evident in the public statements of modern humanism: A Humanist Manifesto (1933), Humanist Manifesto II (1973), and The Secularist Humanist Declaration (1980). The first of these, the 1933 document, said, "Traditional theism, especially faith in the prayer-hearing God, assumed to love and care for persons, to hear and understand their prayers, and to be able to do something about them, is an unproved and outmoded faith. Salvationism, based on mere affirmation, still appears as harmful, diverting people with false hopes of heaven hereafter. Reasonable minds look to other means for survival."

The 1973 Humanist Manifesto II said, "We find insufficient evidence for belief in the existence of a supernatural" and "There is no credible evidence that life survives the death of the body."

Humanism leads to a deification of self and, contrary to what it professes, to an utter disregard for other people.

In deifying self, humanism actually deifies nearly everything but God. Several years ago Herbert Schlossberg, one of the project directors for the Fieldstead Institute, wrote a book titled Idols for Destruction, in which he showed how humanism has made a god of history, mammon, nature, power, religion, and, of course, humanity itself. It is brilliantly done.

As far as disregarding other people, well, look at the best-sellers of the 1970s. You will find titles like Winning through Intimidation and Looking Out for Number One. These books say, in a manner utterly consistent with secular humanism, "Forget about other people; look out for yourself; you are what matters." What emerged in those years is what Thomas Wolfe, the social critic, called the "Me Decade." And the 1970s gave way to the 1980s, which others have aptly called the "Golden Age of Greed."

Remember, too, that this is the philosophy (some would say religion) underlying public school education. This is ironic, of course, since humanism is an irrational philosophy. How so? Because it is impossible to establish humanistic or any other values or goals without a transcendent point of reference, and it is precisely that transcendent point that is being repudiated by the humanists. Frighteningly, the irrationalism of humanism is appearing in the chaos of the schools, where students are using guns to kill other students and threaten teachers.

In the fall of 1992 an ABC Prime Time Live television special, featuring Diane Sawyer, reported that in this country one in five students come to school with a handgun somewhat regularly and that there are ten times as many knives in schools as there are guns. This is as true of the suburbs as it is of the inner city. In Wichita, Kansas, which calls itself mid-America, students must pass through metal detectors in order to enter school, and there are still guns and other weapons in the buildings.

For humanism as well as for secularism, the word for Christians is "do not conform any longer." We remember that the first expression of humanism was not the Humanist Manifesto of 1933 or even the arrogant words of Nebuchadnezzar spoken about six hundred years before Christ, but rather the words of Satan in the Garden of Eden, who told Eve, "You will be like God, knowing good and evil" (Gen. 3:5).

Relativism: "A Moral Morass"

While we are talking about humanism we also have to talk briefly about relativism, because if man is the focal point of everything, then there are no absolutes in any area of life and everything is up for grabs. Some years ago Professor Allan Bloom of the University of Chicago wrote a book called The Closing of the American Mind, in which he said on the very first page, "There is one thing a professor can be absolutely certain of: almost every student entering the university believes, or says he believes, that truth is relative."

What that book set out to prove is that education is impossible in such a climate. People can learn skills, of course. You can learn to drive a truck, work a computer, handle financial transactions, and do scores of other things. But real education, which means learning to sift through error to discover what is true, good, and beautiful, is impossible, because the goals of real education—truth, goodness, and beauty—do not exist. And even if they did exist in some far-off metaphysical never-never-land, it would be impossible to find them, because it requires absolutes even to discover absolutes. It requires such absolutes as the laws of logic, for example.

Is it any wonder that with such an underlying destructive philosophy as relativism, not to mention secularism and humanism, America is experiencing what Time magazine called "a moral morass" and "a values vacuum"?

Materialism: "The Material Girl"

The final "ism" to which Christians are not to be conformed is materialism. This takes us back to secularism, since it is a part of it. If "the cosmos is all there is or ever was or ever will be," as Carl Sagan says, then nothing exists but what is material or measurable, and if there is any value to be found in life, it must be in material terms. Be as healthy as you can. Live as long as you can. Get as rich as you can.

When today's young people are asked to name their heroes or heroines, what comes out rather quickly is that they have no people they actually look up to except possibly the rich and the famous—people like Michael Jordan and Madonna. And speaking of Madonna, isn't it interesting that she is referred to most often not as a singer or entertainer or even a sex symbol but as "the material girl." That is, she represents the material things of this world, clothes (or the lack of them), money, fame, and above all, pleasure. And this is what today's young people want to be like! They want to be rich and famous and have things and enjoy them. They want to be like Madonna.

The poet T. S. Eliot wrote an epitaph for our materialistic generation:

> Here were decent godless people:
> Their only monument the asphalt road
> And a thousand lost golf balls.

How different the Lord Jesus Christ! He was born into a poor family, was laid in a borrowed manger at his birth, never had a home or a bank account or a family of his own.

He said of himself, "Foxes have holes and birds of the air have nests, but the Son of Man has no place to lay his head" (Matt. 8:20).

At his trial before Pilate he said, "My kingdom is not of this world. If it were, my servants would fight... My kingdom is from another place" (John 18:36).

When he died he was laid in a borrowed tomb.

If there was ever an individual who operated on the basis of values above and beyond the world in which we live, it was Jesus Christ. He was the polar opposite of "the material girl." But at the same time no one has ever affected this world for good as much as Jesus. It is into his image that we are to be transformed rather than being forced into the mold of this world's sinful and destructive "isms."

No One But Jesus

In the next few studies we are going to explore another aspect of the problem presented by today's world and begin to look at the solution proposed in Romans 12:2. But I want to close this study by looking ahead one phrase to what Paul says we are to be: not conformed but transformed by the renewing of our minds. There is a deliberate distinction between those two words. Conformity is something that happens to you outwardly. Transformation happens inwardly. The Greek word translated transformed is metamorphoô, from which we get metamorphosis. It is what happens to the lowly caterpillar when it turns into a beautiful butterfly.

This Greek word is found four times in the New Testament: once here, once in 2 Corinthians 3:18 to describe our being transformed into the glorious likeness of Jesus Christ, and twice in the gospels of the transfiguration of Jesus on the mountain where he had gone with Peter, James, and John. Those verses say, "There he was transfigured before them" (Matt. 17:2; Mark 9:2). The same word used by Paul to describe our transformation by the renewing of our minds so that we will not be conformed to this world is used by the gospel writers to describe the transfiguration of Jesus from the form of his earthly humiliation to the radiance that Peter, James, and John were privileged to witness for a time.

And that is why Paul writes as he does in 2 Corinthians, saying, "We, who with unveiled faces all reflect the Lord's glory, are being transformed into his likeness with ever-increasing glory, which comes from the Lord, who is the Spirit" (2 Cor. 3:18).

In 2 Corinthians Paul says, "It is happening." In Romans 12 he says, "Let it happen," thus putting the responsibility, though not the power to accomplish this necessary transformation, upon us. How does it happen? Through the renewing of our minds; and the way our minds become renewed is by study of the life-giving and renewing Word of God. Without that study we will remain in the world's mold, unable to think and therefore also unable to act as Christians. With that study, blessed and empowered as it will be by the Holy Spirit, we will begin to take on something of the glorious luster of the Lord Jesus Christ and become increasingly like him.

Chapter 186.
This Mindless Age

Romans 12:2

In the last chapter I referred to Harry Blamires, an Englishman who wrote an important Christian book in 1963 titled The Christian Mind: How Should a Christian Think? Blamires was a student of C. S. Lewis. His book's main thesis, repeated over and over in chapter 1, is that "There is no longer a Christian mind," meaning that in our time there is no longer a distinctly Christian way of thinking. There is to some extent a Christian ethic and even a somewhat Christian way of life and piety. But there is no distinctly Christian frame of reference, no uniquely Christian worldview, to guide our thinking in distinction from the thought of the secular world around us.

Unfortunately, the situation has not improved over the past thirty years. In fact, it has grown worse. Today, not only is there little or no genuine Christian thinking, there is very little thinking of any kind. The Western world (and perhaps even the world as a whole) is well on its way to becoming what I have frequently called a "mindless society."

Since Christians are called to mind renewal—our text says, "Do not conform any longer to the pattern of this world, but be transformed by the renewing of your mind"—this cultural mindlessness is a major aspect of the "pattern of this world" that we are to recognize, understand, repudiate, and overcome. We are to be many things as Christians, but we are especially to be thinking people. We are to possess a "Christian mind."

America Has Been "Vannatized"

There are a number of causes for our present mindlessness—Western materialism, the fast pace of modern life, and philosophical skepticism, to name a few—but I believe that the chief cause is television.

I began to study television as a cultural problem several years ago, and the thing that got me started was a 1987 graduation address at Duke University by Ted Koppel of ABC's Nightline. Following this address Koppel was frequently quoted by Christian communicators because of something he said about the Ten Commandments. He was deploring the declining moral tone of our country and reminded his predominantly secular audience of the abiding validity of this religious standard. He said that they are Ten Commandments, not "ten suggestions," and that they "are," not "were" the standard. But to me the most interesting thing about Koppel's address was his opening sentence, in which he said that America has been "Vannatized."

Koppel was referring to Vanna White, the beautiful and extraordinarily popular hostess of the television game show Wheel of Fortune. Vanna White is something of a phenomenon on television. Her actual work is simple. She stands on one side of a large game board that holds blocks representing the letters of words the contestants are supposed to guess. As they guess correctly, Vanna walks across the platform and turns the blocks around to reveal the letters. When she gets to the other side she claps her hands. It is simple work, but Vanna seems to like it. No, "like" is too mild a term, as Koppel notes. Vanna "thrills, rejoices, adores everything she sees." People respond to her so well that books about her have appeared in bookstores, and she is well up on that magical but elusive list of the most admired people in America.

But here is the interesting thing. Until recently Vanna never said a word on Wheel of Fortune, and Koppel asked how a person who says nothing and who is therefore basically unknown to us can be so popular. That is just the point, he answered. Since we do not know what Vanna White is actually like, she is whatever you want her to be. "Is she a feminist or every male chauvinist's dream? She is whatever you want her to be. Sister, lover, daughter, friend, never cross, nonthreatening, and nonjudgmental to a fault." She is popular because we project our own deep feelings, needs, or fantasies onto the television image.

Koppel does not care very much about Wheel of Fortune's success, of course. He was analyzing our culture. And his point is that Vanna White's appeal is the very essence of television and that television forms our way of thinking or, to be more accurate, of not thinking. It has been hailed as the great teaching tool, but that is precisely what it does not do, because it seldom presents anything in enough depth for a person actually to think about it. Instead, it presents thirty-second flashes of events and offers images upon which we are invited to project our own vague feelings.

If all we are talking about is game shows and other forms of television entertainment, none of this would matter very much, except for the amount of time our children spend watching these banal, mind-numbing diversions rather than disciplining their minds by serious study. But if television is really conditioning us not to think, as Koppel and I maintain, then television is a serious intellectual, social, and spiritual problem.

Amusing Ourselves to Death

A more academic study of the negative impact of television on culture has been provided by Neil Postman, a professor of communication arts and sciences at New York University, in a book called Amusing Ourselves to Death: Public Discourse in the Age of Show Business.

Amusing Ourselves to Death was published in 1985, one year after 1984, the year popularized as the title of George Orwell's futuristic novel, with its dark vision of a society controlled by fear. In Orwell's novel Big Brother rules everything with a ruthless iron fist. But Postman reminds us that there was another novel written slightly earlier with an equally chilling but quite different vision of the future: Brave New World by Aldous Huxley. In Huxley's novel there is no need for Big Brother, because in this ominous vision of the future people have come to love their oppression as well as the technologies that strip away their capacities to think:

What Orwell feared were those who would ban books. What Huxley feared was that there would be no reason to ban a book, for there would be no one who wanted to read one. Orwell feared those who would deprive us of information. Huxley feared those who would give us so much that we would be reduced to passivity and egoism. Orwell feared that the truth would be concealed from us. Huxley feared the truth would be drowned in a sea of irrelevance. Orwell feared we would become a captive culture. Huxley feared we would become a trivial culture.... As Huxley remarked in Brave New World Revisited, the civil libertarians and rationalists who are ever on the alert to oppose tyranny "failed to take into account man's almost infinite appetite for diversions."

Obviously, as Postman suggests, the Western cultures have succumbed to the second of these two oppressions, just as the communist countries fell victim to the first.

The first half of Postman's book is a study of the difference between what he calls "the age of typography" and our present television age, which he calls "the age of show business."
Typography refers to words in print, and it concerns the communication of ideas by newspapers, pamphlets, and books. It is rational and analytic, because that is the way written words work. He writes:

To engage the written word means to follow a line of thought, which requires considerable powers of classifying, inference-making and reasoning. It means to uncover lies, confusions, and over-generalizations, to detect abuses of logic and common sense. It also means to weigh ideas, to compare and contrast assertions, to connect one generalization to another. To accomplish this, one must achieve a certain distance from the words themselves, which is, in fact, encouraged by the isolated and impersonal text. That is why a good reader does not cheer an apt sentence or pause to applaud even an inspired paragraph. Analytic thought is too busy for that, and too detached.

He illustrates the strength of the age of typography by public attention to the famous LincolnDouglas debates of the mid-eighteen hundreds, which people were capable of hearing, understanding, and forming opinions about, even though they lasted three to seven hours. In the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries "America was as dominated by the printed word and an oratory based on the printed word as any society we know of," Postman says. The country could think.

Unfortunately, television does not operate by rational means of communication but by images, as Ted Koppel pointed out, and as a result we are becoming a mindless culture.

News on Television: "Now... This"

A great deal of what Postman develops in his book is reinforcement for what I have been describing as mindlessness. So let me review three specific areas of bad influence, as he sees it.

A chapter in the book that deals with news on television is entitled "Now... This." That is because these are the words most used on television to link one brief televised news segment— the average news segment on network news programs is only forty-five seconds long—to the next news segment or commercial. What the phrase means is that what one has just seen has no relevance to what one is about to see or, for that matter, to anything. Rational thought requires such connections. It depends on similarities, contradictions, deductions, and the development of probable consequences. It requires time. It is what books and other serious print media give us. But this is precisely what television does not give. It does not give time for thought, and if it does not give time for thought or promote thought, what it essentially amounts to is "diversion."

Postman says that television gives us "news without consequences, without value, and therefore without essential seriousness; that is to say, news as pure entertainment." In other words, it is not only mindless, it is teaching us to be mindless, to the point at which we even suppose that our ignorance is great knowledge.

Reach Out and Elect Someone

A second area of bad influence is politics. Postman calls this chapter "Reach Out and Elect Someone." Ronald Reagan once said, "Politics is just like show business." But if this is so, then the object of politics on television is not to pursue excellence, clarity, or honesty, or any other generally recognized virtue, but to appear as, if you are pursuing these things.

After the 1968 presidential campaign, in which Richard Nixon finally won the White House, a political writer named Joe McGinniss wrote a book titled The Selling of the President 1968. In it he described the strategy of the Nixon advisors who felt that their candidate had lost the 1960 election to John Kennedy because of Kennedy's better television image. He reports William Gavin, one of Nixon's chief aids, as advising, "Break away from linear logic: present a barrage of impressions, of attitudes. Break off in mid-sentence and skip to something half a world away.... Reason pushes the viewer back, it assaults him, it demands that he agree or disagree; impression can envelop him, invite him in, without making an intellectual demand.... Get the voters to like the guy, and the battle's two-thirds won."

How do campaign managers get their candidates elected today? Not by discussing issues, because that is a sure way to get defeated—any position on any issue, unless it is utterly meaningless, is certain to offend somebody. The way to win elections is to present a pleasant television image and to keep the candidate out of trouble for as long as possible.

That is why Ronald Reagan won in 1980 and even more decisively in 1984. It was not his positions, though they were substantially different from those of his predecessors and were, in my opinion, generally right. There really was "a Reagan revolution." But this was not why he won. He won because he had a long career in movies and was a master of the television medium. He projected an image of a strong decent man we could trust.

The 1988 presidential election, in which George Bush defeated Michael Dukakis, involved issues about which every intelligent voter should have been carefully informed. Television is supposed to be the medium through which this is done. But a discussion of the issues is precisely what the voters did not get. Where did George Bush and Michael Dukakis differ in their politics? In regard to domestic programs such as Social Security, child care, education, taxes, abortion? In international affairs? The military? Relations with Russia, Eastern Europe, China, Japan? It was only specialists in government who knew the true answers to those questions, not the voters, because those were not the issues of the campaign.

What were the issues then? Actually, there was only one issue, and it was this: Is George Bush a "wimp"? That question was raised because he looked like a wimp on television; he is thin, seems to be frail, and held his head slightly to one side in a way that looked deferential. If the Dukakis camp could encourage voters to think of Bush that way, they would vote for Dukakis, because no one wants a wimp for president. On the other hand, Bush's task was to convince the voters that he would actually be a strong president, and the strategy of his camp was therefore to wage a strong, aggressive—many said unfair and nasty—campaign against Dukakis.

The media complained! Dan Rather, Tom Brokaw, and Peter Jennings were predictably selfrighteous and offended. They called it the least substantial, meanest campaign in memory. But how hypocritical! It was mindless, but it was mindless precisely because that is what television demands. It demands images and not thought.

The campaign of 1992 is another example. I said from the beginning that Bill Clinton would win the election, not because he might have a better program for getting this country out of debt or even because the electorate was unhappy with America's slow rate of economic growth in the previous two years, but because Clinton looks better on television. Clinton is the perfect television candidate, and so he won.

Marshall McLuhan, the television "guru," was right when he said, "The medium is the message." The campaign managers have learned that, which is why they organize the kinds of campaigns they do.

I know someone will say, "But Reagan was a decent, strong man." Or, "George Bush really is a wimp (or 'is not a wimp')." Or, "Bill Clinton is the stronger candidate." But my point is that we do not actually know those things and cannot know them, at least from television, until events perhaps support or fail to support our perceptions. The most serious thing of all perhaps is not that we do not know, but that we think we do know because of television.

Religion as Entertainment

The third area of bad influence is religion. Postman's chapter on religion is called "Shuffle Off to Bethlehem." Religion is on television chiefly in an entertainment format. With the possible exception of Billy Graham, who has an international following quite apart from the television medium, and some other teaching pastors such as Charles Stanley and D. James Kennedy, the religious television stars are mostly entertainers. Pat Robertson is a master of ceremonies along the lines of Merv Griffin. Jimmy Swaggart is a piano player and singer as well as having been a vivacious and entertaining speaker. Even televised church services, like those of Jerry Falwell and Robert Schuller, contain their requisite musical numbers and pop testimonies, just like variety shows on secular television. The proper name for them is vaudeville.

Nearly everything that makes religion real is lost in the translation of church to television. The chief loss is a sense of the transcendent. God is missing. Postman says:

Everything that makes religion an historic, profound and sacred human activity is stripped away; there is no ritual, no dogma, no tradition, no theology, and above all, no sense of spiritual transcendence. On these shows, the preacher is tops. God comes out as second banana....

CBS knows that Walter Cronkite plays better on television than the Milky Way. And Jimmy Swaggart plays better than God. For God exists only in our minds, whereas Swaggart is there, to be seen, admired, adored. Which is why he is the star of the show.... If I am not mistaken, the word for this is blasphemy.

An observer who likes such religious entertainment might object, "Well, what harm is done as long as genuine religion is still to be found in church on Sundays?" I would argue that so pervasive and normalizing is the impact of television that pressures have inevitably come to make church services as irrelevant and entertaining as the tube.

In the vast majority of church services today there are virtually no pastoral prayers, while there is much brainless music, chummy chatter, and abbreviated sermons. Preachers are told to be personable, to relate funny stories, to smile, and above all to stay away from topics that might cause people to become unhappy with the church and leave it. They are to preach to felt needs, not necessarily real needs. This generally means telling people only what they want to hear.

Your Mind Matters

This is the point at which we need to talk about genuine mind renewal for Christians, which is what I will continue with in the next study. But I close here by mentioning a helpful little book by John Stott, the Rector Emeritus of All Souls Church in London, titled Your Mind Matters. It deals with six spheres of Christian living, and it argues that each one is impossible without a proper and energetic use of our minds: Christian worship, Christian faith, Christian holiness, Christian guidance, Christian evangelism, and Christian ministry. We need to think.

Stott argues that "anti-intellectualism... is... part of the fashion of the world and therefore a form of worldliness. To denigrate the mind is to undermine foundational Christian doctrines." He asks pointedly, "Has God created us rational beings, and shall we deny our humanity which he has given us? Has God spoken to us, and shall we not listen to his words? Has God renewed our mind through Christ, and shall we not think with it? Is God going to judge us by his Word, and shall we not be wise and build our house upon this rock?" They are important and helpful questions, if you think about them.

Chapter 187.
Mind Renewal in a Mindless Age: Part 1

Romans 12:2

In each of the last two studies dealing with what it means to think as a Christian rather than in a worldly or secular way, I have mentioned Harry Blamires, an Englishman who has written two good books on this subject: The Christian Mind: How Should a Christian Think? (1963) and Recovering the Christian Mind: Meeting the Challenge of Secularism (1988). In each of these books Blamires encourages us to reject the world's thinking and begin to think as Christians. This is what Paul is writing about in our text from Romans 12: "Do not conform any longer to the pattern of this world, but be transformed by the renewing of your mind" (v. 2). This means that our thinking is not to be determined by the culture of the world around us but rather that we are to have a distinctly different and growing Christian worldview.

But what does it actually mean to have an outlook like that? How are we to experience mind renewal in our exceedingly mindless age?

Thinking Christianly and Thinking Secularly

The one thing this does not mean is what most people probably assume it does, and that is to start thinking mainly about Christian things. We do need to think about Christian subjects, of course. In fact, it is from that base of revealed doctrine and its applications to life that we can begin to think Christianly about other matters. I am going to pursue exactly that line of thought in this study. But to think Christianity itself is not a matter of thinking about Christian subjects as opposed to thinking about secular subjects, as we suppose, but rather to think in a Christian way about everything. It means to have a Christian mind.

This is because, by contrast, it is possible to think in a secular way even about religious things. Take the Lord's Supper, for instance. For most Christians the Lord's Supper is probably the most spiritual of all spiritual matters, and yet it is possible to think about even it in a worldly manner. For example, a trustee of the church might be thinking that he forgot to include the cost of the communion elements in the next year's budget. Another person might be looking at the minister and criticizing his way of handling the elements. "He's so awkward," this person might be thinking. Still another person might be reflecting on how good it is for people to have spiritual thoughts or to observe religious ceremonies. "This is good for people," he might be reflecting. Each of these persons is thinking secularly about the most sacred of Christian practices.

On the other hand, it is possible to think Christianly about even the most mundane matters. Blamires suggests how we might do this at a gasoline station while we are waiting for our tank to be filled with gas. We might be reflecting on how a mechanized world with cars and other machines tends to make God seem unnecessary for people, or how a speeded-up world in which we use our cars to race from one appointment to another makes it difficult to think deeply about or even care for other people. Even further, we might be wondering, do material things like cars serve us, or are we enslaved to them? Do they cause us to covet and therefore break the tenth commandment? How do they impact the environment over which God has made us stewards?

Blamires says, "There is nothing in our experience, however trivial, worldly, or even evil, which cannot be thought about Christianly. There is likewise nothing in our experience, however sacred, which cannot be thought about secularly—considered, that is to say, simply in its relationship to the passing existence of bodies and psyches in a time-locked universe."

The God Who Is There

So I ask again, Where do we start? How do we begin to think and act as Christians? There is a sense in which we could begin at any point, since truth is a whole and truth in any area will inevitably lead to truth in every other area. But if the dominant philosophy of our day is secularism, which means viewing all of life only in terms of the visible world and in terms of the here and now, then the best of all possible starting places is the doctrine of God, for God alone is above and beyond the world and is eternal. Even more, the doctrine of God is a necessary and inevitable starting place if we are to produce a genuinely Christian response to secularism.

What does that mean for our thinking?

Well, if there is a God, that very fact means that there is literally such a thing as the supernatural. Supernatural means over, above, or in addition to nature. In other words, to go back to Carl Sagan's popular credo, the cosmos is not all there is or was or ever will be. God is. God exists. He is there, whether we acknowledge it or not, and he stands behind the cosmos. In fact, it is only because there is a God that there is a cosmos, since without God nothing else could possibly have come to be.

If anything exists, there must be an inevitable, self-existent, uncaused first cause that stands behind it.

Several years ago at the Philadelphia Conference on Reformed Theology Professor John H. Gerstner was talking about creation and referred to something his high school physics teacher once said: "The most profound question that has ever been asked by anybody is: Why is there something rather than nothing?"

Gerstner said that he was quite impressed with that at the time. But later, as he sharpened his ability to think, he recognized that it was not a profound question at all. In fact, it was not even a true question. It posed an alternative, something rather than nothing. "But what is nothing?" Gerstner asked. "Nothing" eludes definition. It even defies conception. For as soon as you say, "Nothing is..." nothing ceases to be nothing and becomes something. Gerstner referred to Jonathan Edwards, who is not noted for being funny but who was at least a slight bit humorous on one occasion when he said, "Nothing is what the sleeping rocks dream of."

So, said Gerstner, "Anyone who thinks he knows what nothing is must have those rocks in his head."

As soon as you ask, "Why is there something rather than nothing?" the alternative vanishes, you are left with something, and the only possible explanation for that something is "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth" (Gen. 1:1), which is what Christianity teaches.

"He Is There and He Is Not Silent"

The God who exists has revealed himself. This is the doctrine of revelation. Francis Schaeffer titled one of his books He Is There and He Is Not Silent to make this point. God is there, and he has not kept himself hidden from us. He has revealed himself—in nature, in history, and especially in the Scriptures.

In chapter 1851 mentioned four "ism"s that are part of the pattern of this age: secularism, humanism, relativism, and materialism. The doctrine of God is the specific Christian answer to secularism. Revelation is the specific answer to relativism. If God has spoken, then what he has said is truthful and can be trusted absolutely, since God is truthful. This gives us absolutes in an otherwise relative and therefore ultimately chaotic universe.

That God has spoken and that God's Word to us can be trusted has always been the conviction of the church, at least until relatively modern times. Today the truthfulness of the Bible has been challenged, but with disastrous results. For without a sure word from God all words are equally valid, and Christianity is neither more certain nor more compelling than any other merely human word or philosophy.

But notice this: If God has spoken, there will always be a certain hardness about the Christian faith and Christians. I do not mean that we will be hard on others or insensitive to them. Rather, there will be a certain unyielding quality to our convictions.

For one thing, we will insist upon truth and will not bow to the notion, however strongly it is pressed upon us, that "that's just your opinion."

Several years ago when I was flying to Chicago from the West Coast I got into a conversation with the woman seated next to me. We talked about religion, and whenever I made a statement about the gospel she replied, "But that's just your opinion." She was out of the relativistic mold.

I hit upon a way of answering her that preserved the hardness of what I was trying to say and yet did it nicely. I said, "You're right; that is my opinion, but that's not really what matters. What matters is: Is it true?"

She did not know quite what to say to that. So the conversation went on, and after a while she replied to something else I was saying in the same way: "But that's just your opinion."

I said, "You're right; that is my opinion, but that's not really what matters. What matters is: Is it true?" This happened about a dozen times, and after a while she began to smile and then laugh as she anticipated my comment coming. When I got home I sent her a copy of Mere Christianity.

Another thing the doctrine of revelation will mean for us is that we will not back down or compromise on moral issues. You know how it is whenever you speak out against some particularly bad act. If people do not say, "But that's just your opinion," they are likely to attack you personally, saying things like, "You'd do the same thing if you were in her situation" or "Do you think you're better than he is?" We must not be put off by such attacks. Our response should be something like this: "Please, I wasn't talking about what I would do if I were in her shoes. I'm a sinner too. I might have acted much worse. I would probably have failed sooner. I wasn't talking about that. I was talking about what is right, and I think that is what we need to talk about. None of us is ever going to do better than we are doing unless we talk about it and decide what's right to do."

"What the secular mind is ill-equipped to grasp is that the Christian faith leaves Christians with no choice at all on many matters of this kind," writes Blamires. We are people under God's authority, and that authority is expressed for us in the Bible.

The West's Spiritual Exhaustion

Now let's return to some implications of the doctrine of God. First, if there is a God and if he has made us to have eternal fellowship with him, then we are going to look at failure, suffering, pain, and even death differently than non-Christians do. For the Christian these can never be the greatest of all tragedies. They are bad. Death is an enemy (1 Cor. 15:26). But they are overbalanced by eternal matters.

Second, success and pleasure will not be the greatest of all goods for us. They are good, but they will never compare with salvation from sin or knowing God. Jesus said it clearly: "What good will it be for a man if he gains the whole world, yet forfeits his soul?" (Matt. 16:26). Or, from the other side, "Do not be afraid of those who kill the body but who cannot kill the soul. Rather, be afraid of the One who can destroy both soul and body in hell" (Matt. 10:28).

That leads to a Christian response to materialism. There are two kinds of materialism, a philosophical materialism like that of doctrinaire communism and a practical materialism that is most characteristic of the West. We have been raised with a false kind of syllogism that says that because we are not communists and communists are materialists, therefore we are not materialists. But that is not necessarily true. Most of us embrace a practical materialism that warps our souls, stunts our spiritual growth, and hinders the advance of the gospel in our time.

The best critique of Western materialism that I know was presented by Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn, the well-known Soviet dissident and writer, in an address given to the graduating class of Harvard University in 1978. Up to that point Solzhenitsyn had been somewhat of an American hero. He had suffered in the Soviet Union's infamous gulag prison system and had later defected. That's why he was invited to speak at Harvard. But in this address he was so blunt in his criticism of the West that his popularity vanished almost overnight, and he was almost never heard from, though he continued to write voluminously from a retreat in New England.

Solzhenitsyn's address was no defense of socialism. Quite the contrary. He celebrated its ideological defeat in Eastern Europe, saying, "It is zero and less than zero." But he declared, "Should someone ask me whether I would indicate the West such as it is today as a model to my country, frankly I would have to answer negatively.... Through intense suffering our own country has now achieved a spiritual development of such intensity that the Western system in its present state of spiritual exhaustion does not look attractive." He maintained that "after the suffering of decades of violence and oppression, the human soul longs for things higher, warmer, and purer than those offered by today's mass living habits, introduced by the revolting invasion of publicity, by TV stupor and by intolerable music."

According to Solzhenitsyn, the West has pursued physical well-being and the acquiring of material goods to the exclusion of almost everything spiritual.

"We Do Not Mind That We Die"

In 1989 Westerners were astounded by the political changes in Eastern Europe. Country after country repudiated its seventy-two-year communist heritage and replaced its leaders with democratically elected officials. We rejoiced in these changes, and rightly so. But we need to remember two things.

First, while the former communist lands have moved in a more democratic direction, we have moved in the direction of their materialism, living as if the only thing that matters is how many earthly goods we can acquire now. We marveled at the moving scenes of East Germans passing through the openings in the infamous Berlin Wall. We saw them gazing in amazement at the abundance of goods on West Berlin shelves. But what is the good of their being able to come to the West if all they discover here is a spiritual climate vastly inferior to their own?

And that is the second thing we need to remember. Though the American media with its blindness to things spiritual did not acknowledge it, the changes in the Eastern Bloc came about not by anyone's will, that of Mikhail Gorbachev or any other, but by the spiritual vitality of the people.

The strength of the Polish Solidarity movement, where the breakthrough first came, is that of the Roman Catholic Church. Pope John Paul II was a strong supporter of the people's faith and dreams.

Faith and spiritual strength also lay behind the changes in East Germany. Conventional wisdom in Germany has it that the turning point was on October 9, 1989, when seventy thousand demonstrators marched in Leipzig. The army was placed on full alert, and under normal circumstances it would have attacked the demonstrators violently. But the protesters' rallying cry was, "Let them shoot, we will still march." The army did not attack, and after that the protests grew until the government was overthrown.

In Romania, where President Nicolae Ceauşescu just weeks before had declared that apple trees would bear pears before socialism should be endangered in Romania, the end began in the house of a Protestant pastor whose parishioners surrounded him, declaring that they were willing to die rather than let him be arrested by the state police.

Josef Tson, founder and president of the Romanian Missionary Society, was in Romania just after the death of Ceauşescu and reported the details of the story. The pastor was from the city of Timisoara, and his name was Laszlo Tokes. On Saturday, December 16, 1989, just a few days before Christmas, hundreds and then thousands of people joined the courageous parishioners who had surrounded his house trying to defend him. One was a twenty-four-year-old Baptist church worker who decided to distribute candles to the ever-growing multitude. He lit his candle, and then the others lit theirs. This transformed the protective strategy into a contagious demonstration, and it was the beginning of the revolution. The next day, when the secret police opened fire on the people, the young man was shot in the leg, and the doctors had to amputate it. But on his hospital bed this young man told his pastor, "I lost a leg, but I am happy. I lit the first light."

The people in Romania do not call the events of December 1989 a national revolution. They say rather, "Call it God's miracle." The rallying cry of the masses was "God lives!" That from a former fiercely atheistic country! The people shouted, "Freedom! Freedom! We do not mind that we die!"

Willing to die? Ah, that is the only ultimately valid test of whether one is a practical materialist at heart or whether one believes in something greater and more important than things. Do we? No doubt there are Westerners who are willing to die for things intangible. The people who were willing to die for civil rights during the Civil Rights Movement in the 1960s are examples. But today the masses of individuals in America no longer share this high standard of commitment and sacrifice. In 1978, during President Jimmy Carter's abortive attempt to reinstate draft registration for the young, newspapers carried a photograph of a Princeton University student defiantly waving a poster marked with the words: "Nothing is worth dying for."

"But if nothing is worth dying for, is anything worth living for?" asks Charles Colson, who comments on this photograph in Against the Night: Living in the New Dark Ages. If there is nothing worth living for or dying for, then the chief end of man might as well be cruising the malls, which is the number one activity of today's teenagers, according to the pollsters.

Solzhenitsyn summarizes our weak thinking at this point when he says of today's Americans: "Every citizen has been granted the desired freedom and material goods in such quantity and of such quality as to guarantee in theory the achievement of happiness, in the morally inferior sense which has come into being during [these last] decades.... So who should now renounce all this? Why and for what should one risk one's precious life in defense of common values?"

Christianity has the answer to that, and Christians in past ages have known it. It is to "gain a better resurrection" (Heb. 11:35), which means to do what is right because what is right pleases God and that is what ultimately matters. But those who do it must be thinking Christians.

Chapter 188.
Mind Renewal in a Mindless Age: Part 2

Romans 12:2

In the last study I introduced the Christian doctrines of God and revelation as the biblical answer to secularism, humanism, relativism, and materialism, but I did not write about humanism in detail. The answer to humanism is the Christian doctrine of man.

Humanism is the philosophy to which human beings inevitably come if they are secularists. Secularism means eliminating God or anything else that may be transcendent from the universe and focusing instead on only what we can see and measure now. When God is eliminated in this process, man himself is left as the pinnacle of creation and becomes the inadequate and unworthy core for everything. In philosophy we usually trace the beginnings of this outlook to the preSocratic Greek philosopher Protagoras. Protagoras expressed his viewpoint in Greek words that have given us the better known Latin concept homo mensura, which means "Man, the measure" or, as it is often expressed, "Man is the measure of all things." The idea is that man is the norm by which everything is to be evaluated. He is the ultimate creature and thus the ultimate authority.

This seems to elevate man, but in practice it does exactly the opposite. It deifies man, but this deification always debases man in the end, turning him into an animal or even less than an animal. Moreover, it causes him to manipulate, ignore, disparage, wound, hate, abuse, and even murder other people.

What's Wrong with Me?

In the last twenty years something terrible has happened to Americans in the way we relate to other people, and it is due to the twisted humanism about which I have been writing. Prior to that time there was still something of a Christian ethos in this country and people used to care about and help other people. It was the natural thing to do. Today we focus on ourselves and deal with others only for what we can get out of them. This approach is materialistic and utilitarian.

In 1981 a sociologist-pollster, Daniel Yankelovich, published a study of the 1970s titled New Rules: Searching for Self-Fulfillment in a World Turned Upside Down. This book documented a tidal shift in values by which many and eventually most Americans began to seek personal selffulfillment as the ultimate goal in life rather than operating on the principle that we are here to serve and even sacrifice for others, as Americans for the most part really had done previously. He found that by the late 1970s, 72 percent of Americans spent much time thinking about themselves and their inner lives. So pervasive was this change that as early as 1976 Tom Wolfe called the seventies the "Me Decade" and compared it to a third religious awakening.

But isn't this a good thing? Shouldn't thinking about ourselves make us happy? If we redirect our energy to fulfilling ourselves and earn as much as we can to indulge even our tiniest desires, shouldn't we be satisfied with life? No! It doesn't work that way. It fails on the personal level, and it fails in the area of our relationships with other people also.

In 1978 Margaret Halsey wrote an article for Newsweek magazine titled "What's Wrong with Me, Me, Me?" Halsey referred to Wolfe's description of the seventies as the "me" generation, highlighting the belief that "inside every human being, however unprepossessing, there is a glorious, talented and overwhelmingly attractive personality [which] will be revealed in all its splendor if the individual just forgets about courtesy, cooperativeness and consideration for others and proceeds to do exactly what he or she feels like doing."

The problem, as Halsey pointed out, is not that there are not attractive characteristics in everyone (or at least in most people) but that human nature consists even more basically of "a mess of unruly primitive elements" which spoil the "self-discovery." These unruly elements need to be overcome, not indulged. And this means that the attractive personalities we seek really are not there to be discovered but rather are natures that need to be developed through choices, hard work, and lasting commitments to others. When we ask "What's wrong with me?" it is the "me, me, me" that is the problem.

This affects our relationships with other people too, because it makes our world impersonal. Charles Reich in his best-selling book The Greening of America wrote:

Modern living has obliterated place, locality and neighborhood, and given us the anonymous separateness of our existence. The family, the most basic social system, has been ruthlessly stripped to its functional essentials. Friendship has been coated over with a layer of impenetrable artificiality as men strive to live roles designed for them. Protocol, competition, hostility, and fear have replaced the warmth of the circle of affection which might sustain man against a hostile environment.... America [has become] one vast, terrifying anti-community.

The Christian Doctrine of Man

The Christian answer to this is the biblical doctrine of man, which means that if we are to have renewed minds in this area, we need to stop thinking about ourselves and other people as the world does and instead begin operating within a biblical framework.

When we turn to the Bible to see what it has to say about human beings, we find two surprising things. First, we find that man is a uniquely valuable being, far more important than the humanists imagine him to be. But, second, in his fallen condition we also find that he is much worse than the humanists suppose.

Let's take the fact that human beings are more valuable than humanists imagine first. The Bible teaches this at the very beginning of Genesis when it reports God as saying, "Let us make man in our image, in our likeness" (Gen. 1:26). We are then told, "So God created man in his own image, in the image of God he created him; male and female he created them" (v. 27).

In ancient times books were copied by hand with rough letters. There was no typesetting, so it was not possible to emphasize one idea over another by such devices as italics, capital letters, boldface, and centered headings. Instead emphasis was made by repetition. For example, when Jesus wanted to stress something as unusually important, he began with the words "verily, verily" or "truly, truly." We have the same thing in the first chapter of Genesis with the phrases "in our image," "in his own image," and "in the image of God." That idea is repeated three times, which is a way of saying that man being created in God's image is important. It is what makes man distinct from the animals. He is to value this distinction greatly.

Just a few chapters later in Genesis, the fact that man is made in God's image is given as the reason why we are not to murder other people and why murderers should be punished by death, since they devalue another individual's life, taking it lightly: "Whoever sheds the blood of man, by man shall his blood be shed; for in the image of God has God made man" (Gen. 9:6).

Bible students have debated the full meaning of what it means to be made in the image of God for centuries. This is not surprising since being made in God's image means to be like God and God is above and far beyond us, beyond even our full understanding. Nevertheless, we can know a few things:

1. Personality. To be made in God's image means to possess the attributes of personality, as God himself does, but animals, plants, and matter do not. This involves knowledge, memory, feelings, and a will. Of course, there is a sense in which animals have what we call personalities, meaning that individuals in a species sometimes behave differently than others in the species. But animals do not create. They do not love or worship. Personality, in the sense I am writing about here, is something that links human beings to God but does not link either God or man to the rest of creation.

2. Morality. The second characteristic of being made in the image of God is morality, for God is a moral God and those made in his image are made with the capacity to discern between what is right and wrong, between good and evil. This involves the further elements of freedom and responsibility. To be sure, the freedom of human beings is not absolute, as God's freedom is. We are not free to do all things. We are limited. Nevertheless, our freedom is a true freedom, even when we use it wrongly as Adam and Eve did when they sinned. They lost their original righteousness as a result. But they were still free to sin, and they were free in their sinful state afterward in the sense that they were still able to make right and wrong choices. Moreover, they continued to be responsible for them.

3. Spirituality. The third feature of being made in the image of God is spirituality, which means that human beings are able to have fellowship with God. Another way of saying this is to say that "God is spirit" (John 4:24) and that we are also spirits meant for eternal fellowship with him. Nothing can be greater than that for human beings, and the Westminster Shorter Catechism states it well when it says in the answer to the first question: "Man's chief end is to glorify God and to enjoy him forever."

Perhaps at this point we are beginning to see why secular humanism is so bad and not just a less attractive option than Christianity. Humanism sounds like it is focusing on man and elevating man, but it actually strips away the most valuable parts of human nature. As far as personality goes, it reduces us to mere animal urges, as Sigmund Freud tried to do. Regarding morality, instead of remaining responsible moral agents, which is our glory, we are turned into mere products of our environment or our genetic makeup, as B. F. Skinner asserts. As far as spirituality is concerned, how can we maintain a relationship to God if there is no God and we are made the measure of all things?

To refer again to Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn, in humanism "things higher, warmer, and purer" are drowned out by "today's mass living habits and TV stupor." We can make engrossing fiveminute TV videos or commercials, but we no longer build cathedrals.

The Doctrine of the Fall

What is the problem, then? If human beings are more important and more valuable than the humanists imagine, why is it that things are so bad? The answer is the Christian doctrine of sin, which tells us that although people are more valuable than secularists imagine, they are in worse trouble than the humanists can admit. We have been made in God's image, but we have lost that image, which means that we are no longer fully human or as human as God intends us to be. We are fallen creatures.

Here I think of something I wrote about in the first volume of these studies, when I was looking closely at Romans 1. Romans 1 is about human beings falling down a steep slippery slope when they abandon God, and I pointed out that the conceptual framework for this downbound slide is found in Psalm 8. Psalm 8 both begins and ends with the words: "O Lord, our Lord, how majestic is your name in all the earth" (vv. 1, 9). In the middle it talks about the created order. So the beginning and ending teach that everything begins and ends with God, rather than with man, and that if we think clearly we will agree with this.

Then it describes men and women particularly:

> When I consider your heavens, the work of your fingers, the moon and the stars, which you have set in place, what is man that you are mindful of him, the son of man that you care for him?

You made him a little lower than the heavenly beings and crowned him with glory and honor.
You made him ruler over the works of your hands; you put everything under his feet: all flocks and herds, and the beasts of the field.

Psalm 8:3-7

These verses fix man at a very interesting place in the created order: lower than the angels ("the heavenly beings") but higher than the animals—somewhere in between. This is what Thomas Aquinas saw when he described man as a mediating being. He is like the angels in that he has a soul. He is like the beasts in that he has a body. The angels have souls but not bodies, while the animals have bodies but not souls.

But here is the point. Although man is a mediating being, created to be somewhere between the angels and the animals, in Psalm 8 he is nevertheless described as being somewhat lower than the angels rather than as being somewhat higher than the beasts, which means that he is destined to look not downward to the beasts, but upward to the angels and beyond them to God and so to become increasingly like him. But if we will not look up, if we reject God, as secularism does, then we will inevitably look downward and so become increasingly like the lower creatures and behave like them. We will become beastlike, which is exactly what is happening in our society. People are acting like animals, and even worse.

Over the last few decades I have noticed that our culture is tending to justify bad human behavior on the ground that we are, after all, just animals. I saw an article in a scientific journal about a certain kind of duck. Two scientists had been observing a family of these ducks, and they reported something in this duck family that they called "gang rape." I am sure they did not want to excuse this crime among humans by the comparison they were making, but they were suggesting that gang rape among humans is at least understandable given our animal ancestry. The inference comes from the evolutionary, naturalistic worldview they espoused.

A story of a similar nature appeared in the September 6, 1982, issue of Newsweek magazine. It was accompanied by a picture of an adult baboon holding a dead infant baboon, and over this there was a headline that read: "Biologists Say Infanticide Is as Normal as the Sex Drive—And That Most Animals, Including Man, Practice It." The title is as revealing in its way as Carl Sagan's "The cosmos is all that is or ever was or ever will be." It identifies man as an animal, and it justifies his behavior on the basis of that identification. The sequence of thought goes like this: (1) Man is an animal, (2) Animals kill their offspring, (3) Therefore, it is all right (or at least understandable) that human beings kill their offspring.

The argument is fallacious, of course. Most animals do not kill their offspring. They protect their young and care for them. But even if in a few instances some animals do kill their offspring, this is still not comparable to the crimes of which human beings are capable. In the United States alone we kill over one and a half million babies each year by abortion—usually just for the convenience of the mother. And the number of outright murders is soaring.

The Doctrine of Redemption

My point in these last two studies has been that renewing our minds begins with understanding and applying the great Christian doctrines, and thus far we have at least touched on four of them: the doctrines of God, revelation, man, and the fall. This is a proper starting place for our thinking if we are serious about what Paul is urging upon us in our text from Romans, "be transformed by the renewing of your mind."

In the next study I will move on to the final phrase of verse 2 to ponder what it means to "test and approve what God's will is." But before I do that I want to mention the doctrine of redemption, without which nothing in either of these last two studies would be complete.

The doctrine of redemption—the fact that "God so loved the world that he gave his one and only Son, that whoever believes in him shall not perish but have eternal life" (John 3:16)—infinitely intensifies everything I have been saying about man being both more valuable than the humanists can imagine as well as also being worse than they can possibly suppose.

The doctrine of redemption intensifies man's value because it teaches that even in his fallen state, a condition in which he hates God and kills his fellow creatures, man is still so valuable to God that God planned for and carried out the death of his own precious Son to save him. At the same time, this doctrine teaches that man's state is indescribably dreadful, because it took nothing less than the death of the very Son of God to accomplish it.

I want to close this study by referring again to what I regard as the greatest single piece of writing produced by the great Christian scholar and apologist C. S. Lewis. It was preached as a sermon in the summer of 1941, but it is known to us as an essay called "The Weight of Glory." Lewis begins by probing for the meaning of glory, recognizing that it is something of the very essence of God that we desire. It is something "no natural happiness will satisfy." At the same time it is also something from which we, in our sinful state, have been shut out. We want it. We sense that we are destined for it. But glory is beyond us—apart from what God has done to save us and make us like himself.

At the end of the essay, Lewis applies this to how we should learn to think about other people. We should understand that they are either going to be brought into glory, which is a supreme and indescribable blessing, or else they are going to be shut out from it—forever. Here he says, "It is a serious thing to live in a society of possible gods and goddesses, to remember that the dullest and most uninteresting person you can talk to may one day be a creature which, if you saw it now, you would be strongly tempted to worship, or else a horror and a corruption such as you now meet, if at all, only in a nightmare.... There are no ordinary people. You have never talked to a mere mortal. Nations, cultures, arts, civilizations—these are mortal, and their life is to ours as the life of a gnat. But it is immortals whom we joke with, work with, marry, snub, and exploit—immortal horrors or everlasting splendors." What Lewis is doing in that essay is helping us to develop a Christian mind about other people, and his bottom line is that we will treat others better only if we learn to think of them in these terms.

Chapter 189.
God's Good, Pleasing, and Perfect Will

Romans 12:2

Some time ago the staff of the Bible Study Hour prepared a brochure that compared the world's thinking and the Bible's teaching in six important areas: God, man, the Bible, money, sex, and success. The differences were striking, but what impressed me most as I read over the brochure was how right many of the world's ideas seemed if not considered critically and biblically. We hear the world's approach given out so often, so attractively, and so persuasively, especially on television, that it's imperative that we think critically about it.

Here are some of the world's statements we printed:

"I matter most, and the world exists to serve me. Whatever satisfies me is what's important."

"If I earn enough money, I'll be happy. I need money to provide security for me and my family.
Financial security will protect me from hardship."

"Anything is acceptable as long as it doesn't hurt another person."

"Success is the path to fame, wealth, pleasure, and power. Look out for number one."

How about the Christian way? From the world's perspective the Christian way does not look attractive or even right. It says such things as:

"God is in control of all things and has a purpose for everything that happens."

"Man exists to glorify God."

"Money cannot shield us against heartbreak, failure, sin, disease, or disaster."

"Success in God's kingdom means humility and service to others."

Because we are so much part of the world and so little like Jesus Christ, even Christians find God's way unappealing. Nevertheless, we are to press on in that way and prove by our lives that the will of God really is good, pleasing, and perfect in all things.

I find it significant that this is where Paul's statements about being transformed by the renewing of our minds—rather than being conformed to the patterns of this world—end. They end with proving the way of God to be the best way and the will of God to be perfect. This means that action is needed: God is not producing hothouse or ivory-tower Christians. He is forming people who will prove the value of God's way by conscious choices and deliberate obedience.

This point was expressed well by Robert Candlish, one of the best Scottish exegetes of the last century. He wrote, "The believer's transformation by the renewing of his mind is not the ultimate end which the Holy Spirit seeks in his regenerating and renovating work. It is the immediate and primary design of that work, in one sense. We are created anew in Christ Jesus. That new creation is what the Holy Spirit first aims at and effects. But 'we are created in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them' (Eph. 2:10). The essence of a good work is the doing of the will of God. The proving of the will of God, therefore, is a fitting sequel of our 'being transformed by the renewing of our mind.' "

God Has a Will for Each of Us

This last part of Romans 12:1-2 is not difficult to handle because the points are obvious. The first is this: God has a good, pleasing, and perfect will for each of us. Otherwise, how would it be possible for us to test and approve what that will is?

But this requires some explanation. Today when Christians talk about discovering the will of God what they usually have in mind is praying until God somehow discloses a specific direction for their lives—who they should marry, what job they should take, whether they should be missionaries, what house they should buy, and so forth. This is not exactly what proving the will of God means, nor is it what Romans 12:2 is teaching. The will of God is far more important than that.

You may recall that I discussed the matter of knowing the will of God earlier in this series, when I was writing on Romans 8:27, the verse that speaks about the Holy Spirit interceding "for the saints in accordance with God's will." I pointed out that Garry Friesen, a professor at Multnomah School of the Bible, and J. Robin Maxson, a pastor from Klamath, Oregon, had written a very good book on that subject entitled Decision Making and the Will of God. They distinguished between three meanings of the word will: first, God's sovereign will, which is hidden and is not revealed to us except as it unfolds in history; second, God's moral will, which is revealed in Scripture; and third, God's specific will for individuals, which is what people are usually thinking about when they speak of searching for or finding God's will. These authors rightly accepted the first two of these wills, but they disagreed with the idea that God has a specific will for each life and that it is the duty of the individual believer to find that will or "live in the center of it."

My evaluation of this book was that it is helpful in cutting away many of the hang-ups that have nearly incapacitated some Christians. Its exposure of the weakness of subjective methods of determining guidance is astute. Its stress on the sufficiency of Scripture in all moral matters is essential. My only reservation was that it does not acknowledge that God does indeed have a specific (though usually hidden) will for us or adequately recognize that God does sometimes reveal that will in special situations.

We may not know what that specific will is, and we do not need to be under pressure to "discover" it, fearing that if we miss it, somehow we will be doomed to a life outside the center of God's will. We are free to make decisions with what light and wisdom we possess.

Nevertheless, we can know that God does have a perfect will for us, that the Holy Spirit is praying for us in accordance with that will, and that this will of God for us will be done— because God has decreed it and because the Holy Spirit is praying for us in this area.

Still, having said all this, I need to add that this is not primarily what Romans 12:2 is talking about when it speaks of God's will. In this verse will is to be interpreted in its context, and the context indicates that the will of God that we are encouraged to follow is the general will of offering our bodies to God as living sacrifices, refusing to be conformed to the world's ways, and instead being transformed from within by the renewing of our minds. It is this that we are to pursue and thus find to be good, pleasing, and perfect, though, of course, if we do it, we will also find ourselves working out the details of God's specific will for our lives.

Good, Pleasing, and Perfect

The second obvious point about the ending of Romans 12:2 is that the will of God is good, pleasing, and perfect. It teaches about the nature of God's will for us.

1. The will of God is good. In a general way the will of God for every Christian is revealed in the Bible. Romans 8 contains a broad expression of this plan: that we might be delivered from God's judgment upon us for our sin and instead be made increasingly like Jesus Christ. The five specifically highlighted steps of this plan, as presented in verses 29-30, include (1) foreknowledge, (2) predestination, (3) effectual calling, (4) justification, and (5) glorification.

But there are also many specifics. The Ten Commandments contain some of these. It is God's will that we have no other gods before him, that we do not worship even him by the use of images, that we do not misuse his name, that we remember the Sabbath day by keeping it holy, that we honor our parents, that we do not murder or commit adultery or steal or give false testimony or covet (Exod. 20). The Lord Jesus Christ amplified upon many of these commandments and added others. It is God's will that we be holy (1 Thess. 4:3). It is God's will that we should pray (1 Thess. 5:17). Above all Jesus taught that we are to "love each other" (John 15:12).

These things often do not seem good to us, because we are far from God and are still thinking in the world's way. Nevertheless, they are good, which we will discover if we will obey God in these areas and put his will into practice. As one of the great Romans commentators, Robert Haldane, says, "The will of God is here distinguished as good, because, however much the mind may be opposed to it and how much soever we may think that it curtails our pleasures and mars our enjoyments, obedience to God conduces to our happiness."

2. The will of God is pleasing. Pleasing to whom? Not to God, of course. That is obvious. Besides, we do not have to prove that God is pleased by his own will, nor could we. When Paul encourages us to prove that God's will is a pleasing will, he obviously means pleasing to us. That is, if we determine to walk in God's way, refusing to be conformed to the world and being transformed instead by the renewing of our minds, we will not have to fear that at the end of our lives we will look back and be dissatisfied or bitter, judging our lives to have been an utter waste. On the contrary, we will look back and conclude that our lives were well lived and be satisfied with them.

I was talking with a Christian man whose mother was dying. The mother was not a Christian, and she had become very bitter, although she had not been a bitter person before. She felt that everyone was turning against her, even her children, who actually were trying to help her. This man said to me, "I am convinced that Christians and non-Christians come to the end of their lives very differently. Those who are not Christians feel that they do not deserve to end their lives with failing health and pain, and they think their lives have been wasted. Christians are satisfied with what God has led them through and has done for them. It is better to die as a Christian." I think that is exactly right. It is what Paul is saying.

3. The will of God is perfect. There are a number of words in the Greek language that are translated by our word perfect. One is akribôs, from which we get our word accurate, meaning correct. Another is katartizô, which means well fitted to a specific end, like a perfect solution to a puzzle. The word in Romans 12:2 is different. It is teleios, which has the thought of something that has attained its full destiny, is complete. It can be used of one who is mature, a mature adult. It is used of Jesus, who became a complete, or perfect, man. It is used of the end of history. In our text it means that those who do the will of God discover that it is not lacking in any respect. There is a satisfying wholeness about it.

To put this in negative form, it means that if we reach the end of our lives and are dissatisfied with them, this will only mean that we have been living in the world's way and have been conformed to it rather than having been transformed by the renewing of our minds. We will have been living for ourselves rather than for God and others.

We Need to Check It Out

The third obvious point of this verse is that we need to prove by our experience that the will of God is indeed what Paul tells us it is—good, pleasing, and perfect. We need to check it out. It is by checking it out that we will begin to find out what it actually is.

This is the exact opposite of our normal way of thinking. Usually we want God to tell us what his will for us is, and after that we want to be able to decide whether it is good, pleasing, or perfect, and thus whether or not we want to do it. Romans 12:2 tells us that we have to start living in God's way and that it is only as we do that we will begin to know it in its fullness and learn how good it really is. Robert Candlish says, "The will of God... can be known only by trial.... No one who is partaker of a finite nature and who occupies the position of a subject or servant under the authority of God, under his law, can understand what... the will of God is otherwise than through actual experience. You cannot explain to him beforehand what the will of God is and what are its attributes or characteristics. He must learn this for himself. And he must learn it experimentally. He must prove in his own person and in his own personal history what is... 'that good and acceptable and perfect will of God.' "

God's Creatures and Probation

One of the most valuable parts of Candlish's study is the way he follows up on this idea, noting that the idea of proving the will of God experimentally goes a long way toward explaining the Bible's teaching about probation. This word is derived from the word prove and refers to a trial or test. According to Candlish, every order of free and intelligent being has been called upon to stand trial in the sense that ultimately it was created to prove that the will of God is good, pleasing, and perfect —or, if the creature should reject that will and fail the test, to prove that the contrary will of the world is disappointing and defective. Candlish reminds us of the following biblical examples.

1. The angels. We are not told much in the Bible about the trial of the angels, but it is certain that they did stand trial and that some of them failed that trial and so entered into the rebellion led by Satan and passed under the severe judgment of Almighty God.

Candlish speculates that the specific issue of that trial may have been the command to worship the Son of God: "When God brings his firstborn into the world, he says, 'Let all God's angels worship him'" (Heb. 1:6). But whether or not this was the specific matter the angels of God were to prove good, pleasing, and perfect, it is clear that many did not regard God's will as such. It is why they rebelled against it. And even those who did adhere to God's will must have done so not knowing then the full goodness, satisfaction, or perfection of what they were being called upon to do. They have been learning it since by their doing of it; that is, they have been learning it experimentally (cf. Eph. 3:8-11).

2. Man in his pristine state. The second case of probation is man in his pristine state. We know a great deal more about this than we do about the trial of the angels, since it concerns us most directly and is revealed to us for that reason. Adam and Eve were required to prove the good, pleasing, and perfect will of God in the matter of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, refusing to eat of it because God had forbidden it to them. We know how this turned out. When weighed against what they considered to be more desirable ("you will be like God, knowing good and evil," Gen. 3:5), our first parents chose the way of sin, ate of the tree, and paid the price of their transgression.

Candlish argues that if Adam and Eve had kept the will of God, though it did not seem desirable at that stage of their lives, "They would have found by experience that what God announced to them as his will was really in itself, as the seal of his previous covenant of life and as the preparation for the unfolding of his higher providence, fair, reasonable [and] good.... They would have learned experimentally that it was suited to their case and circumstances, deserving of their acceptance, sure to become more and more pleasing as they entered more and more into its spirit and became more and more thoroughly reconciled to the quiet simplicity of submission which it fostered."

But they did not prove it to be such and therefore brought sin, judgment, and death upon the race.

3. The Lord Jesus Christ. The third example is Jesus Christ, who in his incarnate state took it upon himself to prove that God's will was indeed good, pleasing, and perfect, even though it involved the pain of the cross, which in itself hardly seemed good, pleasing, or even acceptable.

In the garden Jesus prayed that the cross might be taken from him, adding, "Yet not as I will, but as you will" (Matt. 26:39). The author of Hebrews says, "During the days of Jesus' life on earth, he offered up prayers and petitions with loud cries and tears to the one who could save him from death, and he was heard because of his reverent submission. Although he was a son, he learned obedience from what he suffered" (Heb. 5:7-8). In the Book of Philippians Paul speaks of Jesus humbling himself and becoming "obedient to death—even death on a cross!" (Phil. 2:8).

Writes Candlish, "It must have been, it often was, with him a struggle—an effort—to do the will of God. It was not easy, it was not pleasant. It was self-denial, self-sacrifice, self-crucifixion throughout. It was repulsive to the highest and holiest instincts of his pure humanity. It laid upon him most oppressive burdens; it brought him into most distressing scenes; it involved him in ceaseless, often thankless toil; it exposed him to all sorts of uncongenial encounters with evil men and evil angels. But he proved it. And in the proving of it, and as he was proving it, he found it to be good and acceptable and perfect."

4. Christians. And what of ourselves, we who confess Jesus Christ to be our Lord and Savior? We are on trial now, and the matter of our probation is whether or not we will embrace the will of God for our lives, turning from the world and its ways, and so prove by the very embracing of that will that it is exactly what God declares it to be when he calls it perfect.

Who is to do that? You are, and you are to do it in the precise earthly circumstances into which God has placed you.

How are you to do it? You are to do it experimentally—that is, by actually putting the revealed will of God to the test.

When are you to do it? Right now and tomorrow and the day after that. You are to do it repeatedly and consistently and faithfully all through your life until the day of your death or until Jesus comes again.

Why are you to do it? Because it is the right thing to do, and because the will of God really is good, pleasing, and perfect.

Candlish says this:

Of the fashion of the world, it may be truly said that the more you try it, the less you find it to be satisfying. It looks well; it looks fair, at first. But who that has lived long has not found it to be vanity at last?

It is altogether otherwise with the will of God. That often looks worst at the beginning. It seems hard and dark. But on! On with you in the proving of it! Prove it patiently, perseveringly, with prayer and pains. And you will get growing clearness, light, enlargement, joy. You will more and more find that "the path of the just is as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day." For "wisdom's ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace." "The judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether. More to be desired are they than gold, yea, than much fine gold; sweeter also than honey, and the honeycomb. Moreover by them is thy servant warned; and in keeping of them there is great reward."

Part Seventeen.

The Christian and Other People

Chapter 190.
First Things First

Romans 12:3

Some time ago I came across the story of a man who imagined himself to be quite spiritual. He was talking with a more mature friend, and he asked his friend to pray for him that he might be humble. "Pray for me that I might be nothing," he said.

His friend replied with some wisdom, probably thinking of 1 Corinthians 1:28, "You are nothing, brother. Take it by faith."

This is what Paul wants us to do in Romans 12:3, as he moves from his profound development of the first principles of the Christian life in Romans 12:1-2 to a discussion of a Christian's right relationship to other people that fills the remainder of the chapter. His words specifically combine a right estimation of ourselves with faith, though in a slightly different sense from my story. "For by the grace given me I say to every one of you: Do not think of yourself more highly than you ought, but rather think of yourself with sober judgment, in accordance with the measure of faith God has given you," Paul says.

Robert S. Candlish outlines Romans 12 in three parts: (1) the Christian's relationship to God (vv. 1-2), (2) the Christian's relationship to the church (vv. 3-13), and (3) the Christian's relationship to a hostile world (vv. 14-21). If we follow his outline, we are at the start of section two, the Christian's relationship to the church. Much of what follows is indeed about the church, but it is important to see that in starting this discussion Paul focuses first on the Christian's estimate of himself alone, since he knows that none of us will ever properly evaluate and esteem other Christians within the fellowship of the church if our pride is in the way.

It is a matter of dealing with first things first—first, a right relationship with God; second, a proper evaluation of myself; third, a right relationship with other people.

Two Ways of Thinking

All of these relationships involve the mind, of course. Paul has been telling us not to be conformed to the pattern of this world but rather "to be transformed by the renewing of your mind." Now he spells out what this means, beginning, "Do not think of yourself more highly than you ought, but rather think of yourself with sober judgment."

Even in this English translation we cannot miss the fact that verse 3 repeats twice the idea of thinking. There is a wrong kind of thinking that we are to reject (thinking too highly of ourselves) and a right kind of thinking that we are to embrace (thinking soberly).

In the Greek text, however, the emphasis on right as opposed to wrong thinking is even stronger than this, since the word for thinking (phronein), occurs four times, twice with prefixes. Phronein means to make a right estimate of things. A fairly literal translation of verse 3 would go like this: "I say through the grace that is given to me, to every one of you, that you should not estimate yourself beyond what you should estimate, but that you should estimate yourself in such a way as to have a sensible estimate of yourself."

Two Common Errors

There are two possible errors in this kind of self-evaluation: 1. To think of ourselves more highly than we ought to think. This is the greater of the two dangers, because it is the one that comes to us most naturally. The reason it does is that it is linked to pride, the first and most deadly of the seven deadly sins. Almost everyone thinks more highly of himself than he ought, and we also want other people to have similarly exalted opinions of us.

How do we think more highly of ourselves than we ought? Some people have high opinions of themselves because of their having been born into a family distinguished because of its wealth or the achievement of some illustrious ancestor. People like this have a recognizable name—Astor, Rockefeller, or Dupont, for example. Perhaps they are related to someone who has achieved recognition in the media or because of public office. Name-droppers fit into this category. They are always telling you about the celebrity they had lunch with last week or the congressmen they will be speaking to tomorrow. Perhaps the person has achieved a recognizable name himself. She is mentioned in the press, or he has appeared on the major television talk shows.

In the last century in England there was a snob by the name of Oscar Browning. He wanted to meet Alfred Lord Tennyson, so he sought him out on the Isle of Wight, where Tennyson was staying, marched up to him, shook him by the hand and announced, "I am Browning."

Tennyson knew only one Browning, the poet Robert Browning. He looked at Oscar Browning carefully. "No, no you're not," he said and walked away.

It would be nice if this type of pride did not exist among Christians, but unfortunately, it does. Some take pride simply in knowing a Christian leader, or in working with him or her. Some take pride in their denomination or their particular church. They act as if it is more important to be a Presbyterian or an Episcopalian or a Baptist (or whatever else they might be) than to be a Christian.

Other people think more highly of themselves than they should because of their exceptional education. That is, they think they know more than other people or are simply smarter than others.

Still other individuals have high opinions of themselves because they have been given unusual power, or seek it. Not long ago Michael Scott Horton edited a book titled Power Religion: The Selling Out of the Evangelical Church? in which he documented the pursuit of worldly power by evangelicals. He covered such important subjects as power politics, power evangelism, power growth, the power within, and power preachers. His conclusion:

Even in the Christian world there is a tremendous spirit of self-confidence and pride: our church growth projects will at last usher in the kingdom; or we will do it by performing signs and wonders, what some proponents even refer to as "magic," or perhaps we will rule by taking over the public institutions and exerting political, social and economic pressure on the enemies of Christ; others may wish to achieve power through tapping the inner resources of the individual through the latest offerings of pop-psychology; some will demonstrate this self-confidence by reinforcing personality cults, legalistic restrictions and peer pressure; finally, some will appeal to the power of fear and paranoia to gather followings, as if they had an inside tract on such divine secrets as the date of our Lord's return. Evangelical gatherings are often marked by a certain smugness about the uniqueness of our generation in God's plan.

None of this is unique to our time, of course. We see it in all ages of the Christian church. We remember, for instance, that Paul was writing Romans from Corinth on his third missionary journey—that is, while he was living in the midst of a church that had been marked by the pursuit of such worldly goals as family prestige, education, and political power. He reminded these people of their humble origin, thus encouraging them not to think of themselves more highly than they ought to think—the very thing he is doing in Romans: "Brothers, think of what you were when you were called. Not many of you were wise by human standards; not many were influential; not many were of noble birth. But God chose the foolish things of the world to shame the wise; God chose the weak things of the world to shame the strong. He chose the lowly things of this world and the despised things—and the things that are not—to nullify the things that are, so that no one may boast before him" (1 Cor. 1:26-29).

2. To think too lowly of ourselves, a false humility. The second error in our evaluation of ourselves is to think too lowly of ourselves and so exude a false kind of humility. Sometimes this is really pride, because when we tell people bad things about ourselves what we really want them to say is, "No, I don't think you're like that at all. I think you're really intelligent (or wise or attractive or kind or whatever)."

"That helps," we say. "Keep it up. Tell me more. I'd like you to talk me out of this."

When we act like that we are really being proud rather than humble, and we show it at once if the other person agrees with our earlier negative self-evaluation. We are offended when a friend says, "Yes, I guess you really are stupid" (or ugly or ineffective or a hopeless case).

On the other hand, some people really do have too low an opinion of themselves and need to find a proper self-esteem. These people need to do this not by propping themselves up artificially— that is, by telling themselves that they are brilliant when they are not, or beautiful when they are plain, or effective when they are actually ineffective and bungling—but rather by finding a proper self-evaluation in spiritual terms. If they are Christians, they need to recognize that they have been made by God and that, however ineffective they may feel—and actually be—in themselves, they are important to God, who has made them to do "good works" (Eph. 2:10).

The Right Way to Think about Ourselves

One of the problems we have is that we usually think about ourselves too much. Yet the solution Paul offers is not to stop thinking about ourselves entirely but instead to start thinking about ourselves in a right way. This has two parts: (1) We are to think of ourselves "with sober judgment" and (2) We are to think of ourselves "in accordance with the measure of faith God has given."

1. With sober judgment. Not long ago I was reading a study of Romans by the late Ray Stedman, former pastor of the Peninsula Bible Church of Palo Alto, California. He said that every morning when he got up he tried to remind himself of three things:

First, I am made in the image of God. I am not an animal and I don't have to behave like an animal. I have an ability within me, given to me by God himself, to respond and relate to God. Therefore I can behave as a man and not as a beast.

Second, I am filled with the Spirit of God. The most amazing thing has happened! Though I don't deserve it in the least degree, I have the power of God at work within me. I have become, in some sense, the bearer of God, and God himself is willing to be at work in me through the problems and pressures I go through this day.

Third, I am part of the plan of God. God is working out all things to a great and final purpose in the earth, and I am part of it. What I do today has purpose and significance and meaning. This is not a meaningless day I am going through. Even the smallest incident, the most apparently insignificant word or relationship, is involved in his great plan. Therefore all of it has meaning and purpose.

Stedman says rightly that there is nothing better than this to set us up on our feet and give us "confidence without conceit." When we think of ourselves in this way we are indeed thinking soberly and evaluating ourselves as God's creatures without either vanity or a lack of proper selfesteem.

2. In accordance with the measure of faith God has given. The second phrase Paul uses for thinking rightly about ourselves is "in accordance with the measure of faith God has given you." This is a little bit more than simply seeing ourselves as made in the image of God, given the Holy Spirit of God, and having part in the overall plan of God. It involves what each one of us is uniquely—that is, as different from other people—and it leads to the discussion of spiritual gifts that follows in this chapter.

Faith here can be taken in three ways: (1) our confidence or trust in God —hence, "Think of yourself... in accordance with the measure of your actual trust in God" (that is, "not as trusting God more than you actually do"); (2) our knowledge of God or of "the faith" God has revealed— hence, "Think of yourself... according to the degree of knowledge about yourself and all people that you have attained" (that is, don't exaggerate the human condition); or (3) our individual spiritual gifts received by faith—hence, "Think of yourself... in accordance with the specific gifts or talents God has given you."

This last meaning is the most unusual, but it is the one to be preferred here because of the context. The first part of verse 3 looks back to what Paul has said in verses 1 and 2. We are to think "soberly" as one aspect of what it means to have a renewed mind. The second part of verse 3 looks ahead to what is going to be said about gifts. We are to understand that the church contains many members and that these have been given and exercise diverse endowments. We do not have all of these gifts ourselves, and we are to evaluate our contribution to the church on the basis of the gifts we have, not on the basis of another's talents.

John Murray says, "It is called the measure of faith in the restricted sense of the faith that is suited to the exercise of this gift, and this nomenclature is used to emphasize the cardinal place which faith occupies not only in our becoming members of this community but also in the specific functions performed as members of it."

So part of a genuine humility has to do with understanding the spiritual endowments God has given us, taking this seriously, and beginning to use those gifts for God. This is exactly where the remainder of this paragraph is going, of course. For after teaching us in the next two sentences that the church is made up of many diverse members and that these members possess different spiritual gifts, Paul continues: "If a man's gift is prophesying, let him use it in proportion to his faith. If it is serving, let him serve; if it is teaching, let him teach; if it is encouraging, let him encourage; if it is contributing to the needs of others, let him give generously; if it is leadership, let him govern diligently; if it is showing mercy, let him do it cheerfully" (vv. 6-8).

Each of us is responsible for discovering what our particular gifts are and using them. It is a false humility that says, "I don't have anything to offer to anyone. God can't use me." For the Glory of God

In Romans 12 Paul is speaking specifically of spiritual gifts—those that are to be exercised for spiritual ends within the fellowship and outreach of the church: prophesying, serving, teaching, encouraging, contributing to the needs of others, leadership, and showing mercy. But I think we are also to have a sober assessment of our natural abilities and acquired skills and that we are to use these to God's glory also. This is particularly true in our secular employment.

I think of a story told by Harry Ironside, a great Bible teacher of an earlier generation. Ironside's father died when he was quite young, so during his school days, on vacations, and on Saturdays, Ironside used to work for a Scottish shoemaker named Dan Mackay. The man was a Christian from the Orkney Islands who did his work well, and as he had opportunity he would speak to his customers about the importance of being born again.

Ironside's responsibility was to pound leather for the soles of the shoes. The cut cowhide was soaked in water and then placed on a piece of iron and pounded until it was hard and dry. This toughened the leather and made the soles last longer, but the pounding took a long time.

One day Ironside was walking by another cobbler's shop, and he saw that the owner was not pounding the leather soles at all. He simply took the soles out of the water and nailed them to the upper portion of the shoes with the water splashing out as he drove the nails in. Ironside went inside and asked him why he was doing his work that way. "Are they just as good as if they were pounded?" he asked.

The cobbler gave him a naughty wink and answered, "They come back all the quicker this way, my boy!"

Ironside thought he had learned something important. So he went back to the Christian cobbler, his boss, and suggested that maybe he was wasting his time pounding the leather to toughen it and get it dry. Mr. Mackay stopped his work and opened his Bible to Colossians 3:23-24, where he read, "Whatever you do, work at it with all your heart, as working for the Lord, not for men, since you know that you will receive an inheritance from the Lord as a reward."

He said, "Harry, I don't cobble shoes just for the money I get from my customers. I am doing this for the glory of God. I expect to see every shoe I have ever repaired in a big pile at the judgment seat of Christ, and I do not want the Lord to say to me in that day, 'Dan, this was a poor job. You did not do your best here.' I want him to be able to say, 'Well done, good and faithful servant.' "

Let me give a more recent example. Several years ago Charles Colson, the head of Prison Fellowship, and Jack Eckerd, founder of the well-known Eckerd Drug Store chain, teamed up on a book called Why America Doesn't Work, which examines America's loss of a sound work ethic. Their conclusion is that the problem is spiritual and that it requires spiritual solutions. Their suggestions concern a sober evaluation of ourselves as God's work and of why God has given us the work we have to do in life. "Why, then, should we work?" they ask. Here are their answers:

Because work gives expression to our creative gifts and thus fulfills our need for meaning and purpose.

Because work is intrinsically good when done with the proper attitude and motive.

Because we are commanded to exercise stewardship over the earth, participating in the work of creation in a way that glorifies God.

Because we are citizens of this earth and have certain responsibilities to our fellow citizens.

It is this moral character of work that historically has been the very heart of the work ethic.

So you see how practical this all is. A proper humility in which we learn to think soberly about ourselves does not lead to self-abnegation or inactivity, which honors no one. Instead it leads to the energetic use of every gift and talent God has given, knowing that they have come from him—that no glory is ever due to us—but because they do come from him, they must be used faithfully and wholeheartedly for his glory.

Chapter 191.
One Body in Christ

Romans 12:4-5

Anyone who is interested in the doctrine of the church and senses its importance must be a bit surprised to notice how little the word church actually occurs in the Bible. It is not found in the Old Testament at all. The first time it occurs is in Matthew 16:18, then again in Matthew 18:17. It is not in the other gospels. It is scattered throughout Acts, of course (about eighteen times), but it is found only five times in Romans, all in chapter 16 (vv. 1, 3, 5, 16, 23). There are quite a few instances in 1 Corinthians and Ephesians (eighteen and nine times respectively), but then the references become infrequent again. In the New International Version of the Bible the singular word church occurs only seventy-nine times. The explanation, of course, is that although the word church is itself relatively infrequent, the doctrine of the church is discussed many more times by other words and images.

That is the case in our text. Paul is beginning to talk about the church in Romans 12:4-5. His discussion is going to deal with church unity, the distribution of diverse gifts among the members of the church, and the way Christians in the church are to behave toward one another. But Paul does not use the word church. Instead he speaks of Christ's body: "Just as each of us has one body with many members, and these members do not all have the same function, so in Christ we who are many form one body, and each member belongs to all the others." This is an important text, because "the body of Christ" is a powerful image for the church. As we might expect, it is also found numerous other places in Paul's writings.

What Is the Church?

Most of us know that the church is not a building, though we say, "I'm going to church," meaning a building, or we speak about "building a church," again meaning a building. We know that the church is people. But how do these people fit into a particular congregation or a denomination in our thinking? We talk about the Episcopal Church or the Presbyterian Church or the Baptist Church. Are they "churches," even "the one true church" as some claim? Are they even churches at all? And what about the people in these denominations? Are all of them members of the church? If so, in what sense? Does membership in a particular organization make you a church member? What about those who watch services on television? Or what about those who were baptized and attended church at one time but who no longer attend?

Paul's image is very helpful at this point. For when he speaks of the body of Christ, obviously he is speaking of those who belong to Christ, who are joined to him in exactly the sense in which he speaks about our being joined to Christ in Romans 5 and elsewhere. This is a spiritual reality, invisible but supremely real. It is something that is accomplished by the Holy Spirit, and it has to do with faith in Christ, by which we become new creatures, having passed out of our death-union with Adam to a new life-union with the Savior.

Charles Colson has written a book on the church called The Body, in which he complains of a lack of definition and identity by supposedly Christian people. "The church—the body of God's people—has little to do with slick marketing or fancy facilities. It has everything to do with the people and the Spirit of God in their midst," he says.

John Stott has written, "The church is a people, a community of people, who owe their existence, their solidarity and their corporate distinctness from other communities to one thing only—the call of God."

Strictly speaking, the church of Jesus Christ, created by Jesus from among all peoples, is a New Testament reality. That is why the word church is found only in the New Testament. It is why

Jesus used the future tense when he replied to Peter's great confession in Matthew 16 by saying, "On this rock I will build my church" (v. 18). This church began at Pentecost when people from all nations were brought to faith in Jesus by the Holy Spirit. Acts lists them as having been "Parthians, Medes and Elamites; residents of Mesopotamia, Judea and Cappadocia, Pontus and Asia, Phrygia and Pamphylia, Egypt and the parts of Libya near Cyrene; visitors from Rome (both Jews and converts to Judaism); Cretans and Arabs" (2:9-11).

But this is not quite the whole story. If the church is the community of those who have been called by God, as Stott suggests in his definition of the church, then the Old Testament believers belonged to the church of Jesus Christ too. This is because they looked forward to Christ's coming and were joined to him by faith, just as we look back.

The key concept here is the covenant. This covenant is expressed in God's call of particular individuals (and not others) and by his entering into a formal agreement to save, protect, and bless them. For their part, the individuals are required to believe, worship, and obey God. Adam and Eve were part of this initial covenant, and so were their godly descendants listed in Genesis 5. We see the idea of a covenant formally and most clearly set out in God's calling of Abraham, with whom a special stage in the history of the Old Testament "church" begins. God said, "Leave your country, your people and your father's household and go to the land I will show you. I will make you into a great nation and I will bless you" (Gen. 12:1-2). Later that covenant was ratified by a ceremony in which God foretold the future history of Abraham's descendants and promised them a land of their own, "from the river of Egypt to the great river, the Euphrates" (Gen. 15:18; see vv. 12-21). Abraham's response was to believe God and worship him.

We find the same pattern in God's dealings with Isaac, Abraham's son, and with Jacob, his grandson. In each case the call of God is joined to a covenant promise, and this is followed by faith, worship, and obedience on the people's part. The church consists of all these people, those whom God has called from all times and from all places and has joined to Jesus Christ.

There Is One Body, One Church

Paul's image of the church as Christ's body not only defines the church as the community of those who have been joined to Christ, but it also teaches that there is only one church. There is but one church because Jesus has but one body.

Ephesians 4:4-6 parallels the ideas we find in Romans 12, only with greater elaboration since Ephesians is essentially a book about the church. Significantly, this passage occurs at the same point in Ephesians as our passage in Romans does, where Paul begins to apply the earlier doctrine of salvation to Christian living. He talks about believers being "humble and gentle," for example. Then he talks about the unity of the church, saying, "There is one body and one Spirit—just as you were called to one hope when you were called—one Lord, one faith, one baptism; one God and Father of all, who is over all and through all and in all" (Eph. 4:4-6). There are seven important unities in this passage:

1. One body. This is an important image for the church, because it pictures it as an organic whole rather than as a machine that is made up of independent parts. The church is not an airplane, a train, or an automobile. It is an organism in which the parts are alive and both support and depend on one another. In 1 Corinthians Paul writes, "God has combined the members of the body and has given greater honor to the parts that lacked it, so that there should be no division in the body, but that its parts should have equal concern for each other. If one part suffers, every part suffers with it; if one part is honored, every part rejoices with it" (1 Cor. 12:24-26).

2. One Spirit. The word Spirit is capitalized in this phrase because Paul is not thinking here that Christians share the same spirit in the sense that they are one in their enthusiasms and goals. He is referring to the work of the Holy Spirit in drawing us to Christ. We are all different. We have come to Christ along different roads. Nevertheless, the reason we have come along those roads at all is that the same Holy Spirit has been drawing us, so that at the theological level our conversion experiences are the same. We have all been awakened to our need. We have all been made alive in Christ. We have all believed on him. Moreover, the Holy Spirit is performing a work of sanctification in each of us, so that we are all working for Christ and are beginning to produce the fruit of the Holy Spirit, which is "love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness and self-control" (Gal. 5:22-23).

3. One hope. Today the word hope usually means something that is uncertain. But in the New Testament it refers to what is sure and certain but for which we wait. Paul calls this "one hope" because it embraces a unifying set of beliefs among Christians—namely, the return of Jesus Christ, the Resurrection, and the Final Judgment. Another way of thinking about the Christian's hope is to say that when Jesus returns we are going to be with him, all of us. People from all races and nations and economic backgrounds will be together with Jesus, and the many things that divide us now will be forgotten. If that is so, shouldn't there be ways in which we reach across denominational, racial, and other barriers and work together now? Shouldn't we be able to demonstrate our unity better than we do?

4. One Lord. To hear some Christians talk, you would think that there are many Lords. "I know a Jesus who causes me to do this, which excludes you," some say. Or, "Your Jesus isn't the Jesus I know." Well, there is such a thing as believing in or proclaiming a false Christ, who is not the Lord. We are not to have fellowship with unbelief. But usually that is not our problem. Our real problem is that we distrust Christians who are not made precisely in our mold. We need to realize that if others really believe in Christ, then the fact that we have this same Lord should draw us together.

5. One faith. This is not the subjective faith that we must have to be Christians. Here the word is being used objectively to refer to the content of faith, or the gospel, and it is teaching that there is only one body of genuine Christian doctrine, whatever our own limited understanding of it may be. Indeed, if we are really Christians, our differences must be in minor areas since by definition we all believe the major doctrines. As a rule, it would be helpful for us to explore the areas in which we agree with other Christians before we explore the points at which we differ.

6. One baptism. It is interesting that Paul should include baptism in a list of things that unite us since a diverse understanding of baptism is one of the things that has divided denominations most severely. The explanation, of course, is that Paul is not thinking of modes of baptism or even whether infants should be baptized. He is thinking of baptism as the sacrament in which we are publicly identified with Christ. If you have been identified with Jesus Christ by baptism, then you are also identified with all others who have likewise been baptized in his name.

7. One God. The final point of unity is "one God." We notice here that the first three of these points are grouped around the Holy Spirit: one body, one Spirit, one hope. The next three are grouped around the Lord Jesus Christ: one Lord, one faith, one baptism. This last item concerns the first person of the Godhead only.

Why is this the order? Probably because Paul is thinking from the effect to the cause. He begins with our being part of the church, and he asks, in effect, "How did we get to be part of the church?" The answer is: By the Holy Spirit joining us to Christ. The Holy Spirit made us part of one body and gave us one hope. Next question: "What, then, is the church? "Answer: Those who have Jesus Christ as Lord, who have believed on him and his work, and who have been identified with him publicly by baptism. The final questions are: But why did Jesus do this? And where did the idea of the church come from anyway? The answer is: Because it was God the Father's plan. The idea of the church comes from God the "Father of all, who is over all and through all and in all" (Eph. 4:6).

John Stott talks about the Trinity as the essential basis for church unity and sums it up like this: "There can be only one Christian family, only one Christian faith, hope and baptism, and only one Christian body, because there is only One God, Father, Son and Holy Spirit. You can no more multiply churches than you can multiply Gods. Is there only one God? Then he has only one church. Is the unity of God inviolable? Then so is the unity of the church.... It is no more possible to split the church than it is possible to split the Godhead."

The Problem with the Church Today

And yet we have split the church, or at least the visible church that people see. John Stott's concern in the book One People is that we have done it by dividing the clergy from the laity. His book is designed to recapture a proper lay ministry. Charles Colson is concerned about our institutions and our individualism. He wants to revive the spiritual vitality of Christ's body. Donald Grey Barnhouse, in his studies of Romans, was troubled by the way we have turned minor points of doctrine into major causes for division. He wanted to overcome that arrogance.

We see this problem on several levels today:

1. The institutional problem. The division or disunity of the church is a problem at the institutional level, of course. In the hymn "Onward, Christian Soldiers," we sing:

> We are not divided, all one body we; one in hope and doctrine, one in charity.

But even as we sing it, we know it is not true. Or we recite the Apostles' Creed, containing the words, "I believe in... the holy catholic church." Catholic means universal, broad, diverse, united. But though we may believe in a universal church, we seem to restrict our thoughts of the church to our own particular fellowship or denomination. It is this institutional problem that has captured the attention of some Christian leaders and through them has been a driving force behind the wellintentioned but misdirected and mostly unsuccessful ecumenical movement.

2. Individualism. It strikes me, however, that today the problem is not so much our institutions, since they do not mean a whole lot to most people anyway, but rather our individualism, which I would define as hyperpersonalized religion. It is the religion of "Jesus and me only." It is what sociologists and pollsters uncover whenever they explore America's religious attitudes and practices.

Many people know the name of Robert Bellah, author of the sociological study of American life called The Habits of the Heart. Bellah says that America has been infected with a virulent virus that he calls "radical individualism." It affects every area of life. People make up their own rules for everything, entirely apart from other people, and as a result they sometimes do terrible things to others. This "radical individualism" is particularly noticeable in religion. According to a USA Today survey, of the 56 percent of Americans who attend church, 46 percent do so because "it is good for you" (that is, "good for me"), and 26 percent go because it is where they hope to find "peace of mind and spiritual well-being." Truth—that is, specific doctrine—does not seem important to these people.

In Bellah's study there is a report of a woman named Sheila who considers herself to be very religious. "What is your religion?" she was asked. "I call it 'Sheilaism,'" she answered. "It's just my own little voice." The word for this is narcissism, derived from the ancient story of Narcissus, a young Greek athlete who was in love with himself and spent his time by a quiet pool staring at his own reflection. It is a part of being conformed to this world rather than being transformed by the renewing of our minds, and it is a radical departure from what religion in America used to be, and should be. "Today religion in America is as private and diverse as New England colonial religion was public and unified," says Robert Bellah. Clearly you cannot have "one body in Christ" if everyone is creating a private little a la carte religion for himself.

Maintain the Bond

So what is the challenge to informed biblical Christians in an age like ours? Well, the answer is not the ecumenical movement. Our task is not to create the unity of the body, above all not from the top down. The unity of the body is a given for those who are "in Christ." Nevertheless, we should work for any valid visible expression of our oneness in Christ that is attainable, and we should avoid unnecessary divisions and even try to learn from one another in a humble, teachable spirit, which is the point at which Paul started in verse 3.

In his study of this passage in his volumes on Romans, Donald Grey Barnhouse tells how he once made slighting remarks about a denomination he considered to be on the fringe of genuine Christianity. A minister from this denomination was present and afterwards told Barnhouse how grieved he was at what he considered an unjust judgment. Barnhouse apologized, and it was agreed that he would meet for lunch with four or five ministers from this particular church.

When they got together, Barnhouse, who had suggested the luncheon, made the additional suggestion that during lunch they should discuss only the points on which they agreed. Afterwards, when they had finished, they could talk about their differences. They began to talk about Jesus Christ and what he meant to each of them. The tension abated, and there was a measure of joy as each confessed that Jesus was born of a virgin, that he came to die for our sins and then rose again bodily. Each acknowledged Jesus Christ as Lord. Each agreed that Jesus was now in heaven at the right hand of God the Father praying for his church. They confessed that he had sent his Holy Spirit at Pentecost and that the Lord was living in each of his children by means of the Holy Spirit. They acknowledged the reality of the new birth and that they were looking forward to the return of Jesus Christ, after which they would be spending eternity together.

By this time the meal was drawing to a close. And when they turned to the matters that divided them, they found that they were indeed secondary—not unimportant, but secondary—and they recognized that they were areas in which they could agree to disagree without denying that each was nevertheless a member of Christ's body. Barnhouse confessed, "Though separated by a continent, I have often prayed for these men and am confident that they have prayed for me. We know that we are one in Christ. They made a distinct contribution to my spiritual life, and I contributed to theirs. I am the richer since I became acquainted with them." Something like that would be a very good experience for most of us.

Chapter 192.
God's Gifts to Christ's Body

Romans 12:6-8

In the last study we began to look at the doctrine of the church as it is presented to us under the image of Christ's body. This is a very rich image, and we saw two things it teaches. First, it teaches what it is to be a member of the church. To be a church member means to be a part of Christ's body, and this means that a person who is a member of the church must be joined to him. It is not a question of merely belonging to an organization, though that is also important in its place. It means to be united to Jesus Christ by the Holy Spirit so that we are no longer in Adam but "in Jesus." It is a spiritual reality.

The second thing we have seen about the church presented under the image of Christ's body is that it is a unity. That is, there is only one church just as there is only one body. You can no more have multiple churches than you can have multiple Christs or a multiple Godhead.

But the image of the church as Christ's body also signifies something else, and that is diversity in unity. It is what Paul is chiefly talking about in Romans 12, for he has just written, "Just as each of us has one body with many members, and these members do not all have the same function, so in Christ we who are many form one body, and each member belongs to all the others" (vv. 4-5). Paul calls the parts of the body "members." We are those members. So the image teaches that Christians have different gifts and are to function differently from others in the use of these gifts, while nevertheless being a part of the body and contributing to the body's unity.

Diversity of Gifts

Different gifts! It is hard for many of us to recognize this and accept it, because we are always wanting other Christians to be like us and function like us, or be cogs in our machine rather than contributing to another Christian's work. Paul knew Christians who had this trouble too, but he tells everyone that we must accept this diversity if the church is to function as it should.

This was important to Paul. Charismata, the word translated gifts, occurs seventeen times in the New Testament; sixteen of those occurrences are in Paul's writings.

Charismata is based on the word grace (charis) and actually means "a grace gift." It is something given to the people of God by God or, as can also be said, by Jesus Christ. Since grace is God's unmerited favor, the word indicates that spiritual gifts are dispensed by God according to his pleasure and that the gifts will differ. Every Christian has at least one gift, like the people who received talents in Christ's parables. Moreover, since these are given by God, they are to be used for his glory and according to his plans rather than to enhance our own glory or further our plans. This is where the thrust toward unity comes in. Each member of the body is to work toward the well-being of the whole so that when one member does well all the others do well and when one member suffers the entire body suffers.

Another way of saying this is to say that we not only belong to Christ, we also belong to one another. John Murray says of Christians, "They have property in one another and therefore in one another's gifts and graces." It would be correct to add that you, as a Christian, have a right to the gifts the other members of the body have been given, and they have a right to your gift. You cheat them if you do not use it, and you are poorer if you do not depend on them.

Exercising the Gifts

What these spiritual gifts are is not easy to say, because every time there is a listing of the gifts in the New Testament—five times in all (Rom. 12:6-8, 1 Cor. 12:8-10 and 28-30, Eph. 4:11, 1 Peter 4:11)—the specific items differ. Ephesians 4:11 seems to give the most basic list: apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastor/teachers. This is the way 1 Corinthians 12:28-30 starts too, but then it moves from what seems to be offices in the church to specific functions like working miracles, healing, helping, administering, speaking in tongues, and interpreting tongues. Romans 12:6-8 has a bit of both. First Peter 4:11 has only service and speaking, but these two items are categories into which other gifts fit.

Nineteen gifts are mentioned in these five lists, but the number is not absolute. Different words may describe the same gift, as with serving and helping, and there are probably gifts that could be mentioned but are not. Seven gifts are mentioned in Romans 12:

1. Prophesying. The first is prophesying. In 1 Corinthians 12:28 and Ephesians 4:11 this gift comes immediately after and is closely linked to the gift of "apostles." There were no apostles in the church at Rome at this time, so Paul does not mention apostles in the Romans list.

In our day the word prophesy retains only a shade of its former meaning, "foretelling the future." In the Old and New Testaments a prophet is one who speaks the words of God. The Greek word for prophet literally means "one who stood in front of another person and spoke for him." An example is the relationship between Moses and his brother Aaron. Moses was unwilling to accept God's call to go to Egypt, stand before Pharaoh, and demand that he let Israel go, because, as he said, "I have never been eloquent" (Exod. 4:10). God answered that he would send Aaron to speak for him. "You shall speak to him and put words in his mouth.... He will speak to the people for you, and it will be as if he were your mouth and as if you were God to him" (vv. 1516). Later this is explained by these words: "See, I have made you like God to Pharaoh, and your brother Aaron will be your prophet" (Exod. 7:1).

This is the sense in which Abraham is called a prophet in Genesis 20:7, because God spoke to him and he spoke God's words to other people. It is the same in the New Testament (Luke 7:2628, John 4:19; cf. Matt. 10:41; 13:57; Luke 4:24). There seem to have been quite a few such prophets in the early church, so much so that Paul devotes nearly the whole of 1 Corinthians 14 to discussing the gift of prophecy and the gift of tongues, which is closely linked to it. From this and other passages it would seem that the prophets were men who spoke under the immediate influence of the Holy Spirit to communicate a doctrine, remind people of a duty, or give a warning (cf. Acts 21:10-14).

Charles Hodge expresses it this way in his commentary on Romans: "The point of distinction between them [prophets] and the apostles, considered as religious teachers, appears to have been that the inspiration of the apostles was abiding, they were the infallible and authoritative messengers of Christ; whereas the inspiration of the prophets was occasional and transient. The latter differed from the teachers (didaskaloi), inasmuch as these were not necessarily inspired, but taught to others what they themselves had learned from the Scriptures or from inspired men."

The gift of prophecy in this sense, like the gift of apostleship, is something that is no longer with the church since, having the completed Old and New Testaments, we no longer need it. The Bible is for us the recorded testimony of these inspired men.

The really fascinating item in this mention of prophecy is the attached phrase "let him use it in proportion to his faith." The word translated proportion is the word analogia (analogue or analogy), which has given expositors the important hermeneutical principle known as the analogy of faith. This is the only place where these words occur in the Bible, but they have been seen to teach what is usually described as the need to compare one Scripture with another so that a passage that is clearly understood throws light on one less clear. From this principle derive the additional guidelines of a necessary unity and noncontradiction in the Bible.

There is some doubt as to whether this is exactly what is meant here. But whatever Paul means, he is implying some control of or limitation on the prophet. The last words of the phrase are literally "the faith" (not "his faith," as in the NIV). So if "the analogy of the faith" is meant, it would mean that even the prophet is bound by prior revelation. He is not to propound anything contrary to "the faith" that has already been delivered to the saints. We remember that in Galatians 1:8, Paul applied this test to both the apostles and angels, insisting that even they have to conform to the standard of right doctrine: "Even if we or an angel from heaven should preach a gospel other than the one we preached to you, let him be eternally condemned!"

If this does not refer to the analogy of faith and means only that the prophet is to speak in accordance with the measure of his own personal faith, it still implies a limitation, because the prophet is not to go beyond what God has given him to speak. So here is a contemporary application. If that was true of the ancient prophets, how much more true ought it to be of Bible teachers today. Anyone who is called to teach must be rigidly disciplined so as not to go beyond what God has actually revealed in Scripture. Our task is to expound the whole counsels, but only the whole counsels of God.

2. Serving. The next spiritual gift is serving. This Greek word is sometimes also translated ministry and applied to the "ministry [that is, teaching] of the word [of God]" (cf. Acts 6:4). But since teaching is mentioned next we should probably think of ministry more broadly here, that is, as embracing all kinds of ministry for the sake of Christ.

What is important to note is that the Greek word diakonian is the root of our word deacon. So what is being spoken of here is a diaconal, or service, ministry. Does this refer to the specific office of a deacon or deaconess in the church, as in Acts 6:1-6? Yes, but not only that. In the church all are called to serve others, though some are given this gift in special measure in order to lead others in the work. We need to remember that even Jesus was a deacon in that, as he said, "The Son of Man did not come to be served, but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many" (Matt. 20:28).

So let's do it! That is what the text says. In the case of prophecy, we are told that the prophet is to prophesy according to the "analogy" of faith or "in proportion to his faith." That is a qualification or directive. That is not the case here. Here the text just says, "If it is serving, let him serve." In other words, just do it!

In Charles Colson's book The Body, there are three quotations that stress service. William Booth, the founder of the Salvation Army, said to his missionaries to India: "Go to the Indian as a brother, which indeed you are, and show the love which none can doubt you feel... eat, drink and dress and live by his side. Speak his language, share his sorrow."

Count Zinzendorf, the founder of the Moravians, told his missionaries: "Do not lord it over the unbelievers but simply live among them; preach not theology but the crucified Christ."

Dietrich Bonhoeffer said, "The church is herself only when she exists for humanity.... She must take her part in the social life of the world, not lording it over men, but helping and serving them. She must tell men, whatever their calling, what it means to live in Christ, to live for others." In Life Together, a study of the meaning of Christian fellowship, Bonhoeffer has a whole chapter stressing the ministry of Christians to other Christians. It is, he says, a ministry of holding one's tongue, meekness, listening, helping, bearing burdens, yes, and also speaking the truth when it is needed. Each of us has a service ministry to perform, because each of us is called to be like Jesus Christ. Where can you serve? Where can you serve that you are not serving now?

3. Teaching. In one way or another, by one word or another, this gift occurs in each of the five New Testament lists. It is a critical gift, of course, the more so today since the gifts of apostleship and prophecy have ceased. I am sure that many have this gift. Ray Stedman says that in his opinion probably a third of all Christians have it and should be using it. If you know anything about Jesus and the gospel, you should teach what you know, formally if you have the opportunity but also informally by a casual word or testimony. You will be surprised what you are able to teach others.

I am a pastor. This is the preeminent gift of pastors, and this leads me to say to pastors that, having been called to teach, they must teach. No one has the opportunity a pastor has for carefully studying and faithfully expounding the Bible. What is more, if he does not do it, then in most churches it will not be done at all. Teaching is hard work, because we must learn ourselves before we teach. But what better calling can one have? So get on with it, and be faithful in it, if that is your gift. I notice that Paul handles his admonition here exactly as he handled it when he spoke of serving earlier, and as he will speak of encouraging later. No fuss. No fanfare. Just do it.

4. Encouraging. Encouragement has become a rather weak word for us, usually meaning little more than giving someone a slap on the back and saying "Good job" or "Well done." When we study the use of this word in the Bible, however, we find it is much more than this. The Greek word appears 107 times in the New Testament, and it is translated by such additional, powerful verbs as beseech, comfort, desire, pray, entreat, and console. It is the same word used of the Holy Spirit and his ministry in John 14-16. The New International Version translates it as Counselor (in John 14:15, 26; 15:26; 16:7), but the Greek is parakletos, which literally means "one who is called in alongside another to help out." Counselor is a synonym for lawyer, and it is worth noting that the precise Latin translation of parakletos is advocatus, which also means "one who is called alongside of," and that advocate is also a synonym for lawyer. If we put this thought into our passage, we get something like "Let the person who has the gift of getting alongside another person to help him or her, really do it. Let him stand by his friend and really help him."

What a tremendous need we have for those who are like that. Many people are hurting, but there are not many helping, because we are all so absorbed in ourselves and our own private affairs. We are living in a narcissistic age, another "Me Decade."

Exhortation was the gift of Barnabas, who traveled with Paul. In Acts 4:36 we are told that his real name was Joseph but that he was named Barnabas because Barnabas means "Son of Encouragement," and that is what he was. We may remember how he stood by John Mark to help him when Paul refused to take Mark along on one of his missionary journeys because he had deserted them earlier. Barnabas got alongside Mark, lifted him up, and reestablished him as a useful servant of Christ, which Paul acknowledged later (2 Tim. 4:11).

5. Contributing to the needs of others. John Calvin and some of the earlier commentators thought that this gift referred to an official church office—that is, to the diaconate that is particularly entrusted with this task. But there is no need to limit this to some official position, and most modern scholars do not. The deciding element seems to be Paul's teaching that those who have this gift are to give "generously." That is an appropriate thing to say if the person involved is giving out of his or her own funds. But the deacons administer the church's funds, and if this refers to deacons, it would be more appropriate to tell them to give carefully, judiciously, or prayerfully, realizing that it is other people's money they are handling.

Are you generous with what you have been given? Some people are so poor it is hard to imagine how they could give anything. But statistics tell us that it is the poor who are most generous in terms of proportionate giving. The very rich are the least generous. Do you have enough to eat, clothes to wear, a place to live, even money in the bank? Then think how you can best be generous with those who are needy or have nothing.

6. Leadership. It is interesting that Paul includes leadership in his list of Christian gifts. The word actually means government or good > administration, and it includes the task of management. This is an important quality to look for in elders, since they need to "manage," or "take care of God's church" (1 Tim. 3:5).

The excellent Swiss commentator F. Godet points out how important this must have been in the early church, when so many of the institutions we take for granted were lacking:

> Think of the numerous works of private charity which believers then had to found and maintain! Pagan society had neither hospitals nor orphanages, free schools or refuges [rescue missions], like those of our day. The church impelled by the instinct of Christian charity, had to introduce all these institutions into the world; hence no doubt, in every community, spontaneous gatherings of devout men and women who, like our present Christian committees, took up one or other of these needful objects, and had of course at their head directors charged with the responsibility of the work. Such are the persons certainly whom the apostle has in view in our passage.

I am not sure that this is exactly what Paul had in mind when he wrote this. But it is certainly one way this gift functions in the church, and it points to a similar and continuing need today. All the organizations we have require management. Those who manage well deserve honor.

7. Showing mercy. The final gift is showing mercy, and Paul's point is that this should be done cheerfully, not begrudgingly. The Greek word is hilarotêti, which gives us our word hilarious. How much we need a cheerful, hilarious spirit in the church! Too often our faces are grim and there is no spirit of joy to be found anywhere.

You and the Gift God Has Given

I close with a paragraph from Ray Stedman, who has written on spiritual gifts in a more helpful way than anyone I know. He asks in his study of Romans 12, "Who are you anyway?" It is a good question for us to ask. Stedman answers:

I am a son of God among the sons of men. I am equipped with the power of God to labor today. In the very work given me today God will be with me, doing it through me. I am gifted with special abilities to help people in various areas, and I don't have to wait until Sunday to use these gifts. I can use them anywhere. I can exercise the gift God has given me as soon as I find out what it is, by taking note of my desires and by asking others what they see in me and by trying out various things. I am going to set myself to the lifelong task of keeping that gift busy.

Paul told Timothy, "Fan into flame the gift of God, which is in you" (2 Tim. 1:6). That is exactly what you should do. You have a gift. The rest of the body needs it. You will be accountable for what you do with it. Use it so that one day you will hear Jesus say, "Well done, good and faithful servant! You have been faithful with a few things; I will put you in charge of many things. Come and share your master's happiness" (Matt. 25:21, 23).

Chapter 193.
The Greatest Thing in the World

Romans 12:9

After the first two verses of Romans 12, which establish the principles by which sound doctrine is to be applied to godly living, Paul has begun to write about the church. His words are not abstract theologizing: He is thinking of the people who make up the church, and his words have to do first with the humility that allows each to assess himself with sober judgment, and second with the knowledge that God has given spiritual gifts to all members of the church and that these must be exercised faithfully for the benefit of all. This line of thought continues in what follows, although in verse 9 the apostle moves from his discussion of spiritual gifts, which are of various sorts and appear in various individuals, to virtues that must be seen in all who call themselves Christians.

"Characteristically," says Australian professor Leon Morris, "he begins with love."

This same sequence, from a discussion of spiritual gifts to discussion of love, is found in 1 Corinthians, though on a larger scale. In that letter Paul talks about the gifts in chapter 12. This corresponds to Romans 12:4-8. Then he passes to the well-known hymn about love that is chapter 13. Romans 12:9-13 corresponds to 1 Corinthians 13.

In this study we begin with verse 9, which introduces the subject. What follows, in verses 10-13, is a further elaboration of how love functions. We will look at those verses in the next study.

Henry Drummond's Sermon

In 1883 the Scottish scientist and evangelist Henry Drummond gave a famous inspirational lecture at a mission station in central Africa called "The Greatest Thing in the World." It was about love, and it was based on 1 Corinthians 13, the great chapter on love—particularly on the last words: "But the greatest of these is love" (v. 13). Drummond was not what we would call an evangelical. I would judge from this and others of his writings I have read that he was basically a Christian humanist in that he believed that the Christian virtues could themselves, if sincerely practiced, save the world. There is not much about the cross or the atonement or the work of the Holy Spirit in his work. Still, "The Greatest Thing in the World" is a classic, and no less an evangelical than D. L. Moody, who heard Drummond give this talk in America the following year, said he had never listened to "anything so beautiful."

Drummond was right in at least one thing. In terms of the Christian virtues, love is preeminent; and if it is truly felt and practiced, the other requirements will follow. After all, even Jesus said that love of God and neighbor sums up the Law and the Prophets (Matt. 22:34-40).

Drummond wrote:

Take any of the commandments. "Thou shalt have no other gods before me." If a man love God, you will not have to tell him that. Love is the fulfilling of that law. "Take not his name in vain." Would he ever dream of taking his name in vain if he loved him? "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." Would he not be too glad to have one day in seven to dedicate more exclusively to the object of his affection? Love would fulfill all these laws regarding God. And so, if he loved man, you would never think of telling him to honor his father and mother. He could not do anything else. It would be preposterous to tell him not to kill. You could only insult him if you suggested that he should not steal—how could he steal from those he loved? It would be superfluous to beg him not to bear false witness against his neighbor. If he loved him, it would be the last thing he would do. And you would never dream of urging him not to covet what his neighbors had. He would rather they possessed it than himself. In this way, "Love is the fulfilling of the law." It is the rule for fulfilling all rules, the new commandment for keeping all the old commandments, Christ's one secret of the Christian life.

At the end of this essay Drummond said that, as he looked back over his life and all the beautiful things he had seen and enjoyed, he was convinced that it was only the small, seemingly insignificant acts of the love of one individual for another that will last forever.

The Nature of Love

But we must not get overly sentimental at this point, since love is not some mushy emotion that embraces all, forgives all, forgets all, and requires nothing. The danger of an essay like Henry Drummond's is that it encourages just those sentiments. The Bible never does. In fact, you will notice at once that in our text Paul does not even define love. He passes immediately to how love functions. It is the same in 1 Corinthians 13. Chapter 13 seems to be defining love, but it does so only in the sense that it tells us what love does and does not do.

Romans 12:9 states two specific things about love. First, true love is genuine. "Love must be sincere," says the author. Second, love must be discriminating. "Hate what is evil; cling to what is good," is how Paul puts it. In the Greek text hate and cling are participles, meaning hating and clinging. So it is clear that they are linked to the former statement and describe how love is to operate, rather than being independent statements or commands.

1. Love is genuine. The New International Version translates the first half of verse 9 as "Love must be sincere." Sincere is an English word based on the Latin words sine cera, meaning without wax, and it refers to the ancient practice of using wax to hide cracks in inferior pottery so the vessel could be sold for a higher price than it could be otherwise. Quality ware was stamped sine cera ("without wax") to show that it had not been doctored. In regard to people, this says that a sincere person is one who is not hiding his true nature by hypocritical words or actions.

In the Greek text the word translated sincere is anupokritos, the latter part of which has given us the word hypocritical, which I have used to describe speech that is insincere. Anupokritos means without a mask, and it refers to the way in which, in the Greek theater, actors would carry tragic, comic, or melodramatic masks to signal the role they were playing. When Paul tells us that love is to be an ("not") hypocritical, he is saying that those who love are not to play a role but rather are to be genuine. In other words, we are to get off the stage and drop our masks.

But that is not easy. John Calvin remarks in his treatment of Romans 12:9 that "it is difficult to express how ingenious almost all men are in counterfeiting a love which they do not really possess. They deceive not only others, but also themselves, while they persuade themselves that they have a true love for those whom they not only treat with neglect, but also in fact reject."

It may help us to realize that the love that is commended here is the love of God that is shown to fallen creatures through the death of God's Son, the Lord Jesus Christ, and which is developed in Christians by the Holy Spirit. In all, there are four Greek words that may be translated love: storgê, which refers to family affection; philia, which denotes love between friends; eros, which is sexual love; and agapê, which is God-love and is therefore pure, holy, unvarying, and unfeigned. It is the latter word that is used in verse 9. This love is sincere by definition, since God is utterly unvarying and unfeigned. It is this true, Godlike love that we are to have for other people.

If we are new creatures in Christ, then we must love without hypocrisy, since this is the very nature of the love that has been placed within us by the Father. We must be sine cera.

2. Love is discriminating. For some people it may come as a shock to discover the word hate immediately after the words love must be sincere. First, love; then hate! The two seem incompatible to most of us. But they are not, and their juxtaposition in this verse teaches an important truth; love must be discriminating. Real love does not love everything. On the contrary, it hates what is evil and clings to what is good.

"God is love" (1 John 4:8). That is one of the most sublime statements in the Bible, but God is not only love. He is also hate in the sense that he hates what is evil with a proper, righteous hatred. Proverbs 6:16-19 tells us seven things that God hates: "haughty eyes, a lying tongue, hands that shed innocent blood, a heart that devises wicked schemes, feet that are quick to rush into evil, a false witness who pours out lies and a man who stirs up dissension among brothers." Isaiah 1:12-15 tells us that God hates religion that is merely formal:

> When you come to appear before me, who has asked this of you, this trampling of my courts?
> Stop bringing meaningless offerings!
> Your incense is detestable to me.
> New Moons, Sabbaths and convocations— I cannot bear your evil assemblies.
> Your New Moon festivals and your appointed feasts my soul hates.
> They have become a burden to me; I am weary of bearing them.
> When you spread out your hands in prayer,
> I will hide my eyes from you; even if you offer many prayers, I will not listen.

In Amos 5:21 God says, "I hate, I despise your religious feasts; I cannot stand your assemblies." The reason, of course, is that these merely formal observances are hypocritical, and love is not hypocritical.

Therefore, if we love as God loves—and we must if we are Christians—then there will be things for us to hate, just as there will also be things we must love. We will hate the violence done to people by whatever name—nationalism, ethnic cleansing, racial or religious pride, war, keeping the peace, even "necessity." But we will love the humble and those who work for peace, yes, and even those who are guilty of the violence, because we will want to turn them from their ways. We will hate lying, especially by those who are in important positions—CEOs and other heads of corporations, political figures, presidents, and even ministers. We will hate what their lies do to others. Yet we will love the truth and will at the same time also love those who are lying, for we will see them as people who need the Savior.

That is what love does. Love hates evil—an intentionally strong word. But love also clings to what is good. The Greek word rendered cling in some of its forms means to glue. So the idea is that true love will bond us to the good. We will stick to it like epoxy.

The Greatest of These

We can hardly discuss what love is like, even on the basis of these two powerful terms—hating evil and loving good—without also turning to what Paul says about love in 1 Corinthians 13:

If I speak in the tongues of men and of angels, but have not love, I am only a resounding gong or a clanging cymbal. If I have the gift of prophecy and can fathom all mysteries and all knowledge, and if I have a faith that can move mountains, but have not love, I am nothing. If I give all I possess to the poor and surrender my body to the flames, but have not love, I gain nothing.

Love is patient, love is kind. It does not envy, it does not boast, it is not proud. It is not rude, it is not self-seeking, it is not easily angered, it keeps no record of wrongs. Love does not delight in evil but rejoices with the truth. It always protects, always trusts, always hopes, always perseveres.

Love never fails. But where there are prophecies, they will cease; where there are tongues, they will be stilled; where there is knowledge, it will pass away. For we know in part and we prophesy in part, but when perfection comes, the imperfect disappears. When I was a child, I talked like a child, I thought like a child, I reasoned like a child. When I became a man, I put childish ways behind me. Now we see but a poor reflection as in a mirror; then we shall see face to face. Now I know in part; then I shall know fully, even as I am fully known.

And now these three remain: faith, hope and love. But the greatest of these is love.

It should be evident to anyone that the most important paragraph of this chapter is the second. The first tells us how important love is. The third says that love will endure even when things like prophecies, tongues, and the quest for knowledge have ceased. The final paragraph says that love is more important even than such enduring things as faith and hope. But it is the second paragraph that lists love's wonderful qualities and functions. There are fifteen statements in all.

1. Love is patient. Drummond says that this is "the normal attitude of love." This is because people are difficult, exasperating, and slow. Love understands this and so waits patiently. It knows that God is patient and that he has been wonderfully patient with us.
2. Love is kind. The world is filled with hurting, suffering people. Love knows this and does what it can to help, uplift, serve, encourage, and otherwise embrace them in their misery. It is quick to speak an encouraging word, quick to offer everyone a willing, outstretched hand.
3. Love does not envy. The first two descriptions of love have been positive. Here is the first of eight negative statements, saying what love is not and does not do. Love is not jealous. It is glad when other people win honors, achieve fame, strike it rich, and are praised. This is because love knows God and is content with the life God has given. Only a believer can be truly happy when others are preferred before himself.

4. Love does not boast. The world is filled with boasters, people who in one way or another are calling attention to who they are, how important they are, and how much they have achieved. Love does not do this, because love does not think highly of itself and because it is glad when others are exalted. A wise man once said, "There is no limit to what a man can achieve if he is not worried about who gets the credit." This is love.

5. Love is not proud. The opposite of pride is humility, and love is humble. Love does not have inflated ideas of itself. Love is gracious.

6. Love is not rude. The opposite of rudeness is courtesy, and love has good manners. It thinks of others. It holds its tongue and waits for others to speak. Love listens. Love does not dominate a social setting and will not blurt out things that wound another person.

7. Love is not self-seeking. The world looks at something and asks, "What's in it for me?" Love does not seek for self, because it is not thinking of self. Love thinks of the one it loves. Jesus did not seek his own advantage when he came to earth to save us. Rather, he "made himself nothing, taking the very nature of a servant,... he humbled himself and became obedient to death—even death on a cross" (Phil. 2:7-8).

8. Love is not easily angered. "For embittering life, for breaking up communities, for destroying the most sacred relationships, for devastating homes, for withering up men and women, for taking the bloom off childhood; in short, for sheer gratuitous misery-producing power, [anger] stands alone," says Henry Drummond. But love is not easily angered. It does not have a short fuse. It is not irritable, not easily provoked. It is not touchy. Love is patient and kind.

9. Love keeps no record of wrongs. Some people have a knack for bringing up mistakes we have made and wounds we have inflicted even decades afterwards. Love forgets these wrongs. It does not compile statistics. It is not resentful. It is not vindictive.

10. Love does not delight in evil. Love is not amused by wrongdoing. It is not attracted by vice. It does not find trash intriguing, even when it is dressed up for prime time television or published in glossy magazines. Dishonest schemes do not please it. Love hates wickedness.

11. Love rejoices with the truth. This is the other half of the only two-part description in this paragraph. It shows that the evil Paul is thinking of when he says "does not delight in evil" is chiefly the evil that tells lies. Love loves truth, above all the truth that is God's. Love loves the Bible. It delights to speak about it.

12. Love always protects. The last four descriptions say what love always does. First, it always protects the other person. It sides with the weak. It rallies around the one who has been oppressed, attacked, abused, hurt, slandered, or otherwise made a victim. Love protects children, because it knows that "the kingdom of heaven belongs to such as these" (Matt. 19:14).

13. Love always trusts. Love is never suspicious. Love is not trying to see under the surface or pry out the hidden motives of another. Love is not stupid or gullible, but it always thinks the best. It is the quality that brings out the best in other people. A mother shows love when she tells her struggling son that she believes in him, or her discouraged daughter that she knows she will do well.

14. Love always hopes. Love does not stop loving because it is not loved in return or because it is deceived. Love hopes for the best, and it forgives not once or even seven times, but seventy times seven. Love is not even counting.

15. Love always perseveres. Love never gives up. It is unconquerable, indomitable. Love can outlast hate and evil and indifference. Love can outlast anything. Donald Grey Barnhouse wrote, "It is... the one thing that stands after all else has fallen."

Because He First Loved Us

We live in a skeptical world, and it would be safe to say that there are not many worldly people who believe in a love like this. They may wish for it, wanting to be loved in this way. But most would say with some bitterness that to hope for true love in this world is a delusion.

What a pity this is! Because exactly this love has come into our world in the person of Jesus Christ, and love is to be shown by those who are his disciples. In 1 John 4, the disciple who leaned on Christ's bosom at the Last Supper tells us that "God is love" (v. 8). He follows it up by saying that the exhibition of God's love is in the death of Jesus for our sins. "No one has ever seen God," he says. But then, "If we love each other, God lives in us and his love is made complete in us" (v. 12). In other words, the world cannot see God, but they can see him in the way Christians love each other.

In ancient times the pagans marvelled at such love. "Behold how these Christians love one another!" they cried. Do you love like that? Remember that this is where the apostle Paul begins the list of Christian virtues.

Chapter 194.
Love in Action

Romans 12:10-13

I pointed out in the last study that although the various exhortations of Romans 12:9-13 seem in most translations merely to be strung together in no specific order and with no apparent relationship to one another, in the Greek they are arranged quite carefully. To begin with, they fall into two separate portions: verse 9, which introduces the subject of love in a general way, and verses 10-13, which show how genuine love is to function. We saw that the Greek words for hate and cling in verse 9 are actually participles linked to the words "love must be sincere." So the sentence actually reads, "Love must be sincere, hating what is evil and clinging to what is good." This tells us that the love Paul is talking about is no mere sentimental mush but rather is concerned for what is good. It is both genuine and discriminating. In the next verses, after describing this love generally, Paul shows how it is to operate in nine areas.

That is the second important fact about this arrangement. In the Greek text these are nine nouns in the dative case, each of which comes first in its clause for emphasis. We usually translate a dative with the word to, as in "to the store" or "to church." But in this case the meaning is something like "as regards" or "with respect to." John Murray does not stick to the nine items specifically, but he provides a translation of verses 10-13 that gives a good idea how this goes: "In brotherly love being kindly affectioned to one another, in honor preferring one another, in zeal not flagging, in spirit fervent, serving the Lord, in hope rejoicing, in affliction being patient, in prayer continuing instant, in the needs of the saints partaking, hospitality pursuing." This is how the love introduced in verse 9 is to function.

Kindness to One Another

The first thing Paul writes about is being kind to one another. Our translation says, "Be devoted to one another in brotherly love." I pointed out in the last study that in the Greek language there are four words for love: agapê, philia, storgê, and eros. The last word refers to sexual love and does not occur in the New Testament, no doubt because this kind of love had become so debased among the heathen. The first word, agapê, is the great New Testament word for God's love and for the love of Christians for God and one another. It is the word used in verse 9. The remaining two words, philia and storgê, are in this verse, which means that all three of the New Testament's words for love are in verses 9 and 10.

But they occur in combinations. In the Greek text the first words of Paul's command are "in brotherly love." That is Philadelphia in Greek, the word for love being combined with the word for brother. The second combination is the Greek word philostorgoi, rendered devoted in the New International Version. These words mean that "in respect to the love of our Christian brothers and sisters, we are to be marked by a devotion that is characteristic of a loving, closeknit, and mutually supportive family."

The King James Version reads, "Be kindly affectionate to one another with brotherly love." Kindly is based on the word kin, meaning family. So again, we are being told that we are to love and treat Christians as we would members of our family.

Christians are our family, of course, regardless of their background, race, nationality, occupation, wealth, or education—or even whether we are attracted to or like another believer. That is irrelevant. The first verse of "Blessed Be the Tie That Binds" goes like this:

> Blessed be the tie that binds
> Our hearts in Christian love;
> The fellowship of kindred minds
> Is like to that above.

"Kindred minds" means the minds of those who are spiritual kin—members of God's new family on earth. So our devotion to one another is not to be a matter of liking but of life. The contemporary church will never have the power of the early church until today's Christians love one another as a close-knit family.

Preferring One Another

The second of Paul's datives is about honor and is closely related to what has just been said. A literal translation might be, "And in respect to honor, lead the way for each another." In other words, "Don't wait around for people to recognize your contributions and praise you. Instead, be alert to what they are contributing and honor them."

Unfortunately, if we look at today's church, we must conclude that the exact opposite is more often the case. Instead of thinking about and appreciating other Christians and what they are doing, our minds are usually on ourselves, and we are resentful that we are not sufficiently recognized or appreciated. Therefore we are jealous of other Christians. Great harm has been done by such jealousy. Ministries have been seriously weakened. Churches have been split. Valuable causes have been set back for generations and sometimes for good. Paul must have seen this as a potential danger for the church at Philippi, for he wrote to those believers: "Do nothing out of selfish ambition or vain conceit, but in humility consider others better than yourselves. Each of you should look not only to your own interests, but also to the interests of others" (Phil. 2:3-4).

This is how true love functions. It gets to the front of the line not to receive its own honors, but to show honor and respect for other people.

Never Flagging in Zeal

Verse 11 contains three statements about true love, beginning with a negative: "Never be lacking in zeal." A more literal rendering, highlighting the dative construction, would be: "In regard to what you ought to be doing, don't be lazy." This is directed against weariness in well-doing (Gal. 6:9), and it is a real problem when trying to live the Christian life for any length of time. It is easy to get discouraged. It is hard to keep on steadily.

At this point the King James Version says, "Not slothful in business." To most people business suggests commercial dealings only, which is why newer versions drop that word. But it is helpful to think of it in this way.

1. The business of being a Christian. It is a puzzle to me how anyone can take on the most important business of all, the business of being a follower of Jesus Christ, and do it in a passive, apathetic, part-time, or slovenly manner. Yet many do. What we should do is follow after Jesus Christ with all our hearts and minds and with all the energy at our disposal. We should work at being Christians. Robert Candlish writes about this wisely: "Your sanctification must be made a matter of business. It must be cared for and prosecuted in a business-like way; not indolently and slothfully, as if it were a process that might be left to itself, but industriously, sedulously, diligently, with regularity and punctuality, as you would manage a worldly concern, on the common principles of worldly energy and worldly care and worldly zeal."

2. The business of being a Christian father or mother. Raising a family takes work, and Christian love demands that this too be done steadily and without being lazy. Children will not raise themselves in godliness. Left to themselves they will grow up like an untended garden, full of weeds and other wild things. It takes work to raise children well.

3. Church business. I am always surprised how church leaders will so often conduct the work of the church in a slipshod manner, doing whatever needs to be done to just get by, when they would never think of conducting their own business in that way or running their own home on such principles. The work of the church, including how we manage the building, should be done in the best possible way we know how. After all, if it is done well, the church will remain as a place for worship and work long after we are gone and our businesses and homes have passed to other hands.

We should be diligent in our spiritual battles too. Candlish says, "If you would fight for Christ, you must fight deliberately, with [a] cool head as well as [a] warm heart; with fixed and resolute determination, upon principle rather than upon impulse. If you would work for Christ, you must work systematically, and you must work on with patient and persevering energy, with firm purpose not to give up or to give in."

4. The business of earning a living. I said earlier that the word business in verse 11 (KJV) does not refer to commercial enterprises, but to everything we should be doing. On the other hand, it does not exclude the ways in which we make our livings but rather embraces them. Christians should excel in how they work. Paul told the Colossians, "Whatever you do, work at it with all your heart, as working for the Lord, not for men, since you know that you will receive an inheritance from the Lord as a reward. It is the Lord Christ you are serving" (Col. 3:23-24). The last sentence means that love for Christ should prod us to work both well and hard in everything.

Fervent in Spirit

The word fervor (NIV) or fervent (KJV) is from a verb meaning to boil. So a literal translation of this phrase would be: "In respect to the spirit (or Spirit), boiling." Unfortunately, since boiling suggests heat and we think of heat as having to do with anger, it would be better to think of this as a Christian "bubbling over" or even, as the Revised Standard Version has it, "being aglow with the Spirit."

This probably refers not to the Holy Spirit, but to a personality that radiates the presence of Jesus Christ. On the other hand, this does not happen apart from the Holy Spirit, and in this sense the translation Spirit is not wrong. Donald Grey Barnhouse wrote, "The glow of the Spirit is the warmth of the soul touched by the love of Christ. It cannot exist apart from the knowledge that we have been loved, that Christ gave himself for our sins, that we have been redeemed, and that the Holy Spirit has come to dwell in our hearts. Such knowledge causes us to yield in full surrender to him as Lord of all. The Holy Spirit, who dwells in all believers, will glow through those who allow him to fill and direct their lives."

Serving the Lord

"Serving the Lord" has probably been added to "keep your spiritual fervor" to show that the "glow" of the Spirit is not without direction but is instead focused on the work and cause of Christ. Still, this is another dative construction that sets it apart as a separate item. Literally it reads, "As regards the Lord, serving." We remember how Jesus once asked, "Why do you call me, 'Lord, Lord,' and do not do what I say?" (Luke 6:46), meaning that if he is our Lord, we must obey and serve him. We will do no less if we truly love him. Moreover, the way we will show we love other people is by serving them. Even Jesus "did not come to be served, but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many" (Matt. 20:28).

Rejoicing in Hope

Verse 12 introduces three more items, which also go together. It might be paraphrased, "In so far as we have cause to hope, let us be joyful; in so far as we have cause of pain, let us hold out; in so far as the door of prayer is open to us, let us continue to use it."

In the Bible hope always has to do with what God has promised but that we have not seen or received yet. In particular it refers to that "blessed hope," which is "the glorious appearing of our great God and Savior, Jesus Christ" (Titus 2:13) and to the fact that when he appears "we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is" (1 John 3:2). The fact that we do not see this yet is important, for it means that as Christians we will have our eyes fixed on invisible, spiritual things, like Abraham, who did not set his affection on the things of this life but who "was looking forward to the city with foundations, whose architect and builder is God" (Heb. 11:10).

More than anything else, this is what sets Christians apart from those about us who are merely secular. Others have their horizons bounded by what is seen. Like Carl Sagan, for them "the cosmos is all that is or ever was or ever will be." The horizons of Christians are not cut off like this. They are wider even than the universe, for Christians look to God, hope in God, and look forward expectantly to an eternity with him.

And what a difference this makes in daily life. Robert Haldane says, "The hope of the glory of God, in which the apostle here affirms that Christians ought to rejoice, is provided as an important part of the believer's armor—a helmet to cover his head to defend him against the attacks of spiritual enemies (1 Thess. 5:8). It supports him when [he is] ready to be cast down.... It soothes the bitterness of affliction when the believer is resting on the promises of God. In prosperity it elevates his affections, and fixing his expectation of the glory that shall be revealed, disengages him from the love of this world.... It comforts him in the prospect of death."

Patient in Affliction

While waiting for the glory that is still to be revealed the Christian sometimes suffers persecution or affliction. Therefore, Paul adds that "in respect to affliction" the one who trusts God should be "patient"—not just resigned in a fatalistic, stoic sense, accepting what cannot be changed, but waiting confidently for God's own resolution of the problem, knowing that he will reward the good and punish evil in his own time.

Meanwhile, we should not to be overly confident that we are among the good or that our actions, especially those that are criticized, are without any evil motives or are beyond reproach. Rather, we must be careful to "make [our] calling and election sure" (2 Peter 1:10) and examine ourselves to see whether we truly love Jesus Christ and are serving him or are merely pursuing our own interests.

In Prayer Continuing Faithful

A literal translation of this verse might be "and in regard to prayer, continuing." Continuing is an interesting word to use. We might have expected any one of a number of other words. But Paul says continuing because he was aware that this is just the problem. It is not that we never pray. We almost have to, if we are Christians. But we get tired of praying, our minds wander, and we neglect prayer precisely when we most need it.

Our Lord was aware of this too, which is why he said so much about prayer. If you go through the gospels and study what he said, you will find that in nearly all instances the bottom line of his teaching was simply that we should pray—not that we should be paragons of prayer, or eloquent in prayer, or even that we pray on until we get what we desire, though that is sometimes implied—simply that we should pray. He said this because we don't, at least not when we most need to.

Do you remember Jesus' teaching about prayer in Luke 11? After he had given the Lord's Prayer, Jesus told about a man who knocked on a neighbor's door late at night because a friend had come and he had nothing to give him, and although the neighbor did not want to get out of bed to help, eventually he did because of the man's persistence. Jesus also told about human fathers who willingly give their children food when they ask for it, not substituting a snake for a fish or a scorpion for an egg. Those stories were meant to illustrate our need on the one hand, and God's willingness to meet that need on the other.

Then Jesus said, "So... ask and it will be given to you; seek and you will find; knock and the door will be opened to you" (Luke 11:9). In other words, "Pray." Just pray! The only reasons we might fail to pray are that: (1) we do not think we need God's help, thinking that we are adequate of ourselves, or (2) we do not believe God really is a loving heavenly father. Why else would we not pray or even be in prayer continually?

Participating in the Need of the Saints

The last of Paul's nine datives is a compound phrase that fills all of verse 13. In our translation it appears as two distinct ideas: (1) "Share with God's people who are in need" and (2) "Practice hospitality." But the Greek text actually combines the ideas, saying, "In regard to the need of the saints, participating, practicing hospitality."

This means that Paul is not just talking about giving money to poor Christians. In fact, he is not thinking about money specifically at all. He is thinking about the needs of Christians and about identifying with them in those needs. If a person is mourning, we should identify with him in his sorrow and give what comfort we can. If another is lonely or abandoned, we should be company for her to the degree we are able. We should give to the financial needs of impoverished people, too. Jesus made such things a test of whether a person is truly a Christian, saying in Matthew 25, "Come, you who are blessed by my Father; take your inheritance, the kingdom prepared for you since the creation of the world. For I was hungry and you gave me something to eat, I was thirsty and you gave me something to drink, I was a stranger and you invited me in, I needed clothes and you clothed me, I was sick and you looked after me, I was in prison and you came to visit me" (Matt. 25:34-36). Those who had not done that were sent away "to eternal punishment" (v. 46).

I do not know how anything can be more practical than this. To love one another, to honor one another, to serve one another, to pray for one another, and to meet one another's needs is the very heart of applied Christianity.

Chapter 195.
The Christian and His Enemies

Romans 12:14-16

My good friend Michael Scott Horton has written a book called Made in America, in which he examines the impact of American culture on Christianity, especially evangelical Christianity. The impact comes from a variety of cultural sources, he says, but one of these is our consumerism. In America everything is sold—from toothpaste to politicians—and the way it is sold is by appealing to the dreams and desires of the people. Nothing bad is ever faced. Disappointments are ruled out. This has its effect on Christianity. In order to sell Christianity — and selling it is big business today—anything unpleasant or demanding is suppressed, and the gospel is commended rather as a cure for failure and low self-esteem, as well as the path to power.

"In consumer religion, Christianity becomes trivialized. Its great mysteries become cheap slogans. Its majestic hymns are traded in for shallow jingles.... And its parishioners, now unashamedly called audiences, have come to expect dazzling testimonies, happy anecdotes, and fail-proof schemes for successful living that will satiate spiritual consumption," he says.

How different is biblical Christianity! In the Gospels Jesus spoke often of the cost of following after him in faithful discipleship, without which there is no salvation and no Christianity. What is more—and here the situation becomes even more impossible for today's marketers of religion— he warned that those who identify with him would be hated. Instead of being popular and successful, Christians would be hated and rejected, as he was.

What a way to "sell" Christianity!

A Radical Ethic

But we must be truthful as God is truthful. Therefore, we must not pretend that the followers of Jesus will always have a smooth path in which to walk or be carried to the skies on "flowery beds of ease."

In Romans 12, Paul has been discussing the application of theology to daily life. He has said that the underlying principle is that Christians are to cease thinking as the world thinks and begin to think as Christians—a radical proposal. First, we are to think of ourselves with sober judgment. Next, we are to see others in the church as members of Christ's body.

But now we come upon an even more radical proposal—we are to love our enemies. Paul says that instead of hating those who hate us, we are to love them and pray for them, even as Christ loved us and prayed for us. "Bless those who persecute you; bless and do not curse," is his instruction.

Christians Will Be Persecuted

Paul's words come directly from Jesus' teaching, of course: first, the certainty of persecution; then, the way we should respond to it.

All through his ministry Jesus alluded to the fact that the world would hate and persecute his followers. But in the last discourses, recorded in

John's gospel, Jesus became explicit in these predictions:

If the world hates you, keep in mind that it hated me first. If you belonged to the world, it would love you as its own. As it is, you do not belong to the world, but I have chosen you out of the world. That is why the world hates you. Remember the words I spoke to you: "No servant is greater than his master." If they persecuted me, they will persecute you also. If they obeyed my teaching, they will obey yours also. They will treat you this way because of my name, for they do not know the one who sent me....

All this I have told you so that you will not go astray. They will put you out of the synagogue; in fact, a time is coming when anyone who kills you will think he is offering a service to God. They will do such things because they have not known the Father or me.

These words predict the world's hatred of Christ's followers and explain why the world will hate Christians. There are three reasons:

1. Christians "do not belong to the world." There is a natural but sinful tendency among people to dislike those who are different from them. This explains much racial hatred as well as the dislike people of one ethnic background frequently feel for people of another or why people feel uneasy when visiting the sick or dying. This can be quite trivial, or it can have stronger motivations. In his Daily Study Bible on John, William Barclay tells how Jonas Hanway, the man who invented the umbrella, was persecuted. When he tried to introduce his idea into England, where the umbrella should have been welcomed as a wonderful gift from a rainy heaven, Hanway was pelted with dirt and stones. Barclay also mentions the great Aristides of Athens, an outstanding leader who was called "Aristides the Just." He was banished by the citizens of Athens. Afterward, when one of the people was asked why he had voted to banish so outstanding a leader, the man replied only, "It was because I am tired of hearing him always called 'the Just.'

The world's people like those who are like themselves. Anyone who does not conform to the pattern, who is different, will meet trouble. But if that is so of people who are basically the world's type anyway, how much more true must it be of those who have been lifted out of the world and its way of thinking by Jesus Christ. The Bible calls them "a new creation" in Christ (2 Cor. 5:17). They are truly different. So the world hates them and tries to persecute them, sometimes in the open, sometimes in subtle ways.

2. Christians have been "chosen... out of the world." There is probably no doctrine of the Christian faith that is more hated by the world than the doctrine of election. People hated it when Jesus first taught it, so much so that on one occasion they responded by trying to kill him (Luke 4:24-29). People hate it just as much today. They hate it even if they just suspect we believe it, even when we do not teach it openly.

3. Christians are identified with Christ. The third reason why the world hates and persecutes Christians is the chief reason and the one Jesus stresses most in John's gospel—because believers are identified with Christ. Moreover, since Jesus is God and since unbelievers hate God—they would murder him if they could get their hands on him—their hatred for God, whom they cannot reach, is vented against Christians. To put it in other words, the world does not hate Christians because of what they are in themselves. In ourselves we are nothing. The world hates Christians because it hates Christ and because we are followers of Christ and stand for his cause against the standards of the world.

"Bless and Do Not Curse"

The fact of persecution is well established. If we are Christ's and if we stand for Christ against the world, we will experience it. But now the question is this: How are we to respond to persecution? In Romans 12:14 Paul tells us that we are to bless our persecutors. We are to "bless" and "not curse." Again, this is a conscious reflection of Jesus' common teaching.

Jesus' best-known teaching on this subject is from the Sermon on the Mount. In that sermon, uttered near the beginning of his ministry, the Lord spoke of those who will persecute Christians, saying:

You have heard that it was said, "Love your neighbor and hate your enemy." But I tell you: Love your enemies and pray for those who persecute you, that you may be sons of your Father in heaven. He causes his sun to rise on the evil and the good, and sends rain on the righteous and the unrighteous. If you love those who love you, what reward will you get? Are not even the tax collectors doing that? And if you greet only your brothers, what are you doing more than others? Do not even pagans do that? Be perfect, therefore, as your heavenly Father is perfect.

Matthew 5:43-48

We will never be able to do what Christ is saying (and Paul is repeating in Romans) unless we understand two things. First, it is natural to strike back at people who are hurting us. It is natural to wish them harm, to "curse" them, to use Paul's word. Moreover, there will be more persecution, and thus a greater danger of cursing, the more pronounced is our Christianity. The more we stand out for Christ, the more we will be persecuted and the greater the danger of our wanting to strike back at our tormentors.

Robert S. Candlish, devotes several pages in his study of Romans 12 to this problem, pointing out that if our Christianity is lukewarm, if we seldom openly identify with Christ's cause, the danger of persecution and the resulting temptation to retaliate will be slight. But if we stand for Christ, for righteousness, and are persecuted, what then? "Can flesh and blood stand it?" he asks. "Can you abstain in your hearts from venting what is but too near akin to a malediction or a curse? Can you help yourselves from partly giving way to what may seem fully justifiable emotions of personal resentment and a personal sense of unprovoked and undeserved wrong?" "No!" he answers. "Not unless you make conscience of blessing those whom you are thus tempted to curse."

And that is the second thing we need to understand, that the only way to overcome our natural tendency to fight back is to work for our persecutors' good. That is, we have to bless and not curse.

The word bless has different meanings. When we bless God we ascribe to him the praise that is his due. When God blesses us he bestows blessing upon us. When we bless others we ask God to bless them. It is in this sense that we are told to bless and not curse. We are to pray for our enemies, asking God to bless them. But, then, if we are asking God to do good to them, it is patently clear that we must also seek every honest means of doing good to them too.

This brings us back to Jesus' teaching. Toward the beginning of his ministry, in the Sermon on the Mount, he uttered what we know as the Golden Rule: "In everything, do to others what you would have them do to you" (Matt. 7:12). Many of the world's cultures have it in negative form:
"Do not do anything to another that you would not want them to do to you." This is not surprising. It simply amounts to: "Don't hit someone else unless you want to get hit yourself." Anyone with even the smallest amount of wisdom can see the sense of that.

But that is not what Jesus said. He expressed his "rule" in a positive form, saying that we are to seek out and, as far as possible, effect the good of other people, even our enemies.

We have in Stephen, the first martyr, an example of this principle in action. As Stephen was being stoned to death he prayed for those who were killing him, saying, "Lord, do not hold this sin against them" (Acts 7:60). His prayer was heard too. We do not know what happened to everyone who was present at the stoning of Stephen that day, but we do know what happened to one of them. His name was Saul, later known as Paul, the author of this very letter. He was profoundly moved by the way Stephen prayed for his antagonists, and Stephen's death won (or at least pricked the heart of) his tormentor (Acts 26:14).

Saint Augustine once said wisely, "The Church owes Paul to the prayer of Stephen." So let's learn to pray for and bless others.

Robert Candlish says:

When you suffer wrong, call to mind the considerations which should bring the wrongdoer before you in a very different light. Look at his case rather than your own.... If you put yourself in his place, you will see much, very much, that should charm all your resentment away and turn it into tenderest pity and concern.... Ask yourself what, if his history had been yours, you would have been, how you—if his lot were yours, his training, his habits, his companions—would be inclined to think and feel and act. You cease to wonder at his obtuseness and his opposition. You are drawn and not repelled by that too easily accounted for infatuation of his, which really hurts not you, but, alas! is ruining his own benighted soul. No thought of self can find harbor within you. All your thought is of him. Your bowels yearn over him and more for the very blindness and madness which make him a persecutor. And so you bless, and do not curse.

Four Important Characteristics

In verses 15 and 16 Paul lists four characteristics of those who are true Christians. These verses bear the same relationship to verse 14 as verses 10-13 bore to verse 9 in the preceding paragraph. In verse 9 Paul set forth a love that is sincere and discriminating. Then in verses 10-13 he listed nine areas in which that love is to function. In this paragraph he has explained that in regard to our enemies we are to bless and not curse. That is the general statement. Next he lists four areas in which that should be done.

The way they are written, verses 15 and 16 could apply to Christians as well as to enemies. But since they are bracketed by references to those who persecute us, in verse 14 which comes before and verse 17 which comes after, Paul must be thinking of how Christians should relate to unbelievers.

1. Empathy. Empathy describes what Paul is talking about when he says, "Rejoice with those who rejoice; mourn with those who mourn." Empathy is the ability to identify closely with someone else, to make his case your own and allow what has happened to him to affect you also.

But this is not easy to do. We often do it superficially. We would not think of joking at a funeral, for example, and we express our condolences to those who suffer loss. Again, when a friend is promoted we send congratulations and may even attend a party in his honor. But when someone does very well we find it hard to be anything but jealous, even when we are congratulating him or her. There is only one way to break out of this. We have to stop thinking of ourselves and our own interests all the time, and the only way we can do that is by a transformation accomplished in us by Jesus Christ. Jesus set the example, of course, since he did not exalt himself but rather took "the very nature of a servant... and became obedient to death—even death on a cross!" (Phil. 2:7-8).

2. Amicability. Christians should be easy to get along with. This is what Paul is thinking of when he says that we should "live in harmony with one another." He is not talking about making peace, which is a positive thing. He will deal with that later (in v. 18). He is talking about not making sparks or causing turmoil. If this is still dealing with enemies, as it must be since the verses both before and after speak of them, then he is saying that we should not be like those Christian crusaders who are always looking for a fight or hunting down "Christ's enemies." We are to love and win people, not root them out to beat them senseless.

3. The common touch. Christians should "be willing to associate with people of low position" even more than others, because that is what most of us are. God did not choose "many who were wise by human standards," many who were "influential" or "of noble birth." Rather "God chose the foolish things of the world to shame the wise; God chose the weak things of the world to shame the strong. He chose the lowly things of this world and the despised things—and the things that are not—to nullify the things that are, so that no one may boast before him" (1 Cor. 1:26-29).

We are to associate with those who seem unimportant even if we have a high position. Jesus did it and was criticized for it (Matt. 11:19). We need to stop thinking of other people as being beneath us and instead come to regard them as people made for everlasting fellowship with God.

4. Humility. The last sentence in this paragraph takes us back to where Paul began. He said in verse 3, "Do not think of yourself more highly than you ought, but rather think of yourself with sober judgment." Right thinking, about both ourselves and others, dominates verse 16, as it did the earlier statement. Can we do it? Leon Morris has a helpful suggestion when he reminds us that "the person who is wise in his own eyes is rarely so in the eyes of other people."

Our Great Example

The trouble with exhortations of this nature, practical as they may be, is that they seem far beyond us and therefore discourage us if we start to take them seriously. They are not discouraging if we do not think deeply, for then we just assume that we are like this. But if we examine ourselves, we will have to admit that we do not pray for God's blessing on our enemies very often, empathize with others, act agreeably, or associate with those the world scorns and be humble. And that is discouraging.

Perhaps what we need to do here is simply get our minds off ourselves entirely and begin to think of Christ. Because if we think of him, we will become increasingly like him, even if we are not especially conscious of it.

Donald Grey Barnhouse writes:

When the nations were raging and the peoples imagining a vain thing, he did not move to destroy them. He did not destroy Adam when he sinned, but promised a Savior and began the long course of history so that man could have opportunity upon opportunity to repent and return to God.... He did not destroy us when we were ungodly sinners. He came from heaven to save us. He came into the camp of his enemies and allowed them to do their will against him in order to establish the foundation for our redemption. When we were without strength, when we were enemies, Christ died for us. Note that he did not save us by demonstrating his mighty power in some miracle. He saved us—He saved us by letting us kill him. How astonishing this is!

And when he rose from the dead he did not judge those who behaved so wickedly against him. The Jerusalem to which he held out his arms before he died was still the center of his loving thought. He commanded his disciples to go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature, but he commanded them to begin at Jerusalem. Was this not heaping coals of fire upon the heads of his enemies? And did it not melt the hearts of many?

It did, of course. It still does. It can through you.

Chapter 196.
Right Living at All Times

Romans 12:17

Not long ago I came across an elaborate poll on the values and conduct of Americans. It appeared as a book called The Day America Told the Truth, and it was described as "the most massive in-depth survey of what Americans really believe that has ever been conducted." The survey was based on a sampling of more than two thousand people in one week, each person answering over eighteen hundred questions, and there were follow-up interviews with thousands more.

A survey of this scope reveals a lot of things, of course. But one of the dominant findings— perhaps the most important of all—is that America no longer has a sense of right and wrong. "A letdown in moral values is now considered the number one problem facing our country," the pollsters wrote. Our political and business leaders have betrayed us. We lie all the time. "Only 13 percent of us believe in all of the Ten Commandments," the book reports. "Forty percent of us believe in five of the Ten Commandments.... There is absolutely no moral consensus in this country as there was in the 1950s, when all our institutions commanded more respect. Today there is very little respect for the law —for any kind of law."

The number one rationalization for lawless and immoral behavior is that everyone else is doing it. "If everybody else is doing it, why shouldn't I?" is our argument.

Making the distinction between right and wrong is what civilization—not to mention right religious behavior—is all about. But that is what we have lost in America. We do not believe in right and wrong. Therefore, it is against that serious national problem that we come to Paul's challenge to Christians in Romans 12:17, where we read, "Be careful to do what is right in the eyes of everybody."

All Things Right and Beautiful

The verse has two parts: (1) "Do not repay anyone evil for evil" and (2) "Be careful to do what is right in the eyes of everybody." The first part is the negative version of the Golden Rule ("Bless those who persecute you; bless and do not curse"). The second part is where Paul gets into the need for right conduct.

The King James Version of this verse seems to say something very different. It says, "Provide things honest in the sight of all men," which sounds like a command to support your family, to see that they have food to eat and a place to live, to pay the children's college tuition. That is not what the KJV translators meant, but the problem arises from the fact that the key word in this verse has several meanings. The word is kalos, which one Greek dictionary defines as good, right, proper, fitting, better, honorable, honest, fine, beautiful, or precious. The earlier translation selected the word honest. The New International Version uses the word right.

This does not mean that either translation is mistaken, however. It is just a case of the Greek word being more inclusive than any one of our many English terms.

The way to understand kalos is to know that it was the word used by the Greek philosophers, especially Plato, to describe the goal of sound thinking. Usually we think of this goal as "the good," which Plato proposed as the right pursuit of all rational beings. But if we are working in the area of aesthetics, the "good" that we are pursuing becomes "the beautiful." In philosophy it is "the truth." If we are thinking of morals, it is what is "right." If we are thinking of character, it is what is "honorable."

The point is that this is what all people should aim at. So when Paul told the Romans that they were to "be careful to do what is right in the eyes of everybody," he was saying that Christians are to lead the way in good or right things, and they are to do this always. We are to be known as those who always pursue the very best in all areas.

Leon Morris puts it in other terms. He says that Paul "is calling on them to live out the implications of the gospel. Their lives are to be lived on such a high plane that even the heathen will recognize the fact. They will always be living in the sight of non-Christians, and the way they live should be such as to commend the essential Christian message."

The Need for Ethics

It is evident that if we are to pursue what is good, true, right, honest, or beautiful in life, there must be something good, true, right, honest, or beautiful to pursue. And this means that there must be absolutes. Otherwise, we would be looking for something that is not there, and looking for something that does not exist is insanity. This is exactly the problem, of course, and it is why America is experiencing its present "values vacuum" or "morals morass," as Time magazine reported several years ago. In other words, our problem is relativism.

This is what Allan Bloom expressed so powerfully in The Closing of the American Mind, an expose of the failure of American higher education during the seventies and eighties. Bloom is a Platonist, or at least he shares the educational goals of the Greek philosophers. He wants to pursue the "good." He thinks that is what higher education is all about. But today, he says, people no longer believe that there is a higher, absolute truth or good to be discovered, especially in education, and as a result the whole educational enterprise is in chaos.

In order to pursue a goal, there must be a goal. To have a strong moral society, we must have moral absolutes. Otherwise, all we can have is what is pragmatic or expedient, which is what education, politics, and American life as a whole have come to. It is why we do not have any heroes today and why we do not have any moral leadership in this country.

A generation or two ago there were heroes, people like Charles Lindbergh, Babe Ruth, Henry Ford, Douglas MacArthur, George Washington Carver, and many others. Today's heroes are celebrities—people like Michael Jordan and Madonna. Why are there no heroes? The Day America Told the Truth says, "There are no heroes because we have ceased to believe in anything strongly enough to be impressed by its attainment."

We are not getting leadership from our elected officials, either. We do not even trust them to be honest. In The Day America Told the Truth there is this sad anecdote. In 1987 a university president was teaching an adult Sunday school class in his local church. It included bankers, business executives, and college professors. He asked this question, based on a recent news event: "We hear on the news that an Iranian ship has been sunk in the Persian Gulf. The Iranian government says that it was sunk by American torpedoes. The U.S. government says that the ship hit Iranian mines. Whom do you believe?" The class was silent. No one answered. Everyone wanted more information before deciding what they thought had happened. Not one person in the class trusted his own government enough to believe it would be telling the truth.

We need to have our national morality renewed. But, of course, this cannot happen if the only thing we can say about values is that they are relative. This is what Charles Colson told the Harvard Business School when he was invited to address it as part of Harvard's Distinguished Lecturer series. He told them they could not teach ethics because ethics requires absolutes but the philosophical basis of American higher education, including education at Harvard, is relativism. He distinguished between "ethics" and "morals." Here is what he told them: "The word 'ethics' derives from the Greek word ethos, which literally means 'stall'—a hiding place. It was the one place you could go and find security. There could be rest and something that you could depend on; it was unmovable. 'Morals' derives from the word mores, which means 'always changing.' Ethics or ethos is the normative, what ought to be. Morals is what is. Unfortunately, in American life today we are totally guided by moral determinations. So, we're not even looking at ethical standards." He argued that in order to have ethics a nation must have access to a set of absolute values, or at least believe they can be found.

But the only place those values can be found is in the biblical revelation, which is why the Judeo-Christian value system has served so well and for so long as the soul of Western civilization. It is also why we need it again today, and so desperately.

Do the "Right" Thing

Several years ago a movie came out called Do the Right Thing. This is good advice, even if our culture is unable to tell us what the right thing is. The Bible tells us we need to do what is right in several areas.

1. Handling money. In 2 Corinthians 8 Paul writes about the way he was handling a large sum of money given by the Gentile churches for the poor Christians of Jerusalem. There had been a famine in Judea. Many were starving, and the Gentiles had given money for these poor people. In these chapters Paul explains that he was committing the money to a group of men appointed by the various churches so there would be accountability and no questions about any mishandling of the funds. He explains his reasoning in verses 20-21, using the word kalos, the word found in Romans 12:17: "We want to avoid any criticism of the way we administer this liberal gift. For we are taking pains to do what is right [kalos], not only in the eyes of the Lord but also in the eyes of men" (2 Cor. 8:20-21).

The church has suffered scandals over money. Jim Bakker went to jail because of money, and he is only the most visible and recent of many prominent religious figures who have mishandled their supporters' funds. If we are to be "careful to do what is right in the eyes of everybody," we must begin here. We should be utterly honest and entirely above board in how we handle money.

That is why at Tenth Presbyterian Church we have our books audited and why the Bible Study Hour does the same thing as well as holding membership in the Evangelical Council for Financial Accountability.

2. Fair treatment of those who work for you. In Colossians Paul writes to those who own slaves, saying, "Masters, provide your slaves with what is right and fair, because you know that you also have a Master in heaven" (Col. 4:1). The word that is translated right in this verse is not the same word as in Romans 12:17. In this verse the word is dikaios, from which we get the Greek word for righteousness (dikaiosunê). It means conforming to a standard, right, proper, fair, honest, innocent. It is a different word, but it means the same or nearly the same thing, and it would be fair to say that dikaios is a near biblical equivalent of the secular philosophical Greek term kalos.

This means that we should treat those who work for us fairly, not using them only for what we can get out of them or always trying to get the highest profit at the lowest cost, at their expense.

It means that Christians should lead the way in fair labor relations and work always for the good of their employees.

Wayne Alderson is one person who has shown how this can be done. He was a coal miner's son who pioneered constructive rather than antagonistic labor-management relations in a steel foundry in western Pennsylvania known as Pitron. When he entered the plant, Pitron was in the throes of a ruinous and potentially explosive strike. But Alderson identified with the workers, respected them, and treated them fairly, and as a result he soon turned the plant into one of the nation's most productive and profitable operations. He now heads an organization known as Value of the Person, which is trying to apply biblical principles to labor-management relations nationwide.

3. Respect of one's parents. One sad part of the loss of values in America surveyed in The Day America Told the Truth is a breakdown in filial piety, more than half of all Americans admitting that they do not plan to take care of their parents in their old age. Nor do the parents expect to be taken care of. The Bible's standard is quite different. The fifth of the Ten Commandments says, "Honor your father and your mother" (Exod. 20:12), and Paul wrote thoughtfully, "Children, obey your parents in the Lord, for this is right [dikaios]" (Eph. 6:1).

4. The pursuit of all good things. A list of this kind might go on indefinitely since right conduct needs to be a part of everything we think, say, and do. But I have been restricting myself to verses in which the word right actually occurs in the NIV. Here is a final one that I have put last only because it comes close to embracing nearly everything else: "Finally, brothers, whatever is true, whatever is noble, whatever is right [dikaios], whatever is pure, whatever is lovely, whatever is admirable—if anything is excellent or praiseworthy—think about such things" (Phil. 4:8).

We live in a sinful, evil, perverted culture. It is hard not to be sullied by it. Yet it was no different in Paul's day. The Greek and Roman world of the first century was a slime pit. But in spite of it, Paul says that Christians are to set their minds on good things, things that are true, noble, right, pure, lovely, admirable, excellent, and praiseworthy. We are to seek the best rather than the worst of the world around us.

Just One More Problem

The first problem I discussed is knowing what the "right" thing is so we might do it. I pointed out that it is impossible to know what the right thing is in a relativistic culture like ours. We need absolutes. Above all we need the absolutes that can only come from God. We need the biblical revelation.

But here is the second problem: having the will to do what is right even when we know what it is. I say this because in spite of everything I have said about America's moral decline and the loss of a fixed moral standard for most people, many nevertheless believe they should do what is right, and in some cases they even believe they know what is right. It is just that they do not do it. Even if they want to! Even if they are sure they can!

Above I wrote about Charles Colson and his address on ethics given to the Harvard Business School in 1991. In that address he recognized both of these problems—first, knowing what is right and, second, having the will to do it—and he illustrated the problems by his own experience. Here is part of his testimony.

I grew up in America during the great Depression and thought that the great goal of life was success, material gain, power and influence. That's why I went into politics. I believed I could gain power and influence how people lived. If I earned a law degree—and I did at night —and accumulated academic honors and awards, it would enable me to find success, power, fulfillment, and meaning in life.

I had a great respect for the law. When I went through law school, I had a love for the law. I learned the history of jurisprudence and the philosophy underlying it.

I studied Locke, the Enlightenment, and social contract theories as an undergraduate at Brown, and had great respect for the political process. I also had a well-above-average I.Q. and some academic honors. I became very self-righteous.

When I went to the White House, I gave up a law practice that was making almost $200,000 a year (and that was back in 1969, which wasn't bad in those days). It's kind of ordinary now for graduates of Harvard Business School, but then it was a lot of money.... I took a job in the White House at $40,000 a year....

There was one thing about which I was absolutely certain—that no one could corrupt me. Positive! And if anybody ever gave me a present at Christmas time, it went right to the driver of my limousine. They used to send in bottles of whiskey, boxes of candy, and all sorts of things. Right to the driver of my automobile. I wouldn't accept a thing.

Patty and I were taken out on someone's boat one day. I discovered it was a chartered boat, and ended up paying for half of if because I didn't want to give the appearance of impropriety.
Imagine me worried about things like that.

I ended up going to prison....

I never once in my life thought I was breaking the law. I would have been terrified to do it because I would jeopardize the law degree I had worked four years at night to earn. I had worked my way onto the Law Review, Order of Coif, and Moot Court—all the things that lawyers do — and I graduated in the top of my class. I wouldn't put that in jeopardy for anything in the world!

I was so sure. But, you see, there are two problems. Every human being has an infinite capacity for self-rationalization and self-delusion. You get caught up in a situation where you are absolutely convinced that the fate of the republic rests on the reelection of, in my case, Richard Nixon.... There's an enormous amount of peer pressure, and you don't take time to stop and think,
"Wait a minute. Is this right by some absolute standard or does this seem right in the circumstances? Is it okay?"...

Second, and even more important—and this goes to the heart of the ethical dilemma in America today—even if I had known I was doing wrong, would I have had the will to do what is right? It isn't hindsight. I have to tell you the answer is no....

I discovered that there was no restraint on the evil in me. In my self-righteousness I was never more dangerous.

I discovered what Solzhenitsyn wrote so brilliantly from a prison—that the line between good and evil passes not between principalities and powers, but it oscillates within the human heart. Even the most rational approach to ethics is defenseless if there isn't the will to do what is right. On my own—and I can only speak for myself—I do not have that will. That which I want to do, I do not do; that which I do, I do not want to do.

It is only when I can turn to the One whom we celebrate at Easter—the One who was raised from the dead—that I can find the will to do what is right. It's only when that value and that sense of righteousness pervade a society that there can be a moral consensus. I would hope I might leave you, as future business leaders, the thought that society of which we are a part—and for which you should have a great sense of responsibility and stewardship—desperately needs those kind of values. And, if I might say so, each one of us does as well.

Colson was referring to the Apostle Paul when he said, "That which I want to do, I do not do; that which I do, I do not want to do" (see Rom. 7:15). But Colson, like Paul, found that what is impossible for us as mere human beings becomes possible through the power of Jesus Christ working within. "Who will rescue me from this body of death?" Paul queried. But he had the answer: "Thanks be to God—through Jesus Christ our Lord!" (v. 25).

Chapter 197.
Keeping the Peace

Romans 12:18-20

Whenever the subject of peace comes up Christians tend to get a bad rap, because the people discussing it think immediately of the Crusades of the Middle Ages or Protestants fighting Catholics in Northern Ireland today. We are supposed to be people of peace. Jesus is the "Prince of Peace" (Isa. 9:6). Yet Christianity seems to go hand in hand with political disruptions, internecine strife, and war.

These associations are not entirely fair. The Crusades were not really Christian. And in any case, they are only examples of the many thousands of wars that have scarred the face of human history. One writer has estimated that in the last four thousand years of human history there have been only three hundred years of peace. Human nature is vindictive, and the fights in which Christians have been involved are merely examples of the innumerable battles that have divided and continue to divide nations, races, families, and people of all backgrounds, beliefs, and dispositions. One of the songs I remember from my college days had this verse:

> The whole world is festering with unhappy souls.
> The French hate the Germans. The Germans hate the Poles.
> Italians hate Yugoslavs. South Africans hate the Dutch.
> And I don't like anybody very much.

Neither United nor Reformed

There is some truth to the complaint that Christians have not always been a peace-loving people.

Wars among nations are seldom in our control. But what about the battles that have divided Christians from Christians? In 1054 the Eastern Orthodox church divided from the Catholic church over one word in the Nicene Creed, filioque. It means "and the Son," and it had to do with whether it is right to say that the Holy Spirit proceeds "from the Father and the Son" or whether the Holy Spirit proceeds only "from the Father."

The leaders of the Reformation divided over how Jesus was present in the communion service, Martin Luther insisting on a literal physical presence ("This is my body," Matt. 26:26) and Zwingli on a mere remembrance ("Do this in remembrance of me," Luke 22:19).

And what of today? One writer tells of a crossroads in a small town where there were churches on three of the four corners. When a stranger asked what churches they were he was told, "Well, that one is United Presbyterian. This one is Reformed Presbyterian. And this one," pointing to the third, "is for Presbyterians who are neither united nor reformed."

Some divisions are based on important matters of theology and practice, of course. But many are not, and the self-righteous, antagonistic, fighting spirits that lie behind these unnecessary divisions and perpetuate them are a scandal among those who profess to follow Jesus Christ. Jesus said, "Blessed are the peacemakers" (Matt. 5:9). He asserted, "By this all men will know that you are my disciples, if you love one another" (John 13:35). Paul gets to this important matter in Romans 12:18-20, when he says:

If it is possible, as far as it depends on you, live at peace with everyone. Do not take revenge, my friends, but leave room for God's wrath, for it is written: "It is mine to avenge; I will repay," says the Lord. On the contrary:

> "If your enemy is hungry, feed him;
> if he is thirsty, give him something to drink.
> In doing this, you will heap burning coals on his head."

These are important statements about what it means to be a peacekeeper, especially because this is the first time in the letter that Paul has discussed the subject of peace between human beings. He discussed what it means to have peace with God in the first chapters of the letter (see Rom. 5:1). But this is the first consideration of what it means to be a peacemaker. There are three verses in this section, and they make three important points.

Realism

The first thing we notice about Paul's challenge to Christians to live a life of peace is his sobering realism. He begins, "If it is possible" and "as far as it depends on you..." (v. 18).

This way of speaking recognizes two potential sources of difficulty: (1) the behavior of other people may negate peace and (2) there may be issues at stake that will make peace impossible even from the side of the Christian. For example, truth cannot be bartered away or sacrificed just to maintain peace. Purity cannot be violated. Injustice cannot be condoned. James 3:17 says, "The wisdom that comes from heaven is first of all pure, then peace-loving...." So a prior, necessary Christian commitment to purity, truth, honesty, justice, and other indispensable matters may make peace unattainable.

Realism recognizes that this is a very wicked world. It knows that evil exists and affirms that it must be resisted by all right-thinking people, sometimes even to the point of armed conflict.

In September 1938 Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain returned from Munich following his much-watched meeting with Adolf Hitler and greeted enthusiastic London crowds with the promise of "peace in our time." He had just signed the infamous four-party agreement giving Germany the right to invade and occupy portions of Czechoslovakia. To maintain peace he had gone against his better judgment and had betrayed an ally. But it was not Chamberlain's motive that was at fault. He was a man of peace who wanted to avoid a threatened bloodbath. What was lacking was his judgment. He was not sufficiently realistic about evil, and World War II was the result.

We also need realism of a positive nature: We should realize that some things contribute to peace just as other things cause conflict and that, if we are Christians, we need to be on the side of the one rather than the other.

Here is some practical realism from the Book of Proverbs:

1. "Hatred stirs up dissension, but love covers all wrongs" (Prov. 10:12).
2. "A fool shows his annoyance at once, but a prudent man overlooks an insult" (Prov. 12:16).
3. "Fools mock at making amends for sin, but goodwill is found among the upright" (Prov. 14:9).
4. "A gentle answer turns away wrath, but a harsh word stirs up anger" (Prov. 15:1).
5. "He who covers over an offense promotes love, but whoever repeats the matter separates close friends" (Prov. 17:9).
6. "Starting a quarrel is like breaching a dam; so drop the matter before a dispute breaks out" (Prov. 17:14).
7. "An angry man stirs up dissension" (Prov. 29:22).

These verses tell us many things we can do to promote or encourage peace even if the other person does not want it.

Forbearance

The second important point Paul has to make about keeping peace is forbearance. He says, "Do not take revenge, my friends, but leave room for God's wrath, for it is written: 'It is mine to avenge; I will repay,' says the Lord" (v. 19). This is categorical teaching. It does not say, "Do not avenge yourselves except under the following three or four conditions" or "except under extreme circumstances." It says, "Do not avenge yourselves." That means never. Fighting back is not Christian.

"But surely I have to stand up for my rights," you say. Do you? If you want to stand up for someone's rights, I'll tell you what to do: Stand up for someone else's rights, fight for them. Do not fight for yourself, at least not if you are serious about obeying God and following Jesus Christ.

This verse tell us something else we should do as well, but it is no more acceptable to our natural way of thinking than what I have just said: Leave room for God's wrath.

In the Greek text of Romans these words are literally, "Give place to wrath," which is how the King James translators rendered the verse. In other words, there is no specific reference to God, which means that there is some question as to what the verse actually teaches. It could mean four things:

1. Give place to your enemy's wrath. That is, step aside and let it pass by you. If there is to be wrath, let it be his rather than yours.
2. Give place to your own wrath. That is, give it time to expend itself. Don't do anything hasty. Let the pressure in you dissipate.
3. Give place to the wrath of the civil magistrate. That is, let the case come before the courts. That is what they are for.
4. Give place to God's wrath. This is the view of the translators of the New International Version, who have added the word "God's" to clarify what they believe the text is teaching.

Of these four interpretations, the middle two can probably be eliminated quickly. The second, giving place to your own wrath, is just a modern idea. We speak of "letting it all hang out" or "getting it off your chest," but that is hardly biblical. In fact, the point of this passage is the precise opposite. We are not to let our wrath out. We are to forego it. The third interpretation, giving place to the proper function of the civil courts, is not in view either. It is true that the next chapter begins to talk about the role of the civil magistrate, but it does not develop the government's role in providing justice for us when we are wronged but rather the state's role in either punishing or commending us for our behavior.

That leaves either the first or fourth interpretation: (1) that we are to give place to our enemy's wrath, allowing it to work or (4) that we are to leave vengeance to God. The choice here is difficult, because both are true and both have something to commend them. Those who argue for the first view note that stepping back to allow something to pass by is the natural meaning of the Greek verb. Donald Grey Barnhouse says, "Here we are being told simply to endure patiently the wrath of the man who does us wrong. If evil rushes toward us, we are to love the evildoer and stand aside while he strikes out in blind selfishness; for we know that he cannot hurt us in the citadel of the heart where Jesus Christ holds sway." Jesus' command, "Do not resist an evil person. If someone strikes you on the right cheek, turn to him the other also" (Matt. 5:39), is along this exact line.

On the other hand, since the verse goes on to speak of God's wrath, saying, "For it is written: 'It is mine to avenge; I will repay,' says the Lord," most commentators feel that the idea of giving place to God's wrath is almost inescapable. John Murray says, "Here we have what belongs to the essence of piety. The essence of ungodliness is that we presume to take the place of God, to take everything into our own hands. It is faith to commit ourselves to God, to cast all our care on him and to vest all our interests in him. In reference to the matter in hand, the wrongdoing of which we are the victims, the way of faith is to recognize that God is judge and to leave the execution of vengeance and retribution to him. Never may we in our private personal relations execute the vengeance which wrongdoing merits."

The statement "It is mine to avenge; I will repay" is from Deuteronomy 32:35, but it is also quoted in Hebrews 10:30. It is an essential truth to keep in mind, but it is difficult, especially when we are under attack.

Times of attack are a profound test of faith and of whether or not we really do have an otherworldly perspective.

When we were studying the "pattern of this age" in our exposition of Romans 12:1-2, I contrasted the Christian worldview with that of secularism. Secularism rejects a beyond or a hereafter and sees life only as the now. So, for the secularist, to suggest leaving vengeance to God is utter foolishness. If the secularist is going to get what he wants, it will have to be now. And if justice is going to be done, it will have to be done in this life. Hence retaliation is the answer. It is only a person who sees beyond the now and is willing to trust God to establish justice and meet out punishments and awards hereafter who can be forebearing and hence be a peacemaker.

Remember these words: "'It is mine to avenge; I will repay,' says the Lord." They are important.

Active Goodness

The third verse dealing with what it means to "live at peace with everyone" is verse 20, which develops a contrast with the thought of taking vengeance into our own hands. "On the contrary," it says,

> "If your enemy is hungry, > feed him; if he is thirsty, > give him something to > drink.
> In doing this, you will heap burning coals on his head."

The thrust of this verse is clear enough. We are to do good even to those who do evil to us. This is the positive way in which we are to work toward peace or be peacemakers. Moreover, it is a third step in an obvious progression. First, we are to forebear doing evil, not retaliating for wrongs done. Second, we are to do good instead of doing evil. Third, we are to do good even to our enemies. The quotation is from Proverbs 25:21-22.

The difficult part of this is the last line, which as Leon Morris notes in a classic understatement, is "a metaphorical expression whose meaning is not obvious." What does it mean to "heap burning coals" on our enemy's head? And why should we want to?

Charles Hodge suggests three possible interpretations.

1. Increasing the enemy's guilt and thus his eventual punishment. This is the oldest and probably the most widely received interpretation of the metaphor. But this is hardly the thrust of this passage, not to mention that it is also a revolting idea. It amounts to using good as a weapon. That is, "Be good to your enemy, because in the end your good will harm him more than if you were mean." It is hard to imagine Jesus or even a nice worldly person seriously saying that.

2. Kindness will cause your enemy to become guilty and feel shame. This is not much better. To be sure, shame might lead to repentance and thus eventually to salvation. But initially it is pain itself that we would be trying to inflict, and this hardly sits well with the idea of doing good to one's enemies or blessing those who curse us, which Paul has expounded just a few verses earlier.

3. Doing good to one's enemy is the best means of subduing him or winning him over. Hodge calls this the simplest and natural meaning, saying, "To heap coals of fire on anyone is a punishment which no one can bear; he must yield to it. Kindness is no less effectual; the most malignant enemy cannot always withstand it. The true and Christian method, therefore, to subdue an enemy is to 'overcome evil with good.' " This is where the next verse takes us, of course. For the end of the matter is that evil is to be overcome by good, not good by evil or even evil by evil. Hodge says, "Nothing is so powerful as goodness.... Men whose minds can withstand argument, and whose hearts rebel against threats, are not proof against the persuasive influence of unfeigned love."

And isn't that exactly how the Lord Jesus Christ subdued us to himself? No one was ever reviled so much or as unjustly as Jesus. Yet, as Peter wrote, "When they hurled their insults at him, he did not retaliate; when he suffered, he made no threats. Instead, he entrusted himself to him who judges justly. He himself bore our sins in his body on the tree, so that we might die to sins and live for righteousness; by his wounds you have been healed. For you were like sheep going astray, but now you have returned to the Shepherd and Overseer of your souls" (1 Peter 2:23-25).

It was by his conduct in suffering and before his enemies that Jesus won us, and it is by his death and the power of his resurrection that he enables us to live like him.

His Mind in Us

This leads me to the last point, a very important one. I have been working through what Paul is teaching about peacekeeping or peacemaking, and I have stressed that it requires realism, forbearance, and active goodness to those who do wrong. But perhaps you have been thinking—I know the thought comes to me—"But I can't do it. I don't care if this is the Christian way or is the example of Christ, I can't do it. Nothing is ever going to get me to the point of wanting to do good to those who hate me."

Fair enough. You have to start where you are, and if that is where you are, you have to recognize it. But also recognize that those who belong to Jesus Christ do not have a choice about whether they are going to follow and obey him or not. We must, if we are Christians. Therefore, we must be peacekeepers and peacemakers. We must be like him.

So the question is not Will you? The question is merely How? Let me make two suggestions.

First, you will never make any progress in making peace between yourself and other people until you have first found peace with God. You must be a Christian. Our relationship with God is the most important of all relationships, and if we are not at peace with him, we will never be at peace with others. We will be fighting constantly. That is why Peter went right on to discuss Jesus' death. On the cross Jesus made peace between rebellious sinners like us and the sovereign, holy God against whom we have rebelled. It is by believing that and trusting in Jesus' finished work that peace with God may be found.

Paul told the Colossians, "God was pleased to have all his fullness dwell in him [Christ], and through him to reconcile to himself all things, whether things on earth or things in heaven, by making peace through his blood, shed on the cross" (Col. 1:19-20).

Second, if you are to be a peacemaker, you must be at peace yourself, and this means you must have experienced what Paul in Philippians calls the peace of God. "Let your gentleness be evident to all. The Lord is near. Do not be anxious about anything, but in everything, by prayer and petition, with thanksgiving, present your requests to God. And the peace of God, which transcends all understanding, will guard your hearts and your minds in Christ Jesus" (Phil. 4:57).

First, peace with God. Second, the peace of God. Then, at the last, you will be able to start being a peacekeeper and a peacemaker. For when you are at peace with God and when the life of the Prince of Peace is in you, Jesus will be doing through you what he himself was doing when he was in the world. And while you are at it, do not forget the seventh of the eight Beatitudes, which promises a blessing to peacemakers, adding, "For they will be called sons of God" (Matt. 5:9).

Chapter 198.
The Triumph of Good over Evil

Romans 12:21

We have come to the last sentence of Romans 12, and it is worth noting, as we look back over the preceding verses, that Paul has said three times that we are not to return evil for evil. Verse 14 commands, "Bless those who persecute you; bless and do not curse." Verse 17 urges, "Do not repay anyone evil for evil." Now, verse 21, the last verse in the chapter, demands, "Do not be overcome by evil, but overcome evil with good." This is Paul's overriding theme in this section. It is why he repeats the idea. But these verses also establish a progression leading from what we must admit is already a very difficult standard to a standard that is even higher—in fact, some would say it's nearly impossible.

Here is how it develops. Verse 14 tells us that we are not to speak badly of another person but rather to speak good instead. Verse 17 tells us that we are not to retaliate for evil done to us. That concerns actions. At the end, in verse 21, Paul takes us beyond anything we might anticipate and tells us that not only are we not to retaliate for evil done to us, but that we are actually to do good to others and, amazingly, actually to overcome the evil of those other persons by our good conduct.

Love Stronger Than Hate

The standard Paul lays down in this chapter is so unnatural to us and seemingly impossible that I want to begin with the story of a man who has actually lived up to it. His name is John Perkins, a black man who dropped out of school in the third grade but who became a pastor and founder of the Voice of Calvary Ministries in Mendenhall, Mississippi. He has received national recognition for his leadership in race relations, has an honorary doctorate from Wheaton College, and even served on a presidential commission for inner-city problems under President Ronald Reagan.

John Perkins was born in Mississippi. He left the south for California when he was still a teenager, became a Christian in California, and later returned to Mississippi because he believed God was calling him to preach the gospel to the poor black people he had been raised with and help them by developing and supporting black leadership.

On February 7, 1970, a Saturday night, a van of black college students who had been taking part in a civil rights march was pulled over by highway patrolmen from Brandon, Mississippi, and the students were arrested. Perkins and two of his associates went to the jail to post bail, but when they arrived they were surrounded by five deputy sheriffs and several highway patrolmen who arrested them and began to beat them.

Perkins had not been speeding, taking drugs, or resisting arrest. He didn't even have a police record. All he had done was go to the jail to post bail for the students. But he was a black leader, and he was hated.

Perkins was beaten most of that night, along with some of the others. They stomped on him and kicked him in the head, ribs, and groin. One officer brought a fork over to him and said, "Do you see this?" Then he jammed it up his nose. After that he shoved it down his throat. For part of that terrible evening Perkins was unconscious and so mutilated that the students who were watching over him in his cell thought that he was either dead or about to die. It was a case of evil in a particularly vicious, violent, racist form.

Yet it did something good for Perkins. Up to this point he had been in Mississippi to preach to black people only. It was all he was allowed to do, of course. The doors of virtually all white churches were closed to him. But the beating changed him and gave him a new vision. He wrote:

I remembered their faces—so twisted with hate. It was like looking at white-faced demons. For the first time I saw what hate had done to those people. These policemen were poor. They saw themselves as failures. The only way they knew how to find a sense of worth was by beating us. Their racism made them feel like "somebody."

When I saw that, I just couldn't hate back. I could only pity them. I said to God that night, "God, if you will get me out of this jail alive"—and I really didn't think I would, maybe I was trying to bargain with him—"I really want to preach a gospel that will heal these people, too."

Perkins's recovery took some time, since he needed to heal both physically and emotionally. The physical recovery was assisted by a pair of compassionate doctors, one white and one black. The emotional healing was accomplished by God, who taught him that the same gospel that frees blacks also frees whites and that real justice, if it was to come, would come "only as people's hearts were made right with God and God's love motivated them to be reconciled to each other." "Now that God had enabled me to forgive the many whites who had wronged me, I found myself able to truly love them," said Perkins. "I wanted to return good for evil." And Perkins did! His ministry is the proof of that desire, and it is continuing. It is a striking case of a believer refusing to be overcome by evil but instead overcoming evil with good.

Do Not Be Overcome, but Overcome

Our text has two parts. The first says, "Do not be overcome by evil." That is the negative. The second part says, "But overcome evil with good." That is the positive. Of the two it is the hardest to accomplish.

1. Do not be overcome by evil. The negative part is hard enough, of course. This is because to be overcome by evil means to respond to evil with evil, that is, to fight back, and that is the most natural thing for a sinful human being to do. It was summed up in a recent comic strip in which Hagar the Horrible tells his son, "Son, don't let the sun go down upon your wrath.... Attack your enemy at once and waste him while what he did to you is still fresh in your mind."

Unfortunately, there are many examples of just that kind of retaliation and of the evil that comes from it. There is the example of Mattathias, one of the Maccabees, who commanded his followers, "Avenge the wrong done to your people. Pay back the Gentiles in full" (1 Macc. 2:6768 NRSV). They tried, but much damage to Israel and an untold loss of lives was the result. We have seen the attitude in Israel in a tit-for-tat policy against the Arabs of the Gaza Strip and the West Bank. We have seen it in South Africa, which seemed on the very edge of a genocidal civil war in spite of the heroic efforts of some leaders, both black and white, to avoid it and move toward reconciliation and justice. We have seen the identical attitude in the former Yugoslavia, where centuries old racial and religious hatred have fueled one of the most destructive wars of recent history. Indeed, this is the case in every place where the normal human instinct for retaliation and the cherishing of hatreds holds sway.

This must not be the case with Christians. Christians are not to avenge themselves. Instead, as Jesus said, "Do not resist an evil person. If someone strikes you on the right cheek, turn to him the other also. And if someone wants to sue you and take your tunic, let him have your cloak as well" (Matt. 5:39-40).

2. Overcome evil with good. Yet not only are we not to strike back, thus being overcome by evil, with evil ruling the day, we are to respond positively in love, thus overcoming the evil in the situation and in the other person with our good.

Every time I get on the positive side of this matter I feel that the standard is so far above most of us as to seem almost unreal. I have already given a great living example of this principle in the life of John Perkins. David and his treatment of King Saul is a good illustration of this from the Old Testament.

David had served Saul faithfully, killed Goliath, fought his battles, and become a hero of the nation. But that had incited Saul to jealousy, and at this point Saul was pursuing David ruthlessly to put him to death. Taking three thousand men with him, Saul pursued David into the wilderness of En Gedi. David was hiding in a cave, and Saul entered, not even suspecting he was there. While the king was in the cave David crept forward and cut off a corner of Saul's robe, which he used to prove his love for the king. Yet so far was David from wanting to do any evil to Saul that he was conscience-stricken just for having cut off the corner of the robe.

When Saul went out again David followed and called to him, "My lord the king!" (1 Sam. 24:8). Saul looked back. David continued. "Why do you listen when men say, 'David is bent on harming you'? This day you have seen with your own eyes how the Lord delivered you into my hands in the cave. Some urged me to kill you, but I spared you; I said, 'I will not lift my hand against my master, because he is the Lord's anointed.' See, my father, look at this piece of your robe in my hand! I cut off the corner of your robe but did not kill you. Now understand and recognize that I am not guilty of wrongdoing or rebellion. I have not wronged you, but you are hunting me down to take my life. May the LORD judge between you and me. And may the LORD avenge the wrongs you have done to me, but my hand will not touch you. As the old saying goes, 'From evildoers come evil deeds,' so my hand will not touch you" (1 Sam. 24:9-13).

When Saul heard this he was stricken with guilt and wept aloud. "You are more righteous than I," he said. "You have treated me well, but I have treated you badly.... May the LORD reward you well for the way you treated me today. I know that you will surely be king and that the kingdom of Israel will be established in your hands. Now swear to me by the LORD that you will not cut off my descendants or wipe out my name from my father's family" (1 Sam. 24:1621). David promised this and they parted on good terms, at least temporarily.

A short time later a similar incident occurred. Saul and his guard of soldiers were sleeping in their camp, and David and his friend Abishai went to it secretly and removed Saul's spear and water bottle. Then they called to the king from a hilltop some distance away, showing the spear and water bottle as proof that once again the Lord had placed Saul in David's power and that he had spared him graciously, since David could have killed Saul if he had wanted to. "Why is my lord pursuing his servant?" David cried. "What have I done, and what wrong am I guilty of?" (1 Sam. 26:18).

Saul answered, "I have sinned. Come back, David my son. Because you considered my life precious today, I will not try to harm you again. Surely I have acted like a fool and have erred greatly" (1 Sam. 26:21).

We know, of course, that Saul was unable to change his character, and therefore these were only temporary embarrassments and confessions. He never stopped trying to kill David, and he was stopped only when God allowed Saul and his son Jonathan to be slain in battle with the Philistines. But on these two occasions, for a short time at least, good triumphed gloriously, and good attended David's long reign in no small measure because of the way he was known to have conducted himself then. "Do not be overcome by evil, but overcome evil with good." David triumphed in both of these areas and prospered because of it.

Who Is Sufficient for This?

How are we to live like this? How can we, being what we are? In his study of Romans 12, Robert Candlish observes, "This surely is a very holy calling. It is a very awful calling. We may well ask, 'Who is sufficient for these things?' And we can be sustained only when we are enabled to add, 'Our sufficiency is of God'—of that God who has so dealt with us as he would have us to deal with our fellowmen and fellow-sinners."

How are we to overcome evil with good, when our natures are so contrary to this standard? Candlish has suggested a first means. I want to develop it and add two more suggestions.

1. We must know with deep gratitude that this is how God has treated us. We deserved to be condemned, but God was good to us and overcame our evil by his good. If we appreciate this rightly, it will empower us to do the same. In fact, if we do not have this spirit, it will be sound evidence that we do not know God and have not experienced his grace in salvation.

I think of the story Jesus told about the unmerciful servant. This man owed the king ten thousand talents, the equivalent of several million dollars. Since he was unable to pay, the king was going to sell him, his wife, and his children into slavery. But the servant fell on his knees and begged for mercy, promising to pay back everything. This was an impossible thing to do, of course. But the king took pity on him, canceled the debt, and let him go.

This servant then found another servant who owed him a mere pittance. He demanded repayment. The servant who owed only a little pleaded for a chance to pay his debt, but the first man refused and had the other cast into prison. When the king heard this, he recalled the first servant, rebuked him, and had him jailed too. "This is how my heavenly Father will treat each of you unless you forgive your brother from your heart," Jesus concluded (see Matt. 18:21-35).

The parable does not teach that we are saved from sin by good works, of course. We are saved by grace alone. It does teach, however, that if we have been saved by grace we will be gracious and that, if we are not, we have never actually known the grace of God and will be judged for our sins at the final judgment. If it does nothing else, the parable shows why overcoming evil with good is not optional for Christians. We must forgive because we have been forgiven. We must overcome evil with good because God has overcome our even greater evil in saving us.

2. We must study the example of Jesus Christ. The second thing we need if we are to learn what it is to overcome evil with good and actually overcome it is the example of Jesus Christ. For this is what Jesus did, and if he is our Savior, we will love him and want to be like him.

Charles Hodge has written:

One of the most beautiful exhibitions of the character of our Savior was afforded by his conduct under persecution. "He was led as a lamb to the slaughter"; "when he was reviled, he reviled not again; when he suffered, he threatened not." Even martyrs dying for the truth have not always been able to avoid the prediction of evil to their persecutors, so much easier is it to abstain from recompensing evil for evil than really to love and pray for the good of our enemies. This, however, is Christian duty; such is the spirit of the gospel.

This is what moved John Perkins. He saw the enslaving nature of white racial hatred as he was being beaten. But it was later, as he was recovering in the hospital that God directed him to Jesus and by this means began to work powerfully on his heart. He wrote:

The Spirit of God worked on me as I lay in that bed. An image formed in my mind—the image of a cross, of Christ on the cross. This Jesus knew what I had suffered. He understood. He cared. Because he had gone through it all himself.

He too was arrested and falsely accused. He too had an unjust trial. He too was beaten. Then he was nailed to a cross and killed like a common criminal. But when he looked at the mob who had crucified him, he didn't hate them; he loved them. And he prayed, "Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing" (Luke 23:34).

His enemies hated, but he forgave. God wouldn't let me escape that. He showed me that however unjustly I had been treated, in my bitterness and hatred I was just as sinful as those who had beaten me. And I needed forgiveness for my bitterness.

I read Matthew 6:14, 15 again and again in that bed: "For if you forgive men for their transgressions, your heavenly Father will also forgive you. But if you do not forgive men, then your heavenly Father will not forgive your transgressions." To receive God's forgiveness, I was going to have to forgive those who had hurt me. As I prayed, the faces of those policemen passed before me one by one, and I forgave each one. Faces of other white people from the past came before me, and I forgave them. I could sense that God was working a deep inner healing in me that went far back beyond February 7, 1970. It went clear back to my earliest memories of childhood. God was healing all those wounds that had kept me from loving whites. How sweet God's forgiveness and healing was.

Nothing in all history has done so much to heal deep human hurts and redirect otherwise resentful and retaliating lives than the example of Jesus Christ, who "suffered for [us]... that [we] should follow in his steps.... He himself bore our sins in his body on the tree, so that we might die to sins and live for righteousness; by his wounds you have been healed. For you were like sheep going astray, but now you have returned to the Shepherd and Overseer of your souls" (1 Peter 2:21, 24-25).

3. We must be close to Christ and strive to draw closer to him always. Important as the example of Jesus Christ is, that example alone is not enough. Nor is merely being saved enough, otherwise Paul would not be urging the Romans to this high standard of conduct, as he is doing. It would be automatic. In order to live as Christ we must first belong to Christ and second draw close to Christ, indeed striving to draw closer to him always. Charles Hodge says, "We must remember that without Christ we can do nothing.... If, therefore, we attempt to discharge the duties here enjoined apart from him, we shall be as a branch severed from the vine; and unless we are 'instant in prayer,' this union with Christ cannot be kept up."

Paul himself was weak. He called himself "the worst" of sinners (1 Tim. 1:15). Yet he also said, "I can do everything through him who gives me strength" (Phil. 4:13). So can you, if you stay close to Jesus.

A Remarkable Chapter

As we look back over this remarkable chapter, starting with the offering of our bodies to God as living sacrifices and ending with the offering of ourselves and own best efforts to others in order that, by the grace of God, we might overcome their evil with good, we marvel at the wisdom, scope, and power of a gospel that can do that. It is a gospel that can take sinners who have lived only for themselves and turn them into men and women who actually overcome the evil of this world. Who could ever think up a gospel like that? Not us, for sure. Only God could devise such a powerful gospel.

Here is how Robert Haldane describes it:

In the above remarkable portion of Scripture, we learn the true tendency of the doctrine of salvation wholly by grace, established in a manner so powerful in the preceding part of this epistle, by which men are created in Christ Jesus unto good works. How beautiful is it, and how sublime when displayed in all its practical effects in the duties which flow from it.... We may search all the works of the most admired writers and, so far as they have not borrowed from the fountain of inspired truth, we shall find in them nothing comparable to the elevated maxims contained in this chapter. Especially we shall not discover the faintest shadow of resemblance to the motives by which these duties are here inculcated. If the heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth forth his handiworks—if the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead, so that the heathen are without excuse—how much more clearly do the Scriptures proclaim their Divine origin, and the majesty of their Author! God hath magnified his word above all his name.

Indeed, he has! God has exalted his truth above anything else that we can possibly hope to understand or know. It is for us now to exalt God's name and Word by living out his truth in the way we go about our daily lives.

Part Eighteen. Church and State

Chapter 199. Authority

Romans 13:1

In the fall of 1561 an important conversation took place in Scotland between Queen Mary and the Calvinistic Protestant preacher John Knox.

Mary was a Catholic. She had been educated in Catholic France, and she believed that sovereigns—she herself was one—had absolute power over the consciences of their subjects. Knox was a reformer. For his uncompromising preaching he had been sentenced to serve as a galley slave for nineteen months. After his release, he had studied in Geneva under John Calvin from 1553 to 1559. Then, in the summer of 1560, he had participated in the drafting of the Scottish Confession of Faith that stated that Jesus Christ "is the only Head of His Kirk" (sections 11 and 18). Knox had returned just two years before his celebrated conversation with Queen Mary.

In the interview Mary accused Knox of having wrongly taught the people to receive another religion than their princes allow. "And how can that doctrine be of God, seeing that God commands subjects to obey their princes?" she asked. She was referring to Romans 13:1 and other texts.

Knox answered, "Madam, as right religion took neither [its] origin nor authority from worldly princes, but from the Eternal God alone, so are not subjects bound to frame their religion according to the appetites of their princes."

He admonished Mary, "God commands queens to be nurses unto his people." "Yes, but you are not the church that I will nourish," she retorted.

Knox replied, "Your will, Madam, is no reason." In this way the issues of church and state and the proper role and function of the state were framed in Scotland in the sixteenth century. There was no relief in Scotland until Mary's forced abdication in 1567.

Christians and the State

What is the role of the state in human affairs? How is the state to relate to the church of Jesus Christ? How are Christian people to relate to the government's authority? It is these questions that Paul raises and answers in the first seven verses of Romans 13.

What a source of controversy they have been! J. C. O'Neill in Paul's Letter to The Romans wrote, "These seven verses have caused more unhappiness and misery in the Christian East and West than any other seven verses in the New Testament." That is probably not true. But they have certainly puzzled many and caused unhappiness among some scholars. Some of them, like the one I just quoted, have attempted to eliminate the verses from the letter, reasoning that they are un-Pauline and come rather from a Stoic source. Such persons think the verses have been interpolated, arguing that verse 8 would follow nicely after 12:21, and that there is nothing quite like this section anywhere else in Paul's writing.

This is true, but that does not mean that Paul did not write it. Furthermore, it can be argued equally well that his discussion of the legitimate authority and proper function of the state is a natural follow-up to the immediately preceding section in which he presented the duty of the Christian to return good for evil, since to do that does not mean that a Christian always has to be victimized by evil persons. It is the state's duty to restrain and punish evil.

Again, a discussion of the role of the state is natural in a letter to Christians living at the center of the Roman world. Jews were notoriously resistant to all outside authority. They had fomented numerous rebellions, and the greatest one of all, the rebellion that was to be crushed by the Roman general Titus in 70 A.D., was only a decade away from the time Paul wrote this letter. In the sixties Christians were shielded under a law originally promulgated by Julius Caesar, but turmoil was coming. Were the followers of Christ to align themselves with the coming revolution, or were they to be loyal citizens of the all-encompassing Roman empire? If so, what about the lordship of Jesus Christ? Was he King, or was he not? If they were not to be loyal citizens, what was their position regarding Rome to be?

The Starting Point: God Is Sovereign

The starting point of Paul's argument is found in the reason he gives for his categorical opening statement that "everyone," not only Christians, "must submit himself to the governing authorities" (Rom. 13:1). Why? The answer is not that you will get into trouble if you don't, or even that obedience is necessary for maintaining social order. Those are excellent pragmatic reasons that Paul understands and will bring into the discussion in due time, but they are not the reasons he gives at the beginning. What he says in verse 1 is that we must obey the authorities because "there is no authority except that which God has established" and "the authorities that exist have been established by God."

In other words, the starting point for Paul's argument is the doctrine of the sovereignty of God, in this case in regard to human rulers. God is sovereign. Therefore, those who exercise authority do so because God has established them in their positions.

We have to take this sovereignty seriously, because it is easy for us to accept God's being sovereign when we are given Christian rulers or when people of high moral character are elevated to positions of responsibility. But what about evil rulers? What about Nero, the corrupt emperor who was reigning in Rome at the very time Paul was writing this letter? What about rulers who persecuted the church? Or, for that matter, what about such evil leaders as Adolf Hitler, Joseph Stalin, and Idi Amin, or even elected officials like Richard Nixon, who betrayed our trust and disappointed us?

Romans 13:1 tells us that even these authorities have been established by God, and that we have a legitimate (though not unlimited) responsibility to obey even them.

We have already come across one example of an evil but nevertheless God-established ruler in Romans, though Paul was not specifically thinking about the role of the state when he brought him into his discussion. This example is Pharaoh, the oppressor of the Jews. He worked them as slaves and arrogantly resisted Moses' demand that he let God's people go. God judged this arrogance. Egypt was ruined by a series of ten plagues, culminating in the death of all the firstborn children of the country. In the end Pharaoh and his armies were destroyed by drowning in the Red Sea. But evil as this man was, he had nevertheless been put into his position by God, which Paul clearly says.

That is the teaching of Romans 9:17, where Paul quotes God as telling Pharaoh, "I raised you up for this very purpose, that I might display my power in you and that my name might be proclaimed in all the earth" (quoting Exod. 9:16). God raised Pharaoh up so that he might display his wrath in judging him. It was not a desirable appointment, but still it was God who had raised him up simply because God is sovereign in all things.

A second example is Nebuchadnezzar, another arrogant ruler. He thought he was superior to Jehovah because he had been able to conquer Jerusalem, raze the temple, and carry off to Babylon the gold and silver objects that had been used by the Jewish priests in their worship. The first four chapters of Daniel are a record of the struggle that took place as Nebuchadnezzar contended for sovereignty and God worked to humble him and show him that God alone, not Nebuchadnezzar, is the Most High God and ruler of all.

Three times in Daniel 4 the text says that "the Most High is sovereign over the kingdoms of men and gives them to anyone he wishes" (vv. 17, 25, 32): (1) Nebuchadnezzar heard these words in his dream; (2) Daniel recited them to him as the words of God; (3) Nebuchadnezzar heard them from heaven when God uttered his important, symbolic judgment of insanity upon the stiffnecked ruler. This is an important truth, and in the end Nebuchadnezzar seems to have gotten the message, for he confessed:

I, Nebuchadnezzar, raised my eyes toward heaven, and my sanity was restored. Then I praised the Most High; I honored and glorified him who lives forever.

> His dominion is an eternal dominion; his kingdom endures from generation to generation.
> All the peoples of the earth are regarded as nothing.
> He does as he pleases with the powers of heaven and the peoples of the earth.
> No one can hold back his hand or say to him: "What have you done?"...

Everything he does is right and all his ways are just. And those who walk in pride he is able to humble.

Daniel 4:34-35, 37

Another example is Cyrus the Persian, who is also mentioned in Daniel (1:21, 6:28, 10:1). He was an unusually humane ruler, whom God used to bring the Jews back to Jerusalem from Babylon. In Isaiah 45:1 this pagan king is even called the Lord's "anointed," which means messiah, the very title given to Jesus as the Messiah of God.

These rulers—Nero, Pharaoh, Nebuchadnezzar, Cyrus—and all others have been set in their places by God, simply because God is sovereign and, as the Westminster Confession of Faith says, "God from all eternity did, by the most wise and holy counsel of his own will, freely and unchangeably ordain whatsoever comes to pass" (III, 1). There is no ruler anywhere or from any time in history who was not set in his exalted position by God.

Obeying the Sovereign

Of course, the problem for us is not so much that God has established whatever rulers there may be. We can believe that abstractly and either like and approve of our rulers, or not like them and disapprove of them, or perhaps even reject them. The problem is that we are told that it is the duty of Christians to obey those who exercise such authority, and that includes all authorities, not just kings and presidents but also policemen, judges, schoolteachers, bosses, and other such "governing authorities." We do not want to do that.

Paul is writing about the civil government in Romans 13, but these other authorities come into the picture tangentially because they have governing roles and have been set in place by God.

There are many obvious problems at this point. First, Paul does not answer a lot of our questions. For example, when is a government a legitimate government, and when isn't it? When is it right to rebel against an unjust or tyrannical government, or isn't it permitted at all? What about our own American War of Independence? If we had been living then, what side should we have been on, with England or with the colonists? What are we to do when there are rival claimants to the throne? Which one should we obey? Again, at what point does an unjust ruler become legitimate?

Or what about limits? Paul says we are to obey the governing authorities. But does this mean that we are to obey everything they command? What about unjust acts commanded by an evil government? Killing civilians? Lying? Clandestine operations even for such an important branch of government as the CIA? Are there no limits to what must be obeyed?

We are going to explore the limits to the obedience Christians can give a civil government in the next study. But the point I am making here is that the matter of obedience to those in authority cannot be taken lightly, as we are so often inclined to do.

As far as Romans 13:1 is concerned, it would be difficult, probably impossible, for anyone to write a more all-encompassing, absolute, or utterly unqualified statement than the one Paul has given: "Everyone [literally, 'every soul'] must submit himself to the governing authorities."

This is written so strongly that Robert Haldane thinks that it requires an obedience to secular rulers that is almost absolute: "Everyone, without exception, is, by the command of God, to be subject to the existing powers, whatever were the means by which they became possessed of the situation in which they stand.... If God has appointed every government that exists in the world, his people are bound to submit to every government under which their lot has been cast."

Power or Authority?

There are limits, of course, but the place to begin is not with the limits, but by trying to understand the nature of the authority that has been given to civil rulers. The key word is authority, which occurs six times in these verses.

Two Greek words are used of political power that are closely connected but need to be distinguished. The first is kratos, which refers to what we might call "the naked power of rule." It can be legitimate or illegitimate, as in the case of the devil, who, we are told, has "the power of death" (Heb. 2:14) but who will lose it when Jesus returns. His power will be taken away, and he will be cast into the lake of fire. This word has proved useful in describing the various types of government. For example, we speak of democracy. Demos means people, crowd, or public assembly. Kratos means rule. So democracy means rule by the people (or by many people). A plutocracy is a system in which the rich (or aristocrats) rule, because ploutos means wealth.

So when we speak of power (kratos) we recognize that there can be both legitimate and illegitimate power. And, of course, Christians are under no obligation to obey a power that is illegitimate. Just because a man with a gun orders us to do something does not mean that we should do it necessarily. The man has power, but it is illegitimate. What we need is a legitimate power—a policeman—to subdue him.

The other word that is used of political as well as other kinds of power is exousia, which is the word Paul uses in Romans 13. Exousia is a delegated power, power that is given to a person or group of persons by another. Paul uses it in Romans 13 because he wants to make explicit that the authority of the governing powers is from God.

Nevertheless, they are responsible for how they exercise it. That is the important thing. They are responsible to God, precisely because God has given them the power. So here in one word is both the legitimacy and the necessary accountability of human government.

Jesus before Pilate

An important example is Jesus Christ's trial before Pontius Pilate. Jesus was tried for treason because, as his accusers put it, he "claim[ed] to be a king" (John 19:12). It did not take Pilate long to discover that the kind of kingdom Jesus was talking about was no direct threat to Rome, because it was a kingdom of truth. Jesus told him, "I am a king. In fact, for this reason I was born, and for this I came into the world, to testify to the truth. Everyone on the side of truth listens to me" (John 18:37). After he had heard that, Pilate knew that this was a religious matter and was of no concern to him.

Yet the leaders of the people were still clamoring for Jesus' death, and it became clear that Pilate was soon going to bow to their wishes. He wanted to help Jesus, but Jesus was not speaking to him. "Do you refuse to speak to me?" Pilate said. "Don't you realize I have power either to free you or to crucify you?" (John 19:10).

At this point Jesus replied with one of two classic texts for helping us understand the God-given role of civil government and the right relationship of the church to the state. He answered, "You would have no power over me if it were not given to you from above. Therefore the one who handed me over to you is guilty of a greater sin" (John 19:11).

The word that is translated power in this verse is the same word that Paul uses in Romans 13, and it is used in exactly the same way. The authority that was given to Pilate was a delegated authority, because it had been given to him by God. It was a true authority. Pilate had the right to try Jesus and render judgment as he thought right. But he was responsible to God for what he did and for how he did it. That is why Jesus was able to remind him, "Therefore the one who handed me over to you is guilty of a greater sin." The sin of the Jewish leaders was greater than the sin of Pilate, because they were sinning against the Scriptures, which pointed to Jesus and were fulfilled by Jesus, and against their consciences, as even Pilate recognized ("It was out of envy that they had handed Jesus over to him," Matt. 27:18). Nevertheless, Pilate was also sinning by condemning an innocent man, and he would have to answer to God for it.

Pilate had authority in Christ's trial. He could decide as he wished. He decided wrongly, but he had authority to make that decision even if it was wrong. This is because his authority was from God, and Jesus did not suggest that it be wrested from him even because he had made so great an error as condemning the Son of God. If nothing else, the example of Jesus before Pilate shows us that for Christians revolution for the sake of revolution alone ("I would rather be king than you") is wrong.

Indeed, instead of being revolutionaries, Christians are obligated to be the very best citizens possible. We should obey speed limits, pay bur taxes honestly, vote in elections, and in all other respects respond with respect and compliance to those who are over us.

To Tell the Truth

Yet this does not mean that Christians are merely to be pliant, lying down in the face of evil and doing nothing to oppose it. Again, we have the example of Jesus. Jesus did not show disrespect to Pilate. He did not warn him that if he failed to rule justly, Jesus' followers would rise up and do their best to unseat him and the Roman government. Jesus knew what the governor would do, and he accepted it as from God, which it surely was. But Jesus was not silent. He spoke of the truth, which he had been sent to make known, and he reminded Pilate that Pilate was sinning and would therefore one day himself have to answer for it.

That is our role. We speak often today of the separation of church and state, and we should be thankful for that separation. It is a dearly won liberty to have a church free from government interference or control and to have a state free from clerical domination. But the separation of church and state does not mean the separation of God and state. And though we do not rule the state, nor should we, it is nevertheless our duty as Christians to speak out against the civil ruler's sins and remind the governing authorities that they are ultimately accountable to him from whom their authority comes.

So we are accountable too! We are accountable to speak up. We do not have the power of the sword. That is reserved for the civil authorities, as Paul will show in Romans 13:4. Our weapon is truth, for we are a kingdom of the truth. The truth is stronger than the sword. But woe to us if we do not wield the sword of truth powerfully.

Chapter 200.
Must Caesar Always Be Obeyed?

Romans 13:2

Left to ourselves we are like those described in the last verse of the Book of Judges when "Israel had no king; [and] everyone did as he saw fit" (Judg. 21:25). That is why Paul insists in Romans 13:1 that we are to obey secular authorities: The state is God's wise provision for avoiding anarchy.

Having been told that we must obey the authorities, the next two verses of Romans 13 give us reasons why we should. First, if we disobey the state we will be disobeying God, and God will punish us (v. 2). Second, the government will also punish us (v. 3). Verse 2, which we are to study carefully now says, "Consequently, he who rebels against the authority is rebelling against what God has instituted, and those who do so will bring judgment on themselves."

Must Obedience Be Absolute?

This raises some important questions. For example, are there no conditions under which rebellion against the existing authority is justified? Or demanded? Suppose the state is tyrannical. Suppose it is violating human rights. And what about obedience itself? Must obedience be absolute, or are there limits? Can we obey in some areas and not others? Must Caesar always be obeyed?

That question alludes to Jesus' celebrated response to the question his enemies raised about taxes, and is one of two classic texts for helping us understand the God-given role of government and our rightful relationship to it.

We examined the first of these two classic texts in the last study: Jesus' reply to Pilate at his trial. Pilate had asked him if he were not aware that Pilate had power either to free Jesus or to crucify him. Jesus replied, "You would have no power over me if it were not given you from above. Therefore the one who handed me over to you is guilty of the greater sin" (John 19:11). We saw that the word translated as power is actually the word authority and that it refers to an authority that is delegated. In other words, Jesus said that although Pilate had a true authority, that authority had been given to him by God and he was therefore responsible to God for how he used it. This verse lays the groundwork for the limitations of the state's authority.

The setting for the second classic text is this. Jesus' enemies had come to him with a trick question: "Is it right to pay taxes to Caesar or not?" (Matt. 22:17). They thought that if he said it was right to pay taxes, they could discredit him with the people who hated Rome and for whom taxes were a greatly resented burden. He would be dismissed as a collaborator. On the other hand, if Jesus said that they should resist Rome by refusing to pay their taxes, then his enemies could denounce him to the Roman authorities as an insurrectionist.

Jesus asked for a coin. When they produced it, he asked whose portrait was on it and whose inscription, probably holding it out to them so they could see it. "Caesar's," they replied.

"Give to Caesar what is Caesar's," Jesus said, thus laying the basis for the exact teaching Paul gives in Romans 13:7, when he says, "Give everyone what you owe him: If you owe taxes, pay taxes." However, at this point I think Jesus must have flipped the coin over, exposing the back on which there would have been a portrait of one of the Roman gods or goddesses. And he continued, making the contrast, "and to God what is God's" (Matt. 22:21).

The first part of Jesus' answer reinforced Caesar's authority, even in such an unpopular matter as taxes. His second part drew limits. Although the state has a God-given and therefore legitimate authority, the authority of God is greater. Therefore, those who know God must worship and obey him, even if it means disobeying Caesar.

Four Logical Options

Jesus' words in response to the question about taxes suggest four options that I have found useful in dealing with this matter of the state's authority and the rightful limits of a Christian's compliance with it: (1) God alone as an authority with the authority of Caesar denied, (2) Caesar alone as an authority with the authority of God denied, (3) the authority of both God and Caesar but with Caesar in the dominant position, and (4) the authority of God and Caesar but with God in the dominant position.

1. God alone as an authority. The first option is one some Christians have embraced at some periods of history, especially when the state has become excessively oppressive or corrupt. In the early church, some people called anchorites went off into the desert, thus separating themselves from all social contacts and living, as they believed, solely for the service of God. From that early movement monasticism was born.

It would be an error to think that this has been practiced only in the early church or by members of monastic orders. Monasticism is also the practical approach of evangelical Christians who so separate themselves from the secular world that they withdraw from the surrounding culture, refuse to participate in elections, have only Christian friends, or will work only for Christian companies.

2. Caesar alone as an authority. The second option is that of most secularists and sometimes even of so-called Christians: the choice of Caesar alone. It was the way chosen by the Jewish leaders at the time of Christ's trial, when they told Caesar (incredibly, in view of their past and their knowledge of the Old Testament), "We have no king but Caesar" (John 19:15).

This is the most dangerous of the four options, because if God is left out, Caesar is left with no ultimate accountability. He has nothing to restrain his whims or cruelty.

In America we recognize the need for checks upon governmental power, so each of our three main branches of government has a check on the others. The president (of the executive branch) appoints Supreme Court justices (of the judicial branch); but if the president gets out of line, the Senate (part of the legislative branch) can impeach him. The president initiates programs, but Congress must fund them. As for Congress, it can make laws, but the president can refuse to sign them (the power of the veto), or the judicial branch can declare them unconstitutional. The Supreme Court is carefully protected out of respect for our laws. We claim to be a nation governed by laws, not by men. But the court cannot initiate legislation; it can only pass on it, and the president has the power to appoint the justices.

We have created this system of checks and balances because we recognize that people in positions of power are untrustworthy. But if that is true on the merely human level, how much truer is it on the cosmic level. Human rulers regularly conspire against God (Ps. 2). So if we forsake God, we are at the mercy of our governors.

3. The authority of God and Caesar but with Caesar in the dominant position. The third option is one many persons would claim, but it is the position of cowards. This is because if God's authority is recognized at all, it must be supreme simply because God is supreme by definition. That is what it means to be God. So if anyone claims to obey the state before God or rather than God, while nevertheless still believing in God, it can only be because he is afraid of what Caesar can do to him.

This was the case with Pilate. He knew Jesus was innocent of the charges brought against him. He declared him innocent and even tried to release him. But in the end he gave in and had Jesus crucified. Why? Because he was afraid of Caesar. Toward the end of the trial, when Pilate was holding out against their wishes, the Jewish authorities played their trump card, crying out, "If you let this man go, you are no friend of Caesar" (John 19:12). Pilate, who feared Caesar and wanted to be a friend of Caesar more than anything else in the entire world, gave in and thus condemned the sinless Son of God.

The irony is that Pilate failed to secure Caesar's friendship even so, because a few years later he was removed from office by the proconsul of Syria and banished to France, where he died.

4. The authority of God and Caesar but with God in the dominant position. The last option is the only valid one: God and Caesar, but with God in the dominant position. It was the position Jesus articulated when he said, "Give to Caesar what is Caesar's, and to God what is God's."

Because Christians recognize the authority of the state, they are (or should be) the very best of citizens, in two ways. First, they should obey the state in all areas of its legitimate authority. As I said in the last study, we should obey the speed limits, pay our taxes honestly, vote in elections, support worthy civic endeavors, speak well of our rulers, and support and pray for them. Calvin expressed this well when he wrote, "We are not only subject to the authority of princes who perform their office toward us uprightly and faithfully as they ought, but also to the authority of all who, by whatever means, have got control of affairs, even though they perform not a whit of the princes' office."

However, the other way Christians should be the very best of citizens is by opposing the state verbally and by acts of noncompliance whenever the government strays from its legitimate Godgiven function or transgresses the moral law of God. In the last study we saw that we are to do this chiefly by words—that is, by rational argument, not by coercive power. The power of the sword is the state's, not ours. Nevertheless, we are also to resist and even disobey the state when necessary.

Limitation Number One: Evangelism

The first area in which Christians cannot recognize the authority of the government and must therefore disobey it is whenever the state forbids the preaching of the gospel or evangelism. This is because Christians have a God-given duty to evangelize. We call it the Great Commission. Jesus said, "Go into all the world and preach the good news to all creation" (Mark 16:15). He told the eleven, "Go and make disciples of all nations" (Matt. 28:19). He said, "You will be my witnesses in Jerusalem, and in all Judea and Samaria, and to the ends of the earth" (Acts 1:8).

What must happen when the authorities demand differently is illustrated in Acts 4 and 5. The disciples had been preaching in Jerusalem, but they had created such a stir that the leaders of the people called them in and, meeting in solemn assembly, commanded that the apostles keep silent. Peter and John replied, "Judge for yourselves whether it is right in God's sight to obey you rather than God. For we cannot help speaking about what we have seen and heard" (Acts 4:1920).

The apostles were threatened and released, but they went right back to their preaching. They were arrested again. "We gave you strict orders not to teach in this name [the high priest said]. Yet you have filled Jerusalem with your teaching and are determined to make us guilty of this man's blood" (Acts 5:28).

The apostles replied, "We must obey God rather than men" (v. 29).

This incident makes clear that Christians are to give preference to the preaching of the gospel and are not to cease from it even though commanded to do so by the civil authorities. They may suffer for it. Many of the early preachers were arrested and beaten. Some were killed. But they evangelized anyway. We need to remember this in our age, which is becoming increasingly intolerant of any public articulation of Christian faith and truth.

Limitation Number Two: Morality

A second biblical limit on obedience to human authorities is in moral areas affecting Christian conduct. No government has the right to command Christians to perform immoral or nonChristian acts. During the Nazi era Christians in Germany were faced with a devilish state and its openly anti-Christian and even antihuman practices. German citizens were commanded to have no dealings with the Jews. They were not to trade with them, have friendships with them, or even acknowledge them. This was an unjustified demand on Christians to behave immorally, and those who disobeyed these laws were right to do so.

Corrie ten Boom and her family were right to hide Jews and thus try to save their lives.

Dietrich Bonhoeffer was right to speak out against Hitler, organize an underground church, and strengthen its opposition and witness.

Martin Niemoeller was right to go on preaching the truth even to the point of being imprisoned for it. We are told that another minister visited him in jail and argued that he would be set free if only he would agree to keep silent about certain subjects. "So why are you in jail?" he concluded.

"Why aren't you in jail?" Niemoeller countered.

In our country Christians must also speak out against racism, government and corporate corruption, sex and age discrimination, and other evils. At the present moment in America it is unlikely that you will be imprisoned for speaking the truth, though that may come in time. But you might lose your job for refusing to be dishonest or for calling those who are not honest to account. You might lose your chance for promotion. You might be cut out of the leadership circle. No matter. You must still speak up, and you must act justly even if you are pressured to comply.

Limitation Number Three: Civil Disobedience

There is a third area in which Christians must disobey the state, but it is a difficult one in which to remain truly biblical—when the state flagrantly ignores either righteousness or justice and those who are sensitive to these wrongs feel the need to do more than merely speak out. This differs from the previous area in that the former limitation concerned times in which Christians are pressured to act immorally themselves and must refuse, while this refers to government immorality and the need for Christians to do something to change it.

We generally speak of this as civil disobedience, and there are many excellent examples of it having been done rightly and with success. The Civil Rights movement of the sixties is a good example.

The problem is that as soon as we move away from words only (that is, speaking the truth and calling the rulers to account) and into the area of direct action, it is easy to cross over the line into a wrong method of responding and thus become guilty not merely of breaking an unjust law but of breaking just and even moral laws. Let me give two examples.

1. Dietrich Bonhoeffer. I have already commended Dietrich Bonhoeffer for his stand against the evils of the Nazi state. He is also to be commended for courageously returning to Germany from America, where he was living at the time, to help the struggling church and give it leadership. But Bonhoeffer was not executed for speaking out against Nazism. He was executed for being involved in a plot to assassinate Adolf Hitler. We can understand how he might have felt that assassination was the only course left to him to stop the growing evil, but desperation does not make murder right, and at this point he clearly went beyond any possible biblical sanction.

We can contrast his conduct with that of David in his struggle against King Saul. God had already removed his blessing from Saul, and Saul was seeking David's life. David did not have to wait in Jerusalem to be killed. He had every right to flee. This was a form of disobedience. But David did not cross over the line and try to kill Saul. On the contrary, he spared his life on at least two occasions while he waited for God to remove him, which God did in the end.

Jesus told Peter, "All who draw the sword will die by the sword" (Matt. 26:52).

2. Operation Rescue. The second example is often on our minds because it is current: the attempt of Christians to stem the terrible destruction of human life through abortions, which are legal by today's laws. This effort is best exemplified by a group called Operation Rescue, although other organizations are also involved.

When I am talking about the abortion problem, as I often do, I usually challenge the blockading of abortion clinics on the basis of the methodology being used. I say that we live in a television age and that television turns our tactics against us to the point of our losing the battle against this great evil. I say that television will never record a serious discussion about the true nature of abortion or the value of a life made in the image of God conducted between an anti-abortionist and a woman who is considering an abortion. It is not good television. But as soon as a restraining order is issued and the police arrive to begin arresting the demonstrators and placing them in paddy wagons, then the cameras roll. For this makes good television, and we who oppose abortion appear on television as people who are violent and who want to take away other people's rights. That is a problem the pro-life people need to consider carefully.

But that is not the issue here. There is nothing wrong with being arrested in itself. The problem in this area is the carryover from mere protest and the attempt to persuade people by speaking the truth to breaking otherwise perfectly valid laws, like rights of private property, freedom of movement, and so forth.

We can applaud the courage of those who demonstrate. We should endorse the issue they represent. We must love them as Christian brothers and sisters. But we must still say that it is not right to trespass on others' property. It is not right to make it difficult for people to enter abortion clinics, if they choose to do so. Above all, it is not right to invade the clinics, destroy records and equipment, or do things that are even worse.

The problem in this area can be seen in the Florida case in which one demonstrator shot and killed a doctor who had been performing abortions. The act was not courageous or godly. It was murder.

I want to make every allowance for the right exercise of the consciences of other people in these areas. I understand that many feel they must do something to attract attention to the evil that exists rather than do nothing. But as Charles Colson observes in Kingdoms in Conflict, "In our day, breaking laws to make a dramatic point is the ultimate logic of terrorism, not civil disobedience." And what is also true, "Civil disobedience, like law itself, is habit-forming, and the habit it forms is destructive of law." Rightly practiced civil disobedience has its place. But we have to be very careful how we use it and what we may be unleashing if we do.

What Is Needed

There is no moment in all of life in which we must be more diligent to hear and obey the Word of God in Scripture as when we are calling on another person or group to do the same. We tend to be self-righteous at the best of times. But we are especially self-righteous when we embark on a crusade. At times we must indeed disobey. Caesar is not God, and though we must render to Caesar what is Caesar's, we must be careful to give God what is God's. May God give us grace to know the difference.

Chapter 201.
The Power of the Sword

Romans 13:3-4

We are studying the Christian doctrine of the state—that is, of God-ordained government—and we come in this study to a word that in our day is often on people's tongues: power. Everyone is interested in power. We want to have power over our own lives. We speak about empowering people. We refer to power trips. Men buy power ties. Even the church is into power, so much so that recently a book called Power Religion appeared to oppose this sad trend.

The reason we come to power now is that it emerges in Romans 13 as a second reason why Christians should submit to the secular authorities. We examined the first reason in our study of verse 2: God has established them, so if we resist those who have been raised up to govern us, we are resisting God and God will judge us accordingly. The second reason we should obey is that the state will judge us too. That is, we will get in trouble because the state has power to enforce its decrees and laws.

Paul expressed this idea by writing, "For rulers hold no terror for those who do right, but for those who do wrong. Do you want to be free from fear of the one in authority? Then do what is right and he will commend you. For he is God's servant to do you good. But if you do wrong, be afraid, for he does not bear the sword for nothing. He is God's servant, an agent of wrath to bring punishment on the wrongdoer" (Rom. 13:3-4). In these verses the power of government is expressed by the symbol of a sword.

Government by Force

Power of the sword means force. This is what the state has been given by God, and it is the very basis for how the state conducts its affairs.

We do not like to think about this very much, because forcing someone to do something is not supposed to be good in our "free" society. Think of raising children, for example. Most people today think it is bad to force children to do anything. So instead of saying, "Make your bed" or "Eat your dinner or else," we give them options, presenting the good as "being in their best interest," or offering them rewards instead of punishments. We say, "Would you rather eat your dinner now or for breakfast?" or even "Would you rather eat your potatoes or your spinach first?" Even as adults we often bristle as soon as someone says that we have to do something.

Because of this cultural mind-set, whenever we think of government, especially if it is one we favor, we refuse to think of it as existing or operating by force. Instead we think of it as giving moral guidance and appealing to the best in its people while providing an environment for selffulfillment or expression. We will admit that totalitarian systems like the former communist states of Eastern Europe operated by force. That is what was wrong with them, we think. But we suppose that our government must be different—or at least we hope it is.

But it is not! "Kinder and gentler" perhaps, its cast-iron fist hidden by a velvet glove. But it too is based on force, for the simple reason that every government is based on force. That is the nature of governments. There is no other way in which they can operate.

For example, we have a system of so-called voluntary self-assessment of income tax in this country. When you fill out your form each April you can read on the front of the tax booklet that we are a country unique in the world in that each year millions of Americans "voluntarily" assess their own tax and "voluntarily" pay those billions of dollars that keep the government running. How wonderful—"voluntary self-assessment." But it is not truly voluntary, of course. If you refuse to pay your income tax, you will be billed for the deficient amount, plus interest. And if you refuse to pay even then, you will be arrested and your assets seized to pay the delinquent taxes.

Paying taxes is not voluntary at all. It is mandatory, and the proof that it is mandatory is the government's final use of force to accomplish its objectives.

Let me give you another example. Suppose you are a businessman who is becoming bogged down by the increasing number of government laws regulating your business. You have so many areas in which you need to comply and so many forms to fill out that you decide that you just will not fill them out this year. What will happen? The government will close your business and possibly even arrest you.

In this study I want to explore the areas in which this power, given to the state by God, is to operate. But before I do that, let me note that the right to enforce laws by force is a right given to the state and not the church. When Jesus was tried by Pilate he acknowledged Pilate's authority over him, which included the right even to put him to death. But Jesus did not claim that power for himself or his followers. When questioned about his kingdom, he replied that his kingdom was a kingdom of truth: "For this I came into the world, to testify to the truth. Everyone on the side of truth listens to me" (John 18:37).

The church has always gotten into trouble when it has tried to take the state's power—that is, force—into its own hands. The church tried to do this in the Middle Ages, after Christianity had been embraced by Constantine as the religion of the empire. But the result was disastrous for the church. The leaders of the church became power hungry, true religion diminished, and corruption increased.

Religious leaders make bad rulers, because secular power seems to corrupt them even more than it corrupts secular rulers. Therefore, the power of the sword has been given to Caesar, not the church, and it must not be used to advance the cause of Christ. Caesar alone has the right to cut off heads.

Civil and Social Order

Nevertheless, when we say that the power of the sword has been given to the state, we do not mean that this power can be exercised in any way whatsoever, or that the state can do by the exercise of power what the church alone is able to do by its proclamation of the gospel and the truth. Let's look at each of these.

1. The state's power, however legitimate it may be when used in the areas for which God has given it, cannot be exercised in any way whatsoever. The state has no God-given right to massacre its citizens, for instance. It has no right to use its power to advance evil. Paul makes this clear in Romans 13:3-4, when he speaks repeatedly of those who do good and those who do evil, and of the state's exercise of its power to reward those who do the one and punish those who do the other.

How, then, is the power of the sword to be used? First, the state is given power to defend its citizens from both enemies outside the state and evildoers within. It has power to wage war, including all necessary powers that go with it: power to conscript its people into the armed forces, power to tax for the war effort, power to redirect the nation's economy to a wartime footing. These are legitimate powers, but they are justified only by the need for the common defense. The power to regulate the economy in order to wage war does not necessarily carry over into peacetime, for example.

The state also has power to defend its citizens from evildoers within. That is, it has been given responsibility to provide and maintain social order. The biblical writers seem to have been particularly concerned about this, probably because they were more aware than most of us of how terrible anarchy can be. Nobody is safe in such times, so even a bad government is to be preferred to chaos. That is one reason why we are told to pray even for evil rulers. Paul told Timothy, "I urge, then, first of all, that requests, prayers, intercession and thanksgiving be made for everyone—for kings and all those in authority, that we may live peaceful and quiet lives in all godliness and holiness" (1 Tim. 2:1-2).

Social order is good by itself, but it is particularly good for Christians because it gives us an opportunity to advance the gospel.

The church can remind the authorities of this good role and urge them to it. John Calvin said, "Magistrates may learn from this the nature of their calling. They are not to rule on their own account, but for the public good. Nor do they have unbridled power, but power that is restricted to the welfare of their subjects."

The second area in which government has been given power by God is in establishing, exercising, and maintaining justice—that is, in rewarding good behavior and punishing bad behavior. This is what Paul chiefly has in mind in these verses when he says, "For rulers hold no terror for those who do right, but for those who do wrong. Do you want to be free from fear of the one in authority? Then do what is right and he will commend you. For he is God's servant to do you good. But if you do wrong, be afraid, for he does not bear the sword for nothing. He is God's servant, an agent of wrath to bring punishment on the wrongdoer."

There are two matters here, each enormously important now. First, a conviction that there are such things as good and evil is critical. For when Paul says that the state has been given power to punish evil, he is assuming a moral standard to which not only the individual citizen but also the state must conform. In other words, the state should reward what is good and punish what is evil, but in order to do that the state must know what the good is, and for that there must be an objective moral standard outside itself, either discovered by it or given to it.

This is extremely relevant today because American law has gone through a revolution in this area. John W. Whitehead has written a book about this called The Second American Revolution. This revolution Whitehead is writing about is the current rejection of rule by law that is objective and unchanging for a malleable sociological law that can be determined by the jurists.

Let me explain. In 1907 Supreme Court Justice Charles Evans Hughes expressed the sociological understanding of law for the first time officially when he said, "The Constitution is what the judges say it is." He meant that the justices are not bound by an absolute law. Instead, they are free to find whatever they want in the law and even to change it. So there is no appeal beyond what the Supreme Court decides, even if it is contrary to what the Constitution or any other laws meant years ago.

When the Constitution was written, however, its authors intended something very different. They meant that law was supreme. Therefore, ours was to be a country governed by laws and not by men, even Supreme Court justices. This idea came into American jurisprudence from the Scottish Presbyterian Samuel Rutherford and his monumental work Lex Rex, meaning "law is king," and through such figures as the English jurist William Blackstone, who worked it into English common law, and John Witherspoon, the only minister to sign the Declaration of Independence, who worked it into our Constitution.

Incidentally, it is only because the colonists believed in an absolute law to which even magistrates were responsible that they judged themselves right to rebel against England. It was because King George had violated the rights of "life and liberty," which had been given to them by "the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God," that they rebelled.

The points here are that the state's ability to act justly depends upon absolute law and that this approach to the state's authority is the only genuinely Christian one. Apart from this everything becomes relative, the possibility of achieving equal justice for all is eventually destroyed, and the citizens become subject to the changing whims of their judges.

2. The state cannot reform evildoers by power. The power of the sword has been given to the state to defend its citizens and to punish wrongdoing only. Or, to put it in other words, the state has a God-given responsibility to punish bad or evil behavior, but it has no authority—and even less power—to actually change or reform the evildoer.

No one has seen this with greater clarity or expressed it with greater insight than C. S. Lewis in an essay called "The Humanitarian Theory of Punishment." In this essay Lewis distinguishes between the old idea of retributive justice, in which a person who has done something bad is punished in accordance with what he or she has done, and the humanitarian idea of justice, in which the person is disciplined in order to reform him.

The first is based on "desert," to use the old word for it. It means that the murderer is given a longer time in jail than the petty thief because the first is a greater crime and the murderer deserves a greater punishment. The second is based on what someone thinks might help or cure the criminal.

Our system is a mixture, of course. Jail sentences are proportionate to the degree of crimes involved. But we also mitigate these on the basis of whether a prisoner is well-behaved or, in the case of crime judged to flow from mental illness, whether the person is cured. We see a practical expression of the second idea in the fact that we call our prisons penitentiaries—places where people are to do penance—or reformatories—places where they can be reformed.

Lewis argues that, although the humanitarian view seems compassionate and thus enlightened (it claims to want only the well-being of the criminal), it is actually cruel, for several reasons.

First, it takes determination of the nature and length of the penalty out of the hands of judges, who affix it for all according to an objective legal standard, and places it in the hands of psychological experts who alone may determine when the criminal is well.

Second, it debases the person involved. Instead of being a responsible moral agent, capable of doing wrong but also capable of paying a proper punishment for it, the criminal becomes a thing to be worked upon by the experts until he is "well" by their definition. This is what was done in the Soviet Union to political prisoners, for example.

And that leads to the third reason. Lewis writes, "If crime and disease are to be regarded as the same thing, it follows that any state of mind which our masters choose to call 'disease' can be treated as crime; and compulsorily cured." That should be of concern to Christians, if to no one else, because Christianity has never been popular, and in the name of curing our "antisocial" or "humanity-hating" beliefs or actions, any government that is powerful enough could lock us up until we are "cured" ideologically.

Of course, what Romans 13 is saying is that the state has no business trying to cure people, only that it is mandated by God to punish bad behavior and reward good actions. Therefore, the state must have a standard of right and wrong, and it must administer that standard impartially. That is all government really can do in the long run.

Where Are God's People?

Two final points are needed to round out this picture of government and its proper use of power:

1. Government cannot develop morality. Government can only punish; it cannot develop morality in its citizens. The important word in that statement is develop, of course. For I am not saying that government is not to be concerned with morality. On the contrary, morality is precisely what it is to be concerned with, for morality is the only true basis for law.

For example, if the government passes a law against stealing and enforces it with the power of the sword, the only valid basis for the law and the penalty affixed for breaking it is that stealing is wrong. Or to put it another way, there is a God-given right to private property. If stealing is not wrong, then the act of government to oppose it and punish it is tyranny—an unjustifiable restriction of freedom. If stealing is wrong, then the government is acting properly. It is the same with all laws. The only valid basis for any law is a previously existing morality.

To give another example, in the case of capital punishment the only valid base for the right of the government to take a life of one who has taken the life of another is Genesis 9:6, which says that the murderer may be killed because he has killed one made "in the image of God." This means that his act was a violation of the law of God and an offense to God.

Nevertheless, this valid concern for morality does not mean that the government can develop morality in its citizens, for it cannot. It can proscribe penalties. It can enforce them and thus perhaps also restrain evil somewhat. But it cannot change the people involved.

A case in point was Prohibition. Government outlawed traffic in alcoholic beverages. But although the trade was restricted a bit, the sale of alcohol nevertheless flourished, and it erupted into a storm as soon as Prohibition was repealed.

2. Morality comes from revealed religion. If government cannot develop morality in its citizens, then morality must come in another way and from another source. What can that source be? Where can morality come from? There is only one answer. It comes from revealed religion, and it must work its way into national life through those citizens who know and sincerely desire to please God.

Religious people are, therefore, the best asset a country can have and the only thing that will advance it in the direction of justice and true righteousness. So today the need is not for more laws. If we do not have a moral citizenry, even the laws can be used immorally. They can be used to get out of paying one's debts, escape a prison sentence, cheat the innocent, oppress the poor, and many such things. What we need are people who know and are willing to live by the moral laws of God.

Remember 2 Chronicles 7:14. That great Old Testament text does not offer healing for a nation through the election of a better president or the ouster of an old one. It does not even recommend passing better laws. It proscribes renewal through the repentance of God's people: "If my people, who are called by my name, will humble themselves and pray and seek my face and turn from their wicked ways, then will I hear from heaven and will forgive their sin and will heal their land."

Chapter 202.
Because of Conscience

Romans 13:5

One of the greatest delights of studying the Bible carefully, as all of us should do, is that we frequently come upon unexpected but very wonderful things.

For example, the account of God's creation of the heavenly bodies in Genesis 1 reads: "And God said, 'Let there be lights in the expanse of the sky to separate the day from the night, and let them serve as signs to mark seasons and days and years, and let them be lights in the expanse of the sky to give light on the earth.' And it was so. God made two great lights—the greater light to govern the day and the lesser light to govern the night. He also made the stars" (Gen. 1:14-16). "He also made the stars!"

What an amazing, unexpected and utterly understated line—"Oh, yes, and also the billions of blazing stars, supernovas, black holes, galaxies and quasars. That, too." I remember that Malcolm Muggeridge called those five words one of the greatest "throw-away lines" in literary history.

And Don't Forget Conscience

There is something like that in the verse we come to in this study, particularly in the word with which it ends: "conscience."

Paul is writing about the proper function of government and why Christians should be exemplary in their submission to its legitimate authority. There are two reasons, and they are both powerful. First, we should submit to the governing authorities because "the authorities that exist have been established by God. Consequently, he who rebels against the authority is rebelling against what God has instituted, and those who do so will bring judgment on themselves" (Rom. 13:1-2). That is, if we resist the state, we are resisting God and God will judge us. The second reason, which we examined in the last study, is that the state will judge us too. "If you do wrong, be afraid, for he does not bear the sword for nothing" (v. 4). The state will insist that we obey it and will punish us if we do not.

Here are two good reasons for submitting to the civil government. But then, just when we think Paul has made his point thoroughly and is about to wrap up, he adds almost as an afterthought, "Oh, yes, and also because of conscience." The full verse says, "Therefore, it is necessary to submit to the authorities, not only because of possible punishment but also because of conscience."

I call this an understatement, or a throw-away line compared to "he also made the stars," because conscience is not a small thing of little importance but rather a large thing of very great importance. Conscience involves our sense of what is right and wrong and, even more importantly, our awareness that we ought to do what is right. In other words, when Paul speaks of conscience, as he does here, he suddenly lifts the discussion of submission to the governing authorities from what we might call a merely pragmatic level to the highest possible plane. For now, instead of saying, "You should obey the state because you will get in trouble if you don't," he says, "You should obey the state because that is the right thing to do, and you know you should do what is right."

Let me say this another way. Instead of treating us as we might treat an animal, training it to respond mechanically by rewarding desired behavior and punishing undesirable behavior, Paul treats people as responsible moral agents—that is, as human beings made in God's image—by appealing to our consciences.

What Is the Conscience?

The conscience seems to have been more important to Paul than to any other biblical writer. In the New International Version of the Bible the word conscience occurs twenty-nine times, but only four of those occurrences are in the Old Testament. Twenty-five are in the New Testament, and twenty of those are in Paul's speeches or writings, quite a few being in 1 and 2 Corinthians.

Aside from Paul's use of the word, there are in addition only three occurrences in Hebrews and two in 1 Peter.

The word conscience is composed of two Latin words: con, meaning with, and scientia, meaning knowledge. So conscience means "with knowledge." Specifically, it has to do with knowledge of one's heart or inner motivations as contrasted with one's actions.

This is the way the word normally appears in English literature. But because we are sinners and know ourselves to be sinners, "conscience" usually is employed in a negative way as something that condemns us. For example, in Richard III, Richard, who was a very evil king, says:

> My conscience hath a thousand several tongues, And every tongue brings in a several tale, And every tale condemns me for a villain.
>
> Richard III, Act 5, Scene 3

The word is used the same way in Hamlet. Referring to the play that Hamlet uses to expose the king's treacherous murder of his father, Hamlet says:

> The play's the thing
> Wherein I'll catch the conscience of the king.
>
> Hamlet, Act 2, Scene 2 In Paradise Lost John Milton says of Satan:
>
> Now conscience wakes despair
> That slumber'd, wakes the bitter memory Of what he was, what is, and what must be.
>
> Paradise Lost, Book 4, Line 23

These uses of the word, and others like them, are mostly negative, and with reason. We are guilty of many offenses and our consciences usually condemn us.

But now consider Paul's use of the word. Paul is aware that a person's conscience can be weak (1 Cor. 8:7, 10, 12), and he knows that our consciences can condemn us, since he speaks of striving "always to keep my conscience clear before God and man" (Acts 24:16). But generally Paul speaks of a "good conscience" (1 Tim. 1:5, 19) and a "clear conscience" (1 Tim. 3:9; 2 Tim. 1:3). He told the Sanhedrin, "My brothers, I have fulfilled my duty to God in all good conscience to this day" (Acts 23:1). To the Corinthians he wrote, "Our conscience testifies that we have conducted ourselves in the world, and especially in our relations with you, in the holiness and sincerity that are from God" (2 Cor. 1:12). Again, "By setting forth the truth plainly we commend ourselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God" (2 Cor. 4:2).

There is an enormous difference here between the use of conscience by secular writers and its characteristic biblical use. The reason is that God has quickened the Christian's moral nature so that he or she not only knows what is right as opposed to what is wrong but also has been given a true desire and ability to do what conscience demands.

What This Means for Government

But we are talking about the role of conscience as it applies to the Christian's relationship to civil government, not to moral matters in general. So we need to ask what is involved here when Paul says, "Therefore, it is necessary to submit to the authorities, not only because of possible punishment but also because of conscience."

1. We have a higher motive for obeying than others have. Paul's main point in this section is that Christians are to obey the secular authorities, and the first reason he has given is that God has established human governments. That is something that Christians can alone fully appreciate. But even this can appeal to a low motivation if all we mean by it is that God will punish those who disobey the civil governments he has set up. However, when Paul brings in the matter of the conscience, he is saying also that we must obey because obedience is right and because, being responsible moral agents, we ought to do the right thing.

In adding this standard Paul also raises our significance as responsible agents and tells us that what we do really matters. Paul is telling us that our obedience to the secular authorities matters, and that this is a very good reason why we should be careful to do it. It matters to God, of course. He cares whether or not you obey him. But it also matters to society. If you take obedience to the laws of the country lightly—if you say, "Well, everyone is doing it" or "They're crazy laws anyway" or "It's not my law; I didn't write it or vote for it"—if you do that, then you are contributing to a spirit of lawlessness that will issue in anarchy and eventually lead to the loss of civil liberties and to a dictatorial government. On the other hand, if you obey the laws of the land, you will be contributing to society by helping to sustain a stable and liberty-respecting government.

One of the great tragedies of our country today is that many people have little or no respect for authority and therefore feel free to break any laws that seem inconvenient to them. So civil disorder is rising. The police are unable to contain the disorder. The courts are overworked, and the nation's prisons are overflowing.

2. We have a stronger reason for disobeying when disobedience becomes necessary. I pointed out in an earlier study that there are limits to the authority that has been granted civil government. This is because authority by its very nature is "given," in this case God-given, and the one given governmental authority is therefore responsible to God. The government has no right to forbid the free exercise or propagation of religion. No secular ruler has the right to violate the Ten Commandments or force others to do so. The government has no right to compel Christians to commit unjust acts or to act contrary to an informed Christian conscience.

But that is the important point here. Conscience! A Christian should have an enlightened moral conscience because he should know the Word of God, and because he possesses the Holy Spirit to help him understand it Also, because he has a new nature the Christian should have a stronger desire to exercise that conscience rightly. A secular ruler might know a right course of action but decide not to pursue it simply because it might be inconvenient, not in his own selfish interests, opposed by his friends, or for any other number of reasons.

The Christian cannot think this way. Therefore, regardless of whether an action is convenient, personally advantageous, or popular, the Christian ought to pursue the right course of action.

This means that a Christian will stand against the state when it does wrong, regardless of the consequences. The world may say, "You'll never get ahead if you do that." But the Christian will ask not whether the position is advantageous or popular, but whether the position itself is right and will act accordingly. Governments have often been wrong. Our own government is frequently wrong. Christians will stand against those wrong actions and for the right "because of conscience."

The Exercise of Conscience

As soon as I write that "our own government is frequently wrong" I am sure I stir up defensive reactions in some people, and many will ask for examples.

1. Abortion. Most evangelical people think of abortion when we think of the government being wrong, and we are dismayed that the Clinton administration favors the right of abortion on demand. We believe abortion is wrong because the fetus is not "tissue," as the pro-choice forces like to think of it, but a tiny human being. We believe abortion is murder and that God will not hold us guiltless for the murder of more than a million and a half babies every year.

What are we to do about it? We are to protest it, of course, explaining our position and arguing our case. I have already pointed out that we will get nowhere if all we do is adopt the world's methodology—sit-ins and pressure tactics and more laws. The world will use that against us, and has. Instead, we need to explain that the only view of mankind that protects us from exploitation by tyrannical rulers or others is that we are made in the image of God and are therefore valuable to God, even in an embryonic state. We need to show that the disenfranchising of the unborn child is no different than the once-popular defense of slavery by calling blacks less than human or the murder of Jews by calling them a threat to society. We must show that human beings are all made in God's image and therefore must not be destroyed for anyone's convenience, even that of the mother.

2. Pornography. We have a strong and valuable tradition of the right of free speech and free expression in this country, and it is something we do not want to lose. We do not want to take away people's right to express their opinions in print or by graphic media. But no freedom is utterly without limits. Someone said, "Your freedom ends where my nose begins." So when we deal with pornography we need to say that freedom to print sexually obscene material stops at the point at which it harms others.

And it does harm others. Defenders of the pornography industry deny this, of course, just as makers of cigarettes deny that cigarettes cause lung cancer, emphysema, and other lung-related illnesses. But in this case, it is our job to show that pornography really is harmful. We need to document our case. We need to remind people that Ted Bundy, who in 1989 was executed for multiple serial murders of young women in Florida and elsewhere, said on death row that the chief contributing influence to his violent murderous course was pornography. We need to highlight the Federal Bureau of Investigation report that convincingly links pornography to sexrelated murders and the study of the Michigan State Police that linked pornography to 40 percent of its assault cases.

The Reverend Donald E. Wildmon has been making this case through the American Family Association (formerly the National Federation for Decency), which he has directed since its founding in 1977.

What can one person do, or even a group of persons? I can tell you what one man did. His name is Jack Eckerd, and when he became a Christian in 1983 he decided that selling Playboy and Penthouse magazines in his extensive drugstore chain was displeasing to God. He called his company's president and told him that he wanted the pornographic magazines removed from all seventeen hundred Eckerd drugstores. The president protested because the sales brought in millions of dollars for the firm, but Eckerd persisted and won. He owned the stores.

Moreover, his action caused something of a chain reaction. One by one Revco, Peoples, RiteAid, Dart Drug, Grey Drug, and High's Dairy Stores followed Eckerd's lead. The last hold-out was 7-Eleven, which in 1986 finally removed pornography from all forty-five hundred of its stores and recommended that its thirty-six hundred franchises do the same. All this happened without a single law being passed. Why? Because of conscience.

3. Gun control. It is incredible to me that there are so few serious actions being taken in our country to control the use of guns, particularly since scores of people are being shot in America every single hour. Our papers and television news shows are full of the stories. The reason why there is so little action is the powerful gun lobby. It argues that the right to bear arms is guaranteed by our Constitution, and that is right. But the Constitution does not mean that we cannot insist on licensing guns, just as we license cars, or that we cannot ban the use of some guns in the same way we do not allow people to drive tanks or armored personnel carriers on our highways. We should not allow felons to own guns.

People argue that criminals will get guns anyway; we cannot stop them. But that is irrelevant. Of course, they will. But when they are caught with an unlicensed gun, they need to be prosecuted for that. Yet this is not my chief concern. My concern is not with the specific laws to be passed. I am not in the business of writing laws. What I am calling for is an outpouring of conscience in the matter of gun availability and the mushrooming of gun-caused murders. The Christian's task is to cry out against the evil and not stop crying until something is done about it.

4. Public schools. And what about the public schools? I am not insisting here that prayers and Bible readings ought to be > reinstated. Many Christians doubt that is a good idea. My concern is with the education itself. In many schools education is not even happening. And even where it does happen, it happens in an ethical environment that is destructive of character and even sound citizenship. People who have values should not be forced to submit to this system. They should be free to create other options and not be penalized even financially by having to pay for their own systems while at the same time being required to support the disasters that pass for schools in their communities.

Our task should be to expose the failures and encourage alternatives, even good secular ones. We need to defend everybody, not just our own interests. We need to call for voucher systems or something like them.

Conscience and the Word of God

This is far from a full social agenda for the Christian community but only an example of the function of Christian conscience in our world.

But let me caution that one of our great dangers as Christians is pride, and by that I mean that we easily assume that only our consciences have been enlightened and that we alone have the right answers. We do not. We need to listen to others, particularly well-informed non-Christians. And we need to remember that our consciences are valuable only when they are themselves enlightened by the written Word of God.

One writer has compared the human conscience to a sundial. It is not a perfect timepiece, but it is fairly accurate—as long as the sun is shining on it. Suppose you consult it by moonlight. In that case, it might tell any time at all. It might say that it is noon when it is actually three o'clock in the morning. The sundial is only valuable when the sun is shining on it. In the same manner, the conscience is only valuable when it is illuminated by the Word of God. We need people who will stand for the right and do the right "because of conscience." But if you start a crusade, be sure the position you take is biblical and that you are not merely serving yourself or enhancing your own crusading reputation.

Chapter 203.
To Each His Due

Romans 13:6-7

No one likes to pay taxes or, for that matter, thinks very charitably about tax collectors. Yet that is the point at which Paul's treatment of the rights of civil government and a Christian's responsibility to it end. We are to pay our taxes and in every other way rightly honor those who are in authority over us, even tax collectors.

When we analyze what this means we find that these last two verses of Paul's teaching about the Christian and his or her relationship to civil government have two parts. The first part says we need to pay taxes. The second part is about showing respect and giving honor to those who deserve respect and who should be shown honor. The verses say, "This is also why you pay taxes, for the authorities are God's servants, who give their full time to governing. Give everyone what you owe him: If you owe taxes, pay taxes; if revenue, then revenue; if respect, then respect; if honor, then honor" (Rom. 13:6-7).

No One Likes to Pay Taxes

This is hard to do. The famous French philosopher and author François Voltaire was having a dinner party with two of his witty friends, and he suggested that they entertain themselves by each improvising a story about thieves. His two friends each told an amusing story and was praised for it. It was then Voltaire's turn. "Gentlemen," he said, "there was once a tax collector.... Good Lord, I've forgotten the rest of the story."

Victor Amadeus, the Duke of Savoy who became King of Sicily and later King of Sardinia, taxed his subjects severely. Once he stopped a working man and asked how he was getting along. "About as well as things can go in a holy land like ours," he answered.

"Holy land?" said Amadeus. "I don't understand."

"Well, we must be a holy land because here the Passion of our Savior repeats itself, only in reverse."

"Reverse?"

"Yes," said the peasant. "In those olden days One died for all. Here all of us die for one."

Supporting Government through Taxes

There are probably a hundred stories like these because no one likes to pay taxes. Yet in Romans 13:6-7 Paul joins with Jesus in saying that this is one important responsibility of a Christian. A Christian is to support his government by paying taxes.

The reason, of course, is that government is expensive and we benefit by it in countless ways, even if we have a bad government. In his commentary on Romans, Ray Stedman, the former senior minister of the Peninsula Bible Church near San Francisco, tells how when he was first a minister he made so little money that for years he didn't have to pay any taxes at all and that it came as a shock to him when one year he finally had to do so. He resented it. So when he mailed in his tax return that year he addressed it to "The Infernal Revenue Service." That didn't seem to bother the tax collectors. They took his money anyway. The next year he addressed it to "The Eternal Revenue Service," but that didn't bother them either. After that he gave up and settled into the same resigned attitude that most of us have for at least the first two weeks in April every year.

But resignation is not the right attitude. Rather, when we pay our federal taxes we should be thankful for the armed forces those taxes support and for the peace and national security we enjoy because of them. Taxes support the courts and numerous federal agencies from which we benefit. We have national parks, federal drug enforcement agencies, food inspectors, the center for infectious diseases, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, air traffic controllers, and other indispensable services. When we pay our state taxes we should be thankful for the state's funding of universities, some city services, maintenance of state highways, and the courts. City taxes fund schools, garbage collection, firefighters, and police.

We may complain about taxes, but without them government could not function, civilization would be impossible, and our lives and property would be in jeopardy every moment of every day.

Responsible Taxation

But although the state's authority and power are from God and are therefore to be respected, the state is nevertheless responsible to God for what it does with that power. This is true in the area of taxation also.

1. A responsible use of taxed money. One limitation on government in the area of taxation is that taxes are not to be used merely to increase the luxury and elevate the lifestyle of our governors. This is clear from the way Paul sets down these verses. For when he says that "the authorities are God's servants," he is saying that government officials are to use our taxes to serve the people and not to enrich themselves.

John Calvin expressed this well in his commentary:

Paul takes the opportunity of mentioning tributes, and he bases his reason for paying taxes on the office of the magistrates. If it is their responsibility to defend and preserve uninjured the peace of the upright and to resist the impious attempts of the wicked, they cannot do this unless they are assisted by force and strong protection. Tributes, therefore, are paid by law to support such necessities.... It is right, however, that they should remember that all that they receive from the people is public property, and not a means of satisfying private lust and luxury.

We do not see abuses of this nature very much among the highest elected officials in our country because presidents, senators, and congressmen are under intense public scrutiny, and abuses in this area can be detected and used against them politically. Abuses that are too flagrant will result in their being put out of office at the next election.

However, we do have much abuse of public monies further down the scale. We see featherbedding of government agencies, far more people being employed than are necessary to do the job. We see bloated budgets and sometimes outright graft or the placing of family members on the payroll to do nonexistent jobs. Many abuses occur at the level of city government, and from time to time these bring even the largest and most prosperous cities to the brink of bankruptcy.

2. Confiscatory taxation. The second abuse about which the government needs to be especially on guard is confiscatory taxation, which means making taxes so high that the government is, in effect, stealing from its people and thus eventually ruining both itself and the country.

This is a tremendous danger, and it is one the founders and early leaders of our country recognized. In fact, it is why they insisted on "no taxation without representation" in the struggles with England that led to the War of Independence. Our forefathers recognized that representative government is the only safeguard against having one's possessions at the mercy of a king or any other strong ruler, and they were willing to venture their lives and sacred honor for that safeguard. One of our earliest chief justices, John Marshall, said, "The power to tax is the power to destroy." Another justice, Oliver Wendell Holmes, expressed this same concern from the point of view of prohibiting destructive tax legislation. He said, "The power to tax [will not be] the power to destroy while this court sits."

This is a difficult area, of course. For it is like asking, "When is long too long?" or "When is short too short?" Those are relative terms, and everything depends on the objects involved and the circumstances.

When are taxes too much? That depends on the condition of the economy and of the world. In a robust economy taxation can be higher as the state uses its higher share of taxes to do more to develop the country and enrich people's lives. In times when people are struggling just to make ends meet, the government has to ease up. Greater taxation is required in times of war than when the country is at peace. In peacetime there really should be something like a "peace dividend," as there was after World War II. It should not be an open door for the state merely to spend more on government programs.

What about the graded income tax? Is that just? No, of course it is not just. We speak of the rich paying their "fair" share. But fairness is the one thing that cannot be said of taking more taxes from those who make more. Fairness would require that we tax everyone equally. Taxing the rich more may be expedient. It may be the only place money can be found in recessionary times or in a failing economy. But it is not just, and in the long run it hurts the national economy since accumulated capital is the only source of funding for new business projects. When the government taxes the rich excessively it mortgages the future for short-term economic gain.

Today spending by our national government is out of control. Most of our elected officials lack courage to stop the excess and reduce the federal budget, not to mention the escalating deficit. Some officials actually want to spend more.

Let me make a radical proposal. Under our system those who do well by making more money are penalized. They are taxed more than others. Shouldn't there be a system under which, if you make more money (or at least if you develop or control a business that makes more money), you should be rewarded? Wouldn't we see greater prosperity if, when people made more, taxes for those people actually went down? In one of Jesus' parables the servant who invested the ten talents he had in order to make ten more was rewarded by being given ten cities, and the man who increased his five talents by adding five more talents was given five cities. As for the man who had been given one talent but failed to use it, his talent was taken away from him and given to the man who had ten! (Luke 19:11-27).

Respect and Honor

How government should conduct itself in the area of taxation was not Paul's concern, of course. He was concerned about how Christians are to function. So at this point he broadens his words from taxes to talk about proper respect and honor. "Give everyone what you owe him," he says, adding after taxes, "if respect, then respect; if honor, then honor." This verse is a bridge to the next section of Romans, in which Paul writes about loving one another, because honor should be shown to many kinds of people and not only to government officials.

A quick look through a concordance brings out several categories of those we are to honor.

1. The king. We have been studying a Christian's responsibility to those exercising civic responsibilities, so a good place to start is with the Bible's commands to "honor the king" and all who, like him, are in high positions of authority. In words that are very close to Paul's, Peter writes:

Submit yourselves for the Lord's sake to every authority instituted among men: whether to the king, as the supreme authority, or to governors, who are sent by him to punish those who do wrong and to commend those who do right. For it is God's will that by doing good you should silence the ignorant talk of foolish men. Live as free men, but do not use your freedom as a cover-up for evil; live as servants of God. Show proper respect to everyone: Love the brotherhood of believers, fear God, honor the king.

1 Peter 2:13-17

When Paul was arrested and brought before the Sanhedrin he spoke of having fulfilled his duty to God in all good conscience, and at that point the high priest ordered those standing near him to strike him on the mouth because they thought his words were arrogant. Paul knew this was illegal under Jewish law since he had not been convicted of anything. So he replied, "God will strike you, you whitewashed wall! You sit there to judge me according to the law, yet you yourself violate the law by commanding that I be struck" (Acts 23:3).

Those who were standing by rebuked Paul for talking so disrespectfully to the high priest. Paul then replied, "Brothers, I did not realize that he was the high priest; for it is written: 'Do not speak evil about the ruler of your people'" (v. 5). The quotation is from Exodus 22:28.

We honor the king and those who are over us by refusing to speak of them disrespectfully, and we exercise a genuinely Christian responsibility toward them by praying for them. This includes officials of our city government as well as federal officials, police, firefighters, and schoolteachers.

2. Church officers. There are a number of verses that tell us to honor those who have been given authority in the churches. Paul told Timothy, "The elders who direct the affairs of the church well are worthy of double honor, especially those whose work is preaching and teaching" (1 Tim. 5:17). The author of Hebrews wrote of church leaders, "Obey your leaders and submit to their authority" (Heb. 13:17).

Again, there are helpful biblical examples of this. When Aaron led the people into idolatry by making the golden calf and Moses came down the mountain to the camp to punish the offenders, Moses did not dishonor Aaron publicly. He demanded to know what he had done. Aaron gave a lame excuse, blaming Moses for taking so long on the mountain, the people for their stiffnecked ways, and even magical circumstances, claiming that all he had done was throw the people's gold into the furnace and the calf had come out. Moses understood these excuses and lies for what they were, but he did not rebuke Aaron since Aaron had been appointed by God and it was for God to rebuke or remove him, not Moses. Moses seems to have let the interrogation of Aaron drop at this point (Exod. 32:21-24).

On the other side we have the story of Miriam, Moses' sister, who opposed Moses because he had married a Cushite woman—that is, probably a black woman. Moses did not defend himself, but God heard and punished Miriam with leprosy. It is a serious thing to speak or work against those whom God has appointed to positions of church authority.

3. Parents. The Ten Commandments contain another verse about those we are to honor, our parents. "Honor your father and your mother, so that you may live long in the land the Lord your God is giving you" (Exod. 20:12). Paul quotes this verse in Ephesians 6:2, noting that it is "the first commandment with a promise."

This is an important command and rightly heads the list of those on the second table of the law, commands expressing our duty toward other people. It is first because the family is the smallest unit of society and respect for family members, particularly parents, is foundational to family order and discipline. Children should be taught to respect their parents and should be punished if they do not. Because if we teach children to obey their parents, when they grow up they will be able to respect and obey others—teachers, policemen, magistrates, and God. We need to speak kindly to our parents, listen to their opinions, remember their birthdays, and care for them in their old age. If we do not respect our parents, whom we can see, how will we be able to respect and obey God, whom we cannot see?

4. Older persons. Leviticus is a difficult book, but it is filled with many important verses, and one of them is this: "Rise in the presence of the aged, show respect for the elderly and revere your God" (Lev. 19:32). How little we do that today! Instead of respecting older people we often despise them, thinking instead that the only people of value are the young. "Never trust anyone over thirty," they said in the sixties—but the sixties was not a decade of great wisdom.

5. God. If we are called to honor people who are in authority over us because of their appointments to office, because they are our parents, or because of their age, we obviously also need to respect and honor God. First Timothy 6:16 says of God the Father, "To him be honor and might forever. Amen." Similarly, John 5:22-23 says, "The Father judges no one, but has entrusted all judgment to the Son, that all may honor the Son just as they honor the Father. He who does not honor the Son does not honor the Father, who sent him."

How do we honor God? We do it by studying his Word that we may come to know him. When we discover something in his Word that he requires of us, we honor him by doing what he has commanded. We honor him by thanking him for all he has given and by praising him for all he is in and of himself. We honor God by trusting him through all the many trials and disappointments of life. We honor him by praising him as the source of whatever good may be found in us or whatever good we may do in this life.

We remember that in that wonderful scene in Revelation, when the saints stand before God represented by the twenty-four elders.

They lay their crowns before the throne and say:

"You are worthy, our Lord and God, to receive glory and honor and power, for you created all things, and by your will they were created and have their being."

Revelation 4:10-11

It is the elders' way of showing that anything they have accomplished has been accomplished by the grace of God and by him only. So they give their crowns to God and praise him.

The Character of Citizens

It is only as Christian people capture the high ground of doing what they do for the honor and glory of God that they can be used of God to elevate society to where those who deserve honor are given honor and those who deserve respect are given respect. And it is only when that happens that a nation becomes morally strong and justice becomes a reality and not just a hollow word. In other words, a nation does not become strong by laws but by the character of its citizens.

The former British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher was an unusual politician in that she understood the limits of government and called for its renewal by people able to live a life of true faith. Addressing the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, she said, "The truths of the Judaic-Christian tradition are infinitely precious, not only, as I believe, because they are true, but also because they provide the moral impulse which alone can lead to that peace... for which we all long.... There is little hope for democracy if the hearts of men and women in democratic societies cannot be touched by a call to something greater than themselves. Political structures, state institutions, collective ideals are not enough. We parliamentarians can legislate for the rule of law. You, the church, can teach the life of faith."

The wonderful thing about this is that if we begin by showing respect to those to whom respect is due and honor to those to whom honor is due, above all showing honor and respect to God, then others may learn something of God through us and eventually come to respect, honor, and love him too, which is salvation and the beginning of wisdom. "To each his due" is not only a word about taxes. It is about justice too, and about the foundation of a free and just society.

Part Nineteen. The Law of Love

Chapter 204.
Debt and How to Get Out of It

Romans 13:8

Romans 13:8 begins a new section of Paul's letter in which Paul turns from the way believers are to relate to the governing authorities to how they are to treat other people in general. Our text is an effective transition, because it picks up on verse 7 ("Give everyone what you owe him: If you owe taxes, pay taxes; if revenue, then revenue; if respect, then respect; if honor, then honor") and bridges to the ongoing Christian responsibility to love other people.

Verse 8 says, "Let no debt remain outstanding, except the continuing debt to love one another, for he who loves his fellowman has fulfilled the law."

Borrowing or Failing to Repay?

The King James Version began this verse a bit differently: "Owe no man any thing" ("Owe no one anything," RSV). This is a literal translation of the Greek. But the New International Version is closer to the actual meaning when it says, "Let no debt remain outstanding," because the Bible does not forbid borrowing. Jesus assumed the right to borrow in Matthew 5:42, when he said, "Give to the one who asks you, and do not turn away from the one who wants to borrow from you." Other texts assume this also (see Exod. 22:25; Ps. 37:26; Luke 6:35). The point of Romans 13:8 is not that Christians should never borrow, but that they should never leave their debts unpaid. As Leon Morris points out, being a present imperative, the verb even has a continuous force: "Don't continue owing. Pay your debts."

John Murray says, "This cannot be taken to mean that we may never incur financial obligations.... But it does condemn the looseness with which we contract debts and particularly the indifference so often displayed in the discharging of them."

The difference between borrowing under certain circumstances and failure to repay what is borrowed can be illustrated as follows. Suppose you are renting a house. You do not own the house. You are only benefiting from it through the willingness of the owner to rent it to you. All you owe is the rent. In this case, the words of our text, "Let no debt remain outstanding," mean that you are to pay the rent on time. Suppose now that you need to borrow capital for a business. The situation is exactly the same. You do not own the capital. All you are doing is renting it through the willingness of the owner to loan it to you. What you owe is the interest—plus the repayment of the capital on whatever schedule has been agreed upon between you and the lender. There is no sin in borrowing the money as long as you are able to pay the interest and premiums according to that schedule.

America: A Debtor Nation

But the problem for many Americans, including our government, is that debt financing has become a way of life, and those who borrow are frequently enticed, misled, or trapped into borrowing more than they are able to repay. Then they default on their payments and often escape the weight of their financial obligations by declaring personal bankruptcy. Bankruptcy means cheating the person or company that has lent the money, and it is an unjust and impermissible course of action for a Christian. It is at this point that Romans 13:8 speaks most forcefully to people today when it says, "Let no debt remain outstanding."

The United States began to go into serious debt only after World War II. Before that we were living within our means. Income paid for the debt on bonds, inflation was negligible, and the country had a positive balance of trade. Today our national debt has passed $4 trillion. None of us really knows how much $1 million is, let alone $1 billion or $1 trillion. Breaking it down may help: $4 trillion dollars is $16,000 for every man, woman, and child in the United States ($4 trillion divided by 250 million). If we wanted to pay this debt off, we would first have to stop going into debt, which our leaders are unwilling or unable to do. (They are actually increasing the debt at an accelerating rate, rather than decreasing it.) Then we would have to repay what we have borrowed. At what rate? And for how long? Well, at 6 percent the interest alone is $657 million per day ($240 billion divided by 365). If we started a repayment plan of, say, $1 billion per day ($343 million per day on top of the interest payments), it would take us more than eleven thousand years to pay off $4 trillion.

People think it does not really matter that our government owes money since, as they say, we owe it to ourselves. But that is unsound reasoning. Money borrowed by government always has to be repaid by someone. It can be repaid literally by future taxes or deceitfully by future inflation, in which the dollars are simply made to be worth less. Or it can be repudiated during a period of political upheaval. In other words, it can be stolen from the lenders, who are the people. There are no other possibilities. Debt simply does not go away.

We can't do anything about the government's debt, of course, except perhaps trying to elect representatives with enough courage to fight it. But we can do something about our own debt, which for many people today is a serious problem.

The difficulty is that our consumer-oriented culture has deceived many people into living beyond their means on the assumption that they will have more money in the future so they can buy on credit now, enjoy their possessions, and pay later. That is a dangerous assumption, of course. We cannot count on earning more in the future than the present. But even if we could count on this, to live by debt financing is still foolish.

The problem is that you not only have to repay the amount borrowed plus interest, you also have to repay interest on the interest still owed. This is known as compounding, and it is the exact opposite of the way money invested early and regularly grows into substantial amounts over a lifetime. This is why if you buy a $100,000 house with a thirty-year mortgage at 10 percent interest, you will have made total payments of over $315,000 by the end of the thirty years. If you live within your means and save, compounding works for you. A person who saves can actually become wealthy by the time of retirement, even if his or her salary is small. On the other hand, if you live beyond your means by borrowing, compounding works against you and can trap you before you are even aware of what is happening.

The biggest trap is credit cards. Almost all creditworthy adults have at least one credit card, and the average cardholder has seven. If you have credit cards and use them only for convenience, paying the full amount due each month so that you never have to pay interest, you are in fine shape. But if you use them to borrow on time, you are headed for trouble. Unfortunately, most people use them as a revolving line of credit.

In 1988 Money magazine reported that the average balance on these cards per person was $1,450 and that millions of Americans had outstanding debts of $2,500 or more. In their judgment, more than twenty million households were living beyond their means. Today, of course, the problem is even worse, and the inability of these millions of people to repay their debts is contributing to our current sluggish economy.

Yet consumer credit companies continue to bombard us with appeals to add just one more credit card. This is not because our credit is so good they just cannot resist wanting us as clients, but that they get 18 to 21 percent interest on whatever we fail to pay monthly, and that is much more than they can get by lending their money at today's competitive bank rates. If you fall for their seductive appeals and end up buying anything on credit, you are foolish.

Ron Blue is a Christian financial planning expert who has written a good book on biblical principles for personal finance called Master Your Money. In it he tells an interesting story. When the Sears company introduced its Discover Card they used Atlanta as a test market, and the Atlanta papers reported that Sears officials expected credit card usage to go up by thirty-five billion dollars as a result of introducing the new card. Their studies showed that the new card would be used for incremental borrowing. That is, it would not be a case of people borrowing on the Discover card rather than on some other card, like American Express, Visa, or MasterCard, for instance. It would be additional borrowing, because the new card would be an additional credit line for those who had it.

Blue talked to a banking friend about the way banks view people who pay credit card bills on time, thus avoiding the high interest. The banker told him that in the banking industry a person who pays his bills right away is known as a "deadbeat," because the company is unable to make much money from him. A decade or so ago a deadbeat was someone who failed to pay his bills. Now he is someone who pays his bills promptly.

Climbing Out of the Debt Pit

There are few ministers today who are not frequently called upon to counsel persons who have been trapped by debt. In fact, the problem has become so serious, even among otherwise solid evangelical people, that many churches have developed financial counseling classes to help parishioners with their debt problems.

Suppose you have been trapped by debt. You cannot pay your bills each month, and the problem is getting worse rather than better. What are you going to do about it? Our text says, "Let no debt remain outstanding." How are you going to obey this vital biblical command? Let me suggest the following practical steps.

1. Recognize that you have a spiritual problem. If you are a Christian, this is the place you need to start, because it will place the responsibility for your condition on you and not on God or adverse circumstances, and assuming responsibility for your own life is the healthiest and most important course for anyone.

Sometimes when Christians get trapped by debt they go to their ministers and ask why God hasn't fulfilled his promise. Hasn't he said that he will "meet all [our] needs" (cf. Phil. 4:19)? Does God break his promises? Does he fail to keep his word? You know the answer to that.

God never breaks his word. Therefore, God has not failed you. Rather it is you who have failed him.

Instead of being spiritual, you have become secular in your thinking. You have listened to the siren song of the secular culture surrounding you, and you have adopted a consumptive lifestyle on the world's recommendation and urging. You have been adopting the world's hedonistic philosophy: "Do it now." "Live it up." "You only go around once." "You're worth it."

Earlier in this volume I addressed the harmful effects of television. Ron Blue makes this observation:

The more television a person watches, the higher lifestyle the person is apt to desire. Television advertising is extremely sophisticated and effective. In a similar way, the more time you spend in shopping malls, the higher lifestyle you are apt to want because you are surrounding yourself with temptation. It is much like going to the grocery store just before mealtime to do your weekly shopping. Chances are that you will spend substantially more than if you went after a meal and with a specific list in mind.

2. Stop buying on time. Simply stop taking on more debt, in any way or for any reason. There are reasons why debt is sometimes a right strategy—to buy a house, for example, assuming that you are able to afford it and still meet your other financial obligations. But if you are trapped by debt, as many are, it is essential that you absolutely stop adding to it. How? Well, one way would be to cut up your credit cards or lock them away.

Money magazine is not in the business of discouraging borrowing. But in the 1988 issue I cited earlier the editors wrote, "If willpower alone cannot stop your borrowing, try plastic surgery: cut up your cards, cancel your credit lines, and close your overdraft accounts."

3. Reduce your expenditures to below your current income. Live within your means. Blue says it like this: "Spend less than you earn and do it for a long time, and you will be financially successful."

Do you remember Charles Dickens's touching character Mr. Micawber from David Copperfield? Micawber was always living a bit beyond his means, which led to the loss of everything he owned, eventually even to his being put in prison. Micawber understood his problem, as many today do not, and he gave Copperfield this warning: "Annual income twenty pounds, annual expenditure nineteen, nineteen six, result happiness. Annual income twenty pounds, annual expenditure twenty pounds ought and six, result misery. The blossom is blighted, the leaf is withered, the God of day goes down upon the dreary scene, and—in short you are for ever floored. As I am!"

If you have trouble reducing your expenditures, you need to prepare a budget and stick to it. If you cannot do that, you need to seek help from a professional counselor about where cuts in your spending should be made.

And this might be helpful. Blue says that at one point in his career he read that using credit cards will cause a family to spend 34 percent more than they would if they were to pay for everything they purchased with cash. That was supposed to be true even if they always paid their credit card bills immediately. Blue found this hard to believe. But he decided to try it. He had always paid his credit card bills at once, because he resented having to pay interest on the money. Nevertheless, he and his wife talked it over, put their credit cards away, and for a year lived strictly on cash.

Were they inconvenienced? Yes. It meant carrying a lot of cash around, and it took a lot to pay for such high-priced items as household appliances, car repairs, and airplane tickets. But having to pay with cash changed Blue's thinking. Paying cash at the drugstore caused him to think carefully about what he was buying and in some cases to eliminate impulsive purchases. Paying cash for clothes caused him to ask whether he really needed them or whether something cheaper might be equally as good.

The bottom line is that at the end of his experimental year, when he added up what he had spent, Blue found that his living expenses had decreased 33 percent from what they had been the year before when he had been using his credit cards. And he had thought that he was living on a barebones budget even then! That might be a good strategy for you, if you are having trouble living within your current income.

4. Sell assets to reduce your current debt. There are only two ways to get out of debt after you have decided to do it: (1) sell off unnecessary assets in order to repay the debt and (2) begin a repayment schedule and stick to it. Neither of these is easy, which is one reason why getting into debt is so bad. But of the two, the easiest is to sell off assets. You will not be able to do this with everything. But there are probably some things you can sell—a high-priced or second car perhaps, a recreational vehicle, a boat, stereo equipment, or other such items.

5. Pay something on each debt each month. Not everyone has the luxury of being able to sell off assets to repay debt. In fact, 80 percent of Americans owe more than they own, which means that selling assets is not much of an option in their cases, though they may be able to reduce their debt by selling some items. Therefore, for most people the only remaining way to get out of the debt trap is by carefully preparing and rigidly following a debt repayment schedule.

Blue has two additional suggestions at this point. First, concentrate on eliminating the smallest debts first. This will make the repayment project simpler, and it will be good for you to have some reward for what may be a long and difficult effort. When you have eliminated the smallest debts, you can apply what you would have been spending on those debts to the other, greater liabilities. Thus, you will be building momentum that will itself be encouraging.

Second, precommit any unexpected income to your debt repayment. If you are a Christian, this will alert you to God's providential oversight of your financial life. If you are seriously trying to obey God in respect to the text we are studying—"Let no debt remain outstanding"—God will most likely provide funds you have not been expecting, and you will be able to thank him for it. When that happens, you will have come far from the attitude that asks, "Why did God let me get into this mess?" or "Why hasn't God kept his promises?" And you will be thinking instead, "What is God trying to teach me through this bad situation?"

He Never Earned More Than $8,000

I want to end with this story, again from the book by Ron Blue. On one occasion a retired pastor came to him for some financial advice. He had never earned more than $8,000 in any one year, and he wanted to know if he would have enough money to live out his life in retirement. At this point the man was eighty years old, and he had been retired for twenty years.

Blue began to ask about his finances. Did he have any debts? No. Why not? Because he knew he would have to repay them someday, and he wasn't earning enough money to pay off debt, feed his family, and give his tithe. Did he have any assets? Yes. He had $250,000 in cash and money market funds in his wife's name and an additional $350,000 in his own name, a total of $600,000. Oh and, yes, he had also invested $10,000 in a new company some years ago, and the value of the stock had by this time grown to $1,063,000. Total assets $1,663,000! And he had never earned more than $8,000 a year! Blue sent him away with no advice at all and told him not to listen to anybody else, either. What he was doing was just fine.

That is a remarkable story, of course. Not everyone will invest in a company that can grow assets from $10,000 to $1,000,000 in a lifetime. But it is a striking illustration of what can happen if a person handles his or her finances as a Christian should.

Chapter 205.
The Debt of Love

Romans 13:8-10

After I had preached the sermon that was the basis for the previous chapter, a number of people told me about their experiences of getting out of debt. The most moving stories were those that told of the tremendous relief and sense of new freedom when the last of the person's burdensome debts was paid off. One person said that it was an experience second only to having been set free from the burden of sin through faith in Jesus Christ.

I have never been in debt financially, but I can understand how immense the relief of getting out of debt must be. Yet there is one debt we can never get out from under, and that is the debt to love.

Our text says, "Let no debt remain outstanding, except the continuing debt to love one another, for he who loves his fellowman has fulfilled the law. The commandments, 'Do not commit adultery,' 'Do not murder,' 'Do not steal,' 'Do not covet,' and whatever other commandments there may be, are summed up in this one rule: 'Love your neighbor as yourself.' Love does no harm to its neighbor. Therefore love is the fulfillment of the law" (Rom. 13:8-10).

A Permanent Obligation

What this means, in very simple terms, is that we can never say that we have satisfied our obligations in this area. Leon Morris puts it like this: "We can never say, 'I have done all the loving I need to.' [This is because] love is a permanent obligation, a debt impossible to discharge." This is not the first time Paul has written about the Christian's obligation to love. He wrote about Christian love in chapter 12 (vv. 9-13), where he showed both what love is like and how it is to function.

1. What love is like. Love must be both sincere and discriminating: (1) "Love must be sincere" and (2) "Hate what is evil; cling to what is good" (Rom. 12:9).

The Greek word translated sincere is anupokritos, the latter part of which has given us hypocrisy and hypocritical. Anupokritos means without a mask, referring to the way in which, in the Greek theater, actors would carry masks to signal the role they were playing. When Paul tells us that love is to be an (that is, "not") hypocritical, he is saying that those who love are not to play a role but are rather to drop their masks and be genuine.

The second part of Romans 12:9 teaches that love is also to be wise or discriminating. Real love does not love everything. On the contrary, it hates what is evil and clings to what is good. If we truly love, we will hate violence done to other people by whatever means. But we will love those who work for peace and even those who are guilty of the violence, because we will want to turn them from their ways. We will hate lying, but we will love the truth and will at the same time even love those who are lying, for we will see them as people who need the Savior.

2. How love is to function. In the verses following verse 9, where he speaks of love's nature, Paul highlights nine specific functions of love. As we saw in chapter 194, in the Greek text of these verses there are nine nouns in the dative case, each of which comes first in its phrase for emphasis. A literal translation of Romans 12:10-13 would be something like this: "As regards brotherly love, be devoted to one another; as regards honor, honor others above yourselves; as regards zeal, never be lacking; as regards service, always keep your spiritual fervor, serving the Lord; as regards hope, joyful; as regards affliction, patient; as regards prayer, faithful; as regards the needs of God's people, sharing; as regards hospitality, pursuing."

In his description of love's nature and function in chapter 12, Paul had the love of believers for one another specifically in mind (though he broadens his outlook toward the end of the chapter), and he was emphasizing love of the good as opposed to love of evil. The new elements in chapter 13 are: (1) he is talking about all people, not just Christians, and (2) as far as the nature of love is concerned, he is teaching that love is the fulfillment of the moral law. Love for all Persons

In Paul's writings the words "one another," as in the phrase "except the continuing debt to love one another," usually refer to Christians. But in this case they surely, though uncharacteristically, refer to all people. This is because immediately after this Paul begins to discuss the moral law, which is binding upon all and is for all, indicating that love for others is the fulfillment of this law, and also because he immediately broadens the statement about loving "one another" by adding, "He who loves his fellowman has fulfilled the law." The word fellowman gives the earlier phrase its full meaning.

This is in line with Jesus' teaching about love. On one occasion an expert in the law asked Jesus what was necessary to earn eternal life, and Jesus replied by referring to the moral law, as he often did. He taught that one is to "Love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your strength and with all your mind" and, second, "Love your neighbor as yourself (Luke 10:27).

"Who is my neighbor?" the expert demanded.

Jesus answered by telling the parable of the Good Samaritan:

A man was going down from Jerusalem to Jericho, when he fell into the hands of robbers. They stripped him of his clothes, beat him and went away, leaving him half dead. A priest happened to be going down the same road, and when he saw the man, he passed by on the other side. So too, a Levite, when he came to the place and saw him, passed by on the other side. But a Samaritan, as he traveled, came where the man was; and when he saw him, he took pity on him. He went to him and bandaged his wounds, pouring on oil and wine. Then he put the man on his own donkey, took him to an inn and took care of him. The next day he took out two silver coins and gave them to the innkeeper. "Look after him," he said, "and when I return, I will reimburse you for any extra expense you may have."

Luke 10:30-35
Jesus concluded that the neighbor was the Samaritan, though he was of a different racial stock than the man who had been robbed, and that he was a neighbor simply because he had acted to help the unfortunate victim. Jesus taught that anyone who wanted to follow after him and be his disciple would have to show that love to everyone.

Love's Fulfilling of the Law

Jesus quoted Leviticus in the introduction to that parable: "Love your neighbor as yourself (Lev. 19:18). It was what occasioned the expert's quibble. Jesus elsewhere called loving our neighbors as ourselves the second greatest commandment (Matt. 22:39), after loving "the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul and with all your mind" (v. 37), which was the first. It is significant that Paul quotes that same verse in order to make exactly the same point in Romans 13: "Love your neighbor as yourself (v. 9).

It seems to me that Paul must have been thinking of Jesus' words specifically, since Jesus ended his teaching about the first and second great commandments by saying, "All the Law and the Prophets hang on these two commandments" (Matt. 22:40), and Paul concludes the same way here (v. 10). True, Jesus spoke both of the first table of the law (love for God) as well as the second table (love for man) and Paul speaks only of love for our fellowman, but that is what the context demands since he is writing about how Christians are to act toward others in this world.

To illustrate his point he lists four of the Ten Commandments.

1. "Do not commit adultery." Love will not commit adultery, because this is a sin against both God and others, and love will not harm others. We think of Joseph and the way he was tempted to sin by the wife of Potiphar. He told her, "With me in charge... my master does not concern himself with anything in the house; everything he owns he has entrusted to my care. No one is greater in this house than I am. My master has withheld nothing from me except you, because you are his wife. How then could I do such a wicked thing and sin against God?" (Gen. 39:8-9). In Joseph's case, love was the fulfillment of the law against adultery.

2. "Do not murder." If love will not harm another person, it surely will not murder another person, even in the sense of attacking him with words (see Matt. 5:21-22). On the contrary, instead of tearing down, love will use words to edify and build up others. Paul told the Corinthians, "Knowledge puffs up, but love builds up" (1 Cor. 8:1). It does that especially for one who is a "weaker" brother.

3. "Do not steal." There are many ways we can steal. We steal from an employer when we do not give him or her the best work of which we are capable. We steal if we overextend our coffee breaks or leave work early. We steal if we waste the products with which we are working. We steal if, as businessmen, we charge too much for our products or try to make a killing in a lucrative field. We steal if we sell an inferior product, pretending that it is better than it is. We steal when we mismanage another person's money, or if we borrow but do not repay what we have borrowed.

If we love other people, we will do none of these things. Instead, we will work so we will not be dependent on others to support us (1 Thess. 4:11) and will have something to share with those in need (Eph. 4:28).

4. "Do not covet." The last of the Ten Commandments strikes at the heart of our materialistic, consumer-oriented culture, which teaches us to covet everything. This is the chief cause behind the debt trap so many have fallen into.

The biggest problem with covetousness is not the trouble it gets us into, however, bad as that is. It is rather that it makes us insensitive to the needs of other people. For instead of helping us to see who they are and what their needs are, covetousness makes us jealous of others with the result that we see only what they have—and want it. Covetousness destroyed Aachan, when he saw the wealth of Jericho and took it secretly, contrary to God's express command. Covetousness and grasping after material things has destroyed the usefulness of many contemporary Christians.

If we loved other people, we would want good things for them rather than letting their good things make us want more for ourselves. In this area, as in the others, love truly is the fulfillment of the law.

Love in Action

It can hardly fail to strike anyone who reads these verses carefully that the examples Paul offers in the form of samples from the moral law are all negative: "Do not commit adultery," "Do not murder," "Do not steal," "Do not covet." This is important, because we are hardly in position to do good to another person until we are ready at least to stop doing him or her harm. Still, we must know that real love is also positive. It "does" for the other. This is involved in the very first thing Paul says, for he writes of the "continuing debt to love one another" (v. 8).

Let's think about this "continuing debt" positively, and ask, What does it mean to discharge this debt honestly? Here are some extremely simple but important and often neglected ways.

1. Listen to one another. We live in an age in which few people really listen to one another. We talk to or at one another, of course. And the media are always talking at us. But we do not listen, and as a result ours is a lonely age in which community has largely disappeared and hundreds of thousands of people live daily within a soundproofed cocoon.

Quite a few years ago a movie called Network provided an excellent critique of our modern, impersonal, television-dominated age. The two main characters were an older man played by William Holden and a young product of the TV generation played by Faye Dunaway. The two were having an affair, but they were not connecting at the personal level. The man, who still remembered what relationships should and could be, was dissatisfied. The woman didn't know what he wanted.

"What do you want from me?" she asked at one point.

"I want you to love me," he answered.

This was a desire she did not understand. So she replied honestly, "I don't know how to do that." The two then stood staring at one another, not speaking, and the viewer became aware of how fragile their relationship was. They could not communicate. There was nothing to hold them together. At that moment the telephone rang. What would happen now? Could the woman ignore the telephone and actually listen to the man? For a moment she seemed to try. But then, as she still stood facing him, her eyes shot sideways to the phone and the opportunity was gone forever. To really love another person we must listen. If we do not know how to listen, we must learn how. And we must take time to do it.

2. Share with one another. The second thing we need to do is share ourselves with each other. The problem is that sharing ourselves makes us vulnerable, especially if we are trying to share with a person we care deeply about. We are afraid to be vulnerable.

No wonder the world's people do not share. They usually hate each other below the smooth surface of their relationships, and often their hatreds are not even buried that far. This should not be the case for Christians. We do not need to be afraid to be vulnerable, because we have already become vulnerable before God, meaning that we have already been exposed as sinners before him. There is nothing about us that God does not know. He knows all sins, all our faults, all our miserable failures as human beings. Yet here is the wonderful thing: God loves us anyway and is working in us to make us different people. God has accepted us just as we are, and he is making us to be like Jesus Christ. Therefore, since God has accepted us we do not need to fear rejection by anybody.

Sharing is the reverse side of listening. We listen to the other person as he or she shares. Then we share ourselves. This is the only way to show real love and build real relationships.

3. Forgive one another. None of us is without sin. Therefore, we are all guilty of sinning against others. For this reason, listening and sharing also involve forgiveness. Sharing means expressing our hurts, and listening means hearing how we have hurt the other person.

Francis Schaeffer developed this well in a study of love called "The Mark of the Christian."
When we have hurt another person we must say, "I am sorry," he said. But love is more than this. Love is also giving and receiving forgiveness. He referred to the Lord's Prayer, in which Jesus taught us to pray, "Forgive us our sins, for we also forgive everyone who sins against us" (Luke 11:4). This does not suggest that we are only to forgive when the other person is sorry, though we must forgive them. Schaeffer says:

Rather, we are called upon to have a forgiving spirit without the other man having made the first step. We may still say that he is wrong, but in the midst of saying that he is wrong, we must be forgiving....

Such a forgiving spirit registers an attitude of love toward others. But, even though one can call this an attitude, true forgiveness is observable. Believe me, you can look on a man's face and know where he is as far as forgiveness is concerned. And the world is called on to look upon us and see whether we have love across the groups, across the party lines. Do they observe that we say, "I'm sorry," and do they observe a forgiving heart?... Our love will not be perfect, but it must be substantial enough for the world to be able to observe it.

And let's remember how Jesus said, "If you forgive men when they sin against you, your heavenly Father will also forgive you. But if you do not forgive men their sins, your Father will not forgive your sins" (Matt. 6:14-15). That is the equivalent of saying that you must forgive others to be a true Christian.

4. Serve one another. The fourth practical expression of what it means to love one another is service. This does not come to us naturally, which is one reason the Bible mentions and illustrates it so often.

This was practically the last lesson Jesus left with the disciples. In the Upper Room at the time of the institution of the Lord's Supper, Jesus got up from the meal, took off his outer clothing, wrapped a towel around his waist, and began to wash the disciples' feet. Peter was appalled. "You shall never wash my feet," he said (John 13:8).

Jesus replied that it was necessary if Peter was to be his disciple, and Peter relented. Still none of them understood what Jesus meant or why he was doing what he was doing (John 13:2-11).

So Jesus explained, "You call me 'Teacher' and 'Lord,' and rightly so, for that is what I am. Now that I, your Lord and Teacher, have washed your feet, you also should wash one another's feet. I have set you an example that you should do as I have done for you. I tell you the truth, no servant is greater than his master, nor is a messenger greater than the one who sent him. Now that you know these things, you will be blessed if you do them" (John 13:13-17).

Jesus was giving an example of menial service, teaching that we are to serve others. On another occasion he said, "Whoever wants to become great among you must be your servant, and whoever wants to be first must be your slave—just as the Son of Man did not come to be served, but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many" (Matt. 20:26-28).

What the World Needs

Some time ago there was a popular song with the words, "What the world needs now is love, sweet love." Love is exactly what the world needs—the song was right about that. But it was also wrong, because the love it was singing about was only the sweet, sentimental love of our empty, commercial age, and that love is not good enough. What the world needs is the sincere, selfless, sacrificial, serving love of God displayed in those who know him and are determined to obey him faithfully.

If you know Jesus, you will not follow after the world's selfish ways but instead will love as God loves. You will keep the law: "Love is the fulfillment of the law." But you will also go out of your way to listen to, share with, forgive, and serve all other people.

Chapter 206.
Understanding the Times

Romans 13:11

This study is about "understanding the times," a challenge suggested by the first half of Romans 13:11. I begin by referring to two other sections of the Bible.

First, Matthew 16:1-3. The leaders of the people had come to Jesus to ask for a sign from heaven, and he replied by saying that they already been given signs and that their problem was that they would not understand the ones they had. Then he used a popular saying similar to our adage: "Red sky at night, sailors' delight. Red sky in the morning, sailors take warning."

Jesus said, "When evening comes, you say, 'It will be fair weather, for the sky is red,' and in the morning, 'Today it will be stormy, for the sky is red and overcast.' You know how to interpret the appearance of the sky, but you cannot interpret the signs of the times" (Matt. 16:2-3). His point was that they could not interpret the signs of his coming.

The second passage is from 1 Chronicles 12, which lists the warriors who came to David when he was king at Hebron. The men of Issachar were among them, and they are described as those "who understood the times and knew what Israel should do" (1 Chron. 12:32).

So we have, on the one hand, those who could not "interpret the signs of the times" and, on the other hand, those who "understood the times and knew what Israel should do." It is against this background that I set Romans 13:11, our text: "And do this, understanding the present time."

The combination of verses causes us to ask: Do we understand the times in which we live? If not, why not? If we do, what are we doing about it? The bottom line is that if we understand the present time, we will know what to do with our time—and will do it, if we are wise.

This Present Time

I have been surprised by the way some commentators have used this text to discuss eschatology. Because the verse goes on to say, "The hour has come for you to wake up from your slumber, because our salvation is nearer now than when we first believed," they speculate about how close that final deliverance (or salvation) really is.

But that is not what this verse is about. The Greek words say merely, "And this, knowing the time." Yet the New International Version is surely correct when it adds the word "present" to indicate that the time Paul is concerned about is not some future time when the Lord Jesus Christ will return, but rather the present time. And he is concerned that we understand it and use it wisely, knowing that it will be gone forever and the opportunities it holds will be lost forever, when Jesus comes.

So what about this present time? What kind of time is it? Let's look at several passages that describe it clearly.

This Present Evil Time

Galatians 1:4 lays the groundwork for our thinking in this area, saying that Jesus "gave himself for our sins to rescue us from the present evil age, according to the will of our God and Father." Obviously, in this verse Paul is thinking of this world's time as a whole, all time prior to the return of Jesus Christ in glory, and he is telling us that it is an evil time out of which we need to be rescued.

I wonder if we really believe that this is a "present evil age." I suspect that what we really believe is that this age is really rather nice, something to be sought after and enjoyed as much as possible.

You are never going to make any true progress in wisdom unless you begin by realizing that this world is hostile to God and opposed to any desires for godliness on the part of God's people. Jesus said it clearly. He told his disciples just before his arrest and crucifixion, "If the world hates you, keep in mind that it hated me first. If you belonged to the world, it would love you as its own. As it is, you do not belong to the world, but I have chosen you out of the world. That is why the world hates you" (John 15:18-19). Later he prayed, "My prayer is not that you take them out of the world but that you protect them from the evil one" (John 17:15).

What this means is that all cultures decline to the degree that they reject Christ. And the more radical the rejection, the more rapid the disintegration. Our own Western culture is declining rapidly.

A number of contemporary writers are saying this, and not all are Christians. Allan Bloom's book, The Closing of the American Mind, is one example. It deplores the decline of Western standards of education due to the overthrow of moral and cultural values by philosophic relativism. Another book that deals with the impact of relativism and the abolishing of Christian absolutes in twentieth-century history is English historian Paul Johnson's masterful study, Modern Times: The World from the Twenties to the Nineties. I think too of Malcolm Muggeridge's The End of Christendom, Carl F. H. Henry's Twilight of a Great Civilization, Herbert Schlossberg's Idols for Destruction, and Charles Colson's Against the Night: Living in the New Dark Ages. I encourage you to read them, if you want honest, penetrating studies of this age.

In Against the Night, Charles Colson quotes Whittaker Chambers, a former communist spy who became a Christian and a passionate defender of the West, but who died despairing of it:

It is idle to talk about preventing the wreck of Western civilization. It is already a wreck from within. This is why we can hope to do little more now than snatch a fingernail of a saint from the rack or a handful of ashes from the fire, and bury them secretly in a flower pot against the day, ages hence, when a few men begin again to dare to believe that there was once something else, that something else is thinkable, and need some evidence of what it was and the fortifying knowledge that there were those who, at the great nightfall, took loving thought to preserve the tokens of hope and truth.

Those are grim words, but they are an honest reflection on this present (or any other) age apart from the true God and the power of true Christianity.

The Sign of Jonah

In 2 Corinthians 6:2, Paul writes, "I tell you, now is the time of God's favor, now is the day of salvation." In other words, although this is indeed an evil age, it is nevertheless also the age in which God has accomplished our salvation.

We see this too in Matthew 16:4, the verse immediately following Jesus' words about the Pharisees and Sadducees' failure to interpret the signs of the times. Jesus told them, "A wicked and adulterous generation looks for a miraculous sign, but none will be given it except the sign of Jonah." It is clear from the way he had spoken of Jonah four chapters earlier that he was referring to his own upcoming death and resurrection.

And that is exactly the way the rest of Matthew 16 unfolds. You will recall that immediately after this and after warning his disciples of what he called "the yeast of the Pharisees and Sadducees"—that is, their teaching—Jesus asked the disciples who the people thought he was.

They replied, "Some say John the Baptist; others say Elijah; and still others, Jeremiah or one of the prophets."

"But what about you?" Jesus asked. "Who do you say I am?"

Peter answered for the others: "You are the Christ, the Son of the living God" (Matt. 16:13-15). Jesus then explained how Peter's answer was right and that it was something that had been revealed to him by God. In other words, he put his seal of approval on Peter's true answer, affirming that Peter (and eventually the other disciples too) had interpreted the signs of the times correctly. They had observed what was happening in Christ's ministry and had therefore come to understand that he was the Son of God and to believe on him.

But the salvation Jesus was bringing was by way of the cross. At the time this was something Peter did not understand at all. He believed that Jesus was the Messiah. But when Jesus went on to teach that "he must go to Jerusalem and suffer many things at the hands of the elders, chief priests and teachers of the law, and that he must be killed and on the third day be raised to life" (Matt. 16:21), Peter rebuked him, saying that he didn't want that to happen to Jesus. Peter needed to be rebuked by Jesus instead.

If we are to understand this present time, we must understand that this is also a time marked out by the cross of Jesus Christ, whom God sent to be our Savior. Paul wrote, "But when the time had fully come, God sent his Son, born of a woman, born under law, to redeem those under law, that we might receive the full rights of sons" (Gal. 4:4-5).

A Time to Repent and Believe

A third passage is from the day, a week before his death, when Jesus was approaching Jerusalem. When he saw it he began to weep, saying, "If you, even you, had known on this day what would bring you peace —but now it is hidden from your eyes. The days will come upon you when your enemies will build an embankment against you and encircle you and hem you in on every side. They will dash you to the ground, you and the children within your walls. They will not leave one stone on another, because you did not recognize the time of God's coming to you" (Luke 19:41-44).

What Jesus meant was that the people had been given time to repent of their sins and turn to him and be saved. But they had refused to do it, and as a result the time of their opportunity was drawing to an end.

That is exactly the condition of people in our world today, since the destruction of Jerusalem, which overtook the people of that city within a generation of Jesus' death and resurrection, was a foretaste and warning of the final judgment that is to come upon every member of our race. Judgment will fall on you, if you are not trusting Jesus Christ for your salvation. He himself will be judge. But here is the good news. Today is the day of God's grace. Judgment has not yet come. Therefore, turn from your sin and believe on Jesus. Perhaps this is the very moment of God's coming to you personally.

A Time of Gospel Proclamation

In the first chapter of Acts, at the very beginning of the account of the founding and growth of the Christian church, the disciples asked Jesus, "Lord, are you at this time going to restore the kingdom to Israel" (Acts 1:6). Their question showed that they were still thinking in unbiblical categories. The Jews expected the Messiah to drive out the Romans, who occupied their country, and reestablish David's dynasty and an independent state of Israel. They believed that Jesus was the Messiah, so they anticipated that he would fulfill this popular expectation.

Jesus replied that this is not what this age is about. This age is one of gospel proclamation. He said, "It is not for you to know the times or dates the Father has set by his own authority. But you will receive power when the Holy Spirit comes on you; and you will be my witnesses in Jerusalem, and in all Judea and Samaria, and to the ends of the earth" (Acts 1:7-8).

That is the fourth text needed to explain the nature of the times in which we live. It tells us that it is not for us to know the times God has set for the end of all things. That alone should rebuke the many extravagant attempts to discern the end of the age from Romans 13 or any other passage touching on eschatology. What we are to know is that these are gospel times, times given to us by God to take the good news about the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ, which is the way of salvation, to all people throughout the whole world.

Going back to Romans 13:11, this means that if you really do understand the present time, which is what the text is asking you to do, you will be in the vanguard of those who are seeking to lead others to faith in Jesus Christ as Savior.

What else is time for, if it is not for that? It is not time for you merely to make money or a name for yourself or to have a good time. How could you even suppose that merely making money or becoming famous or enjoying yourself is what life is about? Life is from God, and the time you have has been given to you by him. Time is for Jesus, and history is about God calling a people out of this present evil age to believe in and also live for him. Your role in this present time, if you are a believer, is to live for Jesus—and witness for him too.

Jesus told his disciples, "All authority in heaven and on earth has been given to me. Therefore go and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, and teaching them to obey everything I have commanded you. And surely I will be with you always, to the very end of the age" (Matt. 28:18-20).

The Time Is Short

In 1 Corinthians 7:29 Paul adds something else about time that fits perfectly with what he is saying in Romans 13: "The time is short." If we are going to serve Jesus Christ, we had better do it now, because we do not have forever. In Romans Paul develops this same idea by saying, "The hour has come for you to wake from your slumber, because our salvation is nearer now than when we first believed."

This is true in two senses, and each can be applied both to believers and to unbelievers.

1. The return of Jesus Christ is imminent. Imminent is not a calendar term, as if we might be saying that Jesus' return is going to take place tomorrow or, at the latest, the day after that or the day after that. Some Bible teachers have fallen into the error of saying this and even of setting dates. But imminent does not mean immediate.

It means it could be at any moment—nothing stands in its way. Of course, that is important all by itself. Since Jesus could return to wrap up this age and usher in the final judgment at any moment, it is urgent that you be ready to meet him, whoever you are and whenever he may come.

If you are a Christian, you must be ready to render account for what you have done with the talents and opportunities he has given you. If you are not a Christian, you will be judged. Anyone who understands this about the times will flee from sin to Jesus and then live for him and serve him with all the strength he provides.

2. The time when you must stand before Jesus Christ is close. That is, regardless of the time when Jesus will return, your personal end is very close. At the best you will die in seventy or eighty years. You may die tomorrow, or today.

If you are trusting Christ, that time is "nearer... than when [you] first believed," to use Paul's words. Soon you will stand before Jesus to give your accounting. Will you acquit yourself well on that day of final reckoning? Will you hear Jesus say, "Well done, good and faithful servant! You have been faithful with a few things; I will put you in charge of many things. Come and share your master's happiness!" (Matt. 25:23)? Or will you be ashamed to stand before him?

If you are not a Christian, tremble! And know no peace until you do trust Jesus. In that same parable, the master says of the unbelieving person, "Throw that worthless servant outside, into the darkness, where there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth" (Matt. 25:30).

Redeeming the Time Because...

The sixth and final text having to do with the time in which we live and how we are to understand it is Ephesians 5:16, which brings us back to what Paul wrote in Romans 13 as well as to the evil of this present time: "Be very careful, then, how you live—not as unwise but as wise, making the most of every opportunity, because the days are evil." The King James Version says, "Redeeming the time, because the days are evil."

The great American Puritan Jonathan Edwards was aware of how important time is. In his youth, before the age of twenty, he wrote out as a personal resolution: "Never to lose one moment of time, but to improve it in the most profitable way I possibly can." He did this faithfully himself. So it is not at all surprising to find him urging the same on those he taught for so many years in Northampton.

One of his sermons, preached in December 1734, is called "The Preciousness of Time and the Importance of Redeeming It" and is based on Ephesians 5:16. One section of that sermon was on improving the time we have. Among his points were these:

1. "Consider... that you are accountable to God for your time." Time is as much a talent given you by God as your natural attributes or advantages. If you were really convinced that you will have to give God an accounting for what you do with your time, would you not use it otherwise than you do? Would you not resolve "never to lose one moment of time, but to improve it in the most profitable way [you] possibly can"? If you believe that, all that is left is to do it.
2. "Consider how much time you have lost already." If you are old or in middle age, you need to pay special attention to this. If you have not been active in Christ's service, you have wasted many precious moments. You can never make them up. But should you not then make every effort to use the remaining time well? Should you not "redeem the time" you do have, knowing the evil of the age and the value of the gospel?
3. Consider how you may "improve the present time without delay." There is nothing you can do about the past, but you should at least make sure that you do not repeat your former errors. Turn from your idleness, sin, or unbelief. Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and determine to follow him. Witness for him. Remember that you are to understand the times and use time wisely. The time is coming when "time shall be no more."

Chapter 207.
Sleepers Awake!

Romans 13:11

My favorite radio station has a unique feature of its early-morning programming called the "Sousalarm." They play a lively Sousa march at 7:15 A.M. sharp to rouse listeners out of bed and get them started on the day. In this text we have a "gospel alarm," taken from Paul's call to Christians in Romans 13. It is an insistent wake-up call: "The hour has come for you to wake up from your slumber, because our salvation is nearer now than when we first believed" (Rom.
13:11).

Paul's Teaching and Jesus' Teaching

I have had several occasions in these studies of Romans 12 and 13 to show that Paul is reflecting the teaching of the Lord Jesus Christ in what he says. Since this is nowhere clearer than in the very last part of Romans 13, let me take just a moment to point up three references. As I see it, these references follow the same sequence as in the gospels. Conventional dating of the New Testament books places the Pauline epistles early and the gospels late, but this does not mean that Paul was necessarily unfamiliar with the material about Jesus' life that was later included in the gospels. Consider what we have in Romans 13:8-11.

1. "Love your neighbor as yourself." In verses 8-10 Paul discussed the law of love, probably with an awareness of Jesus' teaching about the greatest and second greatest of the commandments. That specific teaching is found in Matthew 22.
2. "Understand... the present time." In verse 11 Paul urged his readers to live godly lives because they understand the present time. This reminds us of Jesus' instructions to his disciples found in the sermon given on the Mount of Olives before his crucifixion (Matt. 24).

3. "Wake up from your slumber." In verse 11 we have Paul's call to Christians to wake up. This bears a striking resemblance to Jesus' parable of the five wise and five foolish women recorded in Matthew 25.

Since Paul is probably echoing Jesus' teaching in this verse, we can conclude that our Lord himself as well as the great apostle to the Gentiles, the leading theologian of the early Church, combine in these words to call each of us to wake up. So I ask, Are you awake? Are you awake to your calling, to your unique opportunities for service as a Christian? Are you using the time the Lord has given you to be a witness for him?

The Sleeping Christian

I begin by reminding you that these words are written to professed believers in Jesus Christ and not to non-Christians. Many who claim to be Christians are asleep. Christians are called to behave in a Christlike way to all people—above all, living out the law of love (v. 10)—but many are not actually doing it. As far as all outward appearances are concerned, they are like those unbelievers around them who are spiritually dead. They are not active for God. They are slumbering.

They are like Jonah when he was running away from God. Jonah was a prophet whom God had called to go to Nineveh, the capital city of the great Assyrian empire. He was to preach a message of judgment against it. But Jonah wouldn't go. As he later explained it, he was aware that God was "a gracious and compassionate God, slow to anger and abounding in love, a God who relents from sending calamity" (Jonah 4:2; cf. Exod. 34:5-7), and he reasoned that if God was like that, then the only possible reason for God's sending him to Nineveh with a message of judgment was so that the people might repent and be saved.

Since the Assyrians were the hated enemies of his own people, the Jews, Jonah didn't want to preach anything to them.

So he ran away to Tarshish, a city on the far side of the Straits of Gibraltar in Spain. He did it by taking a ship from the Jewish port city of Joppa, paying his full fare.

Jonah could take the ship, but God was not obliged to take this disobedience from Jonah. So God sent a storm onto the Mediterranean Sea that threatened to sink the vessel, drowning not only Jonah but also the pagans who were sailing it. It was a furious storm, fierce beyond anything these experienced sailors had ever encountered before. So they were praying desperately, all of them—all, that is, but Jonah. Jonah had gone below deck where he had fallen into a deep sleep.

At this point the captain went to him and rebuked him: "How can you sleep? Get up and call on your god! Maybe he will take notice of us, and we will not perish" (Jonah 1:6).

What a sobering picture this is! The sailors were doing everything they knew to do to save the ship, even praying in their ignorance to whatever gods there might be! But Jonah, the one person who actually knew the great God who controls everything, even the winds and the waves, and who also knew why the storm had been sent, was asleep in the ship's dark hold.

The great French thinker and writer Jacques Ellul wrote a study of Jonah in which he viewed the sailors as standing for the unsaved, perishing world, and Jonah as standing for the insensitive, sleeping church. He notes that in this world (not the world to come, but this world) the destinies of both are linked:

The safety of all depends on what each does. But each has his own thing to do. They are in the same storm, subject to the same peril, and they want the same outcome. They are in a unique enterprise, and this ship typifies our situation. What do these sailors do? First, they do all they humanly can; while Jonah sleeps, they try all human methods to save the vessel, to keep the enterprise going (v. 5). What experience, nautical science, reason, and common sense teach them to do, they do. In this sense they do their duty. The sailors are in charge of the world, and in normal conditions they discharge their task correctly. We can ask no more of them. The tragic thing here, however, is that if conditions cease to be normal, it is not the fault of the sailors, the pagans; it is the fault of the Christian who has sailed with them. It is because of him that the situation is such that the knowledge and tradition of the sailors can do no more.

We have to realize once again that this is how it usually is with the world; the storm is unleashed because of the unfaithfulness of the church and Christians. This being so, if the tempest is God's will to constrain his church, a will by which the whole human enterprise is endangered, one can easily see why man's technical devices are of no avail.

When Jonah finally did wake up—or rather was awakened by the captain—he had a valuable message to deliver to the sailors, even though he was running away and had been disobedient. He pointed to the Hebrew God as the true God ("the God of heaven, who made the sea and the land," Jonah 1:9), explained what was going on, which the sailors had no way of knowing ("It is my fault that this great storm has come upon you," Jonah 1:12), and proposed a solution ("Pick me up and throw me into the sea," Jonah 1:12).

In fact, as I read the story I sense that the sailors became believers in God as a result of Jonah's testimony. For we are told at the end of the first chapter, after they had thrown Jonah overboard and the sea had become calm, "At this the men greatly feared the Lord, and they offered a sacrifice to the Lord and made vows to him" (Jonah 1:16).

Do you know people who need to hear your testimony about the God who is able to save sinners? Of course, you do. They are perishing, and they have no idea what to do. You have the answer. The answer is that God sent his Son, the Lord Jesus Christ, to be their Savior by dying for them and in their place. They need to believe on him. Isn't it time for you to wake up and tell them about Jesus?

He Found Them Sleeping

There is another Bible story that we also need to think about at this point, and that is the story of the disciples sleeping in the garden on the night of Jesus' arrest by the temple authorities. Jesus was praying in great agony, saying to the Father, "My Father, if it is possible, may this cup be taken from me. Yet not as I will, but as you will" (Matt. 26:39). Jesus asked the disciples to keep him company, to watch and pray. But they failed to do it. Instead of praying, they were soon fast asleep even as the enemies of Christ made their way into the garden to carry him off to trial and crucifixion.

The disciples, who had not prayed and therefore had not been fortified by God for what was coming, quickly fled. And a short time later, Peter, who followed the arresting party into the courtyard of the Jewish high priest, denied that he ever knew Jesus (Matt. 26:69-75).

In Jonah's case, the sleeper missed the opportunity to testify about God to the unbelieving world—at least until he was awakened by the world and by circumstances. In the second case, the sleeping disciples failed to pray and were therefore useless when the hour of crisis came.

Is it any different today? Are believers not as much asleep in our day as ever they were? The need of the world is apparent, but we do not see it. We have the answer to the world's troubles, but we don't know it. Or if we do, we fail to make it known. Is that true of you? Awake, sleepers! That is the message. If you have been asleep, you need to wake up right now.

Sounding of the "Gospel Alarm"

Have you ever gone into someone's bedroom to wake him up and found him so deeply asleep that all he wanted to do was keep on sleeping? I am sure you have. So I am sure you can understand that the situation of the church in our day is very much like that. The world is perishing. Christians are sleeping. And Christians do not even want to wake up! It is easier and far more pleasant to go on sleeping. Why should we wake up? Why should we even want to wake up? Let me give you some reasons.

1. Because our salvation is nearer now than when we first believed. This is the reason Paul himself gives, and it is a powerful one. Whenever it was that you first believed on Jesus Christ as your Savior and promised to follow him as his disciple—whether five years ago, fifty years ago, or just recently—you have less time to serve him now than you did when you first believed. Your time is not unlimited. Besides, it is slipping away with every passing moment. When are you going to live for Jesus, if not now?

If you are a young person, it is easy to suppose that life is long and that you still have plenty of time to serve Jesus. You do not know that, of course. There is no guarantee that you will live through today, let alone for forty, fifty, or sixty more years. But even if you do have a very long life before you, why should you want to waste the time you have? Or if you waste it now, forming a pattern of living for yourself rather than for God, what is to make you think that you will change your self-centered ways and be of any use to others later? If you do not wake up and live for Jesus now, it is likely that you will continue sleeping into old age and die having done nothing at all of value for the Lord Jesus Christ or his kingdom.

If you are an old person, you may have wasted many years—just as I have been describing. You are willing to confess that what I have just said is very true. Past days are indeed lost opportunities. But you are still here, you are still listening, and what I am saying is, "Wake up!" Even on his deathbed, young David Brainard, a missionary to the American Indians and close friend of Jonathan Edwards, took time to teach a young Indian boy to read so he could read the Bible. He was glad that there was still something, even in his weakened state, that he could do for Jesus. Is there nothing you can do, even in your old age?

2. Because you have no right to sleep when there is work to do. The great Baptist preacher Charles Haddon Spurgeon gave a sermon on Romans 13:11 in which he explained why believers have no right to be asleep. He showed that Christians have been rescued from death to be Christ's witnesses and that they are called to be alert and working until Jesus comes.

He developed this from the case of the ten virgins in Christ's parable:

When the five wise virgins went out to meet the bridegroom, and took their lamps with them, what right had they to be asleep? I can very well understand those sleeping who had no oil in the vessels with their lamps, because when their lamps went out they would be in the dark, and darkness suggests sleep. But those who had their lamps well trimmed, should they go asleep in the light? Those that had the oil, should they go to sleep while the oil was illuminating them? They needed to be awake to put the oil into the lamp. Besides, they had come out to meet the bridegroom. Could they meet him asleep? When he should come, would it be fit that he should find those who attended his wedding all asleep in a row, insulting his dignity and treating his glory with scorn?

We might argue that if they had been awake they might have been able to instruct and help those other women who were not ready for the Lord's return and who were eventually shut out of the wedding banquet.

3. Because we have many enemies who are awake and working even if we are not. This is a point Spurgeon also makes, pointing to the enemy who sowed the tares in the gospel field "while everyone was sleeping" (Matt. 13:25). He said:

You may sleep, but you cannot induce the devil to close his eyes.... You may see evangelicals asleep, but you will not find ritualists slumbering. The prince of the power of the air keeps his servants well up to their work. Is it not a strange thing that the servants of the Lord often serve him at a poor, cold, dead-alive rate? Oh, may the Lord quicken us! If we could with a glance see the activities of the servants of Satan, we should be astonished at our own sluggishness.

At the height of the cold war Robert McNamara, who was at the time United States secretary of state, said that he always had to remember that "when we are sleeping the other two-thirds of the world is awake and up to some mischief." As for ourselves, if we understood that the enemies of the gospel are always awake, wouldn't we be more alert in opposing them and speaking up for Jesus?

4. Because there is something worth waking up for. I am told that one of the saddest things about the prisons of this country is that so many prisoners fall into what the wardens call a prison shuffle, moving at the slowest possible speed, and that many who are imprisoned spend long hours in their beds trying to sleep the lengthy years of their sentences away. That is sad, but understandable. It is understandable that people who have nothing to live for should want to kill time.

But that is not our case. We have meaningful work to do. We have the task of telling men and women of that Savior who, if they believe on him, will lift them out of darkness into light and out of death into life. Moreover, that life is an eternal life, so the fruit of what we are given to do as Christians is eternal. Those who are saved through our witness will be in heaven with God forever. They will be part of that everlasting chorus that will be praising God. Likewise, the good works we do will be remembered before God forever. Not even a cup of water given to a thirsty person in Christ's name will be forgotten.

What else in all of life is like that? Everything else is going to pass away. It will perish. So why live for things that perish? Live for God. The Bible says, "The world and its desires pass away, but the man who does the will of God lives forever" (1 John 2:17). Our text says, "The hour has come for you to wake up from your slumber." Or as the King James version has it, "It is high time" to wake up! And so it is!

The Sad Case of Unbelievers

Romans 13:11 is directed to Christians, but it is legitimate to address unbelievers also. Some Christians are asleep in respect to spiritual things, but unbelievers are more than asleep—they are spiritually dead, because unaided by God they are unable to respond to, understand, or even hear the gospel.

Here I turn back to Matthew 25:1-13, which contains the parable of the five wise and the five foolish women. In Spurgeon's handling of the story, the focus was on those who had no right to be asleep. Spurgeon applied it to people who know Jesus Christ but who are asleep and therefore fail properly to wait for or serve him. But what of the other five women? They were not true believers; they were lost. What of them?

The important thing about this part of the parable is that those who were lost actually thought they were saved and, in fact, for a time were indistinguishable from their believing sisters. This is a point made in each of the three parables in this chapter. The five women had received the bridegroom's invitation, had responded positively, and were even waiting for his coming. They were sure they would be admitted to the wedding banquet. Therefore, even though they were not ready when he came because they were off buying oil, trying to get ready, they expected him to open the door to them and were incredulous when he turned them away.

"Sir! Sir! Open the door for us!" they cried.

He replied, "I tell you the truth, I don't know you" (Matt. 25:11-12).

In the next story the servant who buried his master's talent and did not use it was amazed when the master disapproved of his actions. He thought he had done well, but his master called him wicked and lazy and had him cast "outside, into the darkness, where there will be weeping and gnashing of teeth" (Matt. 25:26-30).

In the third parable recounted in Matthew 25, the goats could not understand why they were rejected since, as they implied, they would have fed Jesus if they had seen him and understood that he was hungry, or given him something to drink if they had seen him and understood that he was thirsty, or invited him in, or clothed him, or looked after him, or gone to visit him. They did not understand that they would have been able to do that only by helping other people or understand that their opportunity to do it was now past. They too were asleep. They also perished.

In each of these cases, the people involved were members of what we would call the visible church. So the parables are to warn such people, people who think everything is well with their souls, that they need to wake up to their true spiritual condition.

This is what happened during the American revivals that took place in the colonies under the preaching of such godly men as Jonathan Edwards, Gilbert Tennent, and George Whitfield. The movement was called the Great Awakening because this was the first effect the preachers of the gospel noticed. They noticed that people who had been thinking of themselves as Christians woke up to the fact that they were not actually born-again children of God and were distressed by that fact. Once awakened, they were able to hear the gospel and believe it. By believing they gave evidence that they were spiritually regenerated or revived.

What we need today is another Great Awakening. It is what you need if you only think you are a Christian.

Chapter 208.
Saint Augustine's Text

Romans 13:12-14

There are some verses in the Bible that immediately bring to mind some great Christian leader or hero of the faith, just because they are so closely associated with that person's life or testimony. Romans 1:17 is the best-known example, because it was used of God in the conversion of Martin Luther, the father of the Protestant Reformation: "The just shall live by faith" (KJV). But how about Matthew 28:20, "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world" (KJV)? That was the life verse of David Livingstone, the great pioneer missionary to central Africa. Or John Newton's text: "Thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondsman in the land of Egypt, and the Lord thy God redeemed thee" (Deut. 15:15, KJV)? Newton, the former "slave of slaves," regarded those words as a description of his early dissolute life and of God's deliverance of him from it.

There are so many of these verses, all linked to the conversion or life work of some great Christian leader, that earlier in this century an Australian pastor named Frank W. Boreham produced a series of books on them that proved immensely popular. Most bore as a subtitle the words: "Texts That Made History." At the end of Romans 13, we arrive at three verses that make anyone who knows anything of church history think at once of Saint Augustine, the words God used in his conversion: "The night is nearly over; the day is almost here. So let us put aside the deeds of darkness and put on the armor of light. Let us behave decently, as in the daytime, not in orgies and drunkenness, not in sexual immorality and debauchery, not in dissension and jealousy. Rather, clothe yourselves with the Lord Jesus Christ, and do not think about how to gratify the desires of the sinful nature" (Rom. 13:12-14). How it came about is a fascinating story.

Augustine's Early Life

Saint Augustine's first name was Aurelius, though he himself never used it—we know it only from those who wrote about him. Augustine was born on November 13, 354 a.d., of mixed pagan and Christian parentage—his mother was a Christian, his father was not—at Tagaste, a small provincial town in North Africa.

His parents had great ambitions for him, though their desires differed greatly. His mother's name was Monnica, and the passion of her life was that her son might become a Christian. His father wanted him to have a superior liberal education and by this means eventually become a great and wealthy man. So Augustine was educated first in his hometown, then at the renowned but notoriously corrupt city of Carthage, also on the northern coast of Africa across from Sicily. Augustine was trained as a rhetorician, one who made his living by arguing cases of law or giving speeches. He was brilliant and was so successful that he later moved from Carthage to Rome, and eventually, in 384 a.d., from Rome to Milan, where he had been appointed government professor of rhetoric. This post gave him high social standing and brought him into contact with the most influential people in Italy, even members of the Roman court.

In 400 A.D., about fourteen years after his conversion, which took place in Milan in 386 a.d., Augustine published his Confessions. This was a book of thirteen relatively short chapters in which he tells of the grace of God in his early life and how God led him to faith in Jesus Christ.

On the very first page, Augustine wrote this sentence: "Thou hast formed us for thyself, and our hearts are restless till they find rest in thee." He meant that of everyone, of course, but it was especially true of himself and is therefore the major testimony of his life. Augustine tried everything the world had to offer, but he found it all empty. He was indeed restless until he came to rest in Christ.

1. His youthful pleasures. To many people one of the most fascinating parts of the Confessions is Augustine's description of his early life. Because of what he says, Augustine has been thought of as having lived a wild and wasteful life, being something of an abandoned libertine and a rake. But there are two things wrong with this way of thinking. First, he was not as depraved as we suppose. He was promiscuous, sleeping with many women at age sixteen, but by the age of seventeen he had formed a long-lasting relationship with a woman whom he did not marry—his parents did not want him to marry, supposing that marriage at an early age would be an obstacle to his career—and Augustine and this woman were faithful to each other until they were eventually forced apart to make way for a "proper" legal marriage some fourteen years later. Augustine wrote that while they were together he was faithful to her, and the Confessions contain a tragic passage describing his personal heartbreak when they were forced apart.

The second thing wrong with thinking of Augustine as a great libertine is that it somehow makes him worse than we ourselves are. Augustine was no better but also not much worse than everyone else in his time, and the way he lived is all too common even today. We live in an age of similar sexual "liberation," and the pattern of Augustine's early years is duplicated today many millions of times over, even by Christian people. So we are no better. And while it is true that he confessed his sins openly, and we usually do not, his sins were only those of which many of us are also guilty.

But here is the point. With ruthless self-examination and logic this great saint—for such he became—explains that even in his indulgences his heart remained restless. For a time he indeed lived for fleshly pleasures. But he found that even surfeited with all the pleasures of the flesh "our hearts are restless till they find rest in thee."

2. His quest for philosophical truth. Augustine did not only have a strong sexual nature, however. He also had a strong and restless mind, and his Confessions tell how he journeyed from one popular philosophical system to another to try to discover truth. He was awakened to this pursuit by reading a book of Cicero's, since lost, called Hortensius. The great Latin writer had written it to encourage love for philosophy, and this was its immediate effect on Augustine. From this point on Augustine resolved to make truth his sole pursuit.

His strong mind led him into the philosophy of the Manichaeans, who were the rationalists of their age. They expressed a high reverence for Jesus Christ, but their religion was all naturalistic, or antisupernatural. They were critical of the Bible and had developed a way of looking at evil that relieved man of responsibility for personal sins or failures. This was appealing to a young man, as you can imagine. It bolstered Augustine's intellectual pride, allowed him to speak well of his mother's religion, excused his moral failings, and freed him to live in any manner he pleased.

Augustine drifted away from the Manichees at about the time he left North Africa for Rome. For a short while he was disillusioned and skeptical about everything, but he was then introduced to the Platonists, who sought for an immaterial reality, good, or truth behind the observable phenomena of life. This had a deep effect on Augustine since, up to this point, he had been unable to think of anything immaterial as real.

But even this was unsatisfactory. Augustine was on the way toward true faith and God, but he still had not found what he was seeking. In a wonderfully perceptive passage he compares the books of the Platonists with what he later found in Scripture:

I read, not indeed in the same words, but to the selfsame effect, enforced by many and divers reasons, that, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God. The same was in the beginning with God. All things were made by him; and without him was not anything made that was made."... But that "he came unto his own, and his own received him not. But as many as received him, to them he gave power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name." That I did not read there.

In like manner, I read there that God the Word was born not of flesh, nor of blood, nor of the will of man, nor of the will of the flesh, but of God. But that "the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us," I read not there....

That before all times, and above all times, thy only-begotten Son remaineth unchangeably coeternal with thee... is there. But that "in due time Christ died for the ungodly," and that "thou sparedst not thine only Son, but deliveredst him up for us all," is not there.

In other words, Augustine learned about the immaterial, unchangeable mind, or logos, of God from the Platonists. The Platonists had surmised many true things about God. But Augustine did not find the incarnation of Jesus Christ or the atonement in their writings. He did not find the gospel. Therefore, he did not find forgiveness for his sins, and his heart remained restless because it had not yet come to rest in God.

3. His fame. When Augustine arrived in Milan as government professor of rhetoric at the university, he was immediately launched into the highest and most influential circles of Italian society. His mother was brought over from Africa. The circle of his old intimates gathered around him. Wealthy and influential friends sought him out. He had achieved the fame he sought. But, as often happens when people finally find the thing they have been fervently seeking, Augustine discovered that the realization of his life goal was unsatisfying. In fact, this became the most miserable time of his life. He even became sick of a chest or lung infection, and it was doubtful whether he would be able to continue his career in oratory.

4. His exposure to religion. Augustine was always somewhat religious, and his religion was never very far from the true evangelical religion of his mother, which was Christianity.

Augustine was skeptical, but he almost always believed in God, and in these early days he would probably have said that in one way or another he was always striving to know him.

When Augustine arrived in Milan he came under the influence of Ambrose, the bishop of that city. Ambrose was a man of towering intellect, massive learning, and great godliness. Moreover, he was an outstanding preacher. So Augustine, who loved the technical skills of good speaking, went to hear him. At first Augustine was interested only in his homiletical style. But Ambrose was really an expositor of the Bible and thus also an outstanding teacher of Christian doctrine. Almost in spite of himself, Augustine was led deeper into understanding what the gospel of salvation through Jesus Christ was all about, though he had not yet come to a point at which he could commit himself to Jesus and become his disciple. He began to read the Bible.

Augustine was also introduced to the lives of several very prominent Christians. One was Victorinus, a rhetorician like Augustine. He made public profession of his faith in Rome, though he was then well known and his identification with Christ was costly. Augustine was likewise influenced by the story of Antony and the legendary monks of Egypt. Antony renounced the world for Christ. This moved Augustine, who loved the world, but he did not believe the gospel. Augustine understood much about Christianity. But his heart was restless, because he had not yet come to rest in Christ.

"Save Me, But Not Yet!"

Augustine wrote of these days, "To thee, showing me on every side that what thou saidst was true, I, convicted by the truth, had nothing at all to reply, but the drawling and drowsy words: 'Presently, lo, presently'; 'Leave me a little while.' But 'presently, presently,' had no present; and my 'leave me a little while' went on for a long while." He looked to his past and observed, "But I, miserable young man, supremely miserable even in the very outset of my youth, had entreated chastity of thee, and said, 'Grant me chastity and continency, but not yet.' For I was afraid lest thou shouldest hear me soon, and soon deliver me."

On one occasion he cried out to his good friend Alypius, "What is wrong with us?... The unlearned start up and 'take' heaven, but we, with our learning, but wanting heart, see where we wallow in flesh and blood! Because others have preceded us, are we ashamed to follow, and not rather ashamed at not following?"

The Scene in the Garden

At last there came the well-known scene in the garden of a friend's estate near Milan, where Augustine was converted. He and Alypius had been reading the Bible together, but Augustine became so distressed at his own lack of spiritual resolution that he withdrew to a distant part of the garden so he could give vent to his emotion and Alypius would not see his tears.

These are Augustine's words:

I flung myself down, how, I know not, under a certain fig-tree, giving free course to my tears.... And, not indeed in these words, yet to this effect, spake I much unto thee—"But thou, O Lord, how long?" "How long, Lord? Wilt thou be angry forever? O, remember not against us former iniquities"; for I felt that I was enthralled by them.... "Why not now? Why is there not this hour an end to my uncleanness?"

I was saying these things and weeping in the most bitter contrition of my heart, when, lo, I heard the voice as of a boy or girl, I know not which, coming from a neighboring house, chanting, and oft repeating, "Take up and read; take up and read." Immediately my countenance was changed, and I began most earnestly to consider whether it was usual for children in any kind of game to sing such words; nor could I remember ever to have heard the like. So, restraining the torrent of my tears, I rose up, interpreting it no other way than as a command to me from heaven to open the book, and to read the first chapter I should light upon. For I had heard of Antony, that, accidentally coming in whilst the gospel was being read, he received the admonition as if what was read were addressed to him: "Go and sell that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven; and come and follow me." And by such oracle was he forthwith converted unto thee.

So quickly I returned to the place where Alypius was sitting; for there had I put down the volume of the apostles, when I rose thence. I grasped, opened, and in silence read that paragraph on which my eyes first fell,—"Not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and envying; but put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make not provision for the flesh, to fulfill the lusts thereof." No further would I read, nor did I need; for instantly, as the sentence ended—by a light, as it were, of security infused into my heart—all the gloom of doubt vanished away.

Alypius was converted himself at this time, and both of them went to tell Augustine's mother, Monnica, who had been praying for her son for years and now rejoiced and praised God for his conversion. It was not long after this that Monnica died, as she and Augustine were on their way back to North Africa, where Augustine eventually became a presbyter and then Bishop of Hippo Regius, serving the Lord there for more than forty years until his death on August 28, 430 a.d., at the age of seventy-six.

Augustine's Later Life

It is hard to overestimate the importance of Augustine's contribution to Christian theology and the church. Hippo was a second-rate diocese, having no special prominence in itself. Besides, it was overrun by the Vandals at the very time Augustine was dying, and the bishopric, the school, and the clergy that Augustine had established and trained were all either widely scattered or destroyed. Nevertheless, Augustine's influence lived on, perhaps more than any other nonbiblical figure, through his writings. They gave form to the best of the church's life during the Middle Ages and were in a sense the true foundation of the Holy Roman Empire.

Adolf Harnack was no conservative theologian, but he called Augustine the greatest man whom, "between Paul the Apostle and Luther the Reformer, the Christian Church has possessed."

After his conversion Augustine produced many polemical works against the Manichaeans, Donatists, and Pelagians, interspersed with Bible expositions and theological studies. He is best known for four works that aptly crown the whole: (1) The Confessions, written about 400 A.D.; (2) On Christian Doctrine, written from 397-426; (3) On the Holy Trinity, written from 395-420; and (4) The City of God, written from 413-426. The fourth volume was the first attempt by any Christian writer to produce a philosophy of history, and it has become an acknowledged classic. In it Augustine describes two rival cities or societies "... formed by two loves: the earthly by the love of self, even to the contempt of God; the heavenly by the love of God, even to the contempt of self." It is a masterful way of analyzing history.

Don't Put Off Putting On!

Romans 13:13-14 was not only God's means of leading Saint Augustine to faith in Christ, it was also a summary of his life. Verse 13 describes what he was. Verse 14 describes what he became. The passage from the first condition to the second is what the Bible urges upon everyone.

These two verses are best known for effecting the conversion of Saint Augustine. But if we think about them for a moment, it is evident that they are not in the first instance written to unbelievers to urge them to become Christians at all. This part of Romans, beginning with the first verse of chapter 12, is written to Christians to explain how they are to live. It really means that we who profess Christ are to live godly lives.

But God uses his Word in unexpected ways, and it is impossible to imagine any passage of the Bible that could not be used by God sometime for the conversion of someone. Is that how God has been using these verses in your life? Has he been using Romans 13:13-14 to move you from sinful self-indulgence, a pursuit of wealth and fame, or even religion, to faith in Jesus Christ? If God has been doing that with you, let me say clearly that now is the time to commit yourself to him. Do not say, "Presently, presently" or "In a little while." The present is now. This is the only perfect time to "clothe yourself with the Lord Jesus Christ" and become a Christian.

Part Twenty. Christian Liberty

Chapter 209.

Where Is the Chasm?

Romans 14:1

If someone spends a lot of time talking about a particular subject, it is usually because the person is interested in it and thinks it's important. So apparently Paul is very interested in the way Christians treat other Christians, since he writes on this subject at length.

Romans 14 begins a new section (Rom. 14:1-15:13), and it is one of the book's longest parts— certainly the longest single part of the closing application portion of the letter (Rom. 12:1-16:27). Why does Paul give so much space to discussing why Christians need to accept those with whom they disagree on less than essential matters? What about matters that in our judgment are much more important, like Christian economics, politics, ecology, or the emancipation of oppressed peoples? Is something as "insignificant" as accepting and getting along with other Christians really that important? Apparently Paul thought so.

His instruction about developing a Christian mind, which I personally think is very important, was completed in two verses. To discuss a right estimate of oneself and others and the need to encourage others took six verses. A call to love one another filled thirteen verses; material on the question of church and state, seven verses; right conduct in light of the imminent return of Jesus Christ, seven verses more. But now his discussion of how Christians are to accept and support other Christians when they do not think or behave as we think they should fills all of chapter 14 and the first half of chapter 15, a total of thirty-five verses. Moreover, this is the last major subject Paul discusses, since following this he begins to talk about his own future plans and sends his final greetings. Apparently, this is the matter he wants to leave before our minds in closing.

There are two main parts to this section: (1) how people with tender consciences are to be treated (14:1-12), and (2) how the "strong" are to use their liberty (14:13-15:13). This is written for the "strong." So if you think you are a strong Christian, both these parts are for you.

What Is the Issue?

The first verse of chapter 14 is a thematic statement. In the New International Version it reads: "Accept him whose faith is weak, without passing judgment on disputable matters." Some people will know it better in the King James Version: "Him that is weak in the faith, receive ye, but not to doubtful disputations." Phillips paraphrases, "Welcome a man whose faith is weak, but not with the idea of arguing over his scruples."

There has been a great deal of debate over what Paul is specifically concerned about in this verse and those following. He is talking about people who are "weak" versus those who are "strong." But who are these weak and strong people? Paul does not spell out exactly who they are, nor why the views of the one party are weak or weaker than the other.

Later on in this section Paul mentions two specific matters: (1) the idea that a Christian is free to eat anything versus the idea that he should eat only vegetables, and (2) the keeping of special "holy" days. This makes us think of other passages in Paul's writings in which these matters are mentioned, but there are differences that make it hard to use those passages to explain what Paul is concerned about here.

For instance, in 1 Corinthians 8:1-13 and 10:23-33 Paul also uses the word weak while speaking of those who had reservations about eating meat from animals that had been sacrificed to one of the pagan gods or goddesses. But nothing in Romans mentions idols, and a concern for a vegetarian diet is not an issue in 1 Corinthians. There are similarities, but there is no reason to assume that the two situations were the same.

Again, Paul is concerned with the observance of special "holy" days in Galatians and Colossians. Galatians 4:10-11 says, "You are observing special days and months and seasons and years! I fear for you, that somehow I have wasted my efforts on you." In Colossians 2:16-17 he warns his readers about those who would impose the observance of such days upon them: "Therefore do not let anyone judge you by what you eat or drink, or with regard to a religious festival, a New Moon celebration or a Sabbath day. These are a shadow of the things that were to come; the reality, however, is found in Christ." Obviously, these are similar texts. But what is most noticeable about them is that Paul takes an entirely different approach in Galatians and Colossians from what he does in Romans. In the shorter Epistles he tells his readers not to become entangled in such things. In Romans he says that none of this matters.

Is Paul being inconsistent, then? Has his mind changed? No! He is merely dealing with different things. John Murray explains it like this:

In Galatians Paul is dealing with the Judaizers who were perverting the gospel at its center. They were the propagandists of a legalism which maintained that the observance of days and seasons was necessary to justification and acceptance with God. This... was "a different gospel which is not another."... In Romans 14 there is no evidence that those esteeming one day above another were involved in any respect in this fatal error. They were not propagandists for a ceremonialism that was aimed at the heart of the gospel. Hence Paul's tolerance and restraint.

A bit further on in this section, in chapter 15, Paul also speaks of differences between Jews and Gentiles, but he is not specific there, either. That is, he does not link the eating of meat or the observance of special days, or their opposites, to either group. So it is not a Jewish asceticism in food versus a Gentile laxity or indulgence that he has in mind.

When we put this together we are probably right to conclude that Paul is not thinking of any one area of action or belief specifically, though he throws out suggestions, but rather that he is intentionally being quite general. To use our common expression, the problem is that Christians are always dumping on one another. Instead of getting on with living their own lives as best they can to the glory of God or, which is also necessary, living so as to win nonbelievers to Christ, they are wasting their time trying to find fault with one another. They do not trust what God is doing in the other Christian.

We have to stop that behavior, Paul says. We must accept and support one another if we are to hear and heed what Paul is saying in this last major section of the letter.

Today's Issues, Not Yesterday's

Another matter we need to think about as we begin to get into this section is that when we are thinking about accepting other Christians as they are we need to grapple with the issues that are dividing believers today and not those that troubled Christians yesterday.

I can think of several behavioral issues that years ago caused Christians to look down on other Christians and judge them and their conduct unfavorably: drinking, smoking, dancing, and going to movies. I did not spend much time in excessively narrow or legalistic church circles while I was growing up, but if I had, the list might have been expanded to include such things as the length of a boy's hair or the length of a girl's skirt.

In my youth those were the issues that would have fallen into the category Paul is writing about in Romans 14 and 15. And one of the sad things about those years is that what Paul wrote about in these chapters was not heeded. That is, the older generation made such a watershed issue of these things that many young people were turned off to religion, or at least to evangelical or fundamentalist religion, rather than conform to what they understood quite rightly to be other than the essence of the gospel.

Many unbelievers must have been turned off or at least confused by this as well. Many of them undoubtedly got the impression that being a Christian essentially meant giving up these so-called worldly vices, rather than trusting Jesus Christ as one's personal Savior and Lord.

But here is the problem. If that is all Paul is writing about in Romans 14 and 15, then he really doesn't have much to say to our generation. This is because ours is an antinomian, liberal, allaccepting generation, and except for a few narrow circles that most of us have little or no contact with, most Christians are all too accepting of what used to be called worldly conduct. We don't care whether people smoke or drink or play cards or so forth. That may be good in some ways, though I would argue that it is also bad in others. But that is not the point here. The question here is this: Is this all that Paul is talking about in these chapters; and if it is, shouldn't we just skip ahead to Romans 15:14 and congratulate ourselves on having already mastered this teaching?

I hope we know that this isn't right. The specifics may have changed, but the problem is with us somewhere, and it is probably greater in us than with others, especially if we do not think we have a problem. Let me suggest a few areas where we can apply this today.

1. When another Christian is going through hard times. I suppose this is the area in which I see the failure of the self-styled "strong" toward the "weak" brother or sister most often. Christians go through hard times. Sometimes it is in the family. A husband is deserted by his wife, or a wife is abandoned by her husband. Sometimes a Christian loses his job and, if the individual is a husband, may come to a point where he is unable to support his family. Sometimes there is sickness or an accident that brings a person to the very edge of life.

When Christians go through such difficult periods, their fellow believers should rally around them, support and encourage them, and help them financially. But instead, what often happens is that those who ought to help sit in judgment. They say, or at least they think, "That person must be out of the will of God, or this wouldn't have happened to her." Or a man loses his job and another Christian accuses him of failing to support his family, noting cruelly—he has a verse for the occasion—"If anyone does not provide for his relatives, and especially for his immediate family, he has denied the faith and is worse than an unbeliever" (1 Tim. 5:8). When a person has a serious car accident or falls or is struck with a serious disease, someone will say smugly, "God must be trying to get your attention."

What a terrible situation! Such "friends" speak like Job's counselors, and they do not even sit down and empathize with the struggling believer first, as those shallow but at least empathetic men did. Unfortunately, many Christians today lack empathy.

2. Variations in individual piety. A second area where Christians continue to judge one another is personal piety. Do you have a "quiet time" every morning? How long per day do you pray? Are you reading good Christian books? How often do you witness?

Don't get me wrong. I think a daily (or at least a regular) quiet time is important. It is essential that we pray, and none of us prays as much as would be profitable. I am constantly saying, "Turn off the television and read a worthwhile Christian book." We are commanded to witness. The problem is that we judge other Christians by whether they measure up to what we ourselves do, forgetting that we are probably not very good models in these areas ourselves, at least if we are to measure our performance by the saints of a past era, and that the other Christian may be excelling in areas with which we are not even familiar.

One very common form of this is the way a "spiritual" wife will judge a husband who does not read the Bible or Christian books as much as she does. He is not thinking about spiritual things all the time; he has his work to think about, and when he comes home he may be tired and perhaps only wants to watch the ball game on television. The wife, if she does not work outside the home and does not have her time entirely taken up with raising young children, has time to read and think. When her husband gets home she wants to talk about what she has been thinking about that day. If he doesn't, she thinks it is because he is not very spiritual or is "not right with

It may well be that the husband is not spiritual, of course. But whether he is or not, the attitude that judges him for what he is not doing and fails to appreciate him for what he is doing is wrong. And it is also wrong when the husband dismisses his wife and her concerns. In this case, it does not matter who is "weak" or who is "strong." What matters is that we accept the other Christian as a believer and trust God for what he is doing in that person's life.

Donald Grey Barnhouse told of being at a luncheon with a group of ministers where someone spoke disparagingly about the clergy in another denomination. They didn't seem to accomplish anything, he said. Barnhouse entered the conversation by telling about one of those ministers whom he had known personally. The man had gone through seminary and had been ordained. But he seldom preached, never went to prayer meetings, and often failed to attend church for weeks at a time. Worse than that, he spent all his time in his library and indulged in habits that others felt were intemperate and un-Christian. He lived this way for more than twenty years. The ministers concluded that a man like that was no credit to the ministry and perhaps was not even a Christian.

Later in the luncheon Barnhouse turned the conversation to the subject of Bible study helps and asked what the others thought was the best Bible concordance. They said that the best was Strong's Exhaustive Concordance, which contains Hebrew and Greek word lists and comparative helps. Barnhouse then pointed out that the minister he had described earlier, of whom they had all disapproved, was James Strong, the author of this invaluable volume.

The point was obvious. God has given his servants diverse talents, and he uses them in ways that please him. How we feel about them is irrelevant, since they answer to God rather than to us. Our part is to accept these others as fellow believers and support them and pray for their work.

3. Denominational affiliation. Church affiliations also often wrongly divide believers and produce judgmental attitudes. I am not saying that we have to consider other denominations to be right in their distinctives, any more than we have to consider other Christians as always right when they differ from us. But just as we are to accept other Christians as Christians, so must we accept other denominations as true elements of the one body of Christ—if they acknowledge him as Lord and confess the gospel as the one way of salvation.

4. Personality differences. What about personality differences? Does every Christian have to be grim like an undertaker, or always smiling like a stand-up comedian? Charles Spurgeon was the greatest preacher of his age, but he was frequently criticized for being funny. When one woman objected to the humor he inserted into his sermons Spurgeon told her, "Madam, you would think a great deal better of me if you knew the funny things I kept out."

Spurgeon was a character. A young man asked what he should do about a box of cigars he had been given. Spurgeon solved his problem. "Give them to me," he said, "and I will smoke them to the glory of God."

On another occasion Spurgeon was criticized for traveling to meetings in a first class railway carriage. His antagonist said, "Mr. Spurgeon, what are you doing up here? I am riding back there in the third class carriage taking care of the Lord's money." Spurgeon replied, "And I am up here in the first class carriage taking care of the Lord's servant."

Let's stop dumping on one another, and let's allow God to deal with each of his servants how, when, and as kindly as he will. And while we are at it, let's be thankful that he has dealt as kindly as he has with us. If he had not, we would all be in deep trouble.

What Does Paul Advise?

We are only at the beginning of this important section of Romans, of course. There is much more to come. But we should notice clearly even here that Paul has two initial points of advice. In fact, what he says is stronger than advice—these are commands, and the whole sentence is made up of them: "Accept him whose faith is weak" and "Do not pass judgment in disputable matters."

1. Accept him whose faith is weak. This means that we are to accept other Christians as Christians and that, as John Murray says, "There is to be no discrimination in respect of confidence, esteem, and affection."

Accept is a strong term, because it is used of God's acceptance of us in verse 3 and of Christ's acceptance of us in 15:7. Verse 3 says, "The man who does not eat everything must not condemn the man who does, for God has accepted him." The other verse says, "Accept one another, then, just as Christ accepted you." If God has accepted the other person, who are you not to accept him?

2. Do not pass judgment in disputable matters. Recognize that some standards of right conduct are unclear and that other matters really do not matter. In those areas, let the matter drop and get on with things that do matter. Above all, accept the other believer for what he or she has to offer to the whole body of Christ. And do your own part too! Tell someone about Jesus. Certainly you have better things to do than to hunt out the speck in the eye of your fellow Christian while overlooking the plank in your own.

Francis Schaeffer used to talk about "the chasm." He said that we put it in the wrong place, dividing ourselves from other Christians. It shouldn't be there. True, there is a chasm between those who know Jesus Christ and those who do not, between Christians and the world, and it is a deep one. But that is where it lies, between Christians and the world, not between Christians and Christians. All who know Jesus Christ are on this side of the chasm, and we must stand with them for Christ's kingdom.

Chapter 210.
Kosher Cooking and All That

Romans 14:2-4

Out in Arizona there is a great rift in the surface of the earth known as the Grand Canyon. On the map it appears only as a slightly shaded area that is not at all imposing. But if you are staying at a hotel on the north rim of the Grand Canyon and want to go to the south rim, you will discover that the only way you can get there is by driving over several hundred miles of hot desert roads.

I do not know if this is what Francis Schaeffer was thinking about when he spoke and wrote about "the chasm," as he often did. He was an American, but he lived in Switzerland and may have been thinking about some deep chasm in the Alps. But the particular chasm he had in mind is irrelevant. What this great contemporary apologist was thinking about was the way Christians place chasms between themselves and other people, and his concern was that we get our chasms in the right place.

At the end of the last study, I pointed out that Christians tend to place chasms between themselves and other Christians, either judging them not to be Christians at all because of some offensive detail of their conduct or else regarding them as Christians but as those with whom they should have no contact. That is wrong. It is what Paul is denouncing in Romans 14, where he begins by saying, "Accept him who is weak in the faith, without passing judgment on disputable matters" (v. 1).

There is a true chasm, of course, and it is a frightening one. It is between those who are Christians and those who are not, between those who have been made spiritually alive and those who remain spiritually dead. That chasm can only be bridged by God through the utterly supernatural and spiritual work of regeneration. The chasm is not to be placed between any who truly believe on Jesus Christ as their Savior.

Christians Are Not Clones

Christians have plenty of problems with the world. The world has a different master, pursues different goals, and lives according to a different set of rules. We are not part of it. But the worst problems we face are on this side of the chasm, between Christians who all confess Jesus Christ to be Lord and Savior but who look at some things differently.

Christians are not clones. God could have made us identical copies of one another, I suppose, though that would not have been very interesting. But he did not. He made us very different, and as a result we inevitably act differently and also think differently about the things we do. These variations put strains on us all, and the end result is that we have difficulty getting along. People in the world have problems too, of course. Don't think that it is nicer out there. It isn't. But the fact that unbelievers have trouble getting along with one another does not mean that Christians should be blind to the problems we ourselves have.

What do we do when we encounter Christians who behave differently from us? Paul highlights two wrong responses here.

First, those who consider themselves to be strong in faith frequently look down on or despise the weak—they sneer. On the other hand, the weak usually condemn the strong—they frown.

Using the example of different opinions about what a Christian should eat or not eat, Paul says, "The man who eats everything must not look down on him who does not, and the man who does not eat must not condemn the man who does" (v. 3).

The First of Paul's Examples: Diet

In the introductory study to this section, Romans 14:1-15:13, I pointed out that Paul is approaching this matter broadly because this is a broad, generic problem in the church. But the problem expresses itself in specifics, and for that reason he gives two examples of what he has in mind. The first is the matter of eating or not eating certain foods. The second is observing or not observing special days.

Let's examine the first example, about what we eat or do not eat. Paul introduces it by saying: "One man's faith allows him to eat everything, but another man, whose faith is weak, eats only vegetables" (v. 2). What is he thinking about here? There are several possibilities.

1. Keeping kosher. We have already seen that nothing we know about the Jewish community or practice in the first Christian century perfectly fits what Paul says, nor does anything we know about conditions or religious practices among the Gentiles. On the other hand, what we know about each is a legitimate example.

Let's take the Jewish community first. There is nothing in the Old Testament law that required Jews to be vegetarians, which is what Paul says the "weak" brothers were in his example, but the Jews did have dietary restrictions. In Leviticus 11, careful distinctions are made between "clean" and "unclean" animals. Jews were free to eat the first but not the second. In Leviticus 17, the people were told not to eat blood, which had to be properly drained even from edible meat before it could be eaten. For Jews who "keep kosher" today this means that specifically appointed rabbis must oversee the slaughtering of animals and place kosher labels on the meat. Again, Exodus 23:19 (also 34:26) is a verse that has become the basis for Jews keeping two sets of dishes, one to hold foods made with milk and the other for those without milk. The verse merely says, "Do not cook a young goat in its mother's milk."

Even though there is nothing in Romans 14 to indicate that this is specifically what Paul has in mind, it is significant, as the great Theological Dictionary of the New Testament edited by Gerhard Kittel points out, that the word Paul uses to describe the "weak" brother, astheneô, is often used for the word kosher in the Greek translation of the Old Testament. So it is highly likely that Jewish scruples about diet were at least one thing the apostle had in mind.

2. Gentile asceticism. Since Paul mentions vegetarianism, which the Jews as a whole did not practice, it is probably also right to suppose that he is thinking of certain kinds of Gentile asceticism, too, which we find in the writings of some of the Greek and Roman philosophers. At certain periods of ancient history life became so excessively indulgent that many of the pagans adopted a rigidly ascetic lifestyle, dressing in plain clothes, eating simple vegetables, and drinking only water.

In those days some people who thought like this would have become Christians, and it is easy to see how they might have carried their views over into Christianity as something of great importance to them. "After all," they might have said, "if I lived a simple lifestyle before I became a Christian, I am certainly not going to live a less pure life now." They had not learned that what they ate or did not eat was unimportant, and they would easily have become judges of their Christian brothers and sisters who lived like those whose lifestyle they were protesting even before they became believers.

3. The Corinthian problem. Finally, we can't overlook the fact that Paul was writing to Rome from Corinth, and he had faced one particular form of the eating problem there (see 1 Cor. 8:113 and 10:23-33).

In the pagan world of Paul's day the practice of religion consisted to a large extent of the offering of sacrifices at pagan temples. The animals were not just burnt up, of course, nor thrown away. Rather, after the offerings were made, the priests would present the carcasses for sale in the marketplaces, and as a result those who went to the market to buy meat would end up with meat from animals that had been sacrificed to the pagan idols. What was a Christian to do if he or she went to a friend's home and meat like this was served? Wouldn't eating it somehow defile the Christian or at least give legitimacy to pagan practices?

Paul answered that "an idol is nothing at all" and that a Christian should feel perfectly free to eat the meat For the sake of those whose consciences might be wounded by such eating, however, a Christian should be sensitive on this issue and not impose his freedom on his weaker brothers or sisters unnecessarily. In a manner exactly parallel to what he says a bit further on in Romans, Paul wrote, "Therefore, if what I eat causes my brother to fall into sin, I will never eat meat again, so that I will not cause him to fall" (1 Cor. 8:13).

What are we to do about matters of eating or drinking, or not eating or not drinking, or similar matters? The important thing about Romans is that Paul is not even dealing with this issue as one to be resolved, but rather with the attitude that either scorns or condemns the other Christian. That is the issue! Not the eating or not eating. In other words, what you eat or do not eat or drink or do not drink does not matter, so stop arguing about it, and stop letting it determine with whom you will associate or with whom you will work in Christ's service.

Jesus' Revolutionary Teaching

There is something else we need to think about before we turn to Paul's specific instructions or advice, and that is the teaching of Jesus Christ on this issue, which Paul certainly knew.

Jesus' ministry was conducted almost entirely within Israel within Jewish circles, and the matter of keeping kosher was of great importance to Judaism. Jesus was revolutionary in what he taught on this issue, however. He had been talking about the Pharisees, who had objected to the fact that Jesus' disciples often ate without washing their hands ceremonially according to their law, and he replied by attacking their legalism, which, he said, was exercised without their actually obeying God's commands. One example was the way they avoided taking care of their elderly parents, saying that the money they could have used for this purpose had been dedicated to God. "You nullify the word of God by your tradition that you have handed down. And you do many things like that" (Mark 7:13; cf. vv. 1-13).

"Many things?" they might have objected. "For instance..."

How about your laws regarding kosher? Jesus asked. "Nothing outside a man can make him 'unclean' by going into him. Rather, it is what comes out of a man that makes him 'unclean'" (Mark 7:15).

When the disciples looked puzzled and later asked him what he meant, Jesus elaborated. "Don't you see that nothing that enters a man from the outside can make him 'unclean'? For it doesn't go into his heart but into his stomach, and then out of his body." Mark adds significantly, "In saying this, Jesus declared all foods 'clean'" (Mark 7:18-19).

Jesus continued, "What comes out of a man is what makes him 'unclean.' For from within, out of men's hearts, come evil thoughts, sexual immorality, theft, murder, adultery, greed, malice, deceit, lewdness, envy, slander, arrogance and folly. All these evils come from inside and make a man 'unclean'" (Mark 7:20-23). In Matthew Jesus adds, "But eating with unwashed hands does not make him 'unclean'" (Matt. 15:20; cf. vv. 16-20).

Obviously, Jesus was not concerned with external matters but with issues of the heart. So if Jesus was not concerned with external matters, God also is not concerned about them and we should not be either. As I say, this was radical teaching in that day in view of the Jews' well-known and rigorously observed laws of purification.

God is not concerned with what you eat!

But there is something about which God is concerned, and that is what comes out of our hearts. That is what makes a man "unclean," said Jesus. If it is not what goes into a person's mouth that defiles the person but what comes out, then we should exercise even more care than the ancient Jews did to get, have, and keep a pure heart. Our hearts are not pure naturally. Jeremiah said, "The heart is deceitful above all things and beyond cure" (Jer. 17:9). But because "with God all things are possible" (Matt. 19:26), my heart and your heart can be changed. They can be changed by Jesus and by the power of the Holy Spirit. That is what we should be concerned about. If we had any idea how impure our own hearts were and were concerned about them, we would be far less inclined to scorn and judge other believers.

Points for the "Strong" Believer

How do we get over our natural but destructive tendency to scorn or judge believers who do not behave exactly like we do? In these verses Paul gives several truths from which to start.

1. The other Christian does not answer to you but to God. Paul teaches this when he asks the self-styled "strong" believer, "Who are you to judge someone else's servant" (v. 4).

Why is it so hard for us to realize this? We understand how this works in everyday life. If you run a business and have people reporting to you, you have a right to determine their work goals, hours, terms of compensation, and performance standards. Your employees are accountable to you. But people who work for your competitor, the business down the street, or your neighbor are not accountable to you. You may not like what they are doing. You may disapprove of their objectives or work. But what they do is none of your business.

It is exactly the same in Christianity. I do not mean by this that we should not have a mutual concern for one another. Jesus taught that we are our brother's keeper (read the story of the Good Samaritan), and if that is true of other people in general, it is certainly true of our brothers and sisters in Christ. We have to pray for them, help them, urge them on, and do everything possible to see that they do well and succeed as Christians. But this does not include scorning them or judging them if in Jesus' service they see things differently and act differently than you do. This is because they do not answer to you. They answer to Jesus. Therefore, leave it with him. And remember that Jesus cares about them and is more concerned that they live an upright, strong, and spiritually profitable life than you are.

2. God has already accepted the other Christian as he or she is. We know this by definition since a Christian is one who stands before God not on the basis of his or her own righteousness but because of the work of Jesus Christ. Since the other believer has been accepted and not rejected by Jesus, you should accept him or her too.

This does not mean that everything the other Christian does is right any more than everything you do is right. But it means that the Christian is accepted because of Christ's death on his or her behalf and the gift of Christ's righteousness to such a one by God. In other words, the basis of his or her acceptance is not works. If you are making the other person's acceptance (by you or, as your own conduct implies, by God) depend on what he or she is doing, you are operating on the basis of salvation by works and are denying the gospel.

You do not have to agree that everything the other person is doing is right, any more than he has to agree that everything you are doing is right. But it does mean that you have to accept the person as a believer with whom you must be in fellowship, because God has himself accepted him, just as he has accepted you. In the last study I pointed out that the same word that is used in verse 1, where we are told to "accept" him whose faith is weak, is used in verse 3 of God's acceptance of us and in 15:7 of Christ's acceptance of us. So it is because God has accepted us that we are to accept others. Moreover, since we are accepted by grace apart from our works, obviously we need to accept other believers on the same basis.

We have to remember that "it is by grace [we all] have been saved, through faith—and this not from yourselves, it is the gift of God—not by works, so that no one can boast" (Eph. 2:8-9).

3. The other Christian stands by the grace of God, just as you do. Let's remember that it is also by grace that we stand and function in the Christian life. Paul indicates this when he says, "To his own master he stands or falls. And he will stand, for the Lord is able to make him stand" (v. 4).

Some commentators take this matter of standing or falling as referring to the final judgment because the words are often used in that context, but this is not what is in view here. "Acceptance" does refer to the basis on which we stand before God or are justified. We are accepted because of Christ's death here, and we will be accepted exactly for that reason at the final judgment. But as far as standing or falling is concerned, this is in the context of the servant's relationship to his master and of the master's ability to bear him or her up. It is a promise that Jesus will be with his people, that he has useful and important work for them to do, and that he will see that they are kept upright to accomplish it.

If Jesus feels that the other believer needs to change something about how he is living in order to accomplish the work he has ordained for him to do, Jesus will see to the change. You can't bring it about by yourself anyway. But if in the meantime Jesus does not bother to change that conduct, then it does not matter to him and is not hurting what he has appointed the other one to do. As a matter of fact, it is possible that what you are so concerned about does not matter under any circumstances—simply because you and I tend to get hung up on things that do not matter while we overlook the things that do.

Remember that Jesus told the Pharisees, "Woe to you, teachers of the law and Pharisees, you hypocrites! You give a tenth of your spices—mint, dill and cummin. But you have neglected the more important matters of the law—justice, mercy and faithfulness. You should have practiced the latter, without neglecting the former" (Matt. 23:23). The Pharisees would have looked down on the common people, who perhaps failed to tithe rigorously. But they had no trouble breaking scores of their other laws in order to arrest, try, and dispose of Jesus Christ.

4. You too are accountable to God. Finally, we need to remember that it is not only the other Christian who is going to give an account to God, but you will have to do it too. In one place Jesus said that you will have to give an account even of every careless word you have spoken (Matt. 12:36).

If that is true, don't you think you have enough to be concerned about without trying to straighten out the other Christian? Of course, no one is always right in everything he or she does, but let Jesus worry about straightening the other Christian out, especially in those areas that probably don't really matter anyway. In the meantime, worry about your own accountability and determine that, regardless of the case of others, when you stand before the judgment seat of Jesus Christ you will hear him say of you, "Well done, good and faithful servant" (Matt. 25:21, 23).

Chapter 211.
Holy Days or Holy People?

Romans 14:5-6

It is sad to think about the things that have divided Christians. In the Middle Ages the Catholic and Eastern Orthodox branches of the church divided over the filioque clause in the Nicene Creed. The words mean "and the Son," and the point in dispute was whether the Holy Spirit proceeds from the Father alone or from both the first and second persons of the Trinity. At the time of the Reformation the Lutherans, Zwinglians, and Calvinists divided over how Christ was thought to be present in the Lord's Supper. Luther's followers insisted on the Roman Catholic view, that the communion bread and wine are transformed literally into the body and blood of Christ. "Hoc est corpus meum ('This is my body')," insisted Luther. The Zwinglians understood the Lord's Supper to be a remembrance service only. They emphasized, "Do this in remembrance of me" (Luke 22:19). Calvin spoke of a "real presence" of Jesus, but insisted that it was a spiritual and not a physical presence.

It is sad that these divisions took place, but at least these were over theological or biblical issues. The matters Paul mentions in Romans 14 are not even great theological issues: what kind of food should be eaten or whether Christians should set aside special days for their religious observances. Paul's point is that issues like these should never divide Christians, that differences of conviction here must be respected. Unfortunately, these matters do divide us, and those who disagree often look down on one another. Divisions over Days

We have already looked at the issue of eating meat or not, and we have seen that Paul says that which a Christian chooses doesn't matter.

His second example, in verses 5 and 6, is about observing special days as holy.

I pointed out in chapter 209 that this matter is also mentioned by Paul in Galatians 4:10-11 and in Colossians 2:16-17. In those verses he denounces special day observances: "You are observing special days and months and seasons and years! I fear for you, that somehow I have wasted my efforts on you" (Gal. 4:10-11), and "Therefore do not let anyone judge you by what you eat or drink, or with regard to a religious festival, a New Moon celebration or a Sabbath day. These are a shadow of the things that were to come; the reality, however, is found in Christ" (Col. 2:16-17).

It is different here in Romans. In Galatians and Colossians the people Paul is writing against wanted to mingle diet or celebrations of days with grace as a way of salvation, and that was "a different gospel—which is really no gospel at all" (Gal. 1:6-7). It had to be opposed. By contrast, the people Paul is thinking about in Romans 14 were not observing diet or days as a way to get to heaven but were doing it because they were convinced that it was necessary to obey or please God.

It is significant that Paul drops the terms "weak" and "strong" at this point. This suggests that the issue he is dealing with now is even less a part of a mature understanding of the gospel than eating meat or being a vegetarian. For now it is not even a question of weakness or strength, but only different ideas of what will please God.

Yet, it is still a contemporary and divisive issue. Even today it produces divisions and distrust. In our day the focus is mostly on what day of the week Christians should worship God and how they should keep that day. There are three main views.

1. Saturday or Sabbath worship. Some Christians hold that we should worship on Saturday since this is the biblical day, according to their view. This is the position of the Seventh-Day Adventists, for example, and of some others.

2. Sunday worship but as the Sabbath. The second position is that Christians are to worship on Sunday but that Sunday should be the equivalent of the Old Testament Sabbath, meaning that Christians are to observe it as the Jews observed Saturday. The Westminster Confession of Faith takes this view, calling the Lord's Day "the Christian Sabbath." It says that "this Sabbath is then kept holy unto the Lord, when men, after a due preparing of their hearts, and ordering of their common affairs beforehand, do not only observe an holy rest all the day from their own works, words, and thoughts, about their worldly enjoyments and recreations; but also are taken up the whole time in the public and private exercises of his worship, and in the duties of necessity and mercy" (Chapter XXI, Sections 7, 8).

This was the view of the English and American Puritans. It is held by many in the Reformed churches today.

3. Sunday worship as a new "Lord's Day." This view holds that the Sabbath has been abolished by the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ and that a new day, the Lord's Day, which has its own characteristics, has replaced it. This was the view of John Calvin, who said that "the day sacred to the Jews was set aside" and that "another was appointed" for it. This is my position also.

Differences on this matter are divisive in some cases. The most serious conflicts within my denomination, the conservative Presbyterian Church in America, are between those who insist on a strict adherence to the Westminster Standards, with its "Sabbatarian" view, and others who hold to the Standards more loosely, at least at this point, and agree instead with Calvin that Sunday has replaced the Sabbath. In our denomination there are people who would like to get pastors like me excluded, because we think this is a nonessential matter on which the Westminster Confession of Faith simply has gone beyond what ought to be required of anyone.

The Sabbatarian Position

What should we think of this disagreement? Let's take the Sabbatarian position, first of all. In the Presbyterian church, the strength of this position is not in the fact that it is found in the Westminster Confession of Faith, though some use that as a club to try to force other people to adopt their position, but rather that it is found in the Bible, in fact, in the Ten Commandments. If it is found in the Ten Commandments, it must be binding on us just as the other commandments are, these people argue.

The fourth commandment says, "Remember the Sabbath day by keeping it holy. Six days you shall labor and do all your work, but the seventh day is a Sabbath to the LORD your God. On it you shall not do any work, neither you, nor your son or daughter, not your manservant or maidservant, nor your animals, nor the alien within your gates. For in six days the LORD made the heavens and the earth, the sea, and all that is in them, but he rested on the seventh day. Therefore the LORD blessed the Sabbath day and made it holy" (Exod. 20:8-11). The reasoning is that if God has set the seventh day apart as something holy and has given instructions as to how it should be observed, then we must observe it.

There are some good arguments against this view, of course, which I have developed elsewhere. I have argued that the Sabbath was a uniquely Jewish institution, that there is no evidence that it was ever observed by any other ancient race or nation, and that it was observed for the first time by Israel only after the people had received the law at Sinai. It is true that Genesis 2:2-3 says that on the seventh day God "rested from all his work" and that he therefore "blessed the seventh day and made it holy," but it doesn't say he did it then. And there is no indication that Adam and Eve, Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, or any of the patriarchs observed or even knew about the Sabbath.

In fact, we read in Nehemiah, "You came down on Mount Sinai; you spoke to them from heaven. You gave them regulations and laws that are just and right, and decrees and commands that are good. You made known to them your holy Sabbath" (Neh. 9:13-14). This implies that the Sabbath was not known to Israel before Sinai but was part of the special arrangements God made with Israel then for the ordering of the life of that unique nation.

Similarly, Exodus 31:13 calls the Sabbath "a sign between me and you for the generations to come, so you may know that I am the LORD, who makes you holy." And later, "It will be a sign between me and the Israelites forever" (v. 17). This portrays the Sabbath as something established between God and Israel only.

It's important to remember that an emphasis on Sabbath-keeping leads easily to harmful legalism. It clearly did among the Jews. In fact, this was the first (and later proved to be the ultimately fatal) point of contention between the Jewish leaders and Jesus Christ. Neither he nor his disciples held to the leaders' strict ideas of how the Sabbath should be observed, and when Jesus was challenged at the point of his "unorthodox" behavior, he replied by telling these legalists, "The Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath. So the Son of Man is Lord even of the Sabbath" (Mark 2:27). In saying this, he pointed to the limited value of the seventh day, even as they observed it, and at the same time asserted his right to amend its observance or even abolish it or replace it if he wished.

The Pharisees didn't agree with him on this. In fact, they hated him for striking at something that was especially dear to them, and as a result they plotted to kill him. Mark tells us that it was on the basis of this issue and after he had healed a man on the Sabbath that the Pharisees first "began to plot with the Herodians how they might kill Jesus" (Mark 3:6). Even today, people who insist on a strict Sabbath tend to be legalistic in other matters also.

Sunday as a New "Lord's Day"

What about the alternate view, then, that Sunday is a new day of Christian worship and that it has characteristics different from the Sabbath? This is my view, and I have what I believe are good reasons for it. For example, although the word sabbath is found nine times in Acts, not once is it said to have been a day observed by Christians. Acts 1:12 uses the phrase "a Sabbath day's walk [journey]." In chapter 13 the word occurs four times in describing how Paul used the Sabbath for his evangelistic ends, going into the synagogues to preach to Jews who were assembled there (vv. 14, 27, 42, 44). Similar references occur in chapters 15 (v. 21), 17 (v. 2), and 18 (v. 4). Nowhere is it said that the church met on the Sabbath or that Christians even thought of their own day, Sunday, as being like or continuing the Sabbath.

Nor did they observe Sunday as the Jews observed Saturday. The Jews abstained from all work. But to judge from the early records, the Christians used Sunday as a day of vigorous spiritual activity and observed it not with long faces but with thanksgiving and joy.

Although the danger of the Sabbatarian position is that it leads to legalism, observing the Lord's Day freely can lead to libertinism—that is, to a complete disregard of the day so that, although Christians are not bound to any special form of activity, many do nothing. They even fail to go to church or go only in a perfunctory way, to get the "duty" over with quickly so they can spend the rest of the day on worldly activities.

Let me say that I do not believe you are "breaking the Sabbath" by eating out on Sunday, playing ball with your children, going to a football game, or even going to a movie. But surely we are missing the boat if Sunday is not a day of spiritual refreshment, an evangelistic opportunity, hours of genuine worship, and a time of joy for us.

Three Guidelines from Romans

Having given both the pros and cons of these two main views—I have overlooked Saturday worship as a minority view that does not affect very many of today's Christians—let me say here that, just as in the case of whether Christians are free to eat meat or should be vegetarians, the important point of Romans 14 is that Paul does not take sides on the issue. He does not rule on the Sabbath question.

So I am not going to insist on my view either. I have friends who think differently. In fact, one of my best friends, a pastor, observes Sunday by eliminating all worldly activities, spending the time after services either in visiting his people and the sick, or in Bible study, prayer, or other reading. How could I possibly suggest that the way he keeps the "Sabbath" is wrong? It isn't. He is serving the Lord by what he does. At the same time, he does not look down on those who, like me, are engaged in so many "Sabbath" activities that we can hardly think of resting until sometime on Monday.

What Paul does give are three helpful guidelines in this area.

1. Each must be convinced in his or her own mind. Notice that verse 5 does not say, "Let everyone do what he or she feels is right, because, after all, the person is convinced in his or her own mind." He does not say the person involved is convinced and therefore should not be challenged, but rather that he should be convinced. This means that Paul is willing to treat each believer as a responsible, thinking person, not merely one to be led about docilely by a selfstyled "stronger" believer. Therefore, we have a responsibility, each one of us, to search out these matters for ourselves.

The words "in his own mind" are important too. For we remember that this last section of Romans began with an emphasis on the mind, saying that a Christian is not to be conformed "any longer to the pattern of this world" but to be transformed by mind renewal (Rom. 12:2).

There is no escaping our individual responsibility. It is not enough to say, "Well, I grew up in a church where no one paid any special attention to Sunday," or "My pastor is a strict Sabbatarian, so I suppose I should be also," or "Since it doesn't really matter, I just won't think about it; I'll drift along." Paul is not condemning anyone, but the reason he is not saying that either position is wrong is that he considers Christians to be responsible, thinking individuals who should be working through each of these matters for themselves. If we are really doing this, perhaps we will even come to a new sense of agreement or at least cooperation on these matters.

2. It is possible to serve the Lord either way. This must be a major emphasis of Paul's, because he repeats the idea three times in verse 6 alone: "He who regards one day as special, does so to the Lord. He who eats meat, eats to the Lord, for he gives thanks to God; and he who abstains, does so to the Lord and gives thanks to God."

In this verse Paul brings the two examples of diet and the keeping of days together and says that it is possible to serve the Lord either way in either area. The person who is a vegetarian for religious reasons is (or should be) so because he believes that this is a testimony to God. He does not want to eat meat that has been offered to idols, for instance, or perhaps because he considers life, even the life of animals, to be sacred. On the other hand, the person who eats anything receives his more abundant meals as having come from God and he rejoices that religion does not really consist in eating or not eating. He knows, as Paul says just a few verses further on in chapter 14, "The kingdom of God is not a matter of eating and drinking, but of righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Spirit" (v. 17).

And what about the observance of special days? The one who stops all worldly activity on Sunday does so in order to serve the Lord, in his case by worship, study, and acts of mercy. The one who is free to do anything should do what he or she does in order to serve God too.

The critical question is this: Are you really serving God by what you do? Does Sunday really count for you in your Christian life and walk? Are you using it well? Do you benefit from it? And for that matter, how about the other days of the week? Are you serving God in those days too, as you should? If you are in a job where you cannot serve God, should you get out of it? It is probably the case that you should simply learn to do whatever you are doing for God's glory. Are you doing that? It is important that you answer these questions. You are not called to be a robot. You are to be a significant, thinking Christian.

3. The diagnostic question: Can you be thankful? Paul mentions the matter of serving the Lord three times in verse 6, but he also speaks of giving "thanks to God" twice. He mentions it in connection with eating either meat or vegetables because we naturally and rightly give thanks at mealtimes. But it should also be true of anything we do or do not feel led to do, including how we conduct ourselves on Sunday. This third guideline cuts two ways.

First, if the other Christian is giving thanks to God for his food or for the line of work or conduct into which he has been led, then his thanks to God should be proof to you that he is doing it "unto the Lord." This takes us back to verse 4: "Who are you to judge someone else's servant? To his own master he stands or falls. And he will stand, for the Lord is able to make him stand." If he is serving the Lord, then you should keep out of his way and allow God to work through the other believer as he sees fit.

Second, the principle of giving thanks is a great help for discerning what we ourselves should do in doubtful situations. What may I do in such and such a situation where the Bible is not explicit or at least where I do not understand how it is explicit? One very good answer is this: Can you enjoy it in the Lord and give thanks for it? The Swiss commentator F. Godet asks, "May I allow myself this or that pleasure? Yes, if I can enjoy it to the Lord, and while giving him thanks for it; no, if I cannot receive it as a gift from his hand, and bless him for it. This mode of solution respects at once the rights of the Lord and those of individual liberty."

And while I am at it, let me say that even the Jewish Sabbath, for all its tendency toward legalism, was meant to be a time of thanksgiving and joy for Israel. Here is how Isaiah writes about it in chapter 58:

> If you keep your feet from breaking the Sabbath and from doing as you please on my holy day, if you call the Sabbath a delight and the LORD'S holy day honorable, and if you honor it by not going your own way and not doing as you please or speaking idle words, then you will find your joy in the LORD, and I will cause you to ride on the heights of the land and to feast on the inheritance of your father Jacob.

Isaiah 58:13-14

I do not see how any child of God could desire more from God than that.

Chapter 212.
God, Other People, and Ourselves

Romans 14:7-9

There are not many people who have studied seventeenth-century English prose literature even if they were English majors in college. But I had a good college course on it and found the prose of that time to be a treasure.

That was the century of John Donne, best known for his "Songs and Sonnets." But Donne became a preacher and also wrote great sermons as well as other prose literature. Among his prose writings are some "Meditations" he composed while confined to bed recovering from a serious illness. At one point he heard a church bell ringing the death toll of some other person, and he reasoned that it is never merely for other people the bell rings. Since each of us is mortal, it rings for us. Donne wrote, "No man is an island, entire of itself; every man is a piece of the continent, a part of the maine; if a clod be washed away by the sea, Europe is the less, as well as if a promontory were, as well as if a manor of thy friends, or of thine own were; any man's death diminishes me, because I am involved in mankind. And therefore never send to know for whom the bell tolls; it tolls for thee."

Those last words are well known. They are the source of the title of one of Ernest Hemingway's best known novels, for example. But they come to mind now not because of Hemingway, but because of Paul's teaching in Romans 14:7-8: "For none of us lives to himself alone and none of us dies to himself alone. If we live, we live to the Lord; and if we die, we die to the Lord. So, whether we live or die, we belong to the Lord."

The Believer and Other People

In this passage the apostle is reflecting not so much on a Christian's relationship to other people—being a part of the much greater community of mankind or of the body of believers—as John Donne did, but rather on each Christian's relationship to God. That is, he is saying not that we belong to one another but that we belong to Jesus. Most commentators point this out.

Yet it is also true that we belong to one another, Christians to other Christians, and this is also appropriate to the context of Romans 14. That those who belong to Christ also belong to one another is a natural extension of what Paul has been saying in verses 1-6, for he said there that Christians are to respect the convictions and spiritual experience of others, meaning that they are not to harm them. Moreover, the fact that we belong to one another is also connected to what follows, for beginning with verse 13 Paul says that for the sake of other believers we ought to abstain from some things we consider permissible.

What you do affects others. Therefore you are not acting in isolation when you either live for Christ or fail to live for him.

This is said many times in the Bible, including numerous occasions in Paul's writings. But one passage that says it exceptionally well is 1 Corinthians 12:12-26, where Paul compares the church to a human body:

The body is a unit, though it is made up of many parts; and though all its parts are many, they form one body. So it is with Christ. For we were all baptized by one Spirit into one body— whether Jews or Greeks, slave or free—and we were all given the one Spirit to drink.

... If the foot should say, "Because I am not a hand, I do not belong to the body," it would not for that reason cease to be a part of the body. And if the ear should say, "Because I am not an eye, I do not belong to the body," it would not for that reason cease to be part of the body....

The eye cannot say to the hand, "I don't need you!" And the head cannot say to the feet, "I don't need you!" On the contrary, those parts of the body that seem to be weaker are indispensable, and the parts that we think are less honorable we treat with special honor.... But God has combined the members of the body and has given greater honor to the parts that lacked it, so that there should be no division in the body, but that its parts should have equal concern for each other. If one part suffers, every part suffers with it; if one part is honored, every part rejoices with it.

Now you are the body of Christ, and each one of you is a part of it.

It might go far to establish us in godliness and cause us to live for Christ wholeheartedly if we really understood that in one way or another everything we do, whether for good or ill, always affects other Christians, usually beginning with those who are closest to us.

The Believer and God

Yet the world can say much of this quite apart from the biblical revelation. It is commonplace today to talk about living in a global village so that what we do in America in terms of our economics or morals or politics affects, for example, what happens to people in Japan or Brazil or Eastern Europe. If we raise tariffs on imports from South America so that the sales of certain products are reduced and American products are protected, we hurt the livelihood of poor people there. If we make morally degenerative movies and export them to the world, as we are doing, the harmful moral climate of America damages countless other people.

What is profound in Paul's teaching is that none of us is isolated from God with the result that what we do in terms of that vertical relationship deeply affects how we either help or harm other people.

Notice the threefold repetition of the words "to the Lord" in verse 8. "If we live, we live to the Lord; and if we die, we die to the Lord. So, whether we live or die, we belong to the Lord." The point is that we are to be in a right relationship to the Lord and serve the Lord in everything — indeed, everything we do is related to God in one way or another, either good or bad and whether or not we realize it—so that we do not hurt other people.

Not long ago I heard an illustration of this principle that showed how those who are not Christians sometimes understand this better than some believers. The first king to unite the warring tribes of the great Arabian peninsula was King 'Abd al-'Aziz. He ruled in the earlier years of this century and died in 1951. In the late 1930s and early 1940s American oil companies were starting to develop the great Arabian oil fields, and this meant that many foreigners, particularly Americans, were beginning to move into this strongly Islamic country. Some of them were Christians, and early in this development a number of expatriates approached the Saudi king to ask if they could establish churches in Arabia. He said he would think about it, telling them to come back in several weeks for his answer.

About a week later, another group of oil company employees came to the king to ask if they could have alcohol in the company camps. Alcohol is forbidden to Moslems. The king replied by a question. He asked the Americans, "If you could have either churches or alcohol, which of the two would you choose?"

This became an important issue for the company, and the answer was debated carefully. At last the Americans returned and said they would prefer to have the alcohol. King 'Abd al-'Aziz replied, "If you had said churches, I would have given you permission to have both. But since you chose alcohol, you can have neither." In his own way, this wise Moslem ruler understood that if people are right with God, they can be expected to order life in a responsible way not only for themselves but also for other people. But if, on the contrary, they will not submit to God, they cannot be trusted to care for one another.

Living for God

Our text tells us that believers in Christ do not live to themselves but "to the Lord" and that they die "to the Lord" too. What does this mean? Let's start with the purpose of our being here on earth.

The best known Christian answer to our purpose here is the one found in the first response of the Westminster Shorter Catechism. The catechism asks, "What is the chief end of man?" It answers, "Man's chief end is to glorify God and to enjoy him forever." The catechism teaches that our chief purpose in life is not our own self-fulfillment or the achievement of a sense of self-worth or even helping others, important as that may be, but the glory of God. That is, God must always come first in everything, for he is first. He is the first and greatest of all realities. As Paul wrote in the great doxology that ends Romans 11, "For from him and through him and to him are all things. To him be the glory forever! Amen" (v. 36). Therefore, in the most literal sense, each of us is to live "to the Lord."

But strikingly and brilliantly, the catechism also adds the words "and to enjoy him forever," thereby indicating that this living to God or pursuit of God's glory is not a painful, self-denying, grim, or grievous thing, but rather a joy and delight for those who do it.

I have been greatly blessed in this respect by some reading I have been doing recently in the writings of John Piper, the pastor of Bethlehem Baptist Church in Minneapolis. Piper is insistent that the glory of God is the end of life and indeed of all creation. But he also insists that we are to enjoy God and even that the way in which we best glorify God is by enjoying him. In a book titled The Supremacy of God in Preaching Piper writes:

God's deepest purpose for the world is to fill it with reverberations of his glory in the lives of a new humanity, ransomed from every people, tribe, tongue, and nation (Rev. 5:9). But the glory of God does not reflect brightly in the hearts of men and women when they cower unwillingly in submission to his authority or when they obey in servile fear or when there is no gladness in response to the glory of their king.

... When God sends his emissaries to declare, "Your God reigns!" his aim is not to constrain man's submission by an act of raw authority; his aim is to ravish our affections with irresistible displays of glory. The only submission that fully reflects the worth and glory of the King is glad submission. Begrudging submission berates the King. No gladness in the subject, no glory to the King.

No one of the world's people has any idea what this means, of course. On the contrary, the world is determined instead to suppress all true knowledge of God and live for self (Rom. 1:18-32). This way of living leads downhill so that we begin to act like beasts. And we not only do what the animals do, being beastlike in our behavior, we do things the animals would not do. The only way we ever learn to live uprightly and actually experience the power to live uprightly is when we live our lives to the Lord.

R. C. Sproul, the founder and president of Ligonier Ministries, has adopted the Latin phrase coram deo as the title of a column in his monthly publication Table Talk. It means "before God" or "before the face of God" or "in the light of God's all-seeing presence." That is the idea we are dealing with here. Only the Christian can and does live coram deo. In fact, he or she must live for God, for this is one thing being a Christian truly means. The non-Christian does not live coram deo. On the contrary, it can be said of him that his chief end is to glorify himself and to enjoy himself forever.

There is one more matter here. This way of living, that is, living "to the Lord," will enable us to take whatever comes into our lives as from the Lord and enable us to live each moment for him. John Calvin saw the importance of this and wrote about it in his treatment of our text:

God claims such power over life and death that every individual is to bear his own condition in life as a yoke laid on him by God. It is just that God should assign to every man his station and course in life. In this way we are not only forbidden to attempt to do anything hastily without a command from God, but we are also commanded to be patient in all trouble and loss. If, therefore, the flesh at any time shrinks from adversity, let us remember that a man who is not free and master of himself perverts law and order if he does not depend on the will of his Lord.

Calvin knew that if we live "to the Lord," we will be able to receive everything "from the Lord" joyfully and with thanksgiving.

Dying to God

Verse 8 also says that if we are believers in Christ, we also "die to the Lord." The phrase embraces two things.

1. The manner of our deaths. One thing "dying to the Lord" means is that the way in which we are called to die is from God and therefore we can trust the manner of our deaths to him. Not long ago I was with a man who was two weeks from retirement. He was thinking about what was going to happen to him in the future, and he talked about dying. "The desirable thing is to die all at once and not in pieces," he said. I suppose that is right. It is desirable. I have always said that I would prefer to die in a plane crash. But death does not always come all at one time. Sometimes it does come in pieces, and it usually does if we live long enough. Our eyesight fails, then our hearing. Our memories begin to fade. Parts of our body break down—our hearts, kidneys, lungs. Our muscles weaken. In our day, with our advances in medicine, it is possible to be kept alive for ten or twenty years even though we may be little more than a noncommunicating invalid, completely confined to a wheelchair, or even worse.

How are we to think about such things as Christians? The answer, if we believe God to be sovereign in our deaths as well as over our lives, is that we can receive all these circumstances as being from him and can serve and love him in whatever conditions we are. The world cannot even think of doing this, but Christians can. Believers can do all things to God's glory.

2. The timing of our deaths. The second way in which we can "die to the Lord" concerns the timing of our deaths. Sometimes Christians live out full and useful lives and die in mature old age. At other times Christians die in the midst of life, often leaving a wife, husband, or children behind. Sometimes they die young. Sometimes Christians even die as children. How are we to think about this? Are we to consider the death of the young believer a tragedy? Is it a cosmic mistake? We can never think this way if we believe in God's sovereignty! If God is truly sovereign, he must be as sovereign over the timing of our deaths as the manner of them and as over life itself.

Speaking of our text, Calvin said, "Thus too we are taught the rule by which to live and die, so that if he [God] lengthens out life in the midst of continual sorrow and weariness, we are not to seek to depart before our time. But if he should suddenly recall us in the prime of our life, we must always be ready for our departure."

Jesus, the Lord of All

The last phrase of verse 8 and the whole of verse 9 are written to strengthen our belief in God's sovereignty, for they tell us that if we are Christians, "we belong to the Lord" and that it was to make this possible that Jesus "died and returned to life," that is, rose again.

There is a sense in which Jesus is and has always been the Lord of all things. For Jesus is God, and lordship actually means God's sovereignty. There is nothing in all creation nor anything that has ever happened in all the history of the earth or universe over which Jesus has not been Lord. Yet Paul is writing here about Jesus' special lordship over his own saved people, and he is saying that he has become their Lord by dying for them and then rising again. By his death he achieved their deliverance from sin's dread penalty and power, and by his resurrection he has established an ongoing relationship with them by which he guides, protects, and saves them day by day until they come at last to be with him in heaven.

The Sadducees tried to trap Jesus with a question about the resurrection. They were the liberals of their day, and they thought belief in a physical resurrection was foolish. Jesus told them they had erred for two reasons. First, they did not know the Bible, which taught that there is a resurrection. And second, they did not know the power of God that makes resurrections and any other supposedly impossible thing possible. The Scripture he quoted was Exodus 3:6, where God declares, "I am the God of your father, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob." Because the verb "I am" is in the present tense, not the past, Jesus concluded that Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob must still be alive, since God "is not the God of the dead but of the living" (Matt. 22:29).

That is exactly what we have in Romans 14, except that now the chapter is talking about the second person of the Trinity rather than the first. It tells us that Jesus is "Lord of both the dead and the living" (v. 9). In other words, those who are his belong to him now and will still belong to him in the future, beyond death. They will belong to him forever.

Something very important happened to me between the preaching of the sermon that appears as the previous chapter and the preparation of this study. It was the death of my father. He had been failing for some time, particularly in his mind. But his death nevertheless came suddenly, and within a few days my mother, sisters, and I had arranged for a double funeral—one in Hamilton, Massachusetts, where my parents had been living, and a second one in Philadelphia, where my father was to be buried. Everyone came—my mother, my parents' children, their children, and their children's children, four generations in all. When we were all together there were four pews of descendants from this one marriage, every one of them professing to believe on Jesus Christ as his or her Savior.

One of my associates conducted the funeral; but I was also to speak, and I was mulling over of what I might say when my mind ran ahead to these verses: "For none of us lives to himself alone and none of us dies to himself alone. If we live, we live to the Lord; and if we die, we die to the Lord. So, whether we live or die, we belong to the Lord. For this very reason, Christ died and returned to life so that he might be the Lord of both the dead and the living."

When I thought of them it seemed to me that this was exactly what needed to be said. For this is the sole but nevertheless extraordinary comfort for all who know Jesus Christ in this life. If we live, we live to the Lord. If we die, we die to the Lord. So whether we live or die, whichever it is, we are the Lord's. Do you know any comfort equal to that? I don't. Our sole comfort is that we belong to Jesus Christ. But because of who he is, that is also a great and all-sufficient comfort. Because we know Jesus to be a wise and utterly sovereign God, we can trust him with whatever comes into our lives and with the manner and timing of our deaths, too. Do you trust him? You can. I commend him to you as a trustworthy Savior.

Chapter 213.
Answerable to God

Romans 14:10-12

In the fourteenth chapter of Romans Paul has been explaining why Christians must not be judgmental where the conduct of other believers is concerned, and one of the reasons he has given is that none of us exists in isolation. We belong to each other and need each other. Moreover, being Christians, we belong to God. So we must not spend our time putting the other Christian down but rather we must accept as brothers and sisters those who are also trying to serve the Lord as best they know how and try earnestly to build up those other persons.

Paul argued that "none of us lives to himself alone and none of us dies to himself alone" (Rom. 14:7). In the last study I cited John Donne's

"No Man Is an Island" to make that point.

But there is one situation in which a man or woman is isolated, and that is when he or she stands before the judgment seat of God, as we each must do. On that day there will be no pleading someone else's responsibility for what we have done or blaming another person for our faults or taking another's credit for our own. As Paul writes to the Corinthians, "We must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ, that each one may receive what is due him for the things done while in the body, whether good or bad" (2 Cor. 5:10). If nothing else is able to get us thinking about our conduct rather than someone else's, it should be this extremely serious, awesome, and inescapable moment of personal accountability.

Christians Must Give an Accounting

Our text is referring to Christians when it says, "For we will all stand before God's judgment seat" (v. 10). It is true that unbelievers will also be judged at the final judgment, but that is not what Paul is writing about here. In this chapter he is reminding his readers that Christians will also be judged, since all must appear before God and give an accounting.

I am sure this does not seem right to many Christians, because they understand rightly that because they have trusted Jesus Christ as their Savior they have passed from a state of being under judgment or condemnation to one of being justified before God. Even more, they remember how Jesus said, "Whoever hears my word and believes him who sent me has eternal life and will not be condemned [the King James Version said, 'shall not come into condemnation']; he has crossed over from death to life" (John 5:24). If that is true, how can a Christian possibly be judged? Or to think about Paul's words in Romans 14, how can the apostle say, speaking specifically of Christians, "We will all stand before God's judgment seat"?

The answer, of course, is that there are various judgments spoken of in the Bible and that the word judge is used in various ways.

Whenever we speak of the judgments mentioned in the Bible we are moving into the area of Bible prophecy, and this is an area in which Christians have very different views. (It is another area in which we need to be unusually understanding and accepting of one another.) However, as I read the Bible it seems to me that at least seven different judgments are mentioned: (1) a judgment of believers at the judgment seat of Christ (Rom. 14:10-12; 1 Cor. 3:11-15; 2 Cor. 5:10); (2) a series of judgments on the earth (Rev. 6-11, 15-16); (3) a judgment of the beast and the false prophet, at which time the devil will be imprisoned (Rev. 19:20; 20:1-3); (4) a judgment of the Gentile nations (Ps. 2); (5) a judgment of Israel (Ezek. 20:32-38); (6) the final judgment of Satan (Rev. 20:1-10); and (7) the final judgment of unbelievers at the Great White Throne (Rev. 20:11-15).

All these judgments except the first are judicial judgments: They involve God's punishments of individuals or nations for those peoples' specific sins. The punishments involve spiritual or eternal death and hell suffering. The first of these judgments stands apart from the rest, because it is a judgment of believers, which means that it is not for sin and does not involve spiritual death or suffering. Nevertheless, it is still a real judgment in which the followers of Christ are to give an accounting for what they have done in this life and are either rewarded or disapproved by God on that basis.

It helps to get a picture of what this involves by realizing that the phrases in Romans 14:10 rendered "God's judgment seat" and in 2 Corinthians 5:10 rendered "the judgment seat of Christ" each contain the Greek word bêma, which refers not to the judge's seat in a court of law but to the bench upon which the referees or judges sat at an athletic contest. It was the place from which those who did well in the contest and triumphed were rewarded with a laurel wreath and from which those who broke the rules were disqualified or disapproved.

This was a well-known concept for the ancient Greeks and Romans, and Paul drew on it more than once in his writings. Thus, although Romans 14:10 and 2 Corinthians 5:10 are the only two verses in which the word bêma actually is used, we find Paul alluding to this idea elsewhere as well:

1. 1 Corinthians 9:25-27. "Everyone who competes in the games goes into strict training. They do it to get a crown that will not last; but we do it to get a crown that will last forever. Therefore I do not run like a man running aimlessly; I do not fight like a man beating the air. No, I beat my body and make it my slave so that after I have preached to others, I myself will not be disqualified for the prize."
2. Philippians 3:12-14. "I press on to take hold of that for which Christ Jesus took hold of me. Brothers, I do not consider myself yet to have taken hold of it. But one thing I do: Forgetting what is behind and straining toward what is ahead, I press on toward the goal to win the prize for which God has called me heavenward in Christ Jesus."
3. 2 Timothy 4:7-8. "I have fought the good fight, I have finished the race, I have kept the faith. Now there is in store for me the crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, will award to me on that day—and not only to me, but also to all who have longed for his appearing."

The man who wrote Romans 8:38-39 ("For I am convinced that neither death nor life, neither angels nor demons, neither the present nor the future, nor any powers, neither height nor depth, nor anything else in all creation, will be able to separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus our Lord") is not worrying about his eternal salvation. He is not afraid that he may be sent to hell. But he is aware that he is going to have to give an account to God of every word he has spoken and everything he has done. And he is taking that moment of personal accountability very, very seriously.

You Must Give an Accounting

We can see how seriously he takes this by the way he writes about it in Romans 14:10-12. Notice three things. First, he emphasizes the word you by putting it in an emphatic position and repeating it twice. This is more obvious in the Greek text than in the English translations, but the New International Version tries to capture the idea by asking in verse 10, "You, then, why do you judge your brother?" Paul is referring both to the one whom he called weak earlier and to the one he called strong. That is, he is writing to you, whoever you may be.

Second, Paul brings in a quotation from the Old Testament, which he often does when he comes to the end of an argument:

It is written:

> "'As surely as I live,' says the Lord,
> 'Every knee will bow before me; every tongue will confess to God.'"

This quotation is taken somewhat loosely from Isaiah 49:23 (see Isa. 49:18), and it is a solemn reminder of how God has said that every person who has ever lived will appear before him for judgment. So we must not think that just because we are Christians, somehow we are going to get off without an accounting.

Third, Paul repeats his point in different words but with emphasis in verse 12: "So then, each of us will give an account of himself to God." This includes you and me.

Accountable for All Things

But for what will we be held accountable? This is a serious and very practical matter, so let's look at some of the verses that tell exactly what we are accountable for.

1. We are accountable for every word we have spoken. There are many verses in the Bible that tell us this. For example, Jesus spoke about how words come from the heart, a good heart producing good words and a bad heart producing bad words. He said, "I tell you that men will have to give account on the day of judgment for every careless word they have spoken. For by your words you will be acquitted, and by your words you will be condemned" (Matt. 12:36-37). In the letter to the Ephesians Paul wrote, "Do not let any unwholesome talk come out of your mouths, but only what is helpful for building others up according to their needs" (Eph. 4:29) and "Nor should there be obscenity, foolish talk or coarse joking, which are out of place, but rather thanksgiving" (Eph. 5:4).

This does not mean that a Christian can never laugh or tell jokes. We do not have to be serious all the time. But it does mean that there should be a certain gravity about us as befits those who are aware of the gospel of the grace of God and of the fact that many are perishing because they will not turn from their sins and believe on Jesus Christ. And even if we laugh and tell jokes, which we will at times, we will not be telling dirty jokes. On the contrary, we will try to edify others even by our humor.

We will pay attention to the words we hear and read too. Donald Grey Barnhouse had some useful thoughts on this in his study of Romans:

I think it is fair and logical to conclude that if the believer must account for every careless word, this applies not only to what he says, but to what he allows himself to hear and read. If you spend several hours a week watching television, you can be almost certain that the thing has mastery over you; but if you watch it only occasionally and in order to relax after a long period of work or study, that is a different matter. I know people who are better acquainted with the comic strips than they are with the Bible. They say that they are too busy for Bible study, but they have at least fifteen minutes a day for the comics and another fifteen to listen to news broadcasts. I read some magazines from back to front, just to laugh at the cartoons, and throw them down without reading any of their articles or stories. However, I am not your judge, and you may not be mine. We are each answerable to the Lord.

There is a positive side to this, however. Although our idle words will be condemned, our public confessions of Jesus Christ and words that are spoken in praise of God to bring him glory will also be remembered forever. For the text in Matthew also says, "By your words you will be acquitted" (Matt. 12:37).

I have always been encouraged by what is said concerning the people of God who lived in the time of Malachi: "Then those who feared the Lord talked with each other, and the Lord listened and heard. A scroll of remembrance was written in his presence concerning those who feared the Lord and honored his name" (Mal. 3:16). This means that God hears our good, faithful, and true words too, and that he remembers them forever. I believe that no word spoken for Jesus or in Jesus' name will ever be wasted or fail of its reward.

2. We are accountable for the talents that have been given to us. We should remember the parable Jesus told in various forms in which a king or owner of an estate left cities to be managed by his servants or gave varying numbers of talents to them, returning later to demand an accounting. In one of these, he dismissed the manager, saying, "What is this I hear about you? Give an account of your management, because you cannot be manager any longer" (Luke 16:2). In another he condemned the faithless steward for being "wicked" and "lazy" (Matt. 25:26) but praised the faithful servants, saying, "Well done, good and faithful servant! You have been faithful with a few things; I will put you in charge of many things. Come and share your master's happiness" (Matt. 25:21, 23).

Have you ever taken stock of the talents God has given you? I do not mean just your particularly strong points or strong skills, but everything you are. Have you ever done a complete inventory of who you are so that you may give it all to God for his service and glory?

I am a fifty-five-year-old white male whom God called to the ministry at an early age so I would be able to direct every stage of my education to that end. I was raised in a Christian home, taught the Bible from childhood onward, was influenced by strong men and women of God, and was placed in Philadelphia in a strong city church to teach the Bible to the people God sends to serve there. We are called to model city ministry at Tenth Presbyterian Church, and we have done it. Everything that is good in me has come from God, and my responsibility is to take those good gifts and offer them up to God in his service, making them count for him in every way I can.

That is my inventory. It is that for which I must give an accounting. Your case is different. You have an entirely different background and entirely different training. You may have been called to be a teacher or a doctor or a secretary or the CEO of some company. You may be black or white or some other color. You may have a high IQ or a low IQ. Whatever you have, it has been given to you by God, and you are responsible to God for how you use it. Are you using it for him? If you do not know the answer to that question, you need to sit down quietly, take personal inventory, and ask God to show you what you can do that will make a difference for him in this life and for eternity.

3. We are accountable for how we use our money. Nothing in life so mirrors our values and priorities as what we do with our money, which is why someone has said, "Let me look at your checkbook, and I will tell you what you are." What you do with your money tells volumes about you.

This is why the Bible has so much to say about money. It is why Jesus spoke about it. Jesus said:

Do not store up for yourselves treasures on earth, where moth and rust destroy, and where thieves break in and steal. But store up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where moth and rust do not destroy, and where thieves do not break in and steal. For where your treasure is, there your heart will be also.... No one can serve two masters. Either he will hate the one and love the other, or he will be devoted to the one and despise the other. You cannot serve God and Money.

Matthew 6:19-21, 24

What would I discover if I were to examine your checkbook? You would have payments on the house, checks for the heating and electricity, money for food, hospital and doctors' bills, perhaps education bills—and taxes, of course, lots of taxes. But what beyond that? Would I find more money being spent on a second home, a luxury car, the country club, or entertainment than for Christian work? What percentage of your income would I find given to the support of your local church? Or to missions? Or to help people you know who are in serious financial need? If you give anything to your church or charitable causes, you probably consider yourself to be very generous, a great philanthropist. But would that judgment hold up to a really objective scrutiny? Would God be satisfied with your priorities?

Earlier I mentioned Donald Grey Barnhouse. In his study he refers to a cartoon in which a farmer is sitting at a table with nine giant potatoes in front of him and a tenth potato, his tithe to God, sitting off by itself. The isolated potato is marked "The Lord's portion," and the caption expresses the words of the farmer who is saying, "I don't see how any fellow could be mean enough to give less."

True enough. The caption is meant to commend the farmer as a man with a surrendered heart.
But I find myself thinking, "Nine for me and one for God? Is even that a strong enough priority? When we have been given so much and have such abundance, is that all we can do, should do, or would do if we really loved the Lord with all our hearts and minds and souls and were aware that one day we will have to give an accounting of how we have spent our money?"

4. We are accountable for how we have used our time. Finally, you will have to give an accounting for your time. How are you using your time? Do you waste long hours watching television? Or if you work all the time, are you working for yourself only, or do you work for others and share your time with your family, or with others you could help? Do you invest some of your time in Bible study, witnessing, or some type of Christian work?

What You Do Now Counts

Let's close by returning to the points Paul is making.

1. Stop judging your neighbor. Most of us are guilty of this, and it is one of the most harmful things that takes place in Christian churches. We think that because there are standards to be maintained we must be snooping out the shortcomings of others. We are not called to do this. If you are worried about standards, make sure you live up to them yourself. Or let the people God has appointed to deal with them—the elders in a local church—do the shepherding work.

2. Take inventory of your own actions and behavior. Unless you are perfect or nearly perfect, which I doubt you are, that will be enough to keep you busy for a very long time, and we will all be better off. Besides, you will help others better that way, because people are always helped more by a loving example of what should be done than by moral nitpicking or outright condemnation.

3. Do what you can to build up the body. Being judgmental tears down. Modeling builds up, and that is what we most need. And remember that it is spiritual work that will last. Most of what you have been spending your time on will pass with the passing of this world and be gone forever.

Accountability is always a sobering message. But it is also encouraging, because it means that what you do really counts.

Chapter 214.
Responsible Christianity

Romans 14:13-16

We live in a day when people are impatient with theology. If they are willing to listen to Christian teaching at all, they want it to be practical. Is it? Well, teaching about the Christian life is practical, and it is the Christian life with which Paul is dealing in this, the last major section of Romans (chaps. 12-16).

Yet the way he does it is surprising. When people ask for practical teaching about how Christians should live, they usually want a list of things Christians should do or not do: read your Bible, come to church, spend quality time with your children, and so on. If their concern is for values or Christian morality, they want a list of rules approaching legalism: Don't smoke. Don't drink. Don't go to bad movies. Don't cheat on your income tax. Have you noticed how little there is of anything like that in these last chapters of Romans? Paul gives commands. Indeed, this is the place in the letter where they are particularly found: "Hate what is evil; cling to what is good" (Rom. 12:9); "Live at peace with everyone" (v. 18); "Do not take revenge" (v. 19); "Let no debt remain outstanding" (Rom. 13:8). But these are general statements, not a list of practical dos and don'ts, and they are introduced by the important general teaching that the way we are to approach everything is from the perspective of a renewed Christian mind:

Therefore, I urge you, brothers, in view of God's mercy, to offer your bodies as living sacrifices, holy and pleasing to God—this is your spiritual act of worship. Do not conform any longer to the pattern of this world, but be transformed by the renewing of your mind. Then you will be able to test and approve what God's will is—his good, pleasing and perfect will.

Is Legalism the Answer?

But what about dos and don'ts? Isn't there a list of things we should do and not do? There is, of course. The Ten Commandments is one important list. Nothing in Paul's writings suggests that we are free to violate the moral law of God. But when he writes about specific details of the Christian life, as he does here, it is important to see that the approach he takes is not legalism. He does not provide a list of acceptable and nonacceptable things, above all not in gray areas. In fact, in these areas he teaches that Christians are free to do anything, and they must allow other Christians to do the same. In other words, the way to move forward in the Christian life is not for one group of believers to lay down a set of rules for other Christians.

One commentator writes, "We may advise, we may cite our own experiences, we may pray, we may point to the Word of God, we may seek to enlighten, but we may never command the conscience of another believer."

How those who know the nature of true Christian freedom are to use their liberty is precisely what Paul discusses in the section of Romans to which we come now. Romans 14:13-15:13 is the second part of a long section in which Paul addresses the way Christians are to relate to others with whom they disagree on some matters. The first part was about how people who disagree on such matters are to treat each other (Rom. 14:1-12). The second part is about how the "strong" are to use their liberty (Rom. 14:13-15:13). In other words, the first part deals with Christian liberty itself, the second part with how it should be exercised.

The key concept is responsibility. We are free as Christians, but we must use our freedom in a way that supports, helps or builds up the other person, not in a way that harms him or tears him down.

The Basic Principle: Verse 13

Verse 13 is a restatement of the principle Paul has been explaining from the start—we must stop passing judgment on one another. It is something he has been saying to both the weak and the strong. The "weak" brother or sister is the one who is bothered by scruples over things that should not matter. The person he calls "strong" is the one who knows that in principle what one does in these areas really doesn't matter.

Paul has provided two examples of what he is talking about: first, care about what one eats— believing that a Christian should not eat meat but should be a vegetarian; second, a scrupulous observance of days. This involved the Jewish passion for the faithful observance of the Sabbath, new moons, and other feast days mentioned in the Old Testament.

These matters do not mean much to most people today, so in our first study of this section I suggested some modern equivalents: (1) the judgmental way some Christians look at others who are going through hard times, reasoning that the other person must have done something wrong for which he or she is being punished; (2) variations in individual piety, some practices or lack of them being judged "unspiritual" by those who think otherwise; (3) denominational affiliations, some being judged apostate by narrower brethren; and (4) personality differences—because some people are shy and cannot speak easily about their faith to other people, they are often thought to be unspiritual or even disobedient believers.

Scripture does not give us merely negative commands, but also gives us positive injunctions, which is the case here. In the Greek text of verse 13 the word judge is used twice. In the first case, the verse tells us to stop judging other people. In the second, it tells us to start judging ourselves. This is a word play in the original language that does not work so well in English because our meanings of the word judge are more restricted. This is why the New International Version translates the verse as it does. The King James Version was more literal: "Let us not therefore judge one another any more; hut judge this rather..." The NIV conveys the idea better when it departs from the literal rendering and says, "Therefore let us stop passing judgment on one another. Instead, make up your mind not to put any stumbling block or obstacle in your brother's way."

Here the best recourse may be a paraphrase. Ray Stedman does this: "Scripture does not merely say, 'Stop judging'; it says, 'Stop judging others; if you want to judge, start with yourself.' " I referred to this in chapter 209 when I wrote, "You have better things to do than to hunt out the speck in the eye of your fellow Christian while overlooking the plank in your own."

When Paul says, "Therefore let us stop passing judgment on one another," he is speaking to both the weak and the strong believer. The weak are not to judge the strong by considering them unspiritual, and the strong are not to judge the weak by considering them immature.

This picks up on what was said in the first section of the chapter and is a natural bridge to what follows.

At this point, however, Paul becomes more directive, speaking to those who considered themselves to be strong, saying, "Instead, make up your mind not to put any stumbling block or obstacle in your brother's way." In fact, from this point on nearly everything he writes is to them. The strong believer has more latitude in these matters and can accommodate the weaker brother, while the weaker brother cannot accommodate him. The weak brother can only abstain from what he believes to be wrong. The strong Christian can either abstain or not abstain. Therefore, he has it within his power to accommodate the other person, which is what Paul tells him to do.

The Underlying Truth: Verse 14

The second verse of this section is a parenthesis. For although Paul will say that the strong believer should forgo what his principles would otherwise permit for the sake of the weaker brother, the underlying truth nevertheless is that the strong believer is right: No food is unclean of itself.

We know that Paul felt this strongly, first because of the way he writes here and also because he has said the same thing explicitly in other letters. Here he appeals to his being "in the Lord Jesus" (v. 14). This does not mean that he has a specific saying of Jesus to appeal to, though he might have been thinking of Christ's words in Mark 7:1-13. It only means that he is close to the Lord and is speaking in accord with Jesus' spirit. In the mouth of an apostle, this is a very close claim to speaking by inspiration.

In 1 Corinthians 8 he answers the Corinthians' questions about eating meat that has been sacrificed to idols by writing, "We know that an idol is nothing at all in the world and there is no God but one" (v. 4) and "Food does not bring us near to God; we are no worse if we do not eat, and no better if we do" (v. 8). Similarly, in 1 Timothy 4:4 he says, "Everything God created is good, and nothing is to be rejected if it is received with thanksgiving." What this means is that, in principle, the strong are right. Nothing that goes into the body defiles the person, only what comes out.

Nevertheless, Paul adds that for the one who thinks something is unclean it truly is. Therefore, for his sake the strong believer should be willing to forgo many things that he would otherwise be able to enjoy because of his own sense of spiritual freedom.

The Strong's Responsibility: Verses 15-16

This brings us to the main point of this passage, but at the same time also to something that must be handled very carefully. To see why we only have to ask this question: Do the strong in faith have to forgo anything about which some weaker believer might object? In a world with so much variety there is hardly anything you or I might do that will not be objected to by some other believer. Moreover, there are believers on both sides of most issues. If we were to listen to what all these other Christians have to say and try to live by their standards, we would either fall into a new legalism or go crazy trying to balance thousands of conflicting claims on our behavior.

William Barclay expresses this well when he writes, "Paul is not saying that we must always allow our conduct to be dominated and dictated by the views, and even the prejudices, of others; there are matters which are essentially matters of principle, and in them a man must take his own way. But there are a great many things which are neutral and indifferent,... and it is Paul's conviction that in such things we have no right to give offence to the more scrupulous brother."

Barclay says, "It is a Christian duty to think of everything, not as it affects ourselves only, but also as it affects others." This is part of what it means for a believer in Christ to be guided by a Christian mind.

At this point let's think about the decree of the first church council described in Acts 15. The question that made the meeting necessary was whether Gentiles, who were becoming Christians in large numbers, needed to be circumcised to be saved. The Jewish legalists thought they did; after all, circumcision is the Old Testament sign of membership in the covenant people. Paul and his party believed they did not. According to Paul's account of the same council in his letter to the Galatians, Paul had brought along a young Gentile missionary worker named Titus as a test case. Titus, being a Gentile, had not been circumcised. Would he be compelled to be, or would the council come out on the side of pure grace?

We know how the council decided. After much debate Peter gave a strong decisive speech in which he argued, "Now then, why do you try to test God by putting on the necks of the disciples a yoke that neither we nor our fathers have been able to bear? No! We believe it is through the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ that we are saved, just as they are" (Acts 15:10-11).

This was heeded, and the council adopted the advice of James, the Lord's brother: "It is my judgment, therefore, that we should not make it difficult for the Gentiles who are turning to God. Instead we should write to them, telling them to abstain from food polluted by idols, from sexual immorality, from the meat of strangled animals and from blood. For Moses has been preached in every city from the earliest times and is read in the synagogues on every Sabbath" (vv. 19-21).

This was done. The council sent a letter to the Gentile believers in Antioch, Syria, and Cilicia, saying, "It seemed good to the Holy Spirit and to us not to burden you with anything beyond the following requirements: You are to abstain from food sacrificed to idols, from blood, from the meat of strangled animals and from sexual immorality" (vv. 28-29).

This has been judged an unfortunate compromise by some students of the Book of Acts, but it was nothing of the sort. It was a perfect example of the teaching Paul has included in Romans. First and most important, it upheld the cause of Gentile liberty, excluding legalism. It decreed that it was not necessary for Gentiles to become circumcised in order to be saved. Nothing is required but faith in Christ's atoning work. It was because of this that Paul was able to write to the Galatians, saying that the council had declared for Gentile liberty and that "not even Titus, who was with me, was compelled to be circumcised, even though he was a Greek" (Gal. 2:3).

At the same time, the council showed concern for the consciences of the weaker, Jewish brethren. For that is what three of the four forbidden actions were about. The demand for sexual morality was required by the moral law of God, of course. The Gentiles needed to hear it. But the other three items all had to do with Jewish scruples about food. In writing to the Corinthians Paul says that it does not matter whether an animal has been sacrificed to an idol or not. A Christian is free to eat it. "We are no worse if we do not eat, and no better if we do" (1 Cor. 8:8). But not all Jews saw it this way, and for their sakes the council ruled that Gentiles should avoid practices that were offensive to their Jewish brethren. James made this reasoning explicit when he said, "For Moses has been preached in every city from the earliest times and is read in the synagogues on every Sabbath" (Acts 15:21). That is, Jews are found everywhere; their law forbids such practices and we want to win them rather than repel them. Moreover, if they are Christians, we want to live with them within the one strong fellowship of the Christian church.

Strikingly therefore, in the same chapter of Corinthians in which Paul argues that "an idol is nothing" (1 Cor. 8:4) and that "we are no worse if we do not eat, and no better if we do" (v. 8), he immediately goes on to say this:

Be careful, however, that the exercise of your freedom does not become a stumbling block to the weak. For if anyone with a weak conscience sees you who have this knowledge eating in an idol's temple, won't he be emboldened to eat what has been sacrificed to idols? So this weak brother, for whom Christ died, is destroyed by your knowledge. When you sin against your brothers in this way and wound their weak conscience, you sin against Christ. Therefore, if what I eat causes my brother to fall into sin, I will never eat meat again, so that I will not cause him to fall.

1 Corinthians 8:9-13

The last line is particularly powerful. For Paul, the great champion of Gentile liberty, is not saying merely that he will forgo his privilege to eat meat as long as the scrupulous believer is around, but that he will do it forever if that is what is necessary for the spiritual health of the other believer.

Why the Strong Should Forgo Privileges

But it is hard to see things that way, especially in this day of passionate emphasis upon our own "rights." That is why the last two verses supply such forceful reasons why the advice not to do anything to harm the other believer should be heeded. There are three of them. This is the way John Calvin expresses them in his commentary.

1. Love is violated if our brother is made to grieve for so slight a reason, for it is contrary to love to cause anyone distress.

If the truth of the gospel was at stake, Paul would fight to the last ditch to defend it. But if it is not a matter of God's grace in saving sinners, it is clear that the demands of love should override one's personal freedom in peripheral matters. Paul has stressed the demands of Christian love earlier in this section, in chapter 12:9-21 and chapter 13:8-14. "Love does no harm to its neighbor," Paul said (Rom. 13:10). But if this is so and if we do love, then we will not harm our Christian brothers or sisters for so slight a matter as what we eat or drink. To insist on our own way at this point would be selfish at best and most likely be wicked.

2. The price of the blood of Christ is wasted when a weak conscience is wounded, for the most contemptible brother has been redeemed by the blood of Christ.

In verse 15, Paul uses a strong word when he says that we are not to "destroy" the brother "for whom Christ died." He does not mean that we might cause our brother to perish eternally by some sin. He means that sin is destructive and that if your actions cause the other person to do what he or she believes to be sinful, then you are harming that person because for him that behavior is wrong. How can you do that if you understand, as you should, that the other person is one for whom Christ died? Jesus gave his life for that other believer. How can you refuse to give up a merely questionable practice? In this area comparison with our Lord would put most of us to shame.

3. If the liberty which Christ has attained for us is good, we ought to see that men do not slander it and rightly disparage it when we abuse the gifts of God.

The good of this verse is not the disputed matter that might be spoken of as evil by the weaker brother. It is the strong believer's liberty, and the point is that our freedom must not be thought by unbelievers to be merely an excuse for Christian license. We are responsible to God, first of all, but also to our weaker brethren and to the watching world. This is a short life. Its pleasures are passing and will be vastly overshadowed by the far greater pleasures and joys of heaven. Should we not willingly give up a little more here for the sake of that which is eternal, and that others might be saved?

Chapter 215.
God's Kingdom

Romans 14:17

One of the saddest things about church history is that early Christian leaders forgot that the kingdom of God is not the exercise of civil authority but "righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Spirit" and began to contend for civil power over the bodies and consciences of men.

We think of the scene on Christmas day in 800 a.d. when Pope Leo III placed a golden crown upon the head of Charlemagne while he knelt before him and the people shouted, "To Charles Augustus, crowned by God, the great and pacific emperor of the Romans, life and victory." Or we recall an even more powerful scene nearly three centuries later, in 1077, when the German emperor Henry IV stood barefoot in the snow and in penitent's garb before the castle gate of Canossa, pleading for mercy from Pope Gregory VII, who two years earlier had deposed him, forbidden anyone to acknowledge his authority, and had even excommunicated him from the saving ordinances of the church. Henry was suing to save his kingdom. These were examples of power politics and power religion at their highest pitch, as both popes and emperors contended for who should have the highest earthly authority.

Gregory VII, better known as Hildebrand, had declared in the bull Dictatus Papae, "The Roman Church was founded by God alone; the Roman pope alone can with right be called universal; he alone may use the imperial insignia; his feet only shall be kissed by all princes; he may depose the emperors; he himself may be judged by no one; the Roman Church has never erred, nor will it err in all eternity."

Is that what the Bible means when it talks about God's kingdom—the rule of popes or other church leaders over kings and their kingdoms? Or is God's kingdom something else? It obviously is something else, and church leaders have erred whenever they have tried to make the church a temporal kingdom. The periods of history in which they have done this have become the most oppressive, secular, corrupt, and violent the world has seen.

God's Kingdom and Human Kingdoms

Paul has been writing about the demands of Christian love and the obligation each believer has to protect and edify his Christian brother or sister. But now, suddenly in the midst of all this, there comes a definition of the kingdom of God that is almost a thunderbolt in view of some Christians' forceful and repeated attempts to impose their earthly wills on other people: "For the kingdom of God is not a matter of eating and drinking, but of righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Spirit" (v. 17).

Romans 14:17 is a key verse for any biblical study of the true nature of the church, yet this is the only time in Romans that Paul employs the word kingdom, and he uses it only sixteen times in all his writings. It is, however, a common and important term in the gospels. There are fifty-five occurrences of kingdom in Matthew, twenty in Mark, forty-six in Luke, and five in John.

God's kingdom is difficult to define because it is so important and so extensive. Sometimes the word is used of the universal reign of God over his creation. At other times it is used of the Messianic reign of Jesus Christ, as God promised David: "Your house and your kingdom will endure forever before me; your throne will be established forever" (2 Sam. 7:16). Later, when the house of David was in evident decline, the prophet Isaiah made clear that this promise was to be fulfilled in the divine Messiah who was to come: "He will be called Wonderful Counselor, Mighty God, Everlasting Father, Prince of Peace. Of the increase of his government and peace there will be no end. He will reign on David's throne and over his kingdom, establishing and upholding it with justice and righteousness from that time on and forever" (Isa. 9:6-7). In still other passages, as in Romans 14, the word refers to the church.

Perhaps the most important thing to be said about the kingdom of God is that it is God's kingdom. It is the realm in which God rules. Moreover, because it is a case of God ruling, his kingdom must by definition be over and above any of the kingdoms of men and be infinitely superior to them. The kingdoms of men may endure for a time, but they eventually pass away. The kingdom of God is forever.

The normal course of the kingdoms of this world is described in a striking way in the Book of Daniel. After the early chapters in which the divine humbling of Nebuchadnezzar is recounted, his son Belshazzar comes to the throne. We are told that Belshazzar gave a party, during the course of which he defiled the vessels that had been used for God's worship in the temple in Jerusalem but had been brought to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar after he had conquered the Jews' capital city. While Belshazzar was doing this, the fingers of a hand appeared and wrote on the plaster of the wall of the banqueting room: MENE, MENE, TEKEL, PARSIN.

The king and his nobles were frightened, and when none of the king's wise men could decipher the words, they sent for Daniel, who explained what the writing meant. "Mene: God has numbered the days of your reign and brought it to an end. Tekel: You have been weighed on the scales and found wanting. Peres: Your kingdom is divided and given to the Medes and Persians" (Dan. 5:26-28).

Daniel said this:

O king, the Most High God gave your father Nebuchadnezzar sovereignty and greatness and glory and splendor. Because of the high position he gave him, all the peoples and nations and men of every language dreaded and feared him. Those the king wanted to put to death, he put to death; those he wanted to spare, he spared; those he wanted to promote, he promoted; and those he wanted to humble, he humbled. But when his heart became arrogant and hardened with pride, he was deposed from his royal throne and stripped of his glory. He was driven away from people and given the mind of an animal; he lived with the wild donkeys and ate grass like cattle; and his body was drenched with the dew of heaven, until he acknowledged that the Most High God is sovereign over the kingdoms of men and sets over them anyone he wishes.

But you his son, O Belshazzar, have not humbled yourself, though you knew all this.... You did not honor the God who holds in his hand your life and all your ways.

3 That very night the Medes and Persians overran the palace, Belshazzar was killed, and Darius reigned in his stead.

That is the course of every human kingdom. God allows an individual or group to rise above their peers in power, their victories bring pride, and God removes them and allows others to reign in their place. Arnold Toynbee, the great British historian, wrote that the world has known thirty-four major civilizations, but all have endured only for a time. Egypt was once mighty, but it fell. Greece and Rome have fallen. The Soviet Union has collapsed. In time the United States of America will also succumb to this inevitable law of history: "Righteousness exalts a nation, but sin is a disgrace to any people" (Prov. 14:34). Pride and sin will also bring America down.

God's Kingdom and the Church

But what of the church? Is it to be an earthly kingdom? If it is, what should its relationship to the civil authorities be? If not, of what does it actually consist?

A great many errors about the church and its proper relationship to the secular powers could have been avoided if Bible students had begun with the definition I have just given and then carried it over to the church consistently. The kingdom of God is the realm in which God rules. That is why there is a sense in which the whole world is God's kingdom; he is sovereign over his entire creation. At the same time, the rule of God describes his relationship to those who acknowledge his rule—that is, to those into whom he has entered by his Holy Spirit. This means that the kingdom of God is present in this important spiritual sense whenever individuals come to acknowledge God's rule and reflect his character.

How is that expressed? That is the question Paul answers in the verse we are studying. For when he writes, "The kingdom of God is not a matter of eating and drinking, but of righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Spirit," Paul is saying that the kingdom of God is present and is seen in whatever God does in the lives of Christians. And what God does is bestow righteousness, grant peace, and bring joy in the Holy Spirit. This has nothing to do with what we eat or drink (or what we do not eat or drink) or whether, to use Paul's first example, believers observe certain days. God is not concerned about these things, which is why we are not to be concerned about them, except to the extent that our conduct may hurt others. What we must be concerned about are the three items Paul mentions: "righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Spirit."

God's Kingdom and the Christian

Unfortunately, commentators are divided about the way these three terms are to be understood, since they are used in various ways in the Bible. One approach is to see these words as expressions of God's progressive saving work in the Christian: first, God gives the righteousness of Christ to the believer; second, this imparted righteousness becomes the basis for a new peace between God and the sinner, spilling over into a peacemaking approach to other persons; third, a life of divine joy results. The other approach is to see these as moral qualities to be developed within the Christian: righteousness or just dealings toward others, peacemaking toward others, and a joyful disposition toward others.

A number of important commentators hold to the latter view, that these are moral qualities developed in the Christian. John Murray makes three good arguments for it: "(1) 'Joy in the Holy Spirit' is subjective; it is joy in the believer's heart. Since this joy is coordinated with righteousness and peace we would expect the two latter to be in the same category. (2) Verse 18 points back to verse 17. 'Herein' ['in this way,' NIV] refers to the elements specified in verse 17. In these elements the believer is said to serve Christ, be well-pleasing to God, and approved of men. The service of Christ is, without question, an obligation devolving upon us and the discharge is said to make us well-pleasing to God. These ideas do not accord with forensic righteousness and peace. (3) Likewise in verse 19 we have hortatory terms directed to our responsibility. Of particular relevance are the words, 'follow after things which make for peace.'... For these reasons 'righteousness' and 'peace' should be taken as the rectitude and harmony that must govern the attitude and behavior of the believer within the fellowship of the church."

In my opinion, however, this is not a place where arguing from the drift of Paul's argument is terribly persuasive. Normally it would be, but in verse 17 Paul is simply injecting another reason why Christians are not to be bound by man-made rules and regulations. He is emphasizing that the kingdom of God does not consist of such things but is actually righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Spirit.

Moreover, it is most natural to view righteousness in the same way Paul has been developing this term throughout the letter, as the righteousness of Christ imparted to us. With the whole letter behind him, why would he change his usage now?

Charles Hodge clearly thought as I do when he expressed the alternative view like this:

Paul does not mean to say that Christianity consists in morality; that the man who is just, peaceful and cheerful is a true Christian. This would be to contradict the whole argument of this epistle. The righteousness, peace and joy intended are those of which the Holy Spirit is the author. Righteousness is that which enables us to stand before God, because it satisfies the demands of the law. It is the righteousness of faith, both objective and subjective; peace is the concord between God and the soul, between reason and conscience, between the heart and our fellowmen. And the joy is the joy of salvation; that joy which only those who are in the fellowship of the Holy Ghost ever can experience.

It might be added that if this is the case, if the righteousness in view is the righteousness of Christ imparted to us; peace, the peace we have with God the Father; and joy, the joy of the Holy Spirit, which is a fruit of his work within us, then Paul's definition of God's kingdom is trinitarian. The gift of righteousness pertains to God the Son, peace to God the Father, and joy to God the Holy Spirit—a very satisfactory form of definition.

1. The righteousness of Jesus Christ. Righteousness is one of the most important words in Romans. It is used thirty-five times in this one letter alone, and it more than any other single word is used by Paul to sum up the salvation that comes to us through the work of Jesus Christ. Since the kingdom of God means among other things the reign of God in us through the work of Christ, it is nearly impossible to think of the kingdom of God in us without reference to this imparted righteousness.

In volume one of these studies I made three important points about this New Testament concept:

First, this righteousness from God is the righteousness of the Lord Jesus Christ. We have no righteousness of ourselves. "There is no one righteous, not even one" (Rom. 3:10). If we are to have any righteousness at all—which we must if we are to stand before the holy presence of Almighty God—we must receive it from Christ.

Second, God offers this righteousness of Jesus Christ freely, apart from any need to work for it on our part. This is critical, since the mere existence of righteousness would do us no good unless God were willing to give it to us freely; we could never deserve or earn it. It was a discovery of this great truth that transformed Martin Luther and launched the Reformation. Before he discovered that God offered the righteousness of Christ as a free gift, Luther hated God for demanding what he could never produce. But after he discovered God's grace in the gospel, Luther became a champion of grace and was willing to perish for that truth.

Third, faith is the channel by which sinners receive Christ's righteousness. Initially Luther thought of faith as a work, but he came to see it merely as a hand opening to receive what God offers. We can say then that the kingdom of God comes to those who by God's grace open their hearts to receive Christ's righteousness and God's rule.

Augustus M. Toplady expressed this movingly when he wrote this hymn:

> Nothing in my hand I bring.
> Simply to thy cross I cling;
> Naked, come to thee for dress;
> Helpless, look to thee for grace;
> Foul, I to the fountain fly;

Wash me, Savior, or I die.
Rock of Ages, cleft for me.
Let me hide myself in thee.

2. The peace of God the Father. The second of Paul's three terms is peace, and this certainly means, at least in the first instance, the peace with God that we have as a result of Jesus Christ's work for us and God's justification of us because of that work.

The Bible speaks of two kinds of peace: "peace with God" because of Christ's work and the "peace of God," which he imparts as we lay our concerns before him. Paul mentions the first type in Romans 5:1: "Therefore, since we have been justified through faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ." He refers to the second peace in Philippians 4:6-7: "Do not be anxious about anything, but in everything, by prayer and petition, with thanksgiving, present your requests to God. And the peace of God, which transcends all understanding, will guard your hearts and your minds in Christ Jesus."

3. The joy of the Holy Spirit. And last of all is joy, though it is the first of the marks of the church as Jesus developed them in his great prayer for the church recorded in John 17 (see v. 13). Indeed, it is even first here in the sense that it is the first evidence of the work that has been done for us and in us by God. When we have been justified by God as a result of receiving Christ's righteousness and have been brought into a relationship with God that may be described as peace after warfare, the natural expression of that in us is the superabounding joy of the Holy Spirit.

Have you experienced that joy? One of the sad things about so many Christians is that they do not seem to be cheerful. One Sunday afternoon in Scotland a church janitor picked up a piece of paper on which one of the worshipers had been doodling, probably during a particularly long sermon. It contained this bit of wry doggerel:

To dwell above with saints in love,
Aye, that will be glory!
To dwell below with saints I know,

Now that's a different story.

It shouldn't be different, of course. It is true that nothing here will ever equal our joy in heaven—that joy will be full, matchless, and unalloyed. But something of that joy, something of the joy of our salvation, should be observable now in all who are truly believing members of God's kingdom.

First Righteousness and Peace

But we must get the order right! There are many people who would love to have the joy that trusting Christians have. In fact, they envy them that joy. But they are unwilling to have it on God's terms, which is the only way it can be had, and that is through faith in the perfect and completed work of Christ. First righteousness, followed by peace with God. Then joy!

Remember what the angel said to the shepherds when the heavenly legions appeared in the night sky over Bethlehem to announce Jesus' birth: "Do not be afraid. I bring you good news of great joy that will be for all the people. Today in the town of David a Savior has been born to you; he is Christ the Lord" (Luke 2:10). It is because we have a Savior, who is also our king, that we have peace with God and joy that is full of glory.

Chapter 216.
Approved by God and Man

Romans 14:17-18

At the end of Luke 2, the chapter that contains Luke's account of the birth of Jesus Christ, there is a fascinating verse that is particularly meaningful if we consider it together with our text in Romans. Luke is writing of Jesus, who, he says, "grew in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and men" (v. 52). In Romans, Paul writes that the Christian "who serves Christ in this way is pleasing to God and approved by men." The correspondence between these two verses suggests that Christians serve Christ by becoming like Jesus Christ and that if they do this they will receive both divine and human approval.

Serving Jesus "In This Way"

The key terms in Romans 14:18 are the Greek words en touto (possibly en toutois), which the New International Version translates as in this way, the Revised Standard Version as thus, and the J. B. Phillips paraphrase as in these things.

The proper translation has been a matter of some controversy because of uncertainty about the Greek text. In most of the ancient manuscripts the Greek words are singular: "in this." But in some they are plural: "in these things." If the latter is right, Paul would be referring to the three items mentioned in the previous verse (righteousness, peace, and joy in the Holy Spirit), and this would dispose us to think of them as virtues rightly to be seen in every Christian: righteous dealings with other people, peacemaking among other people, and a cheerful disposition.

If the majority of the manuscripts are right—that is, if the words are singular ("in this")—then Paul would be referring to the nonjudgmental attitude he has been commending since the beginning of the chapter. That is, he would be promoting a right way of Christian thinking and behaving—knowing that the kingdom of God does not consist in eating and drinking or other nonessential matters but is rather something else entirely: the righteousness of Christ imputed to the sinner, which the believer will want to make known to other people; peace with God achieved by the work of Christ on his or her behalf; and joy, which is a mark of the Holy Spirit of God in the regenerated person's life. In other words, the person who serves Christ will do it by living out a truly vital faith and not by trying to sustain a false, judgmental, and barren legalism.

Paul is not introducing a new subject. He is pointing out that God is looking for a living, vital faith, not legalism. Legalism contributes to the pride of the flesh, because whenever we measure up to some moral code of our own or some other person's devising we think of ourselves as being better than people who do not measure up to it. Jesus is not served in that way or with that kind of thinking. He is served when we understand that we are accepted by God through the work of Jesus Christ alone and are therefore able joyfully to accept and love all others for whom Jesus died. These other believers may be wrong in many respects, in our opinion. But we will know that we are all nevertheless part of one spiritual body, the body of Christ, and that we belong together with all other Christians as together we seek to live for Christ and bear a strong witness for him in this world.

Paul's Personal Example

When we read this passage in light of what we know about Paul and his background in Pharisaic Judaism, it is impossible not to sense that he is writing out of his own experience and with a strong sense of gratitude for the liberty he had himself found in Jesus Christ.

We remember that Paul had been a Pharisee and that the Pharisees were the strictest religious sect of the Jews. There were never very many Pharisees, but they were highly regarded because they made it their life endeavor and passion to keep the law of God in its entirety. If the law said, "Remember the Sabbath day by keeping it holy" and "on it you shall not do any work," they asked, What is work? Then they devised a detailed list of what was and was not forbidden labor. A godly person could not cook on the Sabbath; that was work. So the food to be eaten had to be cooked the day before. Carrying something was work. Even something like a handkerchief could not be carried from one room to another; that would mean breaking the law. If the handkerchief were worn around the neck as a piece of clothing, however, it fell into a different category and was allowed.

There were thousands of regulating definitions like this, and not only for the Sabbath observance but for every other Old Testament precept as well. Food laws were strictly observed. Kosher cooking was demanded. Tithes were obligatory. The Pharisees tithed their possessions as well as their money, which Jesus acknowledged even when he was chiding them for their hypocrisy: "Woe to you, teachers of the law and Pharisees, you hypocrites! You give a tenth of your spices—mint, dill and cummin. But you have neglected the more important matters of the law— justice, mercy and faithfulness. You should have practiced the latter, without neglecting the former" (Matt. 23:23).

That was exactly the problem. In the days before his conversion Paul had been meticulous in keeping these man-made regulations, but he had neglected the more important matters. In fact, he had not even begun to appreciate their importance. For that is what legalism does. It bogs us down in trivia while making us dull, impervious, and then blind to things that are essential. Paul thought he was righteous, but he had not even begun to understand the scope of God's righteousness. He did not know that pleasing God by human righteousness was beyond his ability. He knew the word grace, but he did not understand the nature of God's great and abundant grace or that he needed that grace. Most important, he did not recognize that his attempts to attain to his own righteousness had actually been keeping him from salvation through Christ by the grace of God.

One day that changed. Paul was on his way to Damascus to arrest Christians, whom he believed were enemies of the true faith given to his people. Instead he was arrested by Jesus. A bright light flashed from heaven, and when Paul saw it he fell to the ground blinded. He heard a voice saying, "Saul, Saul, why do you persecute me?" (Acts 9:4).

Paul knew this was a theophany, a revelation or appearance of God. So he asked, "Who are you, Lord?" (v. 5).

He was shocked when the divine voice replied, "I am Jesus, whom you are persecuting. Now get up and go into the city, and you will be told what you must do" (vv. 5-6).

Paul was forever changed by this revelation. He became an entirely different man, and he thought differently too. In Philippians he tells us what this encounter meant to him, comparing what he found in Christ with what he had been trying to achieve for himself before that time:

If anyone else thinks he has reasons to put confidence in the flesh, I have more: circumcised on the eighth day, of the people of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin, a Hebrew of the Hebrews; in regard to the law, a Pharisee; as for zeal, persecuting the church; as for legalistic righteousness, faultless. But whatever was to my profit I now consider loss for the sake of Christ. What is more, I consider everything a loss compared to the surpassing greatness of knowing Christ Jesus my Lord, for whose sake I have lost all things. I consider them rubbish, that I may gain Christ and be found in him, not having a righteousness of my own that comes from the law, but that which is through faith in Christ—the righteousness that comes from God and is by faith. I want to know Christ and the power of his resurrection and the fellowship of sharing in his sufferings, becoming like him in his death, and so, somehow, to attain to the resurrection from the dead.

Philippians 3:4-11

Paul is saying that before he met Jesus in that vision he thought that he had pleased God by his inherited religious advantages coupled to his own numerous achievements:

Circumcised on the eighth day. That was a claim to having been born into a true Jewish family rather than being a proselyte, who would be circumcised as an adult, or an Ishmaelite, who would be circumcised when he was thirteen years old.

An Israelite. Israel was the covenant name of God's elect people. So this word brings in Paul's inherited claim to all the covenant privileges and blessings.

The tribe of Benjamin. When the civil war that came after the death of Solomon divided the northern kingdom from the southern kingdom, Benjamin was the one tribe that remained with Judah in the south, therefore remaining close to the proscribed place of worship, which was Jerusalem. Both kingdoms fell away from God. But the decline was about one hundred years slower in the south, and Benjamin benefited from the geographical association.

A Hebrew of Hebrews. This is a way of saying that Paul was a pure-blooded Jew, born of a Jewish father as well as a Jewish mother. Being a Jew brought great spiritual advantages, which Paul has already listed in Romans 9:4-5: "Theirs is the adoption as sons; theirs the divine glory, the covenants, the receiving of the law, the temple worship and the promises. Theirs are the patriarchs, and from them is traced the human ancestry of Christ, who is God over all, forever praised!"

But Paul was not only counting on the spiritual advantages he had inherited, he was counting on the things he had achieved for himself, too. He was also a Pharisee, as we have seen. He was a zealous Pharisee, which he proved by his persecution of the infant church. Finally, he was at least in his own eyes faultless in regard to legalistic righteousness. Like a good Pharisee he had done what he believed he should do.

Yet once he saw Jesus and learned how empty all these human achievements were and how far short he had fallen of the inner righteousness that the holy God requires, he counted all of that as "loss compared to the surpassing greatness of knowing Christ." That is, he reckoned his former assets as liabilities. He moved them over to the liabilities column. Under assets he wrote "Jesus Christ alone."

When we read Paul's testimony we can understand in a moment why a man like Paul was never going to go back to legalism and why he was so eager to urge an entirely different approach on other Christians. He didn't want any more of that; it hadn't worked. We can understand why he says categorically and without any qualification, "The kingdom of God is not a matter of eating and drinking, but of righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Spirit."

Pleasing to God

When Paul was in Judaism he must have believed that what he was doing pleased God, or at least he must have hoped that God was pleased. But after he was converted he knew that it was actually this new liberated life, lived by the grace of God in Christ, that pleased him.

The aim of every believer must be to please God, and our example in doing so must be the Lord Jesus Christ. On the occasion of Jesus' public baptism by John, recorded in three of the gospels, a voice came from heaven declaring, "This is my Son, whom I love; with him I am well pleased" (Matt. 3:17; cf. Mark 1:11; Luke 3:22). Toward the end of his ministry, on the occasion of his transfiguration, the voice from heaven came again, saying to Peter, James, and John, "This is my Son, whom I love; with him I am well pleased. Listen to him" (Matt. 17:5).

Jesus pleased his Father perfectly. So if you are striving to be like Jesus, you will please God too. Paul had this mind when he wrote of his own aspirations, saying, "We make it our goal to please him" (2 Cor. 5:9).

Is that your goal? If it is, you will stop judging other Christians and instead live in a way that manifests the grace of God in your own life. Above all, you will remember that you are only a sinner and that you have been saved solely by God's grace. People who understand that know they are not better than other people, even if they have come to understand the Bible better than others and obey it more completely. The truth is that such people are not comparing themselves with other people at all. Their minds are on Jesus. They know only that they belong to Jesus and love him, and that they want other people to know and love him too.

Approved by Men

The final phrase of our text is startling, for it tells us that the one who serves Jesus Christ in this way will not only be pleasing to God but will also be "approved by men." What is startling about that statement is that we often are not at all pleasing to non-Christians. We are scorned and even hated by them.

The Bible seems to be contradictory here. On the one hand, Jesus told his disciples, "If the world hates you, keep in mind that it hated me first.

If you belonged to the world, it would love you as its own. As it is, you do not belong to the world, but I have chosen you out of the world. That is why the world hates you" (John 15:18-19). He also said this:

> Blessed are you when men hate you, when they exclude you and insult you > and reject your name as evil, because of the Son of Man....
> Woe to you when all men speak well of you, for that is how their fathers treated the false prophets.
> Luke 6:22, 26

On the other hand, Paul listed human approval as a qualification of one who wanted to be an officer in the church: "He must also have a good reputation with outsiders, so that he will not fall into disgrace and into the devil's trap" (1 Tim. 3:7). As far as the example of Jesus himself is concerned, although he "grew in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and men" (Luke 2:52), he also was despised by many (Isa. 53:3).

Perhaps this illustration will help explain this paradox. Years ago one of my predecessors at Tenth Presbyterian Church, Donald Grey Barnhouse, was teaching about Christians being in the world but not a part of the world, and he concluded by saying, "You may be sure that if nobody thinks you are strange and out of step, you are not a good Christian." After the meeting a friend who had been present and had heard that remark added wisely, "However, you should also say that if everybody thinks you are strange and out of step, you are not a good Christian."

Clearly we are not out to please the world, and we will not please it. If the world hated our Lord and Master enough to crucify him, we can be sure that it will hate us too. At the same time, there should be within the true follower of Jesus Christ enough of his character, truth, love, and integrity that some looking on will, reluctantly perhaps but nevertheless genuinely, acknowledge that the believer is indeed living an exemplary and truly pious life. They should be able to acknowledge that Christians are real. The world must not be able to wag its finger at us and call us hypocrites.

A brief study of the word approved (dokimos in Greek) will also help us understand what is required of one who is serious about serving Jesus Christ. In the ancient world there was no paper money as we know it today, and until a rudimentary banking system grew up for the sake of international trade during the Middle Ages, all financial transactions were in gold, silver, or base metal coin. There were no great coin presses, so in order to make coins the metal was heated until liquid, then poured into molds where it was allowed to cool. After cooling, the irregular edges of the rough coins were trimmed away. This was an inexact method, of course. Moreover, the metal was soft because it was not mixed with alloys, and people frequently shaved away at the edges and kept the metal, in time collecting enough to make up the equivalent of a new coin. We know this was a problem because many laws were passed against it. In one century alone, the city of Athens passed over eighty laws intended to stop this practice.

What happened, of course, was that in time some coins would become so whittled down that the merchants would reject them as obviously lacking their full weight or value. At this point the coins were said to be adokimos—"disapproved." On the other hand, merchants who were upright and would therefore neither give nor accept "light" money, were said to be dokimos—honest men. And their coins were dokimos too.

That is the sense in which the word approved is used of the followers of Jesus Christ. They are to be approved by the world in the sense that the world is to recognize that they have their full weight, that they are people of genuine spiritual substance. Moreover, when we remember that one meaning of the Hebrew word kabod (usually translated glory in the Bible) is weight or weightiness, we see that in this sense Christians are to be those who show forth something of the glory of Jesus Christ and are recognized by the world as doing so. We might say that the world is to recognize that believers in Christ are the genuine article and that they show forth something that is better than anything the world knows and that goes beyond its experience.

It is tragic that it should ever be any other way. Somewhere in his writings, John R. W. Stott, the wise Church of England rector, tells about two Englishmen who were riding in a railway carriage. In the next carriage was a man whom one of the first two thought looked like the presiding Archbishop of Canterbury. "No, he's not," said the friend.

"Yes, he is," said the first.

Eventually they decided to make a bet on whether the third gentleman was the archbishop or not. They agreed on their terms. Then the traveler who thought the man was the well-known leader of the Church of England crossed over to the other compartment and asked him if he were by any chance the Archbishop of Canterbury. The man replied with a curse, swearing that blanketyblank he was not the blankety-blank Archbishop of Canterbury. The questioner went back to his compartment and told his companion, "The bet's off. There's no way to tell whether he's the archbishop or not."

Getting Our Priorities Right

Our text tells us that if we are determined to serve Jesus Christ by living for him and not by legalism, then we will be "pleasing to God and approved by men." But notice that if we do please men (which is not always the case but should frequently be), we will not please them by setting out to please them, but rather by setting out to serve Christ. That is, we must put things in the right order and get our priorities straight. If you try to please men, you will never please them all the time, though you may please some occasionally. But what is really important, you will never please God. God cannot be put in second place. On the other hand, if you determine to please God, you will certainly please him and you may even get a begrudging approval by some fairly reasonable human beings too.

The Book of Revelation says, "To him who loves us and has freed us from our sins by his blood, and has made us to be a kingdom and priests to serve his God and Father—to him be glory and power for ever and ever! Amen" (Rev. 1:5-6). So let's be sure that we really do serve God.

Chapter 217.

Building Up or Tearing Down

Romans 14:19-15:2

Most of us get impatient with repetition. In fact, if the repetition is also admonition, we get hostile: "Why are you telling me that again? I heard you the first time. I'll get to it when I am good and ready." Children get impatient when their parents remind them to eat their cereal, make their beds, clean up their rooms, or wash their faces. The attitude doesn't stop with childhood either. As adults we get impatient with repetitions from God and find them offensive.

The fact that something is repeated shows that we need to hear it. I say this here because nearly everything in the verses that end Romans 14 and begin Romans 15 has been said before. Paul is still talking about our tendencies to judge other Christians, fighting over things that are not important, and he tells us not to do this, encouraging the strong to bear with the convictions of the weak. In fact, the very same words occur in these two sections: peace (verses 17 and 19), destroy (verses 15 and 20), clean and unclean (verses 14 and 20), stumble (verses 13 and 20), fall (verses 4 and 21), condemned (verses 3 and 23), and weak and strong (verses 1 and 15:1).

I often say that if God tells us something once, we should pay attention. It is God speaking. But when he says something twice or even three times, surely we should stop anything else we are doing, focus our minds, seize upon each individual word, memorize what is being said, ponder its meaning, and seek to apply it to every aspect of our lives.

The Building That Is Christ's Church

Nevertheless, the passage we come to now is not entirely repetitious. The main points are, but the section as a whole is bracketed with a concept that has not yet appeared in Romans—to edify or build up. This word pictures Christians as a building (or part of a building) that needs to be carefully constructed, and it contrasts this work with actions or attitudes that would tend to tear the building down. The word occurs in verse 19: "Let us therefore make every effort to do what leads to peace and to mutual edification." Then, although the New International Version translates it as build up, it occurs again in Romans 15:2, where we read: "Each of us should please his neighbor for his good, to build him up."

Edification is mostly a Pauline concept, since fifteen out of eighteen occurrences of the word (oikodomê) in the New Testament are in Paul's writings. Yet the roots of the idea probably go back to Jesus' words to Peter at the time of Peter's great confession of faith in Jesus as the Son of God. Jesus had asked his disciples who other people thought he was. They gave the popular answers: John the Baptist, Elijah, Jeremiah, or one of the prophets. "But what about you?" he then asked. "Who do you say I am?" (Matt. 16:15).

Peter answered, "You are the Christ, the Son of the living God" (v. 16).

Then Jesus said, "Blessed are you, Simon son of Jonah, for this was not revealed to you by man, but by my Father in heaven. And I tell you that you are Peter, and on this rock I will build my church, and the gates of Hades will not overcome it" (vv. 17-18).

Jesus was speaking of the corporate body of believers, of course. Paul usually employs the word to refer to building up individual Christians, helping individuals grow spiritually. But the words in the Greek text are exactly the same, and Paul also sometimes uses the word edify of the church. For example, in his letter to the Ephesians, Paul writes:

Consequently, you are no longer foreigners and aliens, but fellow citizens with God's people and members of God's household, built on the foundation of the apostles and prophets, with Christ Jesus himself as the chief cornerstone. In him the whole building is joined together and rises to become a holy temple in the Lord. And in him you too are being built together to become a dwelling in which God lives by his Spirit.

Ephesians
2:19-22

In these verses Paul likens the church to a kingdom, a family, and a temple. But in thinking of a temple he thinks of a building into which individuals are being "built together." That is, each one is a part of it.

Take Care How You Build

This image is so well developed in the New Testament, particularly in Paul's writings, that it is useful to think about it carefully. If God is in the process of building his church, as Jesus said he is, and if Christians each have a share in doing the work, we ought to ask ourselves how the work should be done and what this should mean for us personally. We need to keep several things in mind.

1. To build something properly you need to know what you are trying to build. You need a design or blueprint. We do not have to go very far to find this idea in Romans 14, because immediately after his first use of the word edification (in v. 19) Paul speaks of the project as "the work of God," saying, "Do not destroy the work of God for the sake of food" (v. 20).

This is not a complete blueprint, but it gets us started by reminding us that the church is God's church, not ours, and that what matters is what God is doing in the lives of individual Christians, not whether those people conform to our ideas of what a pious or useful Christian should be. In Paul's day some people thought that it was important that other Christians observe certain rules of eating and drinking or keep certain holy days. But Paul has been saying forcefully that this is not what the kingdom of God is all about. He has just stated that "the kingdom of God is not a matter of eating and drinking, but of righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Spirit" (v. 17).

For a fuller blueprint, we go again to Ephesians. In one of its best-known passages Paul refers to God's plan like this: "[God] gave some to be apostles, some to be prophets, some to be evangelists, and some to be pastors and teachers, to prepare God's people for works of service, so that the body of Christ may be built up until we all reach unity in the faith and in the knowledge of the Son of God and become mature, attaining to the whole measure of the fullness of Christ" (Eph. 4:11-13).

"The whole measure of the fullness of Christ" is what we should be trying to see in other Christians. Therefore, to the extent that we are following God's blueprint rather than our dim vision of what we think other people should be, we will be doing everything in our power to help them become like Jesus Christ and be equipped to serve others for his sake.

2. You need the right foundation. The second requirement for putting up a good building is a solid foundation. In fact, at the very end of the Sermon on the Mount Jesus used this image to distinguish between those who would build well by hearing his words and putting them into practice and those who would not:

Therefore everyone who hears these words of mine and puts them into practice is like a wise man who built his house on the rock. The rain came down, the streams rose, and the winds blew and beat against that house; yet it did not fall, because it had its foundation on the rock. But everyone who hears these words of mine and does not put them into practice is like a foolish man who built his house on sand. The rain came down, the streams rose, and the winds blew and beat against that house, and it fell with a great crash.

Matthew 7:24-27 To the Corinthians Paul writes of the foundation as Jesus Christ himself: "For no one can lay any foundation other than the one already laid, which is Jesus Christ" (1 Cor. 3:11).

Jesus meant precisely the same thing when he told Peter, "You are Peter, and on this rock I will build my church" (Matt. 16:18).

Because of the way he said this some people have supposed that he was saying he was going to build his church on Peter. But Jesus was actually making a play on Peter's name to highlight the contrast between his weak disciple and himself. In Greek Peter's name is Petros, the masculine form of the noun meaning stone. (It can also mean pebble.)

That is what Peter was, a little stone. But when Jesus spoke of the "rock" on which he would build his church, he used the feminine form of the same word (petra), which means living rock or bedrock. Peter was a little pebble that could easily be dislodged, as he was soon to demonstrate by his failure at the time of Christ's trial. But Jesus was the solid and living Rock of Ages.

This was how Peter himself understood Jesus' words, because he wrote of Jesus as "the living Stone" in his first letter, drawing on three Old Testament texts to make his point:

As you come to him, the living Stone—rejected by men but chosen by God and precious to him—you also, like living stones, are being built into a spiritual house to be a holy priesthood, offering spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God through Jesus Christ. For in Scripture it says:

> "See, I lay a stone in Zion, a chosen and precious cornerstone,
> and the one who trusts in him will never be put to shame."

Now to you who believe, this stone is precious. But to those who do not believe,

> "The stone the builders rejected has become the capstone." and,
> "A stone that causes men to stumble and a rock that makes them fall."
> 1 Peter 2:4-8

Today many people are trying to build useful, solid lives. But they need to know that the only adequate foundation for any stable life or career is Jesus Christ. Are you building on that foundation, a foundation that will enable you to stand against the many storms of life—or are you building on sand?

3. You need good supplies. A third necessity if you are going to construct a worthwhile building is enough raw material—and it has to be of good quality. Jesus said, "Suppose one of you wants to build a tower. Will he not first sit down and estimate the cost to see > if he has enough money to complete it? For if he lays the foundation and is not able to finish it, everyone who sees it will ridicule him, saying, 'This fellow began to build and was not able to finish'" (Luke 14:28-30).

How are you going to build up another Christian, or your own life, for that matter? By teaching the truths of God's Word. And the Word of God will never run short or prove to be inadequate.

That is why Paul told Timothy:

But as for you, continue in what you have learned and have become convinced of, because you know those from whom you learned it, and how from infancy you have known the holy Scriptures, which are able to make you wise for salvation through faith in Christ Jesus. All Scripture is God-breathed and is useful for teaching, rebuking, correcting and training in righteousness, so that the man of God may be thoroughly equipped for every good work.

2 Timothy 3:14-17

We can also think of the wonderfully moving scene in Acts 20 where Paul is taking leave of the Ephesian elders. He knows that he is not going to see them again, so he says, "I commit you to God and to the word of his grace, which can build you up and give you an inheritance among all those who are sanctified" (Acts 20:32). Paul would never instruct these dear friends again, but he knew he could trust God to continue the work of sanctification in their lives by the power of his written Word.

4. You need to construct your building bit by bit. No worthwhile building is constructed overnight. Plans must be drawn, foundations laid, materials chosen, details lovingly applied. In fact, the more substantial and important the building is, the longer the construction will take. Isaiah recognized this when he compared the work of building character to raising children:

   Who is it he is trying to teach?

To whom is he explaining his message?
To children weaned from their milk, to those just taken from the breast?
For it is:
Do and do, do and do, Rule on rule, rule on rule; A little here, a little there.

Isaiah 28:9-10

No one can raise a child overnight, just as one cannot construct a building overnight. Similarly, we cannot edify other Christians rapidly. It takes hard work over time. It means adding a little teaching here and a little teaching there. In terms of a church's ministry, it requires strong consistent teaching week by week.

The Opposite of Building: Tearing Down

There is a negative side to all of this, too. It is also possible to tear down. In fact, this is often done. It is one of the sad things about some forms of Christianity.

One way we tear others down rather than building them up is by fighting over things that are not important: "Do not destroy the work of God for the sake of food" (Rom. 14:20). Another is by insisting on our own rights and pleasures rather than thinking about others: "Each of us should please his neighbor for his good, to build him up" (Rom. 15:2).

Many years ago a missionary executive visited Donald Grey Barnhouse. They talked about problems on the mission field, particularly things that cause divisions, and Barnhouse asked the man to write down things that harm the work of God in other people. The executive spent several hours producing this carefully documented list:

An unforgiving spirit. Self-seeking. A legalistic spirit. Playing God for others. Hypocrisy.
Failing to appreciate others' gifts. Failing to make allowances for one another (Eph. 4:2; James 2:12-13). Lack of patience. Not sympathizing with others' infirmities or, perhaps, their lack of gifts that we possess.

Evil speaking (James 4:11; Titus 3:2). Assuming, without grounds, that others are at fault (James 5:9). Pulling one another to pieces (James 4:11-12, Phillips). Suspecting the motives of another. A domineering spirit. A rebellious spirit. Snobbery (James 2:1, Phillips). Hatred. Grumbling, arguing, murmuring. Maliciousness. Being a busybody. Greediness. Bitterness. Resentment. A sense of inferiority (i.e., not resting in the Lord, not satisfied with the gifts he has given). Lack of security. Instability. Timidity. Spite. Laziness. Economic sponging. Lying and slander. Malice. Jealousy. Thinking too highly of oneself. A critical spirit toward others. Carrying on controversy. Being ill-informed about the position of another.

All of those attitudes and actions are destructive. They tear down rather than build up. But the missionary executive also prepared a positive list:

Willingness to be in subjection one to another. Considering others better than oneself. An understanding spirit. A sense of intimate relationship to Christ. Not insisting on our rights. Willingness to confess a wrong spirit. Sincerity. A generous spirit. A sympathetic spirit. Trusting others. Having faith in Christ, not necessarily in others, but expressed as trust to others, knowing that we belong to him. Joyfulness. Prayer. Discretion. A critical spirit toward oneself. A gentle and quiet spirit (2 Tim. 2:25). Humility (1 Peter 5:5). Using our gifts for one another. Remembering our own mistakes (James 3:2). Christ-centeredness. Love in word and deed. Fair dealing. Integrity. Recognizing one's place. A forgiving spirit. Doing things decently and in order. Conscientiousness. Faithfulness. Being responsible to perform the tasks assigned to us. Not misusing our authority over others. Being willing to follow those in authority over us.

A Temple Rising to God

Is all this worth it? Is it worthwhile sharpening our skills and developing our Christian character so that others might grow to be like Jesus Christ? Of course, it is. The problem is not that we doubt the ultimate value of the work we are given to do but that we get bogged down in the hard, daily task of fashioning the stones of this building and fitting them to the overall structure. We get our eyes off the blueprint and get bogged down in the rubble.

It helps to remember that what God is building is a temple. Here is an illustration. We are told in 1 Kings 6:7 that when the great temple of Solomon was constructed "only blocks dressed at the quarry were used, and no hammer, chisel or any other iron tool was heard at the temple site while it was being built." To my knowledge, no other building in history was ever built in this way. Its construction was so well done it was almost silent. Silently, silently the stones were added, and the building rose.

So it is with the church. We do not hear what is going on inside human hearts as the Holy Spirit creates new life and adds individuals to the temple he is building. We do not even fully realize the part we are playing as we seek to build these other people up by focusing on the important matters, laying aside petty differences, and teaching the Word of God to each of them faithfully. But God is working, and the temple is rising. In the days of the apostles God was adding Gentiles to his church. Paul was his chief instrument in carrying the gospel to them. God added the high and low, slaves and freemen, Greeks, Romans, and barbarians. He added many at the time of the Reformation and in the days of the Great Awakenings and revivals.

He is still building his church today, and we are his workmen, laborers together with Jesus Christ. We have a responsibility to do the work well.

Chapter 218.
The Example of Our Lord: Part 1

Romans 15:3-4

For many years it has been common in the evangelical church to play down the importance of Jesus Christ as an example. This is primarily a reaction to the liberal church's focus on Jesus as an example to the neglect of his deity and atoning work on the cross. Evangelicals have responded by saying, "It is not an example we need; it is a Savior." That is correct, but it is also true that the Bible presents Jesus as an example for those who have been saved by him, telling us that we must be increasingly like Jesus, whom we profess to love and serve. Our text in Romans is one instance of the way the Bible frequently refers to Jesus Christ as our example.

In fact, the chapter we are studying points to his example more than once. In Romans 15:3-4, Paul refers to Jesus as one who did not please himself but rather sought to please the Father and others. In verses 7-9 he denotes him as one who accepted others.

Selfish or Selfless

In this study I intend to follow a line of thought developed by one of my predecessors at Tenth Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, Donald Grey Barnhouse. His study appeared as part of his extensive radio broadcasts on Romans and was later published in booklet form. Today it can be found in God's Glory, volume 10 of the first edition of the Romans series.

Barnhouse began by contrasting the selfishness of human nature with the selflessness of Jesus Christ, noting that the Greek word for the first person is ego, translated as self. Therefore, to be selfish is to be egotistical. By contrast, our text says that the Lord Jesus Christ did not please himself. In this he is marked with a true, perfect humanity very different from the fallen humanity of the sons of Adam:

We live in a selfish world, and selfishness is the principle mark of the human race. Stand beside the highway and watch the death toll of automobile accidents rise. What is the cause of most accidents? The attitude of "Get-out-of-my-way!" How many times we see the baleful glare of a driver who comes up beside us in traffic, his whole expression showing his compulsion to be first.

Even when a person becomes a believer in Christ the old Adamic nature remains, and there is warfare between the spirit and the flesh. In the church at Philippi, two people were at odds and Paul thought it necessary to send one of the apostolic company to settle the matter. He explained that he was sending Timothy, perhaps the youngest of the group, because Timothy would put the interests of the Philippians ahead of his own; and Paul added, "For all look after their own interests, and not those of Jesus Christ" (Phil. 2:21, KJV). The purpose of our text in Romans is to teach us to be like... Christ, who gave us the example for our daily living.

One need not be a close observer to see that the thoughts of the world are centered in self. We switch on the radio, and the song comes lilting forth:

> Oh! what a beautiful morning!
> Oh! what a beautiful day!
> I've got a beautiful feeling,
> Everything's going my way.

We turn the dial and hear a sermon on unselfishness and the glory of becoming like Christ and serving others; but the next program tells you how to get out of helping others.

Here Barnhouse quoted one of the songs from the well-known Broadway musical My Fair Lady, based on the play Pygmalion by George Bernard Shaw:

> The Lord above made man to help his neighbor, No matter where, on land or sea of foam.
> The Lord above made man to help his neighbor, but
> With a little bit of luck,
> With a little bit of luck,
> When he comes around you won't be home.

Barnhouse remarks that when we turn back to the Word of God and consider the example of Jesus Christ, we learn that for Christians, when your neighbor comes around for help, with a little bit of grace you will be home.

He Did Not Please Himself

The chief thing our text tells us is that Jesus did not please himself but rather set out to please God for the benefit of others, and it concludes from that truth that we should follow Christ's example. Indeed, the verses teach what Paul repeated in Philippians 2:5-8:

Your attitude should be the same as that of Christ Jesus:

> Who, being in very nature God, did not consider > equality with God something to be grasped, > but made himself nothing, taking the very nature of a > servant, being made in human likeness.
> And being found in appearance as a man, he humbled > himself and became obedient to death— even death on a > cross!

What would happen to us if Jesus had pleased himself instead of coming to earth as a man and dying for our sins? Where would we be today if Christ had put his own interests first? Once Jesus asked this question of his disciples. As recounted in John 6, the Lord had explained the doctrine of election, pointing out that he alone is the true bread from heaven to whom all must come for life and that no man can come to him unless the Father draws him (John 6:44). Later in the chapter we are told that many of his disciples objected, saying, "This is a hard teaching; who can accept it?" (v. 60). Jesus, knowing that his disciples were confused, said to them, "Does this offend you? What if you see the Son of Man ascend to where he was before!" (vv. 61-62). In other words, "What would happen if I pleased myself and went back to heaven now, instead of dying for your sins?" They would have perished and gone to hell, of course. But he did not do that. Earlier he had told them, "I have come down from heaven, not to do my own will, but to do the will of him who sent me" (v. 38), and he was doing it.

Psalm 69

It is characteristic of Paul to nail down an argument with a passage from the Old Testament after he has made his points well. He does that extensively as he comes to the end of the section of chapter 15 we are studying, quoting Psalm 18:49 in verse 9, Deuteronomy 32:43 in verse 10, Psalm 117:1 in verse 11, and Isaiah 11:10 in verse 12. But he begins this even earlier, in the verses we are studying now, citing Psalm 69:9 to prove that Jesus did not please himself but rather sought to please God his Father for the benefit of others. Romans 15:3 says, "The insults of those who insult you have fallen on me."

Psalm 69 is one of the great messianic psalms of the Old Testament. Seven of its thirty-six verses are directly quoted in the New Testament, and others furnish themes relating to Christ's work that are expanded in the gospels. In the work I referred to earlier Barnhouse noted that if we read this Psalm with Jesus in mind, we will see that he was denied and slandered by his enemies (v. 4), estranged from his own brothers (v. 8), made a proverb by the people (v. 11), criticized by the rulers (v. 12), and was the theme of obscene songs by the drunkards (v. 12). Each of these points lends force to the verse from the psalm Paul quotes and provides examples of the kinds of abuse we should be willing to endure for God and others.

1. His enemies. "Those who hate me without reason outnumber the hairs of my head; many are my enemies without cause, those who seek to destroy me" (v. 4). Since Jesus quoted this verse of himself there can be no doubt how we are to apply it. Among the scribes, Pharisees, priests, and Levites, there were men who simply hated him. It is not hard to know why. Barnhouse explained that they looked like good men only until he came and stood beside them. Then they were exposed in their true colors: "Linen bleaching on the grass seems white until the snow falls; it then appears gray. Thus it was for the so-called 'spiritual' leaders of the people. They hated him freely; they hated him without a cause in himself."

2. His brothers. Psalm 69 also indicates that opposition to Jesus surfaced in his own home. After Jesus was born, Mary bore Joseph at least six children, as at least two daughters and four sons are mentioned in Mark 6:3. Psalm 69:8 says, "I am a stranger to my brothers, an alien to my own mother's sons." Apparently the presence of Jesus in that household caused problems. And no wonder! It is hard to live with a highly talented person. How much more difficult must it have been to live with absolute perfection, which is what Jesus was. His brothers knew that Jesus was exceptional. They knew he had turned water into wine and that he had healed the sick and fed the multitudes, but they saw this only as a potential source of profit for themselves. John tells us, "When the Jewish Feast of Tabernacles was near, Jesus' brothers said to him, 'You ought to leave here and go to Judea, so that your disciples may see the miracles you do. No one who wants to become a public figure acts in secret. Since you are doing these things, show yourself to the world.' For even his own brothers did not believe in him" (John 7:2-5). Clearly Jesus had become "a stranger" to his brothers and "an alien" to his own mother's sons.

3. A proverb. Still further in Psalm 69 we see that Jesus became a cause for "sport" among the people (v. 11). We know that Christian students can be sneered at on college campuses, called religious nuts, the radical right, or the God squad. We do not know what specific words the unbelieving masses used to make fun of Christ, but the psalm leaves no doubt that he became a joke to the people.

4. The rulers. In the next verse we read, "Those who sit at the gate mock me" (v. 12). To sit at the gate was to be an elder and a ruler of the people. Of the model woman described in the last chapter of Proverbs it is said, "Her husband is respected at the city gate, where he takes his seat among the elders of the land" (Prov. 31:23). Thus, those who are referred to in Psalm 69:12 were the rulers of the people, and they were against Jesus.

5. The drunkards. Finally, we read that Jesus was "the song of the drunkards" (v. 12). Solomon wrote that "fools mock at... sin"

(Prov. 14:9), but here we find men who are mocking at the Savior. The Lord Jesus Christ was abused in all these ways, yet he pursued his course because he did not seek to please himself, but the Father.

A Lifetime of Insults

When Jesus began to expose the leaders' sin, they retaliated with hostility. He told them that they were children of their fathers, who had stoned prophets and killed those who were sent to them. "You are doing the things your own father does," he said (John 8:41). They turned on him with anger blazing in their eyes and taunted him with the worst reproach that could be offered. They must have known that Jesus had been born shortly after the marriage of Joseph and Mary. They flung in his teeth that he was known to be an illegitimate child. "We are not illegitimate children," they boasted. Jesus knew that he had been conceived by the Holy Spirit and took this reproach in stride, but he let them know their background: "You belong to your father, the devil" (v. 44). "It should be realized that any one who joins the Pharisees in denying the Virgin Birth of our Lord Jesus takes company with the children of the devil, to be judged to the utmost by the Father when he ultimately deals with all the insults that were given to him through his Son," wrote Barnhouse.

When Philip first told Nathanael about the Lord Jesus, he said, "We have found the one Moses wrote about in the Law, and about whom the prophets also wrote—Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph" (John 1:45). Nathanael's answer was a reproach: "Nazareth! Can anything good come from there?" (v. 46). The same reproach was brought against Jesus by the rulers. "How can the Christ come from Galilee?" they asked (John 7:41). When Nicodemus interrupted their tirades with the suggestion that ordinary civil rights demanded that Jesus get a proper hearing, they turned on him, saying, "Are you from Galilee, too? Look into it, and you will find that a prophet does not come out of Galilee" (v. 52). Barnhouse offers this explanation:

The first time that Jesus ever spoke in public, even before the Sermon on the Mount, his message on salvation by the simple grace of God aroused in the Pharisees the utmost of fury. He had not spoken twenty lines before they were filled with wrath, and rose up and led him to the brow of the hill on which the city was built, intending to push him over the precipice (Luke 4:28-29). His reminder that God saved the Gentile widow and her son and healed Naaman the Syrian, both examples of his sovereign grace toward undeserving sinners, drew the greatest wrath from the people. Men do not want grace from God, they want him to acknowledge that what they find in themselves he also counts as good. This he can never do, and they hate him for it, and they hated his Son when he came with the same message.

Jesus had not been very long in his ministry before men said that he had gone crazy. When he called the twelve and the crowds began to follow him, his friends, perhaps with good intentions, tried to lay hold of him because, they said, "He is out of his mind" (Mark 3:21). They reproached him with this. When later he showed just a touch of the blazing wrath that God will one day exercise through him, telling them how wicked they were, they again thought he was crazy and sent for Mary and his brothers to lead him away quietly (Matt. 12:47).

When he drove out evil spirits, restoring those who had been demon-possessed, the leaders accused him of working by the power of the devil. "It is only by Beelzebub, the prince of demons, that this fellow drives out demons," they said (Matt. 12:24). "One hesitates to contemplate the depths of iniquity in hearts that can look upon the Lord Jesus Christ and attribute his work to Satan," wrote Barnhouse.

When Jesus was on the cross, the people mocked him with his claims:

You who are going to destroy the temple and build it in three days, save yourself! Come down from the cross, if you are the Son of God!

In the same way the chief priests, the teachers of the law and the elders mocked him. "He saved others," they said, "but he can't save himself! He's the king of Israel! Let him come down now from the cross, and we will believe in him. He trusts in God. Let God rescue him now, if he wants him, for he said, 'I am the Son of God.'" In the same way the robbers who were crucified with him also heaped insults on him.

Matthew 27:40-44 It was the height of cruelty to mock a man dying in such agony.

The Bible reveals how the Lord Jesus Christ took these reproaches, which he knew were directed at the Father through him. Matthew paraphrases a passage from Isaiah:

> Here is my servant whom I have chosen, the one I love, in whom I delight;
> I will put my Spirit on him, and he will proclaim justice to the nations.
> He will not quarrel or cry out; no one will hear his voice in the streets.
> A bruised reed he will not break, and a smoldering wick he will not snuff out, > till he leads justice to victory.
> In his name the nations will put their hope.
> Matthew 12:18-21 (cf. Isaiah 42:1-4)

If there was ever an example of one who was willing to bear even the worst of abuses in order to please God the Father, it was Jesus Christ.

Christ's Life through Christ's Power

The point of this is that Jesus is to be an example for us, that we might behave as he did. We have been told by Jesus that if we seek to please God, we will be hated by the world, because we are not of the world: "If you belonged to the world, it would love you as its own. As it is, you do not belong to the world, but I have chosen you out of the world. That is why the world hates you.... If they persecuted me, they will persecute you also" (John 15:19-20). Nevertheless, although we may bear abuse for his sake—and we certainly will if we are living close to him and are bearing a genuine witness for him and for righteousness—we are to bear persecutions patiently without trying to retaliate, that we might please God.

This is an enormous privilege and a daunting challenge. If it were not for the power of Jesus Christ within, we would not respond to either, because we would put ourselves first, as the world does, and avoid the insults. To live as Christ, we must be close to Christ. We must grow in his power by a study of his Word and by close fellowship with him.

F. Godet, the Swiss commentator, wrote, "Divine succor is needed to enable us to follow this line of conduct unflinchingly; and this succor the believer finds only in the constant use of the Scriptures, and in the help of God which accompanies it."

But it's important to remember that in these verses Paul is not talking about Christians standing against the insults and abuses of the world, drawing on the character and power of Jesus to do so, though that is something that is also necessary. Nor is he writing about spiritual warfare. He is talking about a far lesser matter, Christians merely getting along with other Christians, the strong bearing with the limited understandings of the weak and the weak bearing with the beliefs of the strong, whom they believe to be in error. He is simply talking about getting along with one another.

To come back to this point must seem almost a waste of Christ's example, or at least an understatement of the case. But that is exactly the point. Our calling is to be like Jesus Christ, who endured the worst men could do to him in order to please his Father and win our salvation. Since that is our high calling, we should be able to overlook the many ways in which other Christians differ from us and get on with the task of building them up and then striving to grow together with them in the Christian life.

Chapter 219.
The Encouragement of the Scriptures

Romans 15:4

A number of years ago a German theologian named Juergen Moltmann wrote a book entitled The Theology of Hope. His point, which meant a great deal to Bible scholars at the time, was that eschatology (the doctrine of the last things) should not be an appendix to Christian theology— something tacked on at the end and perhaps even dispensable to Christian thought—but should be the starting point of everything. He said that it is confidence in what God is going to do in the future that must determine how we think and act now.

I am not sure that is entirely right. I would call the cross of Christ, not eschatology, the center, arguing that we must take our ideas even of the future from the cross. But Moltmann was correct in stressing that hope is important for living well now. To have hope is to look at the future optimistically. So to some extent a person must have hope to live. The Latin word for hope is spes, from which the French derived the noun espoir and the Spanish, esperanza. But put the particle de in front of those words, and the resulting word is despair, literally "without hope." People who despair do not go on. When John Milton wanted to depict the maximum depth to which Satan fell when he was cast out of heaven, he has him say to the other fallen spirits in hell, "Our final hope is flat despair."

How can any sane person have hope in the midst of the desperate world in which we live? The frivolous can, because they do not think about the future at all. Thinking people find the future grim. Winston Churchill, one of the most brilliant and influential people of his age, died despairing. His last words were, "There is no hope."

Our text says that a Christian can have hope and that the way to that sound and steadfast hope is through the Bible.

In The Wizard of Oz, Dorothy and her friends—the scarecrow, the tin man, and the cowardly lion—make their way down a yellow brick road to find their future. Our text likewise gives us a road to hope. That road leads first through teaching, second through patient endurance, and third through encouragement. The text says, "For everything that was written in the past was written to teach us, so that through endurance and the encouragement of the Scriptures we might have hope" (Rom. 15:4).

The Teaching of the Scriptures

The first and most important stop along this important road leading to hope is teaching, because it is through the teaching of the Scriptures that the other elements, endurance and encouragement, come. Christianity is a teaching religion, and our text is the Bible. It is true that those whose minds have been enlightened by the Bible often go on to learn in other areas too. Some of the greatest scholars in the world have been Christians, and many have traced their love of learning to their Christian roots. Moreover, wherever the gospel has gone throughout the world, schools and colleges and other institutions of higher learning have gone with it. Still, Christians maintain that however much a person may come to know in other areas, if he or she does not know what God has revealed about himself and the way of salvation in the Bible, that person is ignorant and remains a great fool.

Paul said of the Gentile Christians at Ephesus, among whom there must have been many learned persons, that before they had been taught about Jesus and had received him as their Savior, they were "excluded from citizenship in Israel and foreigners to the covenants of the promise, without hope and without God in the world" (Eph. 2:12). They may have been educated, but they were ignorant of the things that matter most. After they had been taught and came to faith in Christ, however, they had hope of "the riches of [God's] glorious inheritance in the saints," which was future, and "his incomparably great power for us who believe," which was present (Eph. 1:1819).

Our text in Romans is about the teaching of the Scriptures and tells us at least three important things about the Bible:

1. The Bible is from God. When Paul says that everything written in the past "was written to teach us," he is not saying that when Moses wrote the Pentateuch, the first five books of the Bible, he did so intending that the church in future ages might be blessed by his writings, or that David wrote the psalms so that we might profit by them. His point is that God caused the human writers of the Bible to write as they did, because what he had in mind was the edification and encouragement of his people through the ages, whether or not the human writers understood this.

This also flows from the context. We remember that Paul has just quoted Psalm 69:9, applying it to Jesus Christ, whom he brought forward as an example for our right conduct. Some may object, "How can you imagine that David was writing about Jesus Christ, who was born so many hundred of years after his own age, or that this has anything to do with us?" Paul is answering, in effect, as F. Godet suggests, "If I thus apply this saying of the psalmist to Christ and ourselves, it is because, in general, all Scripture was written to instruct and strengthen us."

Of course, many other verses say the same thing. Peter wrote, "Above all, you must understand that no prophecy of Scripture came about by the prophet's own interpretation. For prophecy never had its origin in the will of man, but men spoke from God as they were carried along by the Holy Spirit" (2 Peter 1:20-21).

Similarly, Paul told Timothy, "All Scripture is God-breathed and is useful for teaching, rebuking, correcting and training in righteousness, so that the man of God may be thoroughly equipped for every good work" (2 Tim. 3:16-17). The reason the Scriptures are so valuable is that they are unlike other books written by mere human beings. They are from God; therefore they have the authority and power of God within them. Besides, God has promised to bless them to the ends for which they have been given (Isa. 55:10-11).

2. Everything in the Bible is for our good and is profitable. The second important teaching about the Scriptures in Romans 15:4 is that all Scripture is for our good and is profitable. In 2 Timothy 3:16, Paul wrote, "All Scripture is God-breathed and is useful...." In our text he uses the words "everything that was written," but he means the same thing in both passages.

This is not an endorsement of every piece of ancient literature, as if the words "everything that was written in the past" refer to the writings of the ancient Babylonians, Egyptians, Greeks, or Romans. Paul is not writing about secular literature, but about the writings that are "Godbreathed." Other books may instruct and even charm us wonderfully, but only the Bible gives us a sure ground for hope, since only it speaks with full authority and trustworthiness about what God did to save us from sin and give us eternal life.

Paul's statement is, however, an endorsement of all of the Bible. That is, he is informing us that "all Scripture... is profitable" and "everything that was written in the past was written to teach us."

Some critics of the Bible have found things in it that they do not like and have therefore argued either that the Bible is from men only, not from God, or that it is a mixture of the two—some parts being from God and some from man. The parts that are from God are then regarded as authoritative, but the parts said to be from human beings only are discarded as error-prone and nonauthoritative. This is a convenient way of pretending to submit to the Bible's authority while at the same time avoiding anything in the Bible that is convicting or contrary to the critic's thought. This is not the Bible's teaching. It is not historic Christianity. The Bible teaches that everything in it is the true Word of God and that it is binding upon the minds and consciences of all persons. Therefore, if we are being led by God's Holy Spirit, we will conform our thoughts and actions to whatever we find in his Word.

3. Nothing in the Bible is without value. Paul's third point is that not only is everything in the Bible for our good and profitable, but nothing that is in the Bible is without value.

John Calvin was strong in this conviction: "This notable passage shows us that the oracles of God contain nothing vain or unprofitable.... It would be an insult to the Holy Spirit to imagine that he had taught us anything which it is of no advantage to know. Let us also know that all that we learn from Scripture is conducive to the advancement of godliness. Although Paul is speaking of the Old Testament, we are to hold the same view of the writings of the apostles. If the Spirit of Christ is everywhere the same, it is quite certain that he has accommodated his teaching to the edification of his people at the present time by the apostles, as he formerly did by the prophets."

Patient Endurance

The second checkpoint we must pass along the road to hope is endurance, which some versions of the Scriptures translate patience (King James Version), perseverance (New American Standard Bible) or even patient endurance, since the word involves both passively accepting what we cannot change and actively pressing on in faithful obedience and discipleship. This word (hypomonê) occurs thirty-two times in the New Testament, sixteen times in Paul's writings, six of which are in Romans.

Is Paul saying that endurance comes from the Bible—that is, from knowing the Bible? I raise that question because a detail of the Greek text provokes it. Paul uses the word for through (dia) twice, once before the word endurance and once before the word encouragement (the New International Version omits it the second time). According to the strictest rules of Greek grammar, that should mean that endurance is separated from encouragement with the result that the words "of the Scriptures" should be attached to encouragement only. In other words, Paul would be saying that it is through our own personal enduring as well as through the encouragement that we have in studying the Bible that we find hope.

Leon Morris is a fine Greek scholar, and he is led to this position by his grammatical sensitivity. "[Paul's] construction seems to show that only encouragement is here said to derive from the Bible," he says.

In my judgment this is a place where it may be wrong to read too much into a fine point of grammar. Grammatically Morris is right. But in terms of the flow of thought it is hard to suppose that Paul is not thinking of the role the Scriptures have in producing endurance too. For one thing, he links the two ideas together in verse 5, saying, "May the God who gives endurance and encouragement...." Again, in verse 4 both terms follow Paul's opening words about the use of the Scriptures for teaching: "For everything that was written in the past was written to teach us, so that..." Or again, even apart from what Paul is saying, elsewhere we are taught that endurance comes from reading how God has kept and preserved other believers even in terrible circumstances.

James wrote, "Brothers, as an example of patience in the face of suffering, take the prophets who spoke in the name of the Lord. As you know, we consider blessed those who have persevered. You have heard of Job's perseverance and have seen what the Lord finally brought about. The Lord is full of compassion and mercy" (James 5:10-11). He is saying that we learn to endure by reading about the way God helped others before us.

Although they recognize the grammatical issue, a large number of other writers nevertheless see the matter as I have oudined it here. Among these are John Murray, Charles Hodge and F. Godet.

Encouragement

The third checkpoint along the road to hope is encouragement, which also comes to us through Scripture. Encouragement (paraklêsis) is found twenty times in Paul's writings out of twentynine occurrences in the whole New Testament. It occurs three times in Romans.

The interesting thing about this word is that it is virtually the same one Jesus used to describe the work of the Holy Spirit among believers, saying, "It is for your good that I am going away. Unless I go away, the Counselor will not come to you; but if I go, I will send him to you"

(John 16:7; see 14:26; 15:26), and that the apostle John used to describe the work of Jesus himself: "My dear children, I write this to you so that you will not sin. But if anybody does sin, we have one who speaks to the Father in our defense—Jesus Christ, the Righteous One" (1 John 2:1). The word Counselor and the phrase "one who speaks... in our defense" translate the same Greek word paraklêtos, which is also sometimes translated advocate. The literal meaning is "one who comes alongside of another person to help him or her," to back the person up or defend him. So together the passages teach that Jesus himself does this for us, the Holy Spirit does it, and the Scriptures do it too. Indeed, it is through the Scriptures that the Holy Spirit chiefly does his work.

The end result of this is hope. In our text the article is present before the word hope ("the hope"), meaning the Christian hope. This is not just optimism that Paul is writing about, not a hope founded on something the world thinks possible. Also, the verb have is in the present tense, meaning that hope is a present possession. As Calvin says, "The particular service of the Scriptures is to raise those who are prepared by patience and strengthened by consolation to the hope of eternal life, and to keep their thoughts fixed upon it."

An Example from History

But enough analysis! If we are to travel the road of endurance and encouragement to hope by learning from the Scriptures, we should study how it actually works.

There are hundreds of examples of this in the Bible, of course, but let's examine the familiar story of Joseph. Joseph was the next-to-youngest son of Jacob, and he was favored by his father because he was born of his much-beloved wife Rachel and also perhaps because he was an extraordinary young man. His brothers hated him for his virtue so they threw him into a cistern and then sold him to Midianite traders who were on their way to Egypt. Joseph was just seventeen years old. In Egypt he became a slave of a rich man named Potiphar. Joseph served the man well, and he was placed in charge of his entire household. Then Potiphar's wife was attracted to Joseph and tried to seduce him. When Joseph refused to sleep with her, the proud, angry woman denounced him falsely to her husband, and Joseph was thrown into prison.

Joseph languished in prison for two years. Once when he had correctly and favorably interpreted the dream of Pharaoh's cupbearer, predicting that he would be taken from the prison where he too had been confined and restored to his previous position, Joseph asked the man to remember him when he was released and speak a good word to Pharaoh to get him out of prison. But the cupbearer forgot.

The years dragged on. One day God gave a dream to Pharaoh. No one in the palace could interpret it, but the cupbearer remembered Joseph and his ability to interpret dreams and told the king about him. Pharaoh sent for the young man, and Joseph interpreted the dream, predicting seven years of prosperity to be followed by seven years of severe famine. He recommended that the king appoint a wise man to save grain during the good years so that the people would not starve when the years of scarceness came.

You know the story. Pharaoh appointed Joseph to the task. Joseph served well. The land was saved, and in time, when the famine drove Joseph's wicked brothers to Egypt to buy grain, God used Joseph to bring the brothers to repentance. The family was reconciled, and Jacob moved all of them to Egypt, where the people stayed and prospered for many years.

The climax of this great story comes in the final chapter of Genesis, when Jacob dies and the brothers come to plead with Joseph not to take revenge on them. They had completely misunderstood him. He had no intention of doing any of them any harm. "Don't be afraid," he exclaimed. "Am I in the place of God? You intended to harm me, but God intended it for good to accomplish what is now being done, the saving of many lives" (Gen. 50:19-20). The story teaches that God is sovereign even in such terrible circumstances as those that overtook Joseph. And from it we learn to trust God's sovereignty, endure in hardship, be encouraged, and so grow strong in hope.

I have picked this particular story because of Psalm 105, which refers to it. It may have been written by King David, but whoever the writer was, he was a man who needed encouragement. He found it in Joseph's story:

> Give thanks to the Lord, call on his name; make known among the nations what he has done....
> He [God] called down famine on the land and destroyed all their supplies of food;
> and he sent a man before them— Joseph, sold as a slave.
> They bruised his feet with shackles, his neck was put in irons, > till what he foretold came to pass, till the word of the Lord proved him true.
> The king sent and released him, the ruler of peoples set him free.
> He made him master of his household, ruler over all he possessed, > to instruct his princes as he pleased and teach his elders wisdom.

Psalm 105:1, 16-22

This writer clearly knew that "everything that was written in the past was written to teach us, so that through endurance and the encouragement of the Scriptures we might have hope." Do you know that? If you do, you will study what God has spoken and move ahead boldly for him and with hope.

Chapter 220.
A Prayer for Unity

Romans 15:5-6

In the great high priestly prayer of the Lord Jesus Christ, recorded in John 17, Jesus prayed for the church he was about to leave behind, and his prayer was that it might be marked by six important characteristics: joy (v. 13), holiness (v. 17), truth (v. 17), mission (v. 18), unity (vv. 20-23), and love (v. 26). Each of these is prayed for distinctly. But it is significant that of the six, the one Jesus prayed for at greatest length was unity:

My prayer is not for them alone [the disciples]. I pray also for those who will believe in me through their message, that all of them may be one, Father, just as you are in me and I am in you. May they also be in us so that the world may believe that you have sent me. I have given them the glory that you gave me, that they may be one as we are one: I in them and you in me. May they be brought to complete unity to let the world know that you have sent me and have loved them even as you have loved me.

John 17:20-23 Clearly this was an area of church life in which Jesus anticipated problems and for which he therefore prayed at length and in strong terms.

In the letter to the Romans Paul is also concerned about the unity of the church, although he has not been talking about it specifically up to this point, probably because he did not know the Roman congregation personally. He knew the churches of Ephesus, Philippi, and Corinth well, and he had much to say about unity when he was writing to them. He had not yet been to Rome. Nevertheless, he was aware of the potential for divisions within the church at Rome, especially because of the differences between the so-called weak and strong believers.

As I pointed out in chapter 209, Paul's instruction about developing a Christian mind was completed in two verses. To discuss a right estimate of oneself and the need to encourage others took six verses more. A call to love one another filled thirteen verses; material on the relationship of the church to the state took seven verses; right conduct in light of the imminent return of Jesus Christ took seven verses more. But his discussion of how Christians are to accept other Christians when they do not think or behave as we think they should fills all of chapter 14 and the first half of chapter 15, a total of thirty-five verses. Now, as he comes to the end of this section, he prays for unity among these Roman Christians.

This is a typical Pauline touch. He argues passionately, then suddenly interrupts his argument for prayer. Here he says, "May the God who gives endurance and encouragement give you a spirit of unity among yourselves as you follow Christ Jesus, so that with one heart and mouth you may glorify the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Rom. 15:5-6). The verses suggest the nature of this unity and give us its source and goal.

What Kind of Unity?

The word unity does not occur very often in Paul's writings. In fact, in the New International Version it is found only four times. One place is in Ephesians 4, where it is used in two significant ways. Verse 3 says, "Make every effort to keep the unity of the Spirit through the bond of peace." Verse 13 reads, "... until we all reach unity in the faith and in the knowledge of the Son of God and become mature, attaining to the whole measure of the fullness of Christ." There are two kinds of unity in these verses. The second type mentioned, in verse 13, is a unity of understanding or of doctrine, and it is referred to as something yet to be attained, since Christians do not have perfect understanding of the teachings of the Bible and therefore differ on some matters. The differences are not desirable—we would like to be of one mind on all doctrinal matters—but they are inevitable given our present, finite understanding of God's truth. These are matters to be worked on together, and they are in areas in which we should see improvement as we mature in Jesus Christ.

The first unity, in verse 3, is different. It is a family unity "of the Spirit," and it is spoken of as something that has already been given to believers and is now their duty to maintain. It is not based on our limited and even mistaken understandings of God's truth, but on the fact that "there is one body and one Spirit—just as you were called to one hope when you were called—one Lord, one faith, one baptism; one God and Father of all, who is over all and through all and in all" (Eph. 3:4-5). It is this unity for which Jesus prayed in John 17 and for which Paul is also praying in Romans.

In the Greek text of Romans 15:5, Paul's prayer is literally "that they might mind the same thing" or, as the King James Version has it, that they might "be likeminded one toward another." The emphasis is not on identity of doctrine but on mutuality, appreciation of one another, and thankfulness to be with one another in the body of Christ.

The one other text from Paul's writings in which the word unity occurs makes Paul's meaning clear: "Therefore, as God's chosen people, holy and dearly loved, clothe yourselves with compassion, kindness, humility, gentleness and patience. Bear with each other and forgive whatever grievances you may have against one another. Forgive as the Lord forgave you. And over all these virtues put on love, which binds them all together in perfect unity" (Col. 3:12-14). Obviously, what Paul is concerned with here is a set of accepting and forgiving attitudes that recognize other Christians as being part of that one indivisible body of Jesus Christ to which all true Christians belong.

What Christian Unity Is Not

The kind of unity that Paul is praying for is so important that it will be helpful to look at what it is not before we examine what it is. There are two approaches to unity that are particularly wrong.

1. Organizational unity. What most people think of first when they think of church unity is some kind of organizational unity, probably because today we tend to think organizationally but also perhaps because this was emphasized for so long by leaders of the ecumenical movement. The ecumenical movement was an attempt, still somewhat alive but much more lively twenty or thirty years ago, to get all the various denominations of the church to merge. It had several Protestant forms, the best known of which was COCU, the Consultation on Church Union (which became the Church of Christ Uniting), but it also existed in some places as a movement to bring the Protestant churches into the Church of Rome.

There are some advantages to a certain amount of organizational unity, of course. Otherwise there would be no organizations at all—just Christians living in the world. If there are to be places to meet, paid teachers, schools, missionary endeavors, and so on, there have to be structures to support them. That is why churches that believe alike and have common goals ought to be formally united.

But that is only part of the story. The other part is that in itself organizational unity does not accomplish its goals and, in fact, has actually proved harmful. Church history is the proof. In the early days of the church there was much vitality and rapid growth, but there was very little organization. Later, under the emperor Constantine and his successors, there was a great deal of organization as the church tried to mirror the organizational structure and assume powers parallel to those of the Roman Empire. During the Middle Ages the church was indeed one church. Wherever one went there was one large, interlacing structure with the pope at its head. But this was the period of the church's greatest decadence, to the extent that the world actually cried out against that crushing, tyrannous, superstitious, ignorant thing that called itself Christianity.

2. Conformity. Another mistaken notion of the form unity is to take is conformity. This is the chief error of the evangelical church, which, for the most part, is not much concerned with organizational unity. Evangelicals want to maintain their own individual kingdoms and compete with one another for fame and finances. The error of the evangelical church is to strive for an identical pattern of looks and behavior among its members. Some groups train their members in such a way that they end up looking and even speaking alike. Others establish codes of behavior to determine what may and may not be done. Anyone who deviates from these patterns is immediately suspect and may even be judged to be "backsliding" or apostate.

This is not what either Jesus or Paul intended. Paul links his prayer for unity to an acknowledgement that God has made it possible by giving "endurance" and "encouragement." This has to do with our attitudes rather than with organizational structure or conformity.

Similarly, Jesus prayed for a unity that was a reflection of the oneness within the Godhead: "that all of them may be one, Father, just as you are in me and I am in you" (John 17:21). A unity like that involves the values, aspirations, goals, and wills of the participating parties.

New Testament Images for the Church

Let's take this a step farther by looking at three images in the New Testament that express the church's unity: the church as a family, the church as a fellowship, and the church as a body.

1. A family. Christians belong to the family of God, and therefore they are rightly thought of as brothers and sisters, the most common terms used of Christians for one another in the New Testament and early church. God is called Father, and Christians are called brothers again and again in the Epistles.

What is characteristic of this image is that it speaks of relationships resulting from what God has done for us in salvation. One of the ways salvation is spoken of is God begetting spiritual children. John 1:12-13 speaks of this when it says, "Yet to all who received him [Jesus], to those who believed in his name, he gave the right to become children of God—children born not of natural descent, nor of human decision or a husband's will, but born of God. "Jesus spoke of the same reality when he told Nicodemus, "You must be born again" (John 3:7). Those who are born again have become members of God's family and brothers and sisters to each other.

This has two important consequences. First, since the members of this spiritual family are chosen and brought into it by God, we have no say in this matter and must instead welcome whomever God chooses. It is not for us to say whether we will associate with someone or not. Second, we must be committed to each other in tangible ways. We must be willing and available to help each other, and we must defend each other against a hostile world.

But, as one writer notes, "Although God wants us to be brethren, he does not mean that we are to be identical twins." Siblings are usually quite different. One will be artistic and excel in dancing, drawing, and singing. Another may be quite bookish. Still another may have strong organizational skills. One may be a morning person, another an evening person. One may want to be with people all the time. Another may prefer to be alone. It is exactly that way in the church, and we should be happy that it is rather than trying to make everyone alike. Paul told the Ephesians this:

But to each one of us grace has been given as Christ appointed it. This is why it says:

> "When he ascended on high, he led captives in > his train and gave gifts to men."...

It was he who gave some to be apostles, some to be prophets, some to be evangelists, and some to be pastors and teachers, to prepare God's people for works of service, so that the body of Christ may be built up until we all reach unity in the faith and in the knowledge of the Son of God and become mature, attaining to the whole measure of the fullness of Christ.

Ephesians 4:7-8, 11-13

2. A fellowship. The second term that is used to stress the unity of the church is a fellowship. Fellowship isn't an exact word for what the New Testament has in mind, but it is the best word we have in English. In Greek the word is koinonia, which has at its root the idea of sharing something or having something in common. For example, partners who held property in common or had shares in a common business were called koinonoi. Likewise, the Greek of the New Testament period was called Koine Greek, since it was the language most people shared.

As far as Christians being a fellowship is concerned, the idea is that we hold many things in common and that we try to express this in mutually beneficial ways. That which we most hold in common is the gospel, which is why the New Testament can speak of "fellowship [NIV has 'partnership'] in the gospel" (Phil. 1:5). The New Testament also speaks of "fellowship... with the Father and with his Son, Jesus Christ" (1 John 1:3), "fellowship with the Spirit" (Phil. 2:1) and "fellowship with one another" (1 John 1:7).

How do we express this interlocking, common fellowship? The gospel is something we share in. But there are also things we must share out—things we should express to and with one another. We need channels to do this, of course, and that is why Christians regularly meet together not just for the worship of God, which we can also do alone, but for fellowship. Sometimes fellowship takes place in large meetings, but it is generally hard to express it in large gatherings. The best place to express this kind of fellowship is in small groups.

We have tried to encourage small groups at Tenth Presbyterian Church. Tenth Church is not huge, but it is large enough to make fellowship in the larger services difficult. Therefore we have divided ourselves up in several ways. We have age-level divisions, with a graded Bible School and college and young adult groups. We have also divided ourselves geographically, with six regional parishes committed to looking out for those within those six regions. To some extent we also divide by interests: Some adult classes meet around a common theme, groups pray for specific aspects of the church's work, and other groups meet to carry out specific ministries. The most important way we divide ourselves for mutual sharing and fellowship is the seventy to one hundred small-group Bible studies, for it is in these more than in any other church meeting that Christians seem to grow and those who are not yet Christians find Christ.

My own personal experience in this area conforms to what John R. W. Stott found in his greater London parish. He wrote, "The value of the small group is that it can become a community of related persons; and in it the benefit of personal relatedness cannot be missed, nor its challenge evaded.... I do not think it is an exaggeration to say, therefore, that small groups, Christian family or fellowship groups, are indispensable for our growth into spiritual maturity."

3. A body. The third great New Testament image for the church is a body, more particularly the body of Christ. This image is so prominent that Charles Colson has made it the title of a recent study of the church.

A number of New Testament books develop this idea, and with differing emphases. Best known perhaps is the section of 1 Corinthians in which Paul writes of the different ways the parts of the body function and how each is needed: "The eye cannot say to the hand, 'I don't need you!' And the head cannot say to the feet, 'I don't need you!' On the contrary, those parts of the body that seem to be weaker are indispensable, and the parts that we think are less honorable we treat with special honor.... If one part suffers, every part suffers with it; if one part is honored, every part rejoices with it" (1 Cor. 12:21-23, 26). In terms of Paul's argument in Romans, this means that the weak need the strong and that the strong also need the weak. There are no dispensable members of Christ's body.

Another important passage is Ephesians 4:16, which emphasizes the work to be done: "From him [Christ] the whole body, joined and held together by every supporting ligament, grows and builds itself up in love, as each part does its work." This stresses the outward witness and service to others of Christ's church.

We might summarize these three images for the church by saying: (1) "family" stresses our relationship to God (since he is the Father who brings his children into being); (2) "fellowship" stresses our relationship to one another (since we share many things together); and (3) "body" stresses our relationship to those who are without (since we exist to witness to and serve those who do not yet know Christ).

To God Be the Glory

Before I end this study, I want to return to the important purpose clause in our text: "so that with one heart and mouth you may glorify the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ."

According to this verse, the purpose of our unity is not so much that the church might be a pleasant place to be or that weak Christians might be encouraged and strong Christians be channeled into useful work. Rather, it is that God might be glorified. God must be made known as the great and wonderful God he is. Moreover, that is to take place as Christians with one heart (that is, in unity) praise him before others with their mouths.

From time to time I get letters from or speak to people who say they have trouble with the multiplicity of Christian denominations. In fact, I have a letter on my desk that says this even as I write this paragraph. Their argument is that denominations reflect negatively on the church and weaken its witness.

I am not sure that is the case or even that this is what really concerns these people. No one criticizes capitalism because there are many competing corporations, or the automobile industry because there is fierce rivalry between the Big Three auto makers or between American companies and their Japanese or European counterparts. As I said at the beginning, a certain amount of organization is inevitable and some centralization is desirable. For the most part the world understands organizational multiplicity.

I don't think that the world is even particularly troubled by the fact that Christians disagree on some doctrinal matters. After all, they disagree with other people too.

The real problem is that Christians often do not appreciate and support one another, recognizing that whatever differences may exist, all who are Christ's followers nevertheless belong to the same family, fellowship, and body and therefore belong to one another. That is how, above all other ways, the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ must be glorified by us before the watching world.

Chapter 221.
The Example of Our Lord: Part 2

Romans 15:7-9

In chapter 218 we studied the way Jesus did not seek to please himself but rather sought first to please the Father and then those whom he had come to serve. Paul taught that we are to be like him in this, as well as in other things. "Each of us should please his neighbor for his good, to build him up" (Rom. 15:2). In the verses to which we come now Jesus is declared an example in the way he accepted others, regardless of who they were or what they had done: "Accept one another, then, just as Christ accepted you, in order to bring praise to God. For I tell you that Christ has become a servant of the Jews on behalf of God's truth, to confirm the promises made to the patriarchs so that the Gentiles may glorify God for his mercy" (Rom. 15:7-9).

This command follows clearly and obviously from the call to unity in the preceding verses, for the way to maintain Christian unity is to accept those other women and men for whom Jesus died.

A Multifractured World

When Christianity burst upon the world after the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ, it found it an extremely divided place. Some of the divisions were nationalistic—Greeks hating the Romans who had overpowered them and dominated the Mediterranean, and Romans looking down on nearly all the conquered and therefore "inferior" peoples of the then-known world. Some divisions were racial, as between Romans and Greeks and Jews and Arabs. Many of those divisions reached back over centuries of hatred and some persist today, fueling tensions that continue to disturb the Near East. There were rivalries between cities, resolved only when one city destroyed the other, as Rome did Carthage and Sparta, Athens. Some of the divisions were religious.

The sharpest and most intractable of all these divisions was between the religion of the Jews, with its strict Old Testament monotheism, and the religions of the Gentiles, with their many pagan gods. The Jews looked down on Gentiles as heathens, just as the Greeks counted as barbarians all who did not know their language.

It is hard for us to imagine how deep these divisions were at the time of Christ's coming, though we can get an idea of it from an honest look at hatreds in our own day. But as real as these divisions were, the remarkable thing is that they did not divide the Christians. Christians simply transcended them, so that the church from the very beginning was composed of Jews and Gentiles, slaves and freemen, Greeks and Romans, blacks and whites, rich and poor, and so forth. The church at Antioch, which backed Paul on his missionary journeys, is a superb example. It had as its leaders Barnabas, who was a Jew from Cyprus; Simeon, a black man; Lucius, who was probably a Roman, from Cyrene; Manaen, an aristocrat who had been raised with Herod the tetrarch; and Saul, the Jewish teacher from Tarsus (cf. Acts 13:1). What a collection—and what an effective church!

How could people this diverse come together and function so fruitfully? They knew Jesus, the very Son of God; they knew that he had accepted them without condition, sinners that they were, and therefore they had to accept all others for whom he had also died.

The word accept (which also means welcome or receive) is the key, and it goes back to Romans 14:1, where this section of the letter started. Paul did not know the Christians at Rome personally, but he knew human nature, even in Christians, and he wanted to be sure that those who considered themselves to be strong in faith would not look down on those they considered weak, and that the weak would not shun the strong. So he wrote, "Accept him whose faith is weak, without passing judgment on disputable matters." In fact, he also made the point he is making again in chapter 15, when he added as an explanation and a motivation for us, "... for God has accepted him" (v. 3). In Romans 14:3 he points out that the Father has accepted the other Christian. In Romans 15:7 he reminds us that Jesus has accepted him too. So we ask: With that kind of welcome, who are we to hold to our petty prejudices or keep up our damaging rejection of other Christians?

Jews and Gentiles in Christ's Fold

From Paul's perspective the greatest of all possible divisions was the one between Jews, who were God's specifically chosen people, and Gentiles, who apart from Christ were "foreigners to the covenants of the promise, without hope and without God in the world" (Eph. 2:12). Therefore, that is what he deals with specifically in Romans 15:8, saying, "Christ has become a servant of the Jews on behalf of God's truth, to confirm the promises made to the patriarchs so that the Gentiles may glorify God for his mercy." What he means is that Jesus served the Jews to fulfill the promises made to them regarding his coming to die for sin and be their Savior, in order that he might be not only their Savior but the Savior of the Gentiles too.

1. Christ became a servant to the Jews. If Paul said only that "Jesus" became a servant to the Jews, that would not have been a particularly remarkable statement, since anyone could reasonably choose to be a servant to his or her people. But Paul writes "Christ" rather than "Jesus," and Christ means Messiah. The Jews expected the Messiah to be a king who would rule on the throne of David to drive the Romans out of Palestine. A king is served by others. They live to meet his needs; he is not their servant. But Jesus was not that kind of Messiah. He told his disciples, "The Son of Man did not come to be served, but to serve, and to give his life as a ransom for many" (Matt. 20:28). He said of his kingdom, "If anyone wants to be first, he must be the very last, and the servant of all" (Mark 9:35).

2. To confirm the promises made to the patriarchs. Jesus served the Jews, but he did it in God's way rather than theirs. The people wanted a hero. In fact, they were ready to make him king on several occasions, and when he did not meet their materialistic expectations—giving them free meals, for instance—they quickly turned against him. What God wanted was for him to be their Savior, and that is what the promises to the patriarchs meant. These men were told of a

Redeemer who would come, and they were saved by looking to him and trusting him for what he would one day do. Paul explained this to the Galatians, saying, "He [Christ] redeemed us in order that the blessing given to Abraham might come to the Gentiles through Christ Jesus, so that by faith we might receive the promise of the Spirit" (Gal. 3:14).

3. So that the Gentiles might glorify God for his mercy. The fulfillment of the promises to the Jewish patriarchs was not intended for the blessing of Jews alone but for the salvation of Gentiles too so that they along with Jews might glorify God for his mercy. This is the argument of Romans 9-11 telescoped into just one verse. As Paul said to Gentiles toward the close of that argument, "Just as you who were at one time disobedient to God have now received mercy as a result of their disobedience, so they too have now become disobedient in order that they too may now receive mercy as a result of God's mercy to you. For God has bound all men over to disobedience so that he may have mercy on them all" (Rom. 11:30-32).

This, then, is the first important example of Jesus' acceptance of other people: He died for Gentiles as well as Jews. Paul is telling the Jews, who would have tended to look down on Gentile members of the Roman church, that since God has accepted the Gentiles they should not refuse them.

A Friend of Sinners

Jesus' acceptance of others is not limited to Jews and Gentiles, however; it is astonishing and allembracing. Here are some other types of people he accepted:

1. Sinners. "Jesus, what a friend of sinners!" we sing in one of our most popular hymns. It is right that we sing it, for that is exactly what he is. One of his disciples was Levi (Matthew), who had been a tax collector, and when he became a follower of Christ, Levi invited his friends to meet Jesus. His friends were not well thought of by the Jewish leaders —they called them "sinners"—so they demanded of Jesus, "Why do you eat and drink with tax collectors and 'sinners'?" (Luke 5:30).

Jesus replied, "It is not the healthy who need a doctor, but the sick. I have not come to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance" (v. 31).

One of my favorite stories in the Gospels is the account of Jesus' dealing with the woman who had been caught in adultery, recorded in John 8. The leaders of the people were using her to try to trap Jesus and discredit him, because when they brought her to Jesus, frightened and humiliated, they demanded, "Teacher, this woman was caught in the act of adultery. In the Law Moses commanded us to stone such women. Now what do you say?" (vv. 4-5). It must have been a set-up, of course. In order to have witnesses who would satisfy the rigorous demands of Jewish jurisprudence they would have had to have placed spies in the room or at the keyhole. It was a hateful, devilish thing to have done. But it was clever. Because if Jesus had replied, "Forgive her!" they would have denounced him for having rejected God's law. No authentic messenger of God would do that. On the other hand, if he had said, "Stone her!" they would have condemned him for harsh insensitivity, and perhaps hypocrisy too. For he had also said, "Come unto me, all you who are weary and burdened, and I will give you rest" (Matt. 11:28).

"Ah, but what does he do when you do come?" they would have asked. "He tells people to stone you. What kind of a Savior is that?"

We know what Jesus did. First, he caused each of the woman's accusers to be convicted by his own sins, which must have been many. One by one they slunk away. Then, when the people who could have condemned her were gone he said, "Neither do I condemn you.... Go now and leave your life of sin" (John 8:11). He did not excuse her behavior. In fact, he told her to change her way of life. But rather than rejecting her, he accepted her as one of those many sinners for whom he was very soon to die.

2. Outcasts. Tax collectors were social outcasts. Jesus showed his acceptance of them by having one tax collector, Matthew (or Levi), within the select company of his disciples. Even greater outcasts than the hated tax collectors were lepers. They were banned from all normal human contact and were required to remain outside the city gates, lest they contaminate others with their disease. Jesus accepted even these, and he gave tangible evidence of his acceptance by touching and speaking to them when he healed them. One healing is reported in Luke 5. A poor leper came to him begging, "Lord, if you are willing, you can make me clean" (Luke 5:12).

The text says, "Jesus reached out his hand and touched the man. 'I am willing,' he said. 'Be clean!' And immediately the leprosy left him" (vv. 12-13). It was a remarkable display of grace for him to touch such disease-stricken people. Yet he did it, and when he did the lepers as well as other outcast people were made whole.

3. The unclean. In Mark 5 is recorded the story of an "unclean" woman who touched Jesus. She had been suffering from bleeding for twelve years. Any kind of bodily discharge, including bleeding, made people ceremonially unclean so that others could not come in contact with them, even touching their clothing or sitting where they had been sitting, without becoming unclean too. If a person was unclean, he could not go to the temple or share in other normal human activities. The state of the woman must have been one of painful isolation and loneliness. When she learned that Jesus was coming, however, she followed after him and dared to reach out and touch his cloak, thinking, "If I just touch his clothes, I will be healed" (v. 28).

The woman was healed. Her bleeding ceased immediately. Yet she must have been terrified when Jesus suddenly stopped, turned around in the crowd, and asked, "Who touched my clothes?" (v. 30). The frightened woman came forward, no doubt expecting a rebuke for having touched and thus "contaminated" the great teacher. But Jesus did not treat her as one who had done wrong; rather, he commended her for her faith. "Daughter," he said to her, "your faith has healed you. Go in peace and be freed from your suffering" (v. 34).

A few verses later it is told that Jesus went to the home of a synagogue ruler and touched his dead daughter, bringing her back to life. The dead were regarded as unclean too, and coming in contact with a dead body defiled a "clean" person for about a week. Yet Jesus did not hesitate to touch the dead any more than he failed to touch the lepers. He accepted even the most unclean and healed them by doing it.

That would be remarkable if Jesus were only a man. We admire that kind of acceptance when we see it in other people. For the very Son of God to accept sinners, the outcast, and the unclean is utterly wonderful.

Christ's Acceptance of Us

Yet I will tell you something that is even more wonderful than Jesus' acceptance of the sinful, outcast, and unclean people of his day, and that is his acceptance of you and me. True, we may not be "sinners" in the way the righteous persons of Jesus' day meant it when they used that word—that is, those who were in open defiance of the Pharisees' prevailing moral code. We may not be outcasts, pariahs to our neighbors, as the lepers were, or unclean in the Jewish ceremonial sense. But we are sinners in thought, word, and deed. We are outcasts by our own deliberate actions, having turned our backs on God, trampling his mercy underfoot. In the true sense of the word unclean, we have by our many moral transgressions become filthy from head to toe. We are unclean even in our supposed righteousness, for in the sight of God "all our righteous acts are like filthy rags" (Isa. 64:6).

Can you imagine how you in your sin, apart from Christ, must appear to the holy God? You cannot. None of us can see ourselves as God sees us. On the contrary, we think highly of ourselves, dismiss our sins as mere mistakes or shortcomings, and compliment ourselves on how well we are doing. But God tells us how he sees us. Remember Romans 3:10-18:

> "There is no one righteous, not even one; there is no one who understands, no one who seeks God.

All have turned away, they have together become worthless;
there is no one who does good, not even one."
"Their throats are open graves; their tongues practice deceit."
"The poison of vipers is on their lips."
"Their mouths are full of cursings and bitterness."
"Their feet are swift to shed blood; ruin and misery mark their ways, and the way of peace they do not know."
"There is no fear of God before their eyes."

That is how God sees you apart from Christ, as a creature utterly abhorrent to him and as a menace to others. But in spite of that fact, the Lord Jesus Christ, the very Son of God, accepted you and died for you in order to bring you into his righteous kingdom. And God the Father has accepted you too. How, then, can you possibly exclude anyone else? You must accept them, as you have been accepted. And, for that matter, you must not only love Christians; you must also love and seek to bring to Christ all who are not yet Christians—for his sake and for his glory.

To God Be the Glory

As we close, let's reconsider Romans 15:9: "... so that the Gentiles may glorify God for his mercy." It is parallel to the phrase that ends the previous two verses, drawing these two sections together: "... so that with one heart and mouth you may glorify the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ" (v. 6). We are to be united in spirit as God's people, so that God may be glorified; and we are to accept others, as Jesus has accepted us, so that God may be glorified. It is by accepting others that our unity is to be expressed and carried forward.

How God is glorified by that is seen in what I call a biblical understanding of history. Long ago, before God's creation of the heavens and earth and of the people who live on it, God dwelt in glory with his holy angels and everything was harmonious. There was one will in the universe; that will was God's, and it was accepted as good everywhere and unquestionably. But one day Lucifer got it into his head that he could do better than God—that his way was better—and when that happened the original harmony of the universe was broken and division came in. Lucifer became the devil; for devil comes from the Greek word diabolos, and diabolos means disrupter—one who always stirs things up, bringing frustration, anger, sin, and disharmony.

God could have annihilated Satan at once, blotting out the evil. But if he had done that, he would only have shown that he was more powerful than Satan, not that his way was best or that he could restore harmony even out of chaos. So instead of destroying Satan, God let evil run its course. The devil was allowed to work havoc, doing his best to ruin God's creation. He was even allowed to enter the brave new world that God created, drawing Adam and Eve, our first parents, after him in his rebellion against God. But all the devil was able to show was that he could increase the world's disharmony, not make the universe run smoothly or make people better able to accept and love one another. He could turn paradise, the Garden of Eden, into hell (by God's permission), but he could not turn that hell back into paradise.

But God was not finished. Unknown to Satan, God had planned to redeem a select number of people out of the great mass of fallen humanity that the devil was corrupting. So he did it, sending Jesus Christ to die for them to be their Savior from sin and sending the Holy Spirit to give them a new nature. And thus, these weak, fallen human beings became the arena where God demonstrated his ability to bring his people together again, as they were moved to accept each other in Christ because they had been accepted. Thus they glorified God, and God confounded Satan.

John Calvin said it like this: "As Christ has made known the glory of the Father in receiving us all into his grace when we stood in need of mercy, so we ought to establish and confirm this union which we have in Christ, in order to make known also the glory of God."

Chapter 222.

Hope of the Gentiles

Romans 15:9-12

We have already seen several instances of a striking feature of Paul's writing—developing an argument first, then supporting it with quotations from the Old Testament. Paul did that in Romans 3:10-18, supporting his doctrine of human depravity with at least six Old Testament quotations, and then repeatedly in chapters 9-11 and again in chapters 12 and 14. We also see this here, in chapter 15, at the close of his lengthy explanation of why Christians must accept all other Christians. He quotes four Old Testament texts: Psalm 18:49, Deuteronomy 32:43, Psalm 117:1, and Isaiah 11:10.

Much to our surprise, however, the point the citations make is not the major point of this section, which deals with our accepting other Christians. Rather, they support the point made in a minor way in Romans 15:8-9 only—namely, that Jesus became a servant of the Jews by fulfilling the promises made to the Jewish patriarchs "so that the Gentiles may glorify God for his mercy." This point is not made anywhere else in chapters 12-16 but rather in Romans 9-11.

This tells us that "hope for the Gentiles" was a major component of Paul's thinking. We know this was important to Paul personally, because he often reminded people that he was chosen by God to be the apostle to the Gentiles. In fact, he does so just three and four verses further on, in Romans 15:15-16: "I have written to you quite boldly on some points, as if to remind you of them again, because of the grace God gave me to be a minister of Christ Jesus to the Gentiles with the priestly duty of proclaiming the gospel of God, so that the Gentiles might become an offering acceptable to God, sanctified by the Holy Spirit."

This was also important to Paul as an expression of the fullness of the biblical revelation, which taught that salvation would eventually come to the Gentiles as well as to the Jews. This was a major part of his argument in chapters 9-11. We sense something of the importance Paul attached to this truth from the fact that here, in chapter 15, his citations are drawn from every part of the Old Testament: from the law (Deut. 32:43), the prophets (Isa. 11:10), and the writings (Ps. 18:49; 117:1).

If we are Gentiles, as most in the church today are, this truth should be important to us too.

Without Hope and without God

The first point we need to consider is that there was no hope for the Gentiles apart from Jesus Christ. Earlier in Romans Paul asked whether there was any advantage in being a Jew, and he answered, "Much in every way! First of all, they have been entrusted with the very words of God" (Rom. 3:2). He meant that the Jews had the Bible, while the Gentiles did not. Paul interrupted his listing of the Jewish advantages there, but he picked it up again in chapter 9, adding, "Theirs is the adoption as sons; theirs the divine glory, the covenants, the receiving of the law, the temple worship and the promises. Theirs are the patriarchs, and from them is traced the human ancestry of Christ" (vv. 4-5). The Gentiles had none of these advantages. Therefore, Paul was able to tell the Ephesians, who were Gentiles, that before they had heard about Christ and had believed on him, they were "excluded from citizenship in Israel and foreigners to the covenants of the promise, without hope and without God in the world" (Eph. 2:12).

That is a very grim assessment. But if "salvation is from the Jews," as Jesus told the woman of Samaria (John 4:22), meaning that God had been working with Jews almost exclusively from the time of Abraham to the time of Jesus Christ, then it is accurate. It means that for those many centuries in which God was working exclusively with Israel, there was literally no hope of salvation for the masses of the world who were not Jewish.

The Voice of Prophecy

Fortunately, this former absence of hope is not the final word for Gentiles since Gentile salvation was nevertheless also promised in the Old Testament. Paul has already taught this in Romans 9, supporting it, as he does in Romans 15, by citations from the Old Testament (Hosea

2:23, 1:10; Isaiah 10:22-23 and 1:9); in Romans 10:20, and again in Romans 11, where he spoke of Jewish branches being broken off the Jews' own olive tree so that Gentile branches might be grafted in, concluding, "Israel has experienced a hardening in part until the full number of the Gentiles has come in" (v. 25). When we begin to notice the many verses Paul cites, we get a glimpse of how carefully and persistently he must have had to argue this truth when teaching it to the Jewish and Gentile churches.

There is a progression to the four texts he cites in Romans 15. In the first (Ps. 18:49), the psalmist, a Jew, is praising God among the Gentiles. In the second (Deut. 32:43), the Gentiles are called upon to rejoice along with Israel. In the third (Ps. 117:1), the Gentiles are invited to praise God on their own. Finally, in the fourth (Isa. 11:10), it is shown that this was made possible by him who is both the Jewish and the Gentile king. It is valuable to look at each of these texts individually.

1. Psalm 18:49. The first quotation is from Psalm 18, a thanksgiving song in which David looks back over a lifetime of saving interventions and praises God for them. It was apparently written after David's deliverance from Saul, the kings of the many hostile states that surrounded Israel, and the armies commanded by David's rebellious son, Absalom.

At first glance there does not seem to be anything unusual about the psalm, a song by a Jewish king thanking God for, among other things, his victories over the surrounding Gentile nations. But suddenly toward the end of the psalm David declares that he is going to praise God not merely "to" but also "among the [Gentile] nations." This implies that the Gentiles are going to have a part in this praise, listening to it certainly but perhaps also praising God along with David. This is what Paul picks up on when he quotes verse 49 in Romans. He is saying that David looked forward to a day when the Gentiles would know the true God and praise him along with Jews, such as himself.

2. Deuteronomy 32:43. The second quotation comes from Deuteronomy 32, which contains the Song of Moses composed for the people of Israel shortly before his death. Songs or hymns are a means of praising God, but they also often have a teaching function, and that is the case here. A major portion of the hymn reminds the people of the ways God has been good to them (vv. 7-14), while other portions warn them not to depart from the worship of God lest terrible things happen.

Again, like Psalm 18, one would expect this song to be limited in its outlook, thinking of Israel only. But again, like Psalm 18, it also has the other nations in view. Verse 8 is the first verse to strike this more universal note, for it pictures God as "the Most High" who gives each of the nations its portion of the earth's land as an inheritance. The same thing happens again in verse 21, which Paul has already quoted in Romans 10:19: "I will make them envious by those who are not a people; I will make them angry by a nation that has no understanding." The final place this occurs is in verse 43, quoted in Romans 15, which calls on the Gentiles to rejoice together with the Jewish people when God takes vengeance on his enemies and makes atonement for his land and people.

Paul surely would have taken this as a reference to the death of Christ, after which the gospel was preached to Gentiles specifically. It was at this point that Paul's own ministry came into this prophetic forecast of history.

3. Psalm 117:1. The third quotation carries the progression Paul has been developing a bit further. In the first (Ps. 18:49), David was praising God among the Gentiles. In the second (Deut. 32:43), Gentiles are praising God along with the Jews. In this verse, from Psalm 117, the Gentiles are praising God on their own.

Psalm 117 is remarkable for being the shortest psalm in the psalter. But even though it is only two verses long, it has one of the broadest outlooks of any psalm. It is directed to the nations of the world and its peoples, all of whom are called upon to praise Jehovah God for the greatness of "his love toward us" and his "faithfulness," which endures forever. The phrase "his love toward us" might be thought of as meaning his love to Israel only, but that would be contrary to the spirit of the psalm. Therefore, most commentators take it either as God's love "toward the whole family of man," as Charles Spurgeon thought, or of his love for everyone shown by his love for Israel in fulfilling the promises of blessing made to Abraham by sending Jesus Christ to be the world's Savior. Because of the way Paul handled this subject in Romans 9, we are probably right to suppose that he is thinking of God's love in this way in citing Psalm 117:1.

4. Isaiah 11:10. The final quotation comes from Isaiah 11, a chapter that speaks of a future descendant of David who will rule as a great king and bring in a day of universal blessing. The opening part of the chapter is often read at Christmas as a prophecy of Christ's advent:

> A shoot will come up from the > stump of Jesse; from his roots a > Branch will bear fruit.
> The Spirit of the LORD will rest on him— the Spirit of > wisdom and understanding, the Spirit of counsel and > power, > the Spirit of knowledge and of the fear of the LORD— and > he will delight in the fear of the LORD.
>
> He will not judge by what he sees with eyes, or decide by > what he hears with his ears;
> but with righteousness he will judge the needy, with > justice he will give decisions for the poor of the earth.
> Isaiah 11:1-4

The chapter goes on to envision a day of glorious messianic blessing in which "the wolf will live with the lamb, the leopard will lie down with the goat, the calf and the lion and the yearling together; and a little child will lead them" (v. 6). It speaks of a time in which "they will neither harm nor destroy on all my holy mountain, for the earth will be full of the knowledge of the LORD as the waters cover the sea" (v. 9). Then comes the text Paul quotes in Romans: "In that day the Root of Jesse will stand as a banner for the peoples; the nations will rally to him" (v. 10).

Jesse was the father of David. So the text is looking forward to that promised descendant of David who will bring in the messianic age. Paul is saying that the age of blessing has begun by Christ's coming, and that the hope of the Gentiles is in him. This is the main point of Romans 15:9-12, of course. For Paul is not just saying that the Gentiles should be hopeful in the sense that people should never give up hope, or that even the Gentile religions have something going for them. He is saying rather that they have hope because of Jesus Christ. There is hope for Gentiles because Jesus is the Savior of the world and not just the Savior of the Jews. America's Spiritual Decline

When Paul quotes Isaiah as saying that "the Gentiles will hope in him [that is, in Christ]," he is thinking of personal salvation, of course. Yet I cannot look at this text without thinking that it also applies to cultures, particularly American culture, and of the only hope we or any other people have to avoid utter spiritual bankruptcy and chaos. Romans 15:12 (quoting Isaiah 11:10) does speak of "the nations," after all, and we are one of them.

Not long ago someone gave me a copy of a speech William J. Bennett gave to a special twentieth-anniversary gathering of the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank based in Washington, D.C. Bennett served as secretary of education under President Ronald Reagan and later as drug czar under President George Bush. His address, called "Getting Used to Decadence," spoke to America's decline.

Bennett told of a conversation he had with a friend who lives in Asia about how America is perceived today by foreigners. According to Bennett's friend, the world continues to look on America as the leading economic and military power on earth. But, he said, "this same world no longer beholds us with the moral respect it once did. When the rest of the world looks at America... they no longer see a 'shining city on a hill.' Instead they see a society in decline, with exploding rates of crime and social pathologies." Foreigners who come to the United States these days no longer come hopefully but in fear. And they have cause to be fearful—a record number of them get killed here.

Early in 1993, through the Heritage Foundation, Bennett released a book titled The Index of Leading Cultural Indicators, tracing changes in American behavior over the past thirty years (1960-90). There are a few relatively good signs: Since 1960, the population has increased 41 percent; the gross domestic product has nearly tripled; and total social spending by all levels of government (measured in constant 1990 dollars) has risen from $142.73 billion to $787.00 billion—more than a fivefold increase.

But during the same thirty-year period there has been a 560 percent increase in violent crime; more than a 400 percent increase in illegitimate births; a quadrupling in divorces; a tripling of the percentage of children living in single-parent homes; more than a 200 percent increase in the teenage suicide rate; and a drop of 75 points in the average S.A.T. scores of high school students. Today 30 percent of all births are illegitimate, and, according to Bennett, "By the end of the decade, according to the most reliable projections, 40 percent of all births and 80 percent of minority births will occur out of wedlock."

In 1940 teachers were asked to identify the top problems in America's schools. They answered: talking out of turn, chewing gum, making noise, running in the hall, cutting in line, dress code infractions, and littering. When they were asked the same question in 1990, they identified drug use, alcohol abuse, pregnancy, suicide, rape, robbery, and assault.

Within my lifetime, says Bennett, the United States was looked upon as the bright moral conscience of the world. Today we have topped the industrialized world in murders, rapes, and violent crime. We are near the top in rates of abortions, divorces, and unwed births. In elementary and secondary education we are near the bottom in students' achievement scores.

And this is not the greatest problem. The greatest problem, according to Bennett, is that we have gotten used to this condition. We have accepted it. There is no shame, no protest, no outrage, no anger.

Not long ago a person who mugged and almost killed a seventy-two-year-old man was shot by a police officer while fleeing the scene of the crime. A jury awarded him $4.3 million in damages, and no one protested. In California the trial of the two Menendez brothers, charged for killing their elderly parents with a shotgun, resulted in a hung jury. The jurors believed the psychiatrists' defense that they must have been somehow psychologically abused.

Bennett traces our problem to what the ancients called acedia, borrowing a term meaning "an aversion to and a negation of spiritual things." Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn, the great Russian author and expatriate, called it "spiritual exhaustion." The late American novelist Walker Percy described it as America's "weariness, boredom, cynicism, greed and in the end helplessness before its great problems."

Bennett himself called it "a corruption of the heart." Contrasting America's material prosperity with its spiritual impoverishment, he observed, "If we have full employment and greater economic growth—if we have cities of gold and alabaster—but our children have not learned how to walk in goodness, justice, and mercy, then the American experiment, no matter how gilded, will have failed."

Savior of the Nations

As Christians, we did not need William Bennett to tell us that apart from Jesus Christ all people have "corruption of the heart." But we are indebted to him for tracing so graphically what happens when a culture turns its back on God, as ours has done.

Paul's phrase describing the Ephesians before they came to Christ was "without hope and without God in the world" (Eph. 2:12). Our culture wants to be "without God," but it is discovering that to be without God also means to be without hope. We must remind everyone that where there is God, there is hope, and that Jesus Christ is still what Martin Luther called der Heiden Heiland, "the Savior [and, therefore, the hope] of the Gentiles."

Chapter 223.
The First Benediction

Romans 15:13

There is a sense in which the Book of Romans ends with the thirteenth verse of chapter fifteen, because what follows is essentially personal in nature. Paul did not always end his letters with such remarks, and this one would have been complete without them. Besides, Romans 15:13 would have been a great ending.

I have called this study "The First Benediction" because there will be two more benedictions before we end—Romans 15:33 and Romans 16:20—followed by a doxology in Romans 16:2527. Each benediction is important, but this is a particularly important and comprehensive one.

Donald Grey Barnhouse devoted six studies to this verse in his radio series on Romans. (They were reduced to one in book form.) He says, "This verse is a great summary of the blessed life in the brotherhood formed by our oneness in Jesus Christ. The source of that life is the God of hope. The measure of that life is that we shall be filled 'with all joy and peace.' The quality of that life is joy and peace which he desires for us. The condition of that life is faith—we enter it by believing. The purpose of that life is that we might abound. The enabling of that life is divine power. And the director of that life is the Holy Spirit." So clearly, this is a very practical verse.

Romans 15:13 is a prayer, which leads Leon Morris to say, "We should not think of Paul primarily as a controversialist; he was a deeply pious man and it is characteristic that he finishes not with some equivalent of Q.E.D. [quod erat demonstrandum, meaning 'which was to be demonstrated'] nor a shout of triumph over the antagonists he has confronted but with a prayer."

The God of Hope

The obvious place to begin this study is with the word hope, because it is the first key word and occurs twice, once at the beginning and once at the end.

What is striking here is that Paul links hope to God, speaking of "the God of hope." This can point to God as the source of hope (a subjective genitive), or it can point to God as the object of hope (an objective genitive). Both are true. God is the source of hope because he is the source of every good thing. But he is also the object of hope, since we have hope in him and not in the weak things advanced as objects of hope by our secular sinful world.

Paul is not saying to "keep a stiff upper lip" or "look for the silver lining" or "never, never, never give up" when he speaks of the Christian's hope. To be hopeful is a human characteristic possessed in large measure by great men and women, and we admire it. But if that is all we are talking about in terms of our spiritual state, it would be utter deception and delusion. This is because without God our condition is literally, thoroughly, unmistakably, and unalterably hope*less*. We are indeed "without hope and without God in the world" (Eph. 2:12).

As soon as we bring God into the picture the situation is reversed. Now we have hope through the work of Jesus Christ, because God himself is our hope and has given hope to us.

Nothing else can be that or do that. If you put your hope in other people, they will let you down. If you trust your stocks or bonds or bank accounts, you will find that they can disappear overnight. In any case, they are not ultimately satisfying. Health will fail. Houses can burn. Jobs can be lost. Even great nations enter periods of economic and moral decline. But the one who has his or her hope from God and trusts God as he has revealed himself in Jesus Christ can stand firm in anything. Edward Mots expressed it in one of our best-known hymns:

> My hope is built on nothing less > Than Jesus' blood and righteousness; I dare not trust the sweetest frame, But wholly lean on Jesus' name. On Christ, the solid Rock, I stand; All other ground is sinking sand.
> His oath, his covenant, his blood
> Support me in the whelming flood; When all around my soul gives away, He then is all my Hope and Stay. On Christ, the solid Rock, I stand; All other ground is sinking sand.

Paul spoke of this hope when he wrote to the Christians at Corinth, describing himself as "sorrowful, yet always rejoicing; poor, yet making many rich; having nothing, and yet possessing everything" (2 Cor. 6:10).

Abounding in Joy

Joy is one of Paul's great concepts since, as Leon Morris points out, "the term occurs in his writings twenty-one times and no other New Testament writing has it more than John's nine times." He links it to faith in Philippians 1:25 ("I know that I will remain, and I will continue with all of you for your progress and joy in the faith") and with the other fruits of the Holy Spirit in Galatians 5:22-23 ("But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness and self-control").

Yet Paul didn't invent the idea. He received it from Jesus, who spoke of it, along with peace, as his gift to his disciples before his departure. Jesus said, "I have told you this so that my joy may be in you and that your joy may be complete" (John 15:11). Speaking of his death he added, "Now is your time for grief, but I will see you again and you will rejoice, and no one will take away your joy" (John 16:22). Later in his high priestly prayer, recorded in John 17, Jesus said to his Father, "I am coming to you now, but I say these things while I am still in the world, so that they may have the full measure of my joy within them" (v. 13).

This joy has its source in God, since "every good and perfect gift is from above, coming down from the Father of the heavenly lights, who does not change like shifting shadows" (James 1:17).

This means that the Christian's joy is not a matter of natural human endowments or nice circumstances. It is supernatural in origin and in the way it expresses itself in spite of circumstances. Donald Grey Barnhouse wrote, "It is not a question of being an extrovert or an introvert. Some people are by nature gloomy and morose. In the days of superstition it was thought that such had been born under the influence of Saturn, and so they were called saturnine. Other people are buoyant and outgoing, and this was attributed to their being born under the influence of the planet Jupiter, so they were called jovial. But jovial people are sometimes plunged into the deepest despair and gloom when something goes contrary to their selfish desires. And contrariwise, some who are naturally despondent learn to settle upon the eternal Rock, and are filled with a deep and steadfast joy, which does not have its spring in this natural life."

In the prayer recorded in John 17, Jesus indicated that we should have "the full measure" of this divine joy within. But we don't always; that is why he prayed for it on our behalf.

We find much the same thing in our text in Romans, for Paul is praying that God might fill the Roman believers with "all joy and peace as you trust in him." This teaches that there are degrees of these blessings for Christians; and this must mean that although many have them, not all are filled with them. Instead of being mostly empty of blessings, you should be filled to the brim.

Two Kinds of Peace

Two kinds of peace are spoken of in the Bible: peace with God and the peace of God. Thus far in Romans the first meaning has dominated, because Paul has been trying to show how sinners, who are naturally at war with God, might find peace with God through the cross of Christ. Here, however, he is talking about personal peace, the peace of heart and mind that God gives.

William Barclay in his commentary on Romans writes about how people naturally want peace but lose it due to inner tensions or disturbing circumstances:

The ancient philosophers sought for what they called ataraxia, the untroubled life. They wanted above all serenity, that serenity which is proof alike against the shattering blows and the petty pinpricks of human existence. One would almost say that today serenity is a lost possession.

There are two things which make serenity impossible. (a) There is the inner tension. Men live a distracted life, for the word distract literally means to pull apart. So long as a man is a walking civil war, so long as he himself is a battleground, so long as he is a split personality, there can obviously be no such thing as serenity. There is only one way out of this, and that is for self to abdicate to Christ. When Christ controls the tension is gone. (b) There is worry about external things. There are many who are haunted by the chances and the changes of life. H. G. Wells tells how in New York harbor he was once on a liner. It was foggy, and suddenly out of the fog there loomed another liner, and the two ships slid past each other with only yards to spare. He was suddenly face to face with what he called the general large dangerousness of life. It is hard not to worry, for man is characteristically a creature who looks forward to guess and fear. The only end to that worry is the utter conviction that, whatever happens, God's hand will never cause his child a needless tear. Things will happen that we cannot understand, but if we are sure enough of love, we can accept with serenity even those things which wound the heart and baffle the mind.

What that is all about, if we speak in theological terms, is faith in the sovereignty of God—that God is in control and that he never lets anything come into the lives of one of his children that he has not ordained for that person for his or her ultimate good. A person who really trusts in God's sovereignty will have a peace that others cannot even comprehend.

Trust in Him

The fourth of the key terms Paul puts together in this verse is faith, or trust as the New International Version has it. Faith is the indispensable channel for blessings, as they come from God but become ours only as we trust in him.

This is not so mysterious. It is simply a matter of believing God when he tells us who he is and what he has done and will continue to do for his people. I am convinced that the most important of all differences between people is precisely at this point, not whether they are intelligent or unintelligent, kind or unkind, joyful or taciturn, people-oriented or loners, but whether or not they will trust God. Christians by very definition are believers; non-Christians are unbelievers. But I mean more than this. I mean that even professing Christians differ fundamentally in regard either to trusting or not trusting God, either believing him or questioning what he says.

In his study of this verse Donald Grey Barnhouse illustrates this by citing the way some Bible critics reacted when so-called errors they believed they had found in the Bible were explained. They began by creating a series of arguments for why intelligent people could no longer trust the Bible—call them arguments A, B, C, and D. These stood for a while because biblical scholarship is slow. Yet as the years went by arguments A and B were refuted by a better knowledge of the Bible and of the times of the writing of the biblical documents. By this time these same unbelieving critics had developed arguments E, F, G, and H. Scholarship crawled on and eventually explained these problems. But now the critics had arguments I, J, K, L, and M. And so it has gone. Eventually they ran out of letters and had to start again!

We might expect that such people would learn from what has happened, but they do not. In the meantime, however, as Barnhouse writes, "While this parade of doubt passes by, there is the quiet march of men of faith who are filled with all joy and peace in believing, because they have been filled by the God of hope who establishes, strengthens and settles them."

I have often called attention to Charles Haddon Spurgeon's remark that he was willing to be thought a fool today, knowing that in twenty or thirty years his faith in the Word of God would be vindicated, and chiding those who aspired to seem wise now by attacking the Scriptures but who would look foolish in a decade or so's time.

Learn to trust God. You will find that as you trust him you will grow stronger in your faith and that you will become ever more firmly settled in the wonderful doctrines taught us in the Bible. Moreover, you will discover something of the perfect joy and peace of believing God. Hymn writer Thomas Kelly (1769-1855) wrote this:

> Trust in him, ye saints, forever;
> He is faithful, changing never;
> Neither force nor guile can sever
> Those he loves from him.

Powered by the Holy Spirit

The fifth and last of the great biblical words found in Romans 15:13 is power, in the phrase "by the power of the Holy Spirit." In the Greek it is the word dynamis, not exousia (which is sometimes also translated as power but actually means authority). It is a power that gets things done.

This phrase reminds us that nothing of any spiritual value is possible in and of ourselves since, as Jesus said, "Apart from me you can do nothing" (John 15:5). We cannot believe unless we are enabled to believe by God (Eph. 2:8). We cannot find peace unless we submit our requests to God by prayer and earnest petition (Phil. 4:6-7). Joy comes only from God and is a fruit of the Holy Spirit's work within (Gal. 5:22). Hope is impossible (Eph. 2:12). But while these blessings are impossible for any of us to achieve by ourselves, everything is possible for God who makes them possible for us and in us by his Spirit's power. In fact, God promises to bless us in all these ways if we will trust him, and it is for this that Paul is praying in Romans 15.

By ending with a reference to "the power of the Holy Spirit," the prayer that is our text both begins and ends with God. This is an important point, and it is one that should be familiar to us by now since it is exactly what we found in Romans 11:36, which closed the long doctrinal section of the epistle. It ended with a doxology, the final words of which were:

> For from him and through him and to him are all things. To him be the glory forever! Amen.

Everything in this whole universe begins with God, is accomplished by God's agency, and exists for God's glory. But if that is true of the inanimate universe—the world of plants and trees, of suns and planets, of quasars, quarks, and black holes—it is certainly true of salvation. It is true of you, if you are a Christian. You exist because God created you. You believe because he worked faith in you and sustains it in you by the power of his Holy Spirit. He does this that you might live to his glory now and indeed forever.

Left to ourselves we can do nothing. Even as saved people we would fall at the first wisp of temptation or the first blast of Satan's death-dealing blows. But because God is for us we can stand firm and triumph. That is why Thomas Kelly continues, in the hymn from which I quoted earlier:

> Keep us Lord, O keep us cleaving
> To thyself and still believing,
> Till the hour of our receiving
> Promised joys from thee.

Finally, we note that according to our text, all this is so Christians "might overflow with hope." That is Paul's emphasis, his conclusion. To put it in temporal sequence: God, who is the source of hope, is asked to fill believers with joy and peace through their learning to trust in him, so that by the power of the Holy Spirit's working they might overflow with the hope of which God the Father is the source.

This is the fourth mention of hope in this chapter (vv. 4, 12, 13 twice) and the third since verse 12. So obviously it is Paul's main concern and should be ours also, especially since we live in an age that is so lacking in hope. As I look around me today I sense that people have lost hope in nearly everything. They have no faith in politicians or the economy or justice from the courts or even safety from those authorized to provide it. They do not even have faith in themselves. And they are without God, and therefore there is no hope for them in this world.

What an opportunity for God's people! Robert Haldane says, "The people of God have high hopes." Indeed we do. We have divine, uplifting, great, overwhelming, and overpowering hopes. So let's be hopeful. Abound in hope—and let the world know why.

Part Twenty-One.

Paul's Personal Ministry and Plans

Chapter 224.
Check-off Points for a Good Church

Romans 15:14

Have you ever come to the end of something that has been exceptionally nice and found yourself feeling a bit sad about it? Maybe a vacation? Or a night at the opera? Children feel sad when Christmas is over, though their parents are usually rejoicing.

We have something like that now. We are coming to the end of our study of Paul's great letter to the Romans. In it Paul has unfolded the Christian doctrine of justification by faith in all its many ramifications. He has demonstrated its necessity, described what God did to bring it about through the atoning death of Jesus Christ, explained how it works itself out by the power of the Holy Spirit in individual lives to give a permanent and sure salvation, and answered objections rising from the failure of the majority of Jews to believe the gospel. He has unfolded practical applications of this theology in such areas as yielding our minds to Jesus Christ, a proper evaluation of ourselves and others, matters of church and state, how believers are to live in light of the imminent return of Christ, and the need for Christians to accept and value one another.

With Romans 15:14, Paul begins to wrap this up, turning in his final paragraphs to his reasons for writing the letter, suggesting what his future travel plans might be, and sending greetings to people he knew in Rome. But even though he is ending, he still has quite a bit to say.

How does this last section fit in? We can understand the outline of Romans best if we think of it as a doctrinal treatise wrapped up in a letter. The letter began with the first seventeen verses of chapter 1. Everything since has been Paul's treatise. But here, in verse 14 of chapter 15, Paul resumes the letter format and actually harks back to some of the things he wrote about in chapter 1. The words "my brothers" (Rom. 15:14) show that he is speaking personally now and from a concerned Christian heart.

Those Roman Christians

Paul tells the Roman Christians in the opening sentence of his personal remarks that they are doing all right and that he is convinced this is so. The full text says, "I myself am convinced, my brothers, that you yourselves are full of goodness, complete in knowledge and competent to instruct one another." Paul said something along these lines in the first chapter when he took note of their strong faith and of the fact that it was being talked about all over the world (v. 8).

He is renewing his comments along these lines because he had been developing his doctrinal arguments fully and forcefully—the next verse acknowledges that he had written "quite boldly on some points, as if to remind you of them again"—and he knew that they might think that he somehow considers them to be deficient.

Of course, the fact that he has written as he has, far from being a thoughtless slight or criticism, is actually a compliment. Nothing is clearer than that the letter is for people who take their faith seriously. Yet it is not the mere fact of the letter that is a compliment. Paul is aware that his confidence in these believers, whom he had never seen, might nevertheless be misunderstood. So he compliments them directly, using the terms appearing in this verse: (1) "full of goodness," (2) "complete in knowledge," and (3) "competent to instruct one another. "John Murray says of this verse, "He could scarcely have devised a combination of words that would more effectively convey to them his own personal conviction of the fruit of the gospel in their midst."

If this really is Paul's way of complimenting the Roman church on being what a church should be, then he is also giving us three criteria by which we can evaluate ourselves—or any local gathering of believers.

Full of Goodness

Paul begins with goodness, and he says that this is something of which the Roman church was full. This is a rather rare word, not found in classical Greek but used in the Septuagint, elsewhere in Paul's writings, and by some later church writers, no doubt because of its use by Paul. The word is agathôsunê, and it is significant because it refers to moral or ethical goodness as well as to what we would most naturally think of —namely, kindness, thoughtfulness, charity toward the poor, and such.

This is important, of course, especially when we remember what Paul had to say about goodness in the earlier chapters. In his study of the nature of fallen man developed in chapter 3 he quoted Psalm 14:1-3 and 53:1-3 as teaching that "there is no one who does good, not even one" (v. 12).

Even worse, not only do we fail to do or practice good; we also actively do evil, and that continuously.

> "Their throats are open graves; their tongues practice deceit."
> "The poison of vipers is on their lips."
> "Their mouths are full of cursing and bitterness."
> "Their feet are swift to shed blood; ruin and misery mark their ways, > and the way of peace they do not know."
> "There is no fear of God before their eyes."
>
> Romans 3:13-18

How, then, can Paul speak in chapter 15 of the Roman believers being filled with goodness? The answer, obviously, is that they had become Christians, having been turned from their sin to faith and righteousness by the power of the Holy Spirit. It is true, as Robert Haldane writes, that "in our flesh there is nothing good." But it is equally true that "from the work of the Spirit on our hearts we may be full of goodness." This is to be a normal condition. It is not a matter for some superclass of Christians, what some branches of the church call saints.

We need to remember that Galatians 5:22-23 lists goodness as one part of the Holy Spirit's fruit: "But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness and self-control," and that, according to Ephesians 2:10, doing good works is the necessary outcome of our having become Christians: "For we are God's workmanship, created in Christ Jesus to do good works, which God prepared in advance for us to do." If we do not show any evidence of God's goodness in our lives or if we do not do any good works, it is evidence that we are not Christians. So goodness is a check-off point not only for a good church, but for whether we are genuine followers of Jesus Christ.

Let me illustrate what we should be with this example. Less than two hours before I wrote this paragraph I received word that one of the leading members of our church had died. His name was Cornelius Phillips, and he had blessed many people because of his faith, strong testimony, and good works. When I heard of his death I immediately pulled out a letter that a man I did not even know had written about him a year and a half earlier. It read:

I'm writing regarding one of your church members at Tenth Presbyterian Church. He's in the hospital now, and I'm sure the folks at church are praying for him. What I wanted to say was that he is a fine Christian. He cares about the Lord; he cares about his family, and also about his church.

I met Cornelius Phillips last August when my father was ill and passed away. He lent a great deal of peace and caring to our family at that time and still does today.... Your church has a good reputation, and I would have to say that people like Cornelius and his wife and others like them are part of the reason for that reputation. Cornelius in his humility would be the first to say, "Praise the Lord." I would echo that statement and say, "Praise the Lord" for people like him.

That is genuine Christianity. Wouldn't it be wonderful to be part of a church filled with such people? I dare to say I am part of such a church and that there are many like them. I would say of them, as Paul said of the Roman congregation, "I myself am convinced, my brothers, that you yourselves are full of goodness."

Yet we must not presume along these lines. We must constantly be asking, Am I such a person as Paul describes here? Am I filled with God's goodness? Would anybody ever use Paul's words to describe me? If we cannot answer yes to those questions, it is time for self-examination and for doing what Peter had in mind when he wrote, almost immediately after having spoken of the need for goodness, knowledge, self-control, perseverance, godliness, brotherly kindness, and love among Christians, "Therefore, my brothers, be all the more eager to make your calling and election sure. For if you do these things, you will never fall, and you will receive a rich welcome into the eternal kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ" (2 Peter 1:10-11).

Complete in Knowledge

The second check-off point for a good church is the phrase "complete in knowledge." This does not mean learned in an academic sense but rather a sound, practical understanding of the Christian faith that will issue in wholesome, helpful conduct.

At this my mind goes back to our studies of Romans 12:1-2, especially the part where Paul urges us to be transformed by the renewing of our minds. I made the link between thinking like a Christian and acting like a Christian. I said that you will never act like a Christian unless you begin to think properly. That is what is wrong with American religion, of course. Pollster George Gallup has described America as richly religious but ethically impoverished. In an interview with Reformed Theological Seminary Journal he said:

Religious belief is remarkably high—certainly, the highest of any developed nation in the world. At the same time, American religious life is characterized by a series of gaps. First, an "ethics gap" exists between Americans' expressed beliefs and the state of the society they shape. While religion is highly popular in America, it is to a large extent superficial; it does not change peoples' lives to the degree one would expect from their level of professed faith. In ethical behavior, there is very little difference between the churched and the unchurched.

The problem is found in the second gap Gallup mentions, a gap between faith and knowledge. "Related to this is a 'knowledge gap' between Americans' stated faith and the lack of the most basic knowledge about that faith. Half of those who say they are Christians do not know who delivered the Sermon on the Mount," Gallup says.

We would like to think this is a problem only for nominal Christians or perhaps, speaking as evangelicals, for liberals. After all, liberals do not even believe the Bible, we think. But it is a problem for us too.

Some time ago I read a book by David Wells, Gordon-Conwell Theological Seminary professor of historical and systematic theology, called No Place for Truth: Or Whatever Happened to Evangelical Theology. Wells has a simple but very disturbing thesis: Evangelicalism as a religious force in American life is dead or is in the process of dying because it has abandoned any serious commitment to truth. He is not saying that evangelicalism is dead as a sociological force or presence, for evangelicals have large churches, many members, and a great deal of money. But since they no longer really care about the truthfulness of the gospel and the Christian faith as a whole, they are ceasing to make any significant difference.

I can hear many questioning that. It is the evangelicals, rather than liberals, who believe the gospel, they say.

Well, there is a great deal of difference between what we say we believe or even think we believe and what we believe practically. To judge by what evangelicals do rather than by what they say, which is what Professor Wells is attempting, evangelicals actually believe in Madison Avenue techniques or miracles for evangelism, psychology for Christian growth and sanctification, spiritual voodoo for discerning the will or God, and the power of politics, wealth, or numbers for making an impact on society. This is not what the followers of Christ did in an earlier age, when they proclaimed and trusted in the truth of the gospel.

What is happening to evangelicals is what happened to the liberal church earlier in this century, though most evangelicals are unaware of it. They are losing faith in the power of the truth of God, blessed by the Spirit of God, to make a difference. They are in fact becoming quite worldly. It can hardly be said of most of today's evangelical churches that they are "complete in knowledge," meaning a sound and significant knowledge of the truth of God's revelation, even though they may be proficient in launching and developing churches.

Sadly, if this comparison holds, the prognosis for the future of the evangelical church is prefigured by the history of the liberal denominations that once had plenty of members and money but have been losing both quite rapidly.

Churches will lose their significance, too. In order to influence society, a person or a movement must be different. But Christians will never be different unless they understand, believe, and act upon the revelation of the character and ways of God that we have in the Bible. A while ago I asked the faculty at Gordon-Conwell Seminary what changes they had noticed in seminary students in recent years.

David Wells was present at this gathering, and he replied that he had noticed four things. First, each entering class was more biblically illiterate than the last. Second, each class seemed to be filled with more individuals who were swamped with their own personal problems and thus were thinking mostly about themselves rather than about their studies or how they might help others. Third, they had a greater sense of their own personal rights or entitlements; they expected everything to be done for them. And fourth, they were sold out to and mostly uncritical of the surrounding secular culture.

I find that frightening, now and with a glance to the future. Can it be said of us that we are "complete in knowledge"? We should be. The church in Rome was. What is going to happen to us if we are not?

Competent to Instruct One Another

Finally, Paul says in praise of the Roman church that the believers in Rome were "competent to instruct one another." The Greek word translated competent is based on the word dynamis (actually dynamenoi), which has the idea of being powerful or effective. Dynamis was the word used in the phrase "by the power of the Holy Spirit" in verse 13. Instruct is nouthetein, which carries the idea of admonishing another person in order to correct something that may be wrong. In the New Testament the word occurs only in Paul's writings plus once in a speech of his recorded in Acts 20:31.

In Acts 20 Paul has arrived at Miletus on the coast of Asia Minor near Ephesus and has sent for the elders of the Ephesian church in order to say good-bye to them and give them his final admonitions and encouragements. As part of this helpful instruction he brings forward his own example when he was with them earlier, saying, "Remember that for three years I never stopped warning each of you night and day with tears" (Acts 20:31).

He constantly had the health and well-being of the Ephesian church in view and always did everything possible to build it up. Thus, he was always speaking to them about God and the gospel and encouraging them to go forward steadily and boldly in the Christian life.

Do we love the Lord enough to talk about him naturally and often? Do we love others enough to bring spiritual truths into daily conversation? Do we care for Christians enough to point them in the right direction when we see that they are deviating from or falling short of it?

And do we sometimes talk about difficult things, though kindly? Once Donald Grey Barnhouse was sent an appraisal of a man who was under care of the church's session as a candidate for the ministry. It had been prepared by a mature Christian under whom the candidate had worked and was, as Barnhouse said, "a dissection of his spiritual anatomy." Barnhouse met with the candidate and started to review the appraisal with him. He had hardly gotten beyond the first paragraph of the four-page document before the young man reacted strongly. Barnhouse told him to jot down his disagreements while the letter was being read and they would discuss them, which they did. It was easy to see that he was deeply agitated and wounded.

When Barnhouse finished, the man demanded, "Do you agree with this?"

Barnhouse did not reply to that question, but he said, "I do not know when I have ever read a paper that more clearly reveals a heart of love in the man who prepared it. If I were to write a title, I would call it, 'How to Salvage John Jones for the Lord Jesus Christ.'"

That is what the apostle Paul was doing in Ephesus and what he was complimenting the Roman believers as being able to do with one another, not to tear them down or expose each other's faults, but with the goal of training them and encouraging them for the work of Jesus Christ.

If these things can be said of us, thank God. We are not capable of developing these things in ourselves. They are his work. If they cannot be said of us, then they are goals that we can work for: (1) that we might be full of goodness, (2) that we might be complete in knowledge, and (3) that we might be competent to instruct one another. At that point we will have begun to be a mature church, having attained "to the whole measure of the fullness of Christ" (Eph. 4:13).

Chapter 225.
Paul's Priestly Ministry

Romans 15:15-16

Christianity has only one priest, Jesus Christ. He alone has made atonement for our sins by his death on the cross, and he alone makes intercession for us before the Father. That is why the church's preachers, pastors, or ministers are never called priests in the New Testament.

In light of this we find something very striking in our text. Here Paul is writing of his ministry to the Gentiles, a ministry given to him by Jesus Christ, and he speaks of his "priestly duty." This is striking because the words are not used in that way elsewhere and also because in other places Paul explicitly disclaims interest in what are usually thought of as normal ministerial functions. An example is baptism. He told the Corinthians he did not baptize often and that he was glad he had only baptized a few persons in their city (1 Cor. 1:14-17).

He is making a contrast between what priests are normally thought of as doing and what he was actually called to do as minister to the Gentiles. Priests stand between men and God and offer sacrifices. The priestly duty to which Paul refers is to proclaim the gospel.

The Curse of Priestcraft

It has been a misfortune for the church that its ministers ever got the idea that they were anything else but preachers.

What happened in church history is something like what occurred in Israel in regard to the people's wanting a king. In the early days of Israel's history, after the conquest of Canaan, the land was ruled by judges whom God raised up when leadership was required. But the people began to look around at the other nations who had kings, and they decided they wanted one too. They approached Samuel, who was a judge at that time, and said to him, "Appoint a king to lead us, such as all the other nations have" (1 Sam. 8:5). This idea displeased Samuel, but the Lord agreed to their request, and headstrong Saul became the first of many wayward and even oppressive kings of Israel.

Not content with the role God had given them to teach and so guide the church and its ministry, ministers in the early church looked around at the nearby pagan religions, which had priests, and decided that they wanted to be priests too. So they began to wear special clerical clothes and lord it over the laity. What is worse, they began to think of the communion table as an altar and the observance of the Lord's Supper as a sacrifice in which the body and blood of Jesus were to be repeatedly offered up for sins. From this terrible error came the mass.

Moreover, the clergy taught that they were necessary for the offering to be rightly made and thus that salvation was impossible for anyone without their priestly mediation. The heresy of sacramental salvation was the sad result.

Robert Haldane wrote, "The bread of the Lord's table at length became the body of Christ in a literal sense; the table on which it lay became the altar; the teachers became the priests who offered the sacrifice of the mass; and the contributions of Christians became offerings. In all these things, and innumerable others, the figurative sense has been, by a gross imagination and the artifice of Satan, turned into a literal sense, to the utter subversion of truth."

What a difference between this and what Paul says of his priestly ministry in our passage. Charles Hodge described the contrast this way: "In this beautiful passage we see the nature of the only priesthood which belongs to the Christian ministry. It is not their office to make atonement for sin, or to offer a propitiatory sacrifice to God, but by the preaching of the gospel to bring men, by the influence of the Holy Spirit, to offer themselves as a living sacrifice, holy and acceptable to God."

The Nature of the Ministry

These verses teach that the nature of the Christian ministry is to proclaim the gospel.

The purpose of a court trial is to learn the truth and deal with its consequences. Therefore, witnesses are required to promise to tell "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." But since it is often difficult to get at the truth, there are such things as physical evidence, depositions, testimony by experts, and cross examinations. The task of the minister is likewise to proclaim "the gospel, the whole gospel, and nothing but the gospel." But so many other things get in the way and obscure the gospel or its proclamation that in many cases this essential task of teaching is just not done.

Let's follow the outline suggested by the swearing in of trial witnesses and talk about "the gospel, the whole gospel, and nothing but the gospel."

1. The gospel. The gospel is good news, which is what the Greek word euangelion means. Nothing should be easier to proclaim than that, we think. But let's ask a few questions. First, what is the nature of this good news? Answer: that God has provided a way for us to be saved from sin through the work of Jesus Christ. Now let's explore that: What is sin? The Westminster Shorter Catechism answers this way: "Sin is any want of conformity unto, or transgression of, the law of God." What, then, is the law of God? To answer that question we have to explore the meaning of the Ten Commandments, which is what Jesus seems to have done with the rich young man who came to him, asking, "Good teacher, what must I do to inherit eternal life?" (Mark 10:17), and who later went away sorrowful.

This is also what Paul has done in Romans. He has explored the nature and extent of sin in great detail so we might be able to understand the nature of God's saving grace toward us in Jesus Christ.

The point is that although the gospel is a simple thing, explaining it takes time. But this is what many of today's churches, even evangelical churches, fail to do. It is why David Wells talks about the death of evangelicalism in America in No Place for Truth: Or Whatever Happened to Evangelical Theology." Our churches may appear prosperous on the surface, but thousands of them are dead or dying because in a practical sense they have abandoned truth.

2. The whole gospel. Paul also made it his aim to preach the whole gospel. This is very important. I have pointed out that the nature of the gospel is often missed because we do not deal with such underlying matters as sin as defined by God's law. But even when we have done that and have gone on to speak of the work of Christ in saving us from God's just punishment for our sin, we still have not explained the whole gospel. For the good news is not just that God has made a way for us to be saved from sin's penalty but that God is also saving us from practicing sin.

In other words, sanctification is part of what is going on in salvation. Sanctification is not justification. Justification is an act; sanctification is a process. They must be distinguished, but they cannot be separated—you cannot have one without the other. Therefore, if a person claims to be saved but is not going on in the Christian life, that claim, however sincerely stated, is presumption. Jesus said that we must take up our cross daily and follow him (Luke 9:23). He said, "He who stands firm to the end will be saved" (Matt. 10:22). According to the Bible, Jesus died to save us from our sin, not in it.

This too is what Paul has been teaching in Romans. And not just that. He has taught a Christian view of history and the need to apply the whole of the gospel to the whole of life, which is what chapters 12-16 are about. When we begin to think along these lines, we soon discover that "the priestly duty of proclaiming the gospel of God" is not easy.

3. Nothing but the gospel. There is more than one way to tell a lie, and one way is to tell the truth but add to it falsely. The same thing is true of the gospel. The great Christian apologist C. S. Lewis remarked that the greatest heresies in the church have not been the denials of Christian truth so much as they have been additions to it, what Lewis called "Christ and...": Christ and Buddha, faith and works, grace and merit, Christianity and secularism, and so forth.

In the letter to the Galatians Paul was dealing with people who wanted to add the keeping of the law to faith as a way of justification. He said that if they did that, Christ would be of "no value" to them at all (Gal. 5:2). He said that if anyone preached a gospel of "Jesus and...," this would be another gospel—a false gospel—and that he should be condemned.

The positive expression of what Paul was doing appears in his words to the believers at Corinth:

"When I came to you, brothers, I did not come with eloquence or superior wisdom as I proclaimed to you the testimony about God. For I resolved to know nothing while I was with you except Jesus Christ and him crucified" (1 Cor. 2:1). This does not mean that Paul only preached so-called salvation messages or that he failed to relate his teaching to what the Corinthians were dealing with as part of their culture. But he did not attempt to add to Christ's work. He preached Christ and Christ only.

Tact and Boldness

There is an amazing balance in what Paul is doing here between what we would call tact and what he calls boldness. Having stated the gospel fully and applied it forcefully, especially in urging the so-called strong Christians to bear with those they considered to be weaker and urging the weaker Christians not to condemn the strong, Paul apparently sensed that the Roman believers might be offended by his frankness. So he acknowledges that he has written "quite boldly on some points," possibly in an offensive manner, yet tactfully, too. For he not only admits his boldness but explains it in the context of merely reminding the Roman Christians of what they probably already knew.

We learn from this that although it is important to preach "the gospel, the whole gospel, and nothing but the gospel," it is not necessary to do it offensively. We should always be respectful of the people to whom we speak or write.

We also learn from this passage that we need to be reminded of these core doctrines. If Paul is serious about reminding these believers at Rome, then they were already well instructed.

Nevertheless, they still needed reminding, as we all do because we tend to forget God's truth or at least neglect it and let it slide away from our active minds. We always need to stir one another up to remembrance (2 Peter 1:12-15).

The Goal of the Ministry

It's important to note in this text how Paul writes about the goal of his ministry. We hear a great deal about goal-setting these days: Companies set goals, individuals set goals, and even churches spend time analyzing the precise nature of their work and state objectives and goals. Paul's goal is this: "so that the Gentiles might become an offering acceptable to God, sanctified by the Holy Spirit."

Paul is not making a formal argument at this point. He does not give us an Old Testament quotation to nail his point down, as he has done many times before. But I suspect, because of his use of the language of sacrifice, that he has Isaiah 66:20 in mind. Isaiah was writing about those who "will proclaim [God's] glory among the nations" (proclaim is the very word Paul uses), and he concludes, "They will bring all your brothers, from all the nations, to my holy mountain in Jerusalem as an offering to the Lord."

That is what Paul says God has called him to do: to proclaim the gospel "so that the Gentiles might become an offering acceptable to God, sanctified by the Holy Spirit."

Gentiles were considered to be unclean by Jews, but, according to Paul, they are to become an offering sanctified to God by the Holy Spirit. The word sanctified means to be set apart to God and dedicated or consecrated to him. Paul said this of them at the very beginning of the letter: "To all in Rome who are loved by God and called to be saints" (Rom. 1:7). How are people sanctified? The first way is simply by their becoming Christians, for all who become Christians also become saints, since Christians are by definition people set apart for God. It is because of this that Paul can write inclusively of the saints at Corinth (1 Cor. 1:2), the saints throughout Achaia (2 Cor. 1:1), the saints in Ephesus (Eph. 1:1), and so on.

The second way is by their offering their bodies to God "as living sacrifices," which is what Paul urged at the start of this final section of the letter (see Rom. 12:1). Either meaning would fit the context here. But we sense, just because this is the practical portion of the book, that what he has in mind is a dedicated, effective, hardworking, God-glorifying Gentile Christian church.

The Sufficiency of the Word of God

How is all of this to happen? How are the Gentiles (or Jews, or anyone else for that matter) going to become an offering that is acceptable to God, sanctified by the Holy Spirit? By proclaiming the gospel.

Do we really believe that God has given us what we need in the Bible, or do we think we have to supplement it with other man-made things? Do we need sociological techniques to do evangelism; psychology, psychiatry, and counseling for Christian growth; extrabiblical signs or miracles for guidance; and political tools for achieving social progress and reform? To judge from their programs, this is exactly what many evangelicals and evangelical churches believe and are practicing. But it is precisely why they are so weak and why "evangelical" religion is failing.

The Word of God is sufficient in all areas; it is able to do all we need it to do and are commissioned to do as Christians.

1. Evangelism. The Word of God is sufficient for evangelism. Indeed, it is the only thing that works in evangelism. Everything else—captivating music, personal testimonies, emotional appeals, even coming forward to make a commitment to Jesus Christ—all that is at best supplementary. And if it is used or depended upon apart from the faithful preaching and teaching of the Word of God, the "conversions" that result are spurious conversions, which is to say that those who respond do not actually become Christians. Worldly methods work, but the results will be worldly as well. The only way the Holy Spirit regenerates lost men and women is through the Bible. Peter said, "You have been born again, not of perishable seed, but of imperishable, through the living and enduring word of God" (1 Peter 1:23).

2. Sanctification. When evangelicals think of sanctification today, most of them think of either of two things: a method ("Here are four steps to sanctification; do this and you will be holy"), or an experience ("You need a second work of grace, a baptism of the Holy Spirit"). Paul's approach was to teach Christians what has been done for them by God in their salvation, because if they know that and understand it, then they will know that they cannot go back to being what they were before and they will get on with being Christians. The only rational thing for them to do will be to go forward in the Christian life.

3. Guidance. All the guidance we need in the Christian life has been provided in the Bible. It tells us how we are to live and what we are to do to please God. If there is something we want to know or think we need to know that is not in the Bible—what job we should take, whom we should marry, where we should live—there is a sense in which it doesn't matter as long as we are obeying what God teaches about living a godly life. This does not mean that God does not have a detailed plan for our lives. He does. But it does mean that we do not have to know this plan in advance. Indeed, we cannot know it. What we need to know is what God has told us in the Bible.

4. Social reform. We are concerned about social renewal and reform today and rightly so, because we live in a declining culture and want to see the lordship of Jesus acknowledged and justice and righteousness prevail. We want to see the poor relieved of suffering. We want to see broken relationships healed. What is needed is not more government programs or increased emphasis on social work, but first and above all the teaching and practice of the Word of God.

This is proved by what happened in Geneva, Switzerland, in the sixteenth century through the ministry of John Calvin. The city was a moral disgrace. It was notorious for its riots, gambling, indecent dancing, drunkenness, adultery, and other vices. People would run around the streets naked, singing bawdy songs and blaspheming God. The governing council of the city was distressed and passed laws designed to restrain vice and remedy the situation, but nothing worked. Public morals continued to decline.

Calvin came to Geneva in August 1536, was dismissed two and a half years later, and was recalled in 1541. He had no money, no influence, and no weapon but the Word of God. But he preached from the Bible every day, and as he did, under the power of his preaching, the city began to change. As the Genevan people acquired knowledge of God's Word and allowed it to influence their behavior, their city became a model city from which the gospel spread to the rest of Europe, Great Britain, and the New World. Geneva was cleaned up physically. Beggars were removed from the streets, but a hospital and poorhouse were provided for them, and they were well run. Education was offered for all classes of people, poor as well as rich, and new industries flourished. There has probably never been a better example of extensive moral and social reform than the transformation of Geneva under John Calvin, and it was accomplished almost entirely by the preaching of God's Word.

The reason, of course, is that the Bible truly is the Word of God and thus carries with it the power and compelling authority of God himself. And that is why Paul made it his business to proclaim the gospel, and why we should too. What God does today he does by his Word. Therefore, it is our priestly duty to proclaim it to a needy world.

Chapter 226.
Paul's Glory

Romans 15:17-22

I do not know how old Paul was when he wrote his letter to the Romans, but to judge from what we are told about him in Acts he must have been coming to the end of both his life and his ministry. Shortly after writing Romans he took his final journey to Jerusalem, was arrested, and was sent as a prisoner to Rome, where eventually he died.

Paul may have had an extensive ministry in Spain after he first came to Rome, after a release from an initial imprisonment. But whether that was the case or not, in this passage of Romans Paul seems to be looking back over the greater part of his lifetime career as a missionary and evaluating it from a spiritual perspective. We know from his letters to the Corinthians that his career had been difficult. He had experienced hardships, threats, beatings, dangers, and rejections (see 1 Cor. 4:9-13; 2 Cor. 4:8-12, 6:3-10, 11:23-29). But he did not judge what he had done to be a failure. On the contrary, in these verses he actually boasts about what God had accomplished through him "in leading the Gentiles to obey God" (v. 18). He uses the words glory in verse 17 ("I glory in Christ Jesus") and ambition in verse 20 ("It has always been my ambition to preach the gospel where Christ was not known").

Glorying in Jesus Only

At first glance this seems prideful, and we have been taught that pride in any form is wrong. Yet it is not as simple as that. There is sinful pride, but there is also a proper kind of pride, not in what we are or have done by ourselves naturally, but as Christian people who are pleased with what God does through us. This can get distorted and destructive because of sin, but a right kind of pride is helpful—and even necessary—if it is focused properly. Paul had the right kind of pride because he was boasting in Christ and not in his own personal accomplishments or talents.

There was a time in his life when Paul had gloried in his accomplishments, but that was before he met Christ. He wrote about it in Philippians: "If anyone else thinks he has reasons to put confidence in the flesh, I have more: circumcised on the eighth day, of the people of Israel, of the tribe of Benjamin, a Hebrew of Hebrews; in regard to the law, a Pharisee; as for zeal, persecuting the church; as for legalistic righteousness, faultless" (Phil. 3:4-6). That was an impressive list of assets from a human point of view. But when Paul met Jesus on the road to Damascus he learned that these worldly accomplishments did not add up to righteousness before God. They could not earn God's approval. Moreover, his pride in them had been keeping him from faith in Jesus Christ as his Savior.

When Paul saw what he had been doing he wrote those things off as mere garbage, choosing to trust Jesus Christ alone. He told the Philippians, "But whatever was to my profit I now consider loss for the sake of Christ. What is more, I consider everything a loss compared to the surpassing greatness of knowing Christ Jesus my Lord" (Phil. 3:7-8).

Paul did not glory in his natural abilities, either. We know that he had a powerful intellect. The Book of Romans and his other writings are ample proof of that. We know that he could speak persuasively. His speeches preserved in Acts give an idea of how tactful, wise, informed, adaptive, and persuasive his speech was. He was the equal of any Greek orator. In fact, he was superior to them, because he believed what he was saying.

Donald Grey Barnhouse wrote, "Paul's greatest talent was his ability to enter a completely pagan city which practiced devil worship and gather a group of transformed believers in the name of Christ. He then hovered over them in prayer and, by constant admonition, lifted them from the most corrupt stratum of heathenism to the highest level of Christian godliness and morality." That was a tremendous achievement based on great talent. It could be said that in time the gospel seeds Paul sowed overthrew the Roman Empire and transformed the European continent. But Paul did not glory in his talents any more than in his amazing accomplishments.

Instead, he gloried in Jesus Christ. He told the Corinthians, "When I came to you, brothers, I did not come with eloquence or superior wisdom as I proclaimed to you the testimony about God. For I resolved to know nothing while I was with you except Jesus Christ and him crucified. I came to you in weakness and fear, and with much trembling. My message and my preaching were not with wise and persuasive words, but with a demonstration of the Spirit's power, so that your faith might not rest on men's wisdom, but on God's power" (1 Cor. 2:1-5). Paul would have loved to sing this hymn by John Bowring:

In the cross of Christ I glory,

Towering ov'r the wrecks of time;
All the light of sacred story Gathers round its head sublime.

Yet Paul also gloried in what Christ had done through him. The most glorious thing of all is that Jesus was able to accomplish these things through such a person as Paul. The wonder is that he could take this proud, stubborn, self-righteous murderer of God's people and turn him into the greatest pioneer missionary the world has ever seen. Paul could never take that glory to himself. Yet the more he was able to accomplish, the greater was the glory that went to Christ.

God's Use of Little Things

That should be true of you and me too, which is where this study becomes practical. Earlier I mentioned Paul's claim that he had not depended on wisdom or eloquence when he preached the gospel to the Corinthians, though he had plenty of both, because he did not want the Corinthians' faith to rest on human abilities but on the power of God. He said nearly the same thing in regard to their own mostly undistinguished backgrounds and abilities, as if to point out that it was precisely through their limitations that God was to be most glorified:

Brothers, think of what you were when you were called. Not many of you were wise by human standards; not many were influential; not many were of noble birth. But God chose the foolish things of the world to shame the wise; God chose the weak things of the world to shame the strong. He chose the lowly things of this world and the despised things —and the things that are not—to nullify the things that are, so that no one may boast before him. It is because of him that you are in Christ Jesus, who has become for us wisdom from God—that is, our righteousness, holiness and redemption. Therefore, as it is written: "Let him who boasts boast in the Lord."

1 Corinthians 1:26-31

God is glorified in using us. We are the most unprofitable of servants, even if we have great natural talents. But if we will offer ourselves to God as his slaves, he will use us and will bring glory to himself even through our natural human foolishness, our weaknesses, or our lack of worldly status. And that will be our glory too!

Think of the Reformers, and what God did through them. Luther was a portly little monk. Calvin was what we would call an ivory tower bookworm and theologian. God changed the world through those men. He used another little monk, known as "Little Bilney," to win Hugh Latimer to Christ, and Latimer had a tremendous Reformation influence. William Wilberforce was a cripple, but God used him to free the slaves throughout the British empire. D. L. Moody was only an uneducated shoe salesmen, but one day Moody heard a preacher say, "The world has yet to see what God can do through one man who is entirely surrendered to him." In his heart Moody said, "By God's grace I will be that man."

That is what is required, and it is what Paul did. It is what made him such a powerful ambassador for Christ in the ancient Greek and Roman world.

What Paul Accomplished

In verses 18-20 Paul tells what he accomplished at Christ's direction, by his power, and for his glory. It is not what Jesus is doing with you necessarily. It is personal to Paul. But it is impressive and is a suggestion of what God might be able to do through you, if you truly give your life to him. There are a number of specific points to notice.

1. The scope of Paul's evangelistic work. In verse 19 Paul describes the scope of his work, writing, "So from Jerusalem all the way around to Illyricum, I have fully proclaimed the gospel of Christ." Students of Paul's letter have pointed to a problem at this point, but looking into it only gives us greater insight into Paul's accomplishment. The problem is that, so far as we know, Paul did not do evangelistic work in Jerusalem, though he visited it on several occasions, and he did not evangelize Illyricum. Illyricum refers to the region we know as the former Yugoslavia (Bosnia, Herzegovina, Montenegro, Serbia, Dalmatia) and Albania.

The solution seems to be that Paul is saying not that he evangelized these areas, but that he evangelized from one to the other. It would be as if someone said that he had traveled all over the United States from Canada to Mexico. He would not be saying that he had traveled in either Canada or Mexico but throughout the land in between.

In other words, Paul had evangelized Turkey, Macedonia, and Greece, as described in Acts. He started out in the Near East and pushed on north and west as quickly as he could to establish sound churches in each region. He was obeying the Great Commission as he had received it from Jesus Christ. It was in the furtherance of this goal that he was planning to visit Rome and, if possible, the regions beyond.

The Great Commission was not given only to Paul, of course, but to us. What are you doing to further it, personally or by helping others to go where you cannot?

2. The nature of Paul's evangelistic work. In verse 20 Paul gives a glimpse into the unique nature of his work, which was "to preach the gospel where Christ was not known, so that I should not be building on someone else's foundation." He supports this in verse 21 by quoting from Isaiah:

Rather, as it is written:

> "Those who were not told about him will see and those who have not heard will understand."

This is not every Christian's calling, nor every minister's. Some are called to build on foundations already laid. Paul pointed that out in 1 Corinthians, where he compared the differing ministries of himself and Apollos, saying, "I planted the seed, Apollos watered it, but God made it grow" (1 Cor. 3:6). My own ministry has had some pioneering elements, but it has consisted largely in watering what others have planted or building on foundations that have been previously laid. My challenge is to build well on what has preceded me.

At the same time, we need to remember that Paul's ambition has been an important stimulus and challenge to many missionaries who have made it their ambition to take the gospel to new areas. I have friends who want to get into remote areas of the former Soviet Union so that Christ may be preached there to those who do not know him. Others want to reach far into China, and some are doing so. Still others are learning the language of remote jungle tribes so that they can translate the Bible into those languages. That is the ambition Paul had. So even though we may not all be called to do it—real pioneers are usually few in number—we should nevertheless support their efforts whenever possible.

I am reminded of David Livingstone's reply when he was presenting himself to the London Missionary Society and they asked him where he wanted to go. He answered, "Anywhere, as long as it is forward." After he reached Africa he recorded his impressions, saying that he was haunted by the smoke of a thousand villages stretching off into the distance. How can any true Christian be at ease in Zion when there are billions of people who have yet to hear of Jesus Christ?

3. The power of Paul's evangelistic work. In verse 19 Paul stated that his missionary work was carried out "by the power of signs and miracles, through the power of the Spirit." According to nearly all commentators, "signs and miracles" is not the best translation of Paul's words. Signs are miracles. So the contrast is not between signs and miracles but between two different ways of looking at what is miraculous. The right idea is conveyed by "signs and wonders." In biblical language a sign is a miracle that has significance through pointing beyond itself to truth about God or the gospel. All Jesus' miracles recorded in John are signs in this sense. A wonder is the same event regarded from the point of view of the awe it evokes in a human observer.

There is a fairly popular movement today that claims that doing miracles is the proper and perhaps only truly effective way to do evangelism. It is called the signs and wonders movement, and it is associated with the name of John Wimber, a former professor at Fuller Theological Seminary, and the Vineyard churches that he founded.

Paul only used these words in two other places: 2 Corinthians 12:12, where he used them of himself, calling miracles "the things that mark an apostle"; and 2 Thessalonians 2:9, where they have to do with the work of "the lawless one" who is the Antichrist. These passages teach two important things. First, in themselves signs and wonders prove nothing, for they can be done by demonic powers as well as by God. Second, in the New Testament miracles are associated with apostles ("things that mark an apostle") and were therefore meant to authenticate the apostolic message in days before there was a New Testament. Today the New Testament is our apostolic authority.

That doesn't mean that God never does miracles today but that we are not to seek miracles as a way of doing evangelism. All this does is get us away from doing what is really important and effective—teaching the Bible as the Word of God.

Moreover, it is the teaching of the Bible that alone accomplishes the true miracles God and we desire. The miracles that need to be done today are not healing the sick or raising the dead, but bringing dead souls to life to believe on Jesus Christ as Lord and Savior and then to be changed by him. Someone once asked a preacher whether he could turn water into wine as Jesus did. He answered that he could do something better than that. He told about an alcoholic who had neglected his family but who had been brought to Christ by hearing the gospel. The preacher said, "We didn't turn water into wine, but we turned whisky into milk for his babies."

So it has always been. As Christ's people have taken the gospel to the farthest reaches of the world, pagans living in darkest spiritual night have been brought to gospel day, the despairing have been given a sure and lasting hope, liars have been turned into men and women of truth, people of loose morals have become righteous and upright, and those who have been lazy with no real goals in life have been captured for Jesus and have lived industrious lives for his glory. This has fulfilled Jesus' words when he said, "Anyone who has faith in me will do what I have been doing. He will do even greater things than these, because I am going to the Father" (John 14:12).

If even the angels in heaven rejoice whenever a sinner comes to Christ (Luke 15:10), should it not be our goal and glory to work faithfully and industriously to see it happen too?

To God Alone Be Glory

I close by reminding you that although the conversion of the lost is our glory to the extent that we participate by carrying the gospel to them, it is ours only because it is Jesus Christ's first of all, because he is at work within us. Paul said, "I glory in Christ Jesus" (Rom. 15:17).

Remember that great scene in Revelation 4:10-11 where the saints lay their crowns before the throne and say:

> "You are worthy, our Lord and God, to receive > glory and honor and power, > for you created all things, and by your will they > were created and have their being."

The saints have crowns because of what they have achieved. They have been faithful to Christ, they have fought the good fight, they have triumphed by the blood of the Lamb and by their testimony. That is their glory. But they do not take that glory to themselves. Rather, like Paul, they give it back to God by laying their crowns at his feet.

One day you and I will have a chance to do it too. God grant that what we give him in that day might be bright and glorious, to the praise of his amazing grace.

Chapter 227.

Onward to Spain!

Romans 15:23-24

If a person works for the city or federal government, she might retire after twenty years of service. A man serving in the armed forces might also retire after twenty years. In other work retirement is generally fixed by age. But what about retirement from Christian service or from merely being a Christian? I want to suggest that for a Christian retirement never comes, since we are to live as Christians and serve others until Jesus returns or we die.

David Brainard, the friend of Jonathan Edwards, died of tuberculosis at a young age. But even on his deathbed he rejoiced that he was still able to teach a young Indian boy how to read the Bible. Donald Grey Barnhouse, one of my mentors, said that it was his intention to keep on working until God retired him permanently. And so he did. God took him to heaven shortly after he had completed his studies of the Book of Romans.

Paul had an impressive list of missionary accomplishments, sufficient for many lifetimes, but he had no intention of settling down into a comfortable retirement. Our text tells us that instead of stopping with what was past, Paul wanted to press on west from the site of his present endeavors in Greece to bring the gospel to far-distant Spain.

His attitude reminds us of David Livingstone's response to the London Missionary Society when they asked him where he wanted to go as a missionary: "Anywhere, as long as it is forward."

Forgetting What Is Behind

The passage in which Paul spells out his missionary plans and desires for the future begins at verse 23, but this is one of those places where Paul seems to break off what he is saying without finishing his sentence. The New International Version tries to smooth out the difficulty by adding "I plan to do so" to verse 24, but those words are not in the original Greek text.

The striking thing about verse 23 is that it is a virtual repetition of what Paul said in Romans 1:13, which may be why he breaks off as he does: "I do not want you to be unaware, brothers, that I planned many times to come to you (but have been prevented from doing so until now) in order that I might have a harvest among you, just as I have had among the other Gentiles." In chapter 15 he seems to be saying, "Since I have completed my work in these regions and since I have always wanted to visit you who are in Rome....

But you know that, because I have told you that already." What he says then is that although he had often wanted to spend some profitable time with them, he did not want to settle down in Rome permanently but wanted to make it only a stopping-off place on an anticipated fourth missionary journey to Spain.

Pressing On to What Is Before

Scholars do not agree on whether Paul ever got to Spain. Some read into the pastoral letters that Paul was imprisoned twice in Rome ("The Lord will rescue me from every evil attack," 2 Tim. 4:18). Then Paul could have gone to Spain after his first imprisonment, returned to Rome to report on his activities, and then been arrested again and martyred. Since we know that he was martyred in Rome, if he was imprisoned there only once, he obviously couldn't have gone to Spain.

The only evidence that shows that Paul might have been in Spain are two small non-Spanish records. Clement of Rome, one of the apostolic fathers, writes in Epistle to the Corinthians that Paul reached "the limits of the west." He does not use the word Spain, but "the limits of the west" would have meant Spain to a Roman, which Clement was. The other record is the Muratorian Canon, which mentions "the departure of Paul from the city on his journey to Spain." These are interesting references, but they fall short of proof.

Regardless of whether Paul actually made it to Spain, we can learn from his plans to go there. Ray Stedman makes several valuable points about these verses:

1. A place for planning. Some Christians act as if believers should sail through life on automatic pilot, expecting God to direct their lives in a supernatural way apart from any direct involvement from them. They think planning is wrong. But, of course, Paul did not think like that. He was open to God's special guidance, as we learn from the accounts of his missionary journeys in Acts. He obeyed God's leading. But he also made plans, and one of those plans, which was quite important in his thinking, was to carry the gospel to the far corners of the known Roman world— to Spain. Paul had planned to go to Spain for some time, and he was still pursuing this goal at the time of his writing to the Romans.

2. The need for flexibility in planning. Although Paul made plans he was also flexible in the sense that he did not have a timetable. Stedman says that "he went according to the way God opened the doors." He planned to go in a certain direction. He kept that clearly in his mind, but "he did not tell God how or when it had to be." Paul subordinated his plans to God's overall direction, and he did not chafe when the specifics of God's plan or God's timing varied from his own.

3. The importance of persistence. Paul did not abandon his plans when they were delayed by God but instead persisted in them. Stedman writes, "He had set his heart on Rome and Spain, and he was going there. No matter how long it took, he kept plodding steadily toward the goal." We do not know if he ever got there, but the evangelization of Spain remained his heart's desire.

Someone will ask if, in that case, it might not have been wrong for Paul to have made plans to reach that country since, if he did not get there, God obviously did not intend for him to do so. It would mean that Paul's plans were not God's plans, that Paul was in error. Well, if Paul did not get to Spain, it obviously was not God's plan for him to reach

Spain. But I do not think it follows that he was wrong to have made this an important missionary goal. If that were the case, it would be wrong for us to plan anything since, as Robert Burns once wrote, "The best laid plans of mice and men gang aft aglee." Our plans frequently fail. I know people who have planned to go to the far reaches of the former Soviet Union but have not been able to get there, at least not yet. I do not believe it is wrong for them to have made those plans. It is better to dream great dreams for God, even if they are not fully realized, than to dream no dreams at all. One thing is certain, unless we see visions, dream dreams, and make plans, there will be no great steps forward in the work of the gospel.

Help on the Outward Journey

Ray Stedman adds another point to what he said about Paul's planning: In his missionary work Paul always tried to work with a team, never alone. We know from the pastoral letters that by the time he reached Rome most of his pioneer team had been left behind—Timothy in Ephesus (1 Tim. 1:3) and Titus in Crete (Titus 1:5). At one point of his imprisonment only Luke was with Paul (2 Tim. 4:11), but even then he wrote to Timothy to urge him to come to Rome and to bring Mark with him. Here in his letter to the Romans he seems to be recruiting the members of this important church to be what we would call a home support team.

How tactfully he does it. First he tells them that he is only going to be passing through. He wants to be able to enjoy their company for a while, but he is not going to stay with them at their expense or take charge of the Roman church. His sights were focused elsewhere.

Second, he wants them to assist him on his journey. The Greek lexicographers tell us that assist (literally, "being brought forward on my journey by you") is a verb that can be used of a variety of helps, such as food, money, companions, arranging for means of travel, and other matters. The verb could be restricted to items of common courtesy, like prayers and best wishes, but it also allows for more substantial help, which Paul would need and for which he is very gently hinting. Up to this point he had been supported by his home church at Antioch in Syria, but Spain would be too far away for him to receive any tangible help from Syria. Therefore, he is suggesting that it would be a great help to him and an encouragement if the Roman church could become his new home base and back him as he presses on westward to the Iberian peninsula.

Some Applications for Us

This passage is bursting with valuable applications.

1. Our missionary task is not ended until every person in the world has heard of Jesus Christ. It is easy to get tired in Christian work not only as individuals, but as churches. When we are tired it is easy to think of retirement, dropping out of Christian work. That is not right. If God has left us in this life, it is for us to do something good for him. Otherwise he would simply take us home to glory. And if Jesus has not yet returned, it is because there are people who need to be reached with the gospel of God's grace in Jesus Christ. As long as the church is in the world, we have people to reach and neither your task nor mine is completed.

We sometimes sing, "Arise, O God, and shine in all thy saving might, and prosper each design to spread thy glorious light." But we would be more on target today if we cried, "Arise, O church of God, fulfill God's design." Christians are asleep in the world's soft, embracing arms. They need a trumpet call to missions. They need to be told that the gospel task is not ended until every person in the world has heard of Jesus Christ.

2. "When an opportunity of serving Christ in one direction is shut up, we ought to turn to another." I can't think of any better way to state this application than the way the Scottish commentator Robert Haldane stated it in his commentary. We do not know why Paul thought that there was no more place for him to work in Asia, Macedonia, or Greece, perhaps only that he felt he had established churches in the key cities and that this was his particular calling from God. But whatever the reason, the closing of his work in one place merely freed him to begin to think of serving in another.

If you are serving God and your work is not done, keep at it where you are. Don't get restless. But if one opportunity has closed—perhaps the people in your Bible study have moved away or you are no longer serving in the Sunday school or on a church board—look around for something else. The needs are great and the opportunities are endless.

3. A desire to serve God in some place is not unworthy, for God often works his will in us in such ways. Some people have the idea that the only way we can be sure of doing God's will is if we are doing something we hate or at least would rather not be doing. What an absurdity that is! Look for what you can do and desire to do it. Paul told Timothy, "If anyone sets his heart on being an overseer, he desires a noble task" (1 Tim. 3:1), thereby endorsing a desire to serve God as an elder in a local church. This does not mean that your desire will necessarily prove to have been God's will for you. We do not know whether Paul ever got to Spain. But it does mean that the desire itself is not a bad thing. It is certainly unlikely that you will achieve anything for God if you do not aspire to it.

4. Although the task remains unchanged, God often accomplishes its fulfillment in ways we do not anticipate or desire. We have to be flexible, for God's ways are not our ways, and he frequently accomplishes what we rightly desire for him in ways we could not have imagined. Who would have thought that God's way of making the Jewish people into a great nation would have been bringing them to Egypt in the days of Joseph and later allowing them to become slaves? Or who would have supposed that God's way of bringing Paul to Rome would have been through arrest in Jerusalem, followed by a two-year imprisonment at Caesarea, culminating in his appeal to be tried in Rome by Caesar?

God's ways are not our ways. Therefore, be prepared for new things and for unexpected circumstances. Although the task of taking the gospel to the lost remains unchanged, God will probably accomplish your part of it in ways you do not anticipate.

5. Although God could supply his missionaries' needs miraculously, he usually does so through the gifts of his people. God is a God of miracles. Paul had not lagged behind the other apostles in being a channel through which God performed miracles (2 Cor. 12:12). God could have provided miraculously for Paul. But he did not. Instead, when Paul started out bringing the gospel to Asia Minor he was supported by the church at Antioch. Later when he went from Macedonia into Greece he was supported by the church at Philippi (Phil. 4:10-19). Here he tactfully looks for support from the church at Rome.

It is no different today. God calls his servants to the missionary task, but he also places a duty to support them on those who remain at home. That is your duty if you have a regular income and are not yourself serving on a foreign or other missionary field. Has God blessed you with material things? Are you provided for financially? Then remember your missionaries. Remember that although God could supply their needs miraculously, he has chosen to do so through you.

6. The fellowship of the people of God is more to be desired than the friendship of emperors or kings. Paul was going to Rome, the seat of the great Roman Empire, the home of the Caesars. But Paul was not looking to the great of the world to help him out, nor did he covet their friendship. His friends were the Christians, and he wanted to be with them and be helped on his missionary way by them. Learn from his example. The world will not help you do God's work. It will entice you, use you, betray you, let you down. Only God's people will share your godly desires and vision.

Informal Missionaries

When we study an extraordinary person like Paul it is very easy for us to dissociate his achievements from our own plans or expectations, just because we think of him as being so extraordinary. But although he was certainly that, the vision Paul had and the things he accomplished were not really that extraordinary in these early formative years of Christianity. Paul's dreams were the same as those of the great majority of God's people.

In Edward Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire we are told about the rapid expansion of Christianity in the first century of the Christian era. Tertullian, writing around the year A.D. 200, said, "We are but of yesterday, and we have filled every place among you— cities, islands, fortresses, towns, marketplaces, the very camp, tribes, companies, palace, senate, forum—we have left nothing to you but the temples of your gods." How did that occur? Gibbon suggests that it was because in the early church "it became the most sacred duty of a new convert to diffuse among his friends and relations the inestimable blessing which he had received." In other words, each believer considered himself or herself to be a missionary. Adolf Harnack, the great German church historian, declared, "The most numerous and successful missionaries of the Christian religion were not the regular teachers but Christians themselves, in virtue of their loyalty and courage.... It was characteristic of this religion that everyone who seriously confessed the faith proved of service to its propaganda.... We cannot hesitate to believe that the great mission of Christianity was in reality accomplished by means of informal missionaries."

That is exactly what we need today. If you see this need, you will press on with the missionary task, because you will know that God has given you important things to do for him today.

Chapter 228.
Christian Giving

Romans 15:25-28

When the subject of charitable giving comes up, most people assume they are generous. They are not naturally that way, of course, since people are selfish by nature. It is part of what it means to be sinners. We need to be taught to be generous, which is why instruction about giving is a necessary part of all well-rounded Christian preaching.

The apostle Paul taught those who were converted to Jesus Christ through his ministry to be generous. Here in Romans 15, as he writes to the believers in Rome to explain why he is being delayed in his plans to come to them on his way to Spain, he refers to what he had done to teach the Christians in the eastern half of the empire about giving. In doing so, he gives us important insights into this vital part of what it means to be a Christian. Paul writes, "Now, however, I am on my way to Jerusalem in the service of the saints there. For Macedonia and Achaia were pleased to make a contribution for the poor among the saints in Jerusalem. They were pleased to do it, and indeed they owe it to them. For if the Gentiles have shared in the Jews' spiritual blessings, they owe it to the Jews to share with them their material blessings. So after I have completed this task and have made sure that they have received this fruit, I will go to Spain and visit you on the way" (Rom. 15:25-28).

The Gentile Offering

When we study what is said about this offering from the Gentile churches for the saints in Jerusalem, in Acts and in Paul's writings, we learn quickly that it was a very important matter for Paul.

The idea of a special offering seems to have entered his mind when he was in Jerusalem to argue the case for Gentile liberty against attempts by Jewish legalizers to force Gentiles to obey the requirements of the Old Testament ceremonial law. We have two accounts of the council at which this took place, in Acts 15 and Galatians 2. In Galatians Paul reports that his view of the gospel, including the rights of Gentile liberty, was upheld by the other apostles and that they endorsed his Gentile ministry. He says that James, Peter, and John "gave me and Barnabas the right hand of fellowship when they recognized the grace given to me. They agreed that we should go to the Gentiles, and they to the Jews." But he adds, "All they asked was that we should continue to remember the poor, the very thing I was eager to do" (Gal. 2:9-10). In other words, the Jerusalem leaders asked aid for the poor in Jerusalem, and Paul agreed to help.

This was a legitimate request. Jerusalem was a poor area of the world, and the Christians there were very poor. Rome was rich, since the wealth of the world poured into Rome. But in order for wealth to flow to Rome it had to flow from other places, and it most often flowed from the outlying provinces, such as Judea. The provinces were impoverished to enrich the capital.

Then, too, the Christians in Jerusalem may have exacerbated their own problems, though with good will. C. H. Dodd, in his commentary on Romans, suggests that the system of Christian communism that the early church established in Jerusalem had contributed significantly to its poverty: "The Jerusalem church contained from the beginning many poor and few rich. Filled with a sense of their unity as 'brethren,' they instituted a system of partial and voluntary communism. But they carried it out in the economically disastrous way of realizing capital and distributing it as income (Acts 2:44, 45; 4:34-5:5). So far as we can gather, no practical steps were taken to replace the capital thus dissipated; and when hard times came, the community had no reserves of any kind." If this is a right assessment, then the Christians in Jerusalem were not only poor, they were poorer than most of the other poor people around them. It would be a right response for the richer Gentile congregations elsewhere to help out.

Yet even this does not fully explain Paul's preoccupation with this offering, and Leon Morris is right when he observes that Paul must have seen it as an important symbol of the unity of believers: "Some early Christians held that all converts ought to be circumcised and to live according to the Jewish law; Paul had a continuing controversy with people who held such views. His collection would show that those who rejected this hard-line conservatism were nevertheless bound to Jewish believers in ties of genuine Christian love."

Perhaps they would also show the Jerusalem leaders that Paul had been successful in his missionary work. This would not be the noblest of motives, but Paul may have had a bit of pride in wanting to collect this offering and accompany it to Jerusalem himself to show Peter, James, and John and the others how he had honored his agreement to help out and even demonstrate how bountifully he had been able to do it.

How Paul Viewed This Offering

Whatever Paul's motivation for asking might have been, it was right that Christians of means should have assisted those who were in want, and Paul was right to teach the Gentile Christians that they should be generous in responding to the need of their Jewish brethren. How he looked at the collection at this stage is seen in our text. He says three things about it:

1. It was "in the service of the saints" in Jerusalem (v. 25). The word that is translated service is the one from which we get the word deacon. It occurs just a few verses further on in chapter 16, where Phoebe is commended as a "servant" or "deaconess" of the church in Cenchrea. We recognize that caring for the poor is a legitimate function of the diaconate. But since Paul was not a deacon but rather an apostle and yet is saying here that his role in collecting and delivering this offering for the saints at Jerusalem was a diaconal service, we learn that we are all to be engaged in this kind of service. In other words, the role of the deacons is not to minister in our place, so we do not have to care for the needs of others, but rather to show us how to minister— just as ruling elders show us how to exercise spiritual oversight of one another, and teaching elders lead us in how to study and understand the Bible. Caring for other people is every Christian's job.

Moreover, it is a necessary spiritual fruit, which is exactly what Paul calls it in verse 28. This means that if the life of Christ is really found in us, then we will care for others as a natural and necessary expression of our transformed lives. The apostle James wrote, "Suppose a brother or sister is without clothes and daily food. If one of you says to him, 'Go, I wish you well; keep warm and well fed,' but does nothing about his physical needs, what good is it? In the same way, faith by itself, if it is not accompanied by action, is dead" (James 2:15-17).

One reason we must be generous is because generosity is evidence that we are Christians. If we do not care for other people or the work of God, why should we suppose we are Christians?

2. The Gentiles "were pleased" to help out (v. 26). The second thing Paul says about this offering in writing about it to the Romans is that the Christians of Macedonia and Achaia were pleased to share in it. He stresses this point by repeating it twice, once in verse 26 and a second time in verse 27.

Were the Christians of Macedonia and Achaia really pleased to do it? I ask this question, because the answer is not a clear-cut yes. It is actually yes and no. The Christians of Macedonia had been willing. Indeed, they had been supporting Paul even before he began to take up this particular collection, and Paul commends them for their generosity on more than one occasion. This was not quite the case with the Christians in Achaia. On the contrary Paul seems to have had difficulty collecting the offering there. We know this because of his two letters to the Corinthians, particularly 2 Corinthians, where he urges the church there to get on with the offering that they had promised but had been slow in taking up.

The problem was that the Corinthians had not followed through on their original early commitment. They seemed to have been willing at first. But like many of us, they had let the matter of their giving to God's work slide. Paul was sending Titus, one of his faithful fellow workers and companions, along with two other unnamed brothers to receive this offering, and he was writing to ensure that the Corinthians would actually take the offering and have it waiting when they arrived (2 Cor. 8:16-18).

Generosity is a natural part of being Christians, but we must be taught to give. That is what Paul was doing in his extensive teaching about giving in 2 Corinthians and in writing to the Romans. We need the same kind of teaching today, even though people dislike being instructed about giving.

3. The Gentiles who had "shared in the Jews' spiritual blessings owe[d] it to the Jews to share with them their material blessings" (v. 27). The third thing Paul says about giving in writing to the Christians at Rome is that the Gentiles of Greece owed support to the Christians of Judea because they had received their spiritual blessings through them. It is a simple principle: A Bible teacher ought to be supported. He should not have to do secular work to support himself, though good ministers are usually happy to do it if that should prove necessary. Paul himself worked as a tentmaker at Corinth, when his support funds were low or slow in coming.

God's Formula for Great Giving

Anyone who has ever tried to get someone else to give to religious or charitable causes knows how difficult motivating another person can be. So it may be useful to ask: How did Paul motivate the Corinthians, who seem to have been reluctant, to be faithful in this area? It is noteworthy that he did not nag, scold, beg, or plead. But neither was he against using some very direct motivation. If we read 1 Corinthians 8 and 9 carefully, we will find him appealing to the need for personal consecration on the Corinthians' part, the example of Christ, the love and grace of God for us, and even to a proper kind of pride and self-interest.

The chief element in Paul's attempt to motivate the Corinthians to great giving was the example of the poorer churches of Macedonia. Like Judea, Macedonia was a poor area. Corinth was a prosperous place by comparison. How is it that the poorer Macedonian churches had been able to set such a good example for Corinth? The answer to this question is in 2 Corinthians 8:2, which I call "God's Formula for Great Giving": "Out of the most severe trial, their overflowing joy and their extreme poverty welled up in rich generosity." Here are three elements: (1) a severe trial, (2) overflowing joy, and (3) extreme poverty. Combined, says Paul, they produced exemplary generosity.

1. A severe trial. We do not know what this severe trial was. It may have been persecution. It may have been the poverty. Whatever it was, it represented circumstances that we would probably call unendurable or at least severely trying.

This is not the way we would expect things to be. We think that if a person is going through some trial, his or her attention should rightly be directed to that problem and not to the needs of other people. That is how we would expect to react ourselves. But here, as in so many areas of life, Christian experience is entirely different from what we would expect. When Christians go through trials, they think about others who are also suffering and they reach out to them.

The best example is Jesus, who, when he was hanging on the cross, thought of the soldiers ("Father, forgive them, for they do not know what they are doing," Luke 23:34), his mother ("Dear woman, here is your son," John 19:26) and the dying thief ("I tell you the truth, today you will be with me in paradise," Luke 23:43).

2. Overflowing joy. Paul does not say what the Macedonian Christians were joyful about, but we may suppose their joy came from several things. They would have had joy in salvation, for Paul writes in 1 Thessalonians that the believers in that city welcomed the message with "the joy given by the Holy Spirit" (1 Thess. 1:6). Before the coming of the gospel they were lost in heathen darkness and were, like Paul's description of the Ephesians, "without hope and without God in the world" (Eph. 2:12). After they had believed, they were conscious of having found God and of having passed out of darkness into light, and they were joyful.

Similarly, in Philippians Paul speaks explicitly of the believers' "joy in Christ Jesus" (Phil. 1:26), urging them to "rejoice in the Lord always" (Phil. 4:4), that is, to continue as they were doing.

Every Christian should be joyful, of course. But we are concerned with the link between joy and giving, and one thing joy must indicate in this context is that the giving of the Macedonians was unconstrained—it was of their own free will, which is why it was joyful. As long as our giving is constrained, as it is when we give our taxes to the government, it is a burden and is frequently coupled with resentment. But when we give freely, as we ought to do for Christian causes, we give joyfully and our joy is enhanced by giving.

I think here of Frances Ridley Havergal, who wrote lines we often sing with little understanding or commitment:

> Take my silver and my gold,
> Not a mite would I withhold.

Those lines were autobiographical. That is, Frances Havergal did what she described. We know from her writings left behind at her death that at the time she wrote those words she sent to the Church Missionary Society all her gold and silver jewelry, including a jewel chest she described as being fit for a countess. She wrote to a close friend, "I don't need to tell you that I never packed a box with such pleasure." That is a joy generous Christians recognize. They know that joy leads to generous giving, as 2 Corinthians teaches. It is enhanced by it.

3. Extreme poverty. The third element in this formula for generous giving is poverty—indeed, extreme poverty. What an utterly contrary principle from what the world teaches! If you hire a fund-raising organization to help raise large sums of money for a secular charity, you will be told that the first third of the goal must be raised by advance gifts from large donors, the second third by nearly as large gifts from very wealthy people, and only the last third from your organization's regular constituency. Or, depending on the cause, the expectations may be even more disproportionate. Sometimes the gifts from large donors are supposed to be at least 80 percent of the whole.

That is not how it is in Christian circles. Large gifts have their place, perhaps to launch a new project or pay for a special need. But by and large, the work of the church is sustained by the regular small gifts of people who are not wealthy. In fact, in many places the spreading of the gospel is underwritten almost entirely by the very, very poor.

Some time ago I came across statistics that showed that giving among the very poor is remarkable. In the United States those below the poverty line give about 5 percent of their income to charitable causes. Those who are in the middle income brackets give slightly more, about 7 percent, because they have more from which to give. But when people move into the highest brackets, that is, above $100,000 per year, the rate falls back to only 2 percent. So, statistically, it is usually not the rich who give generously but those who are not nearly so well off.

The Macedonians were poor and had undergone severe trials. But the result of this unusual combination of circumstances was great giving. It was according to the formula "Severe trials + overflowing joy + extreme poverty = rich generosity." This is something like saying, "Minus one, minus fifteen, minus three equals a million," but that is God's arithmetic, strange as it may seem to us. And it works wonderfully.

The Secret of Great Giving

Verse 5 adds a further explanation of the remarkable giving of the Macedonian Christians: "And they did not do as we expected, but they gave themselves first to the Lord and then to us in keeping with God's will." As we well know, trials and poverty do not in themselves produce great giving, not even among Christians. In fact, they sometimes do the opposite. They produce bitterness in people who thereby become self-centered, mean, tight-fisted, and greedy.

What makes the difference, as Paul explains in this verse, is whether the Christians involved have: (1) first given themselves to the Lord and (2) then given themselves to others as a consequence.

It is hard to emphasize giving ourselves to God too much, because in the fullest sense everything in the Christian life begins, continues, and ends with this necessity. It begins here, because this is what it means to be a Christian in the first place. To be a Christian is to surrender oneself to Jesus Christ, repenting of sin, believing on him, and beginning to follow him as one's Master. It continues here, because Jesus calls us to a life of discipleship, which means serving him as Lord of our entire lives. It ends here, because Christians must persevere in this calling to the very end.

Some years ago I heard a prominent member of a board of directors of an organization say, "To be a good board member you should be able to give one of three things: time, talent, or treasure." That is good worldly wisdom, but a Christian will do better. A Christian will give everything he or she is or has to Jesus Christ because Jesus has first given himself for us. If you have trusted Christ as your Savior, you will want to give yourself and your treasure to others, as he gave himself for you. Or else, you need to be taught to do it!

Chapter 229.
The Full Measure of God's Blessing

Romans 15:29

We are at the end of a long paragraph in which Paul has been telling the Christians at Rome of his plans to visit them after first going to Jerusalem to present the offering for the poor that he had raised among the Gentile churches. He told them that he had wanted to come to Rome earlier; he had been delayed by his earlier missionary work and by the need to accompany the offering, but he is certain that his proposed visit will at last come to pass. He says, "I know that when I come to you, I will come in the full measure of the blessing of Christ."

Leon Morris points out, as others also have, that these words are a mark of the letter's authenticity and early date, since no one who knew how Paul actually came to Rome (as a prisoner in chains) would have put it this way.

That is an interesting observation, but it is not what ought to occupy our thoughts here. What is important is that Paul anticipated coming to Rome in the "full measure" of Christ's blessing. What is the nature of this "full" blessing? Is it something in which we can share? If it is, how can we be certain of sharing in it? These are questions no true Christian should ignore.

Let's begin with the meaning of the word blessing. Blessing is not easy to define and has various meanings. Next, we will look at the types of blessing we encounter in the Old and New Testaments. Third, we will study what Jesus had to say about blessing, based on his illustration of the vine and the branches in John 15. Finally, though briefly, we will ask what the requirements are if we ourselves are to be channels of such blessing.

What Does Blessing Mean?

What does blessing mean, and what does Paul mean when he says, "I know that when I come to you, I will come in the full measure of the blessing of Christ"?

1. Set apart to God. Blessing has an interesting history. In the early days of the development of the English language, before the Norman conquest, there were more than thirty Anglo-Saxon forms of the words bless, blessed, and blessing, words like bloedsian, bledsian, and bletsian. What is common to these words is that they were all based on the Germanic word blod, meaning blood, and therefore referred to something that had been set apart to God by a blood ritual.

In today's speech the words that come closest to this are sanctified and consecrated, though we preserve this earliest meaning of blessed and actually use the word itself in two common expressions. First, we speak of "the blessed sacrament," meaning that the communion elements have been set apart for a spiritual purpose. Second, we "bless" people, which is what pastors do at the end of a worship service and what we also do when someone we know sneezes and we respond, "God bless you." We may not know what we intend by that expression, but what it means is that we want the person to be set apart to God and his service.

2. To speak well of some person. A second meaning of the word blessed comes to us through the French and Latin languages. The Normans, who invaded England in 1066, brought French with them, including the word benir, meaning bless, which was based on the common ecclesiastical Latin term benedicere, which meant to speak well of somebody. It was used in the Latin Bible for blessing or praising God. This sense of the word occurs in Luke's gospel in reference to human beings when Jesus tells his disciples, "Bless them that curse you." He means that although our enemies speak badly of us, we are to speak good about them. In time this meaning of blessing attached itself to the older Anglo-Saxon expressions so that blessing began to mean not only to be set apart to God but to be well spoken of or well regarded.

3. An exceptional state of happiness. A third meaning of blessing and blessed comes from their being close in sound to another old English word, bliss, meaning an exceptional state of happiness or well-being. Because the words were alike, blessed soon took on this meaning too, which is the sense it has in the Beatitudes, where Jesus said, "Blessed are the poor in spirit.... Blessed are those who mourn.... Blessed are the meek...." and so on. He meant that people who are like this will be deeply and profoundly happy.

In Romans 15:29, the term probably includes all three meanings: to be set apart to God, to be spoken well of, and to be happy. The meanings belong together like this: First, Paul is confident that when he comes to Rome he will do so as an appointed and consecrated messenger of God, who is therefore blessed by God in the sense that God's good words will accompany him and prosper what he does for God. Therefore, because he is God's servant and will be blessed by God in his service, he is profoundly happy and will continue to be so.

Isn't that a wonderful way to face the future? Don't you wish you could face tomorrow like that? The point of this study is that you can, if you will look upon your life and order it as Paul did.

Two Kinds of Blessing

There are at least two types of blessing found in the Bible.

1. Every spiritual blessing in Christ. First, there are the blessings that are ours right now because of our being united to Jesus Christ by the Holy Spirit. Many verses speak of this: Romans 8:17, which calls us God's heirs ("heirs of God and co-heirs with Christ"); 1 Corinthians 3:21-23, which tells us that everything is ours ("All things are yours, whether Paul or Apollos or Cephas or the world or life or death or the present or the future—all are yours, and you are of Christ, and Christ is of God"); and 1 Timothy 6:17, which says that God has given us all things richly to enjoy ("Hope in God, who richly provides us with everything for our enjoyment").

The most important of these verses is Ephesians 1:3, which says, "Praise be to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who has blessed us in the heavenly realms with every spiritual blessing in Christ." This is important because it teaches that every possible spiritual blessing we could ever have is already ours by virtue of our being united to our Savior.

Not long ago a speaker at one of our 1994 Philadelphia Conferences on Reformed Theology called attention to a fine expression of this truth by John Calvin:

If we seek salvation, we are taught by the very name of Jesus that it is "of him" (1 Cor. 1:30). If we seek any other gifts of the Spirit, they will be found in his anointing. If we seek strength, it lies in his dominion; if purity, in his conception; if gentleness, it appears in his birth. For by his birth he was made like us in all respects (Heb. 2:17) that he might learn to feel our pain (cf. Heb. 5:2). If we seek redemption, it lies in his passion; if acquittal, in his condemnation; if remission of the curse, in his cross (Gal. 3:13); if satisfaction, in his sacrifice; if purification, in his blood; if reconciliation, in his descent into hell; if mortification of the flesh, in his tomb; if newness of life, in his resurrection; if immortality, in the same; if inheritance of the Heavenly Kingdom, in his entrance into heaven; if protection, if security, if abundant supply of all blessings, in his Kingdom; if untroubled expectation of judgment, in the power given to him to judge. In short, since rich store of every kind of good abounds in him, let us drink our fill from this fountain, and from no other.

2. Blessing on our work for God. The second type of blessing mentioned in the Bible is blessing on our work for God—that is, on our ministry. This kind of blessing is not complete or automatic, as the first is, since it relates at least in part to how closely we are following after Christ and also to whether we seek this blessing and ask God for it. Moses was one who knew this, which is why his hymn on the shortness and frailty of human life ends with this prayer:

> May the favor of the Lord our God rest upon us; establish the work of our hands for us— yes, establish the work of our hands.
> Psalm 90:17

Of course, this is what Paul also has in mind as he writes to the Roman Christians. He is not writing about the blessings that are already ours in Christ. He has them, and so do the Roman Christians. Rather, Paul is writing that his future visit to Rome might be spiritually profitable. We remember that he also spoke of this at the very beginning of the letter when he wrote, "I long to see you so that I may impart to you some spiritual gift to make you strong" (Rom. 1:11). Paul wanted his life to count for God wherever he was or would be. Since he was coming to Rome, he wanted his days in Rome to be blessed by God in the lives of the Christians who lived there.

Moreover, he wanted his coming to Rome to count to the greatest degree imaginable. He wanted to experience the full measure of the blessings of Christ in the lives of the Christians.

Have you ever thought of your life in these terms? Most Christians want God to bless them, meaning that they want God to preserve them from physical harm, give them a long life, help them to make a lot of money, and keep their children out of trouble. Those are blessings, of course. But they are self-centered, and they certainly do not represent the fullness of what God is capable of doing or is willing to do in and through us for the spiritual well-being of other people. I encourage you to think of your life as a means by which God might be able to impart spiritual blessings to other people.

The Vine and the Branches

I have mentioned Moses' prayer that the work of his hands might be established and blessed by God and Paul's desire that he might come to Rome in the full measure of the blessing of Jesus Christ. This was also the desire of the Lord Jesus Christ for us, as expressed in his teaching about the vine and the branches in John 15:1-17:

I am the true vine, and my Father is the gardener. He cuts off every branch in me that bears no fruit, while every branch that does bear fruit he prunes so that it will be even more fruitful. You are already clean because of the word I have spoken to you. Remain in me, and I will remain in you. No branch can bear fruit by itself; it must remain in the vine. Neither can you bear fruit unless you remain in me.

I am the vine; you are the branches. If a man remains in me and I in him, he will bear much fruit; apart from me you can do nothing. If anyone does not remain in me, he is like a branch that is thrown away and withers; such branches are picked up, thrown into the fire and burned. If you remain in me and my words remain in you, ask whatever you wish, and it will be given you. This is to my Father's glory, that you bear much fruit, showing yourselves to be my disciples.

As the Father has loved me, so have I loved you. Now remain in my love. If you obey my commands, you will remain in my love, just as I have obeyed my Father's commands and remain in his love. I have told you this so that my joy may be in you and that your joy may be complete. My command is this: Love each other as I have loved you. Greater love has no one than this, that one lay down his life for his friends. You are my friends if you do what I command. I no longer call you servants, because a servant does not know his master's business. Instead, I have called you friends, for everything that I learned from my Father I have made known to you. You did not choose me, but I chose you and appointed you to go and bear fruit—fruit that will last. Then the Father will give you whatever you ask in my name. This is my command: Love each other.

My chief reason for citing this passage in full is the progression Jesus develops using the word fruit, which is the equivalent in this illustration of the blessing Paul was seeking on his ministry in Rome. It is fourfold, and it requires the entire passage to see it.

1. Fruit (vv. 1-4). In the first paragraph of this address Jesus stresses that the purpose of the disciples' union with him, as branches with a vine, is that they might bear fruit. There are no qualifying adjectives attached to fruit at this point. Christ's concern is simply that there be fruit. Indeed, this is the concern of the Father too, according to Jesus, for the Father is pictured as the gardener who both trims the vine and prunes the branches to make them fruitful. The importance of bearing fruit appears clearly in the next paragraph, for what Jesus seems to be teaching there is that if we do not bear fruit, we do not belong to Christ; that is, we are not in the vine, we are not his.

The idea of the Father cutting off every branch that does not bear fruit (v. 2) and the later reference to such unproductive branches being "thrown away" and even cast "into the fire and burned" (v. 6) has sounded to many people as if those who have once belonged to Jesus Christ can perish. They are troubled by what seems to be the teaching that we can lose our salvation. That is not right, of course. Other passages clearly refute it (see John 10:27-30; Rom. 8:31-39; Phil. 1:6). But if these verses from John 15 do not teach that our salvation can be lost due to our being unfruitful, what do they mean?

Various answers have been given. One is that it is the worldly works of unprofitable Christians that are spoken of as being burned up, not the believers themselves, much as Paul speaks of "the quality of each man's work" being revealed by fire in 1 Corinthians 3:10-15. But in John 15 Jesus is clearly speaking of the branches. A second explanation is that it is as "a branch" that the believer is cast out, not as "a son." The problem with this interpretation is that it introduces a distinction into the allegory that is not present and is foreign to Jesus' teaching.

Years ago I tended to either of those two explanations, but today I think that the Puritans (and others) were right when they said that casting out applies to those who are Christians in name only, the bottom line being that Christians must bear fruit if they are truly Christians. I think this fits Jesus' teaching, because Jesus frequently taught that the Jews of his day, who considered themselves to be fruit-bearing children of God, would be rejected at the last judgment. It also fits what Paul developed in Romans 11 by a similar image, when he taught that Jewish branches had been broken off the olive tree of salvation in order that Gentiles might be grafted in.

2. Even more fruitful (v. 2). The second step in Jesus' fourfold development of the fruit idea is that the Father's chief object in trimming the vine's branches is that they might be "even more fruitful." "More" is the first qualifying adjective. It is a searching word, as Andrew Murray pointed out in his valuable devotional study The True Vine, because "as churches and individuals we are in danger of nothing so much as self-contentment. The secret spirit of Laodicea—we are rich and increased in goods, and have need of nothing—may prevail where it is not suspected. The divine warning—poor and wretched and miserable—finds little response just where it is most needed."

So I ask: Has a torpid spirit of self-satisfaction and vain contentment settled upon you? Do you feel that you have done enough? That your church has achieved all it needs to achieve? That you know all you need to know of Christian doctrine or have witnessed for Christ sufficiently? If so, you should remember how Jesus said that when we have done everything we have been told to do we must still say, "We are unworthy servants" (Luke 17:10).

3. Much fruit (vv. 5-8). In the next paragraph of Jesus' teaching a second modifier occurs with the word fruit, much. It occurs twice, in verses 5 and 8: "If a man remains in me and I in him, he will bear much fruit" (v. 5), and "This is to my Father's glory, that you bear much fruit, showing yourselves to be my disciples" (v. 8).

It is sad that so many Christians expect so little of Jesus. It may be because they consider much of anything to be worldly—too much money, too much fun. But I suspect the real reason is because they are self-satisfied and lazy. If this is true of you, Jesus' words should be a strong rebuke, for they say that what he desires of you is not fruit only or even more fruit this year than last, but much fruit. If you take that seriously, you will attempt great things for God, knowing that little fruit brings little glory either to the Father or the Son but that much fruit brings much glory to them.

4. Fruit that will last (v. 16). Toward the end of this passage Jesus adds one more step in his fourfold development of the spiritual fruit illustration. He speaks of "fruit that will last" (v. 16). Not all fruit does last. In fact, in purely agricultural terms no fruit actually lasts at all. All fruit decays, rots, and eventually becomes unsuitable to eat. The same is true of much of what we do. Many of our most extensive efforts come to nothing. In time we ourselves die and pass away. The one thing that does remain is the spiritual fruit produced in and through the lives of those who are united to Jesus Christ. God is eternal. Consequently, what he does through us is eternal too. We echo this truth in a bit of Christian doggerel that goes:

Only one life! 'Twill soon be past.
Only what's done for Christ will last.

In truth, much of what is done even in the name of Christ will not last because it is not done in the spirit of Christ and by his power. But if Jesus is working in us, we can know that what he is doing will be wonderfully fruitful and never pass away.

Are you doing what Christ would have you do? And are you doing it in his name and by his power? Remember that it is possible to build a great monument to self out of wood, hay, and stubble. A haystack can be a very large thing. But it will not last the winter, and all that is done in the power of the flesh and for the flesh will be destroyed too. Make sure that what you do is in "the full measure of the blessing of Christ."

If You Would Be Fruitful

I do not know if Paul had heard of Jesus' teaching about the vine and the branches, but he knew the truths that are in it, and he also knew and practiced the requirements Jesus gave for being fruitful.

First, we must remain in close fellowship with Christ ("No branch can bear fruit by itself; it must remain in the vine. Neither can you bear fruit unless you remain in me," John 15:4). Second, we must know that we are nothing in ourselves ("Apart from me you can do nothing," v. 5). Third, we must be filled with Christ's word ("If you remain in me and my words remain in you, ask whatever you wish, and it will be given to you," v. 7). Fourth, we must love each other (vv. 12, 17). That is exactly what we will do if we want to come to others in the fullness of Christ's blessing.

Chapter 230.
Pray for Me!

Romans 15:30-32

In the last study we looked at how confident Paul was that when he came to Rome it would be "in the full measure of the blessing of Christ." I ended by listing the requirements for such blessing, the basis for Paul's confidence, based on Jesus' teaching about the vine and the branches in John 15. Yet Paul undoubtedly also prayed for God's blessing on his pending visit to Rome and asked other believers to pray too. Paul was confident of God's richest blessing on his ministry because he had asked God for it.

In the final paragraph of Romans 15 Paul passes to the subject of prayer, urging the Christians at Rome to pray for him. This is not unusual. It was Paul's regular practice to request prayers for himself and his ministry. We can think of many passages where he does it: 2 Corinthians 1:10-
11; Ephesians 6:19-20; Philippians 1:19; Colossians 4:3-4; 1 Thessalonians 5:25; 2
Thessalonians 3:1-2. But this is a strong and very impassioned plea, undoubtedly because of the difficulties Paul foresaw in going to Jerusalem. In these verses Paul describes prayer as a struggle and brings in each member of the Trinity: "I urge you, brothers, by our Lord Jesus Christ and by the love of the Spirit, to join me in my struggle by praying to God for me" (v. 30).

John Murray says of this verse, "God answered the prayers but not in the ways that Paul had hoped for or anticipated. The lessons to be derived from verses 30-33 are numberless." I agree with John Murray, for none of us prays as well, fervently, or with as much understanding as we should.

Prayer Is Not Useless

One of the reasons why we do not pray as we should is that we do not realize the seriousness of what is going on or our part in it. According to Ephesians 6, we are embroiled in fierce spiritual warfare, and prayer is our weapon. Paul realized that intensely, which is why he engages the believers at Rome to join his struggles by praying to God on his behalf.

A great Bible teacher of the early part of this century, Reuben A. Torrey, was at a Bible conference in St. Louis. Another minister was speaking on "The Rest of Faith," saying that Jesus has won all spiritual victories for us and that all we need to do is rest on Christ's work. There is a sense in which that is true, of course. But the preacher overextended himself when he exclaimed, "I challenge anybody to show me a single passage in the Bible where we are told to wrestle in prayer." Torrey was on the platform, and he says that although one speaker does not like to contradict another, this was a challenge he had to take up. So he said softly, "Romans 15:30, brother." Fortunately the other speaker was honest enough to admit that Torrey was right. For what Romans 15:30 says is that we are to struggle together in prayer and that much depends on it.

It is helpful to know that the Greek word here is synagonizomai, which is a compound made up of the preposition meaning with (syn) plus the word from which we get our words agony, agonize, and antagonist (agonizomai). An agon was an athletic contest. Thus, agonizomai described the struggle that took place in an athletic contest and by extension in any other conflict as well. Jesus used the word when he said, "My kingdom is not of this world. If it were, my servants would fight..." (John 18:36). His word for fight is agonize. In Luke 22:44, this is the word that is used to describe our Lord's fervent prayer in the Garden of Gethsemane. Luke says, "And being in anguish, he prayed more earnestly, and his sweat was like drops of blood falling to the ground." To return to Paul, both the noun and verb occur in Paul's summation of his ministry, where he says: "I have fought the good fight" (2 Tim. 4:7).

This, then, is why prayer is not a useless exercise. We are engaged in a great spiritual struggle against the devil and his schemes, and prayer is the only way we can participate in it. Prayer Is Effective

The second lesson of Paul's important paragraph about prayer is that prayer is useful. As James says, "The prayer of a righteous man is powerful and effective" (James 5:16).

It had to be if it was going to help Paul. In verse 31 of this section Paul asks the Roman Christians to pray for two things: first, that he would be delivered from the unbelievers in Judea, and second, that his service in Jerusalem might be accepted by the saints there. There was ample cause for his anxiety on both counts. Paul was aware of how intensely he was hated by the Jews. They saw him as a Jewish renegade and heretic who was teaching a disastrous theology and undermining Judaism. The proof of their hatred (and of the danger to which Paul was exposed) was seen in their reception of Paul when he arrived in the city and was making his way to the temple. His enemies saw him and stirred up the masses of the people, shouting, "Men of Israel, help us! This is the man who teaches all men everywhere against our people and our law and this place. And besides, he has brought Greeks into the temple area and defiled this holy place" (Acts 21:28). This last charge was untrue, but it was effective in causing the people to seize Paul and try to kill him. He was saved from the mob only because the commander of the Roman garrison sent soldiers into the crowd to take him into custody. Yet even as they did, the people kept crying out for his death (v. 36).

What about Paul's second area of concern, that his service (he means the offering that he had received from the Gentiles) might be acceptable to the Jerusalem saints? We might wonder how any offer of financial assistance could be unacceptable, but we need to remember how fiercely many Jewish Christians felt about the Mosaic law and how fanatically they opposed Paul's insistence that Gentiles should not be subjected to its strictures. Paul wanted the Gentile offering to heal this division, but it was possible that it could have had a directly opposite effect. It could have been seen as a bribe and only have intensified the hostility.

So what was the outcome? Well, in the first instance Paul was indeed delivered from the unbelievers in Judea, though not in the way he would have wanted or expected. When the riot occurred, he was rescued by the soldiers. And though he spent the next two years in custody in Caesarea and at least two years as a prisoner in Rome, he did at last get to Rome and possibly to Spain as well.

There is also reason to believe that the Gentile offering partially healed the breach between Jewish and Gentile Christianity, for the leaders thanked Paul for his concern and praised God for his ministry, while reminding him that God was also working among them to save many Jews and bless Jewish Christianity (see Acts 21:17-20).

Does prayer work? Yes, in the sense that it changes us. But it also works in the sense that it is God's appointed means to spiritual victory and right ends. Charles Hodge wrote in connection with these verses, "Prayer (and even intercessory prayer) has a real and important efficacy; not merely in its influence on the mind of him who offers it, but also in securing the blessings for which we pray. Paul directed the Roman Christians to pray for the exercise of the divine providence in protecting him from danger, and for the Holy Spirit to influence the minds of the brethren in Jerusalem. This he would not have done, were such petitions of no avail."

Earlier I cited James 5:16 to show that "the prayer of a righteous man is powerful and effective." Another verse from that letter, James 4:2, shows that the reason we do not experience the full measure of the blessing of Christ is that we do not ask for it: "You do not have, because you do not ask God." Unfortunately, we are often woefully deficient in this area.

Let me tell you how Dwight L. Moody became an evangelist. Moody was a shoe salesman who was also the teacher of a boy's Bible class in Chicago. He was there at the time of the Great Chicago Fire, and after he had done his part in getting together some money to help the poor and buy a building for his own work, he went to England for a rest. He did not intend to preach. He only wanted to hear Charles Spurgeon, George Mueller, and some others. But one Sunday he was invited to preach in a Congregational church in north London, and he accepted.

Sunday morning did not go well. Moody said that he had "no power, no liberty; it seemed like pulling a heavy train up a steep grade." It was so bad that he tried to get out of preaching the evening service, for which he had also been invited, but the minister would not let him off.

That evening it was quite different. Moody felt unusual power, and when he got to the end he decided to give an invitation. He asked all who wanted to accept Christ to get to their feet, and about five hundred people did. Moody thought there must be some mistake, perhaps they just didn't understand him. So he asked them to sit down. Then he said, "After this meeting there will be an after-service in the vestry, and I invite all who are serious about receiving Christ to come to that meeting." There was a door to the vestry on each side of the pulpit, and when the service was over the people began to stream through.

"Who are all these people?" Moody asked the pastor. "Are they yours?"

"Some of them are."

"Are they Christians?"

"Not as far as I know," was the reply.

Moody went into the vestry and repeated the invitation in even stronger terms, and the people all once again expressed their willingness to become Christians. Moody still thought there must be some mistake. He said, "I have to go to Ireland tomorrow, but your pastor will still be here and if you really mean what you have just said, come tomorrow night and meet with him again." A few days later, when he was in Ireland, Moody received a telegram from the minister saying, "There were more people here on Monday night than on Sunday. A revival has broken out in our church, and you must return from Ireland and help me." Moody did return, and what happened in those days was the basis for the invitations that later took him back to England and then over the whole world as an evangelist.

That alone is a remarkable story, but here is the rest of it. There were two sisters in that north London church, one of whom was a bed-ridden invalid. After the morning service at which Moody had first preached the healthy sister came home and reported that a Mr. Moody had been there that morning.

"Mr. Moody of Chicago?" asked the sister. When told that he was the one who had preached, the sick sister said, "I have read about him in the newspapers and have been praying that he would come to London and that God would send him to our church. If I had known that it was he who would be preaching this morning, I would have eaten no breakfast and have spent the time praying instead. Now leave me alone. Don't let anyone in to see me. I am going to spend the rest of the day and evening fasting and in prayer." That is what she did, and the revival in north London resulted.

Is prayer effective? Indeed it is! What is more, it is the only thing that is effective in this great spiritual struggle for the minds and souls of men and women. It is God's appointed means to revival.

Prayer Is Necessary

The third point this passage teaches is that prayer is necessary. It is not only effective, it is the only thing that is effective. Therefore it is absolutely necessary that we pray to see individuals saved and experience other spiritual blessings and results. Abraham Lincoln once said, "I have been driven many times to my knees by the overwhelming conviction that I had nowhere else to go. My own wisdom, and that of all about me, seemed insufficient for the day."

I include this point on the basis of Paul's reference to the will of God in verse 32: "so that by God's will I may come to you with joy and together with you be refreshed." Does that mean that prayer gets God to change his will so that he conforms to our wishes, or does it mean only that we are changed to accept what he is going to do anyway?

There are two common errors at this point. The first is the error of a superficial Calvinism, which understands that God is sovereign and that his will is always done. It errs in deducing that because this is true, prayer is virtually unimportant except in regard to how it changes us. The second is the Arminian error, which makes God somehow weakly dependent on us. William Evans, in Why Pray, writes, "Prayer does not change God's purposes and plans; but it releases them and permits God to do in, for and through us all that which his infinite love and wisdom want to do, but which because of lack of prayer he has not been able to do.... Prayer gives God the opportunity to do for us what he wants to do.... [We should not] think that God can do whatever he wants to do without our aid. He cannot."

Cannot? Unable? Give God the opportunity? Anyone who knows anything about the majestic sovereign God of the Bible knows that there is something terribly wrong with this approach.

The answer is a better understanding of true Calvinism, which realizes that God does not only appoint the end to be obtained, but he also designates the means to attain that end. Therefore, if God has appointed a widespread revival or the salvation of an individual or any other blessing and if he has determined that the means by which that blessing shall be received is prayer, then it is as necessary that we pray as it is that this predetermined blessing come about. Prayer is inseparably linked to election, just as witnessing and the preaching of the Word are linked to it. If God has determined to do something in response to the prayers of his people, then his people must pray. Indeed, he will lead them to do so.

John Calvin said, "The phrase through the will of God reminds us of the necessity of devoting ourselves to prayer, since God alone directs all our paths by his providence." Torrey declared, "Prayer is God's appointed way for obtaining things." He concluded that the major reason for all lack in our experience, life, and work is prayer's neglect.

Prayer Is Difficult

So why do we neglect prayer? Maybe because we do not believe that what I have just said is true or important, but perhaps also because prayer is so difficult. It must be difficult, because Paul calls it a struggle. People who pray well know what that means.

The next question is why prayer is difficult. One reason is that prayer is a spiritual battleground.

Our enemy is the devil, and we cannot expect things to be easy when we are struggling with Satan for the souls of men and women. Again, prayer is difficult because we do not know God or God's ways as we ought to know them. Therefore we often do not really know what to pray for. Paul understood this problem well, for he wrote earlier in Romans, "We do not know what we ought to pray for, but the Spirit himself intercedes for us with groans that words cannot express" (Rom. 8:26). In other words, one of the works of the Holy Spirit is to pray for us and with us and so make up for our great spiritual ignorance and deficiencies.

But let me suggest one other reason why prayer is so difficult for us based on what we find in Romans: We are too self-centered in our prayers. Have you noticed how unselfish Paul's prayer requests were? They were for his safety and success in Jerusalem, but not simply that he might have an easy time. He wanted his service to be so well received that it would help heal the breach between Gentile and Jewish Christianity. He wanted to be delivered from the unbelievers in Jerusalem so that his ministry among the Gentiles might be continued with God's blessing. Indeed, the last verse of our passage says, "... so that by God's will I may come to you with joy and together with you be refreshed" (v. 32).

I am reminded of the story of a little girl who had been to a Sunday school lesson on prayer and had been taught that Jesus said, "If anyone says to this mountain, 'Go, throw yourself into the sea,' and does not doubt in his heart but believes that what he says will happen, it will be done for him" (Mark 11:23). The child could see a large mountain from her bedroom window, and the next day her mother came by her room and heard her praying that God would cast the mountain into the sea. "Why do you want to pray a prayer like that?" her mother asked. "Why would you ever want that mountain thrown into the sea?"

"Oh," said the little girl, "I'd love to see the big splash it would make when it came down."

Unfortunately, many of our prayers are only a little less selfish than that. And since selfishness is sin and sin is a barrier to prayer (see Isa. 59:1-3), it is not surprising that we find prayer difficult and that our specific prayers often go unanswered.

Prayer Is Commanded

Paul's words are a command: "Join me in my struggle by praying to God for me. Pray that I may be rescued."

Jesus also taught us to pray. Remember his story about the unjust judge and persistent widow who kept coming to him until he finally gave her what she wanted (Luke 18:1-8). Jesus did not teach that God is an unjust judge; but he wanted us to know that we "should always pray and not give up" (v. 1). Jesus prayed! So did the apostles. So have all the saints through all the ages. Can we neglect it? Reuben Torrey was right when he said that whatever else we may learn on this subject, what we must certainly learn is this: "I must pray, pray, pray. I must put all my energy and all my heart into prayer. Whatever else I do, I must pray."

Chapter 231.
The Second Benediction

Romans 15:33

Have you ever had the experience of trying to say good-bye to someone or trying to end a conversation, but because new topics kept coming up you found yourself saying good-bye again and again? That happens between lovers all the time. It happened between Romeo and Juliet. In the hands of William Shakespeare it has given us one of the sweetest and most memorable partings in all literature. You might remember these words from Act 2:

> Good night, good night! Parting is such sweet sorrow That I should say good night till it be morrow.

We see something like this as we come to the end of Romans. In every one of his letters Paul ends with a benediction, but in Romans he does this more than once. He ends the eleventh chapter with a doxology that could have been a benediction. But even after he gets into the application part of the letter (chaps. 12-16) he seems to be trying to end:

first, in the middle of chapter 15; next at the end of the same chapter; then, twice more toward the end of the letter.

Halfway through chapter 15 he wrote, "May the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace as you trust in him, so that you may overflow with hope by the power of the Holy Spirit" (v. 13). Romans 16:20 says, "The grace of our Lord Jesus be with you." The chapter ends, "Now to him who is able to establish you by my gospel and the proclamation of Jesus Christ, according to the revelation of the mystery hidden for long ages past, but now revealed and made known through the prophetic writings by the command of the eternal God, so that all nations might believe and obey him—to the only wise God be glory forever through Jesus Christ! Amen" (vv. 25-27).

Our text is the second of three concluding benedictions: "The God of peace be with you all. Amen" (Rom. 15:33). This is the shortest of the benedictions, but in the judgment of at least one commentator it is the greatest.

A World Turned Upside Down

This verse can be thought of as "the greatest" in the sense that it speaks of peace, the greatest need of sinful men and women.

1. A world at war. The earliest of all historical records, a Sumerian bas-relief from Babylon (about 3000 B.C.), shows soldiers fighting in close battle order, wearing helmets and carrying shields. Wars are the chief legacy of every ancient culture. The Peloponnesian War that destroyed Greece at the height of her great civilization lasted twenty-seven years. Rome made war a way of life. In the Middle Ages war ravaged Europe, culminating in the Thirty Years' War, which ended in 1648. The Encyclopedia Britannica calls the Thirty Years' War "the most horrible military episode in western history prior to the twentieth century." In it one third of the German-speaking people—seven million—lost their lives. Yet for sheer volume of destruction both of lives and property, the wars of our time have greatly exceeded it. Twenty million people died in World War I. Sixty million died in World War II, while the cost increased from an estimated $340 billion to $1.5 trillion.

In the December 25, 1967, issue of U.S. News and World Report an article appeared tabulating that since World War II there have been "at least 12 limited wars in the world, 39 political assassinations, 48 personal revolts, 74 rebellions for independence and 162 social revolutions, either political, economical, racial or religious." A recent book reports that "in 1992 alone, human beings were engaged in ninety-three wars around the world and spent $600 billion dollars preparing for war." There is no end of peace initiatives and treaties, but the ink is scarcely dry on these treaties when guns begin to sound for the next fierce encounter.

2. No peace for the wicked. The immediate cause of this persistent lack of peace among nations is that people are not at peace themselves. They are not content. They are not happy to be what they are but are always looking for ways to increase their power, wealth, or reputation at other people's expense. This is what Isaiah was thinking about when he wrote, "The wicked are like the tossing sea, which cannot rest, whose waves cast up mire and mud. 'There is no peace,' says my God, 'for the wicked'" (Isa. 57:20-21). James, the Lord's brother, touched on the same theme when he queried, "What causes fights and quarrels among you? Don't they come from your desires that battle within you? You want something but don't get it. You kill and covet, but cannot have what you want. You quarrel and fight. You do not have, because you do not ask God" (James 4:1-2).

My favorite quotation from the brilliant French apologist Blaise Pascal goes, "I have often felt that the sole cause of man's unhappiness is that he does not know how to stay quietly in his own room." He might have said that this is the chief problem with the world as well.

3. At war with God. Yet there is a cause for the turbulence and evil of the world that goes beyond even personal restlessness, and it is that people are also at war with God. What is even more serious, God > is at war with them. This takes us back to the very first chapter of Romans, where Paul said that human beings in their fallen state do everything in their power to repress the knowledge of God made known to them in nature, because they are hostile to God and do not want to recognize his demands upon their lives. The key paragraph says, "The wrath of God is being revealed from heaven against all the godlessness and wickedness of men who suppress the truth by their wickedness, since what may be known about God is plain to them, because God has made it plain to them. For since the creation of the world God's invisible qualities—his eternal power and divine nature—have been clearly seen, being understood from what has been made, so that men are without excuse" (Rom. 1:18-20).

Simply put, people are at war with God, so God is at war with them. Their rage against God spills over into their personal lives, so that they are never content, and into their relationships with other people, so that they are a source of turmoil rather than being peacemakers.

But God is also "the God of peace," as Paul says, because he is the author of peace. This means that he has worked to bring peace to sinful human beings and their world. Our experience of this peace is threefold: (1) peace with God, which is all-important; (2) peace with other human beings; and (3) personal peace in all circumstances.

Peace with God

In his commentary on Romans John Murray remarks on how often Paul in his benedictions "calls God the God of peace or invokes upon his readers the peace that is from God." The reason for this is that a lack of peace is our chief problem. The chief message of the gospel is that God has made peace with us by the blood of Christ's cross.

That is exactly how Paul states it in Colossians 1:19-20: "For God was pleased to have all his fullness dwell in him [that is, in Christ], and through him to reconcile to himself all things, whether things on earth or things in heaven, by making peace through his blood, shed on the cross." Our sin is what causes the state of war that exists between ourselves and God, but God has dealt with sin by having his Son, the Lord Jesus Christ, die for it. The Bible tells us that "the wages of sin is death" (Rom. 6:23), but it also says that Jesus died in our place to take the penalty for that sin upon himself. The result of this, as Paul says in Romans 8:1, is that "there is now no condemnation for those who are in Christ Jesus."

Moreover, as Paul also shows, not only has God brought to an end the cause of hostility between ourselves and himself by the work of Christ, he has also transferred us from the status of rebels against his sovereignty to that of beloved sons and daughters. Paul also writes, "For you did not receive a spirit that makes you a slave again to fear, but you received the Spirit of sonship. And by him we cry, 'Abba, Father.' The Spirit himself testifies with our spirit that we are God's children. Now if we are children, then we are heirs—heirs of God and co-heirs with Christ, if indeed we share in his sufferings in order that we may also share in his glory" (Rom. 8:15-17).

What we are talking about here is "peace with God" (Rom. 5:1), and it has been achieved for us by God himself through the death of Jesus Christ. This is an objective work, and we enter into it simply by receiving or believing what God has done.

Peace with One Another

The second area in which we experience the peace of which God is the author is peace with one another. This is true for Christians in a general sense because Christians no longer need to contend for their own interests at the expense of other people. Instead of continuing as fierce, selfish belligerents on the world scene, they become true peacemakers.

There is also a specific way in which Christians experience peace with one another, however, and this is within the fellowship of the church in which the walls that formerly divided Christians are broken down—walls of race, economic status, nationality, and educational level.

This is an important theme in Paul's letter to the Ephesians, notably in the second chapter, where he writes of the new community that God has created in Jesus Christ:

For he himself is our peace, who has made the two one and has destroyed the barrier, the dividing wall of hostility, by abolishing in his flesh the law with its commandments and regulations. His purpose was to create in himself one new man out of the two, thus making peace, and in this one body to reconcile both of them to God through the cross, by which he put to death their hostility. He came and preached peace to you who were far away and peace to those who were near. For through him we both have access to the Father by one Spirit.

Ephesians 2:14-18

In Paul's mind there was a great visible symbol of the hostility that existed between people and races in the wall that surrounded the Jewish temple in Jerusalem. The temple of Paul's day had been built by Herod the Great to replace the inadequate temple that dated from the days of Nehemiah. Much of it was overlaid with gold, and it sat on a raised earth platform known even today as the temple mount. It was surrounded by courts. The innermost court was called the Court of the Priests because only members of the priestly tribe of Levi were permitted to enter. The next court was the Court of Israel; it could be entered by any Jewish male. After this there was the Court of the Women, which could be entered by Jewish women as well as any other Jew.

These courtyards were all on one level. So although there were great differences between them, the differences were not as great as the radical division that came next. From the Court of the Women five steps descended to a level area in which there was a five-foot stone barricade that went completely around the temple enclosure; then, after another level space, fourteen more steps descended to the Court of the Gentiles. The Jewish historian Josephus wrote that the wall dividing Jews from Gentiles was marked at intervals by stone inscriptions warning that no foreigner was to enter the Jewish enclosures upon penalty of death.

These inscriptions were like our signs that say "Trespassers will be prosecuted," except that these read, "Trespassers will be killed." We know how seriously this was taken because of the attempt of the Jewish mob to kill Paul when he returned to Jerusalem on the false charge that he had brought a Gentile named Trophimus past these barriers into the inner enclosures of the temple (Acts 21:27-29).

This was the great visible symbol of Jewish-Gentile hostility that Paul had in mind as he wrote of the work of Christ in removing this alienation. In all the ancient world, no wall was as impassable as that between Jews and Gentiles. But Paul says that God has destroyed the barrier in Jesus Christ and has made one new people by him.

He has done this by opening the door to himself to people of all races by faith in Jesus. The temple had another even more significant barrier than those I have mentioned as existing between persons, and that was the great veil that separated the Holy Place, which the appointed priests could enter, and the Most Holy Place, which only the high priest could enter, and only once a year on the Day of Atonement. It symbolized the inaccessibility of God, for God was understood to dwell symbolically within the Most Holy Place between the wings of the cherubim who were perched on the golden covering of the Ark of the Covenant. This was the greatest barrier of all. The entire system of walls and veils was meant to show not only the barriers between various kinds of people, but to highlight the greatest of all barriers, which is the barrier between man and God due to man's sin. The cause of all alienation is sin, and the greatest alienation of all is that between ourselves and the holy God.

But see what God has done! When the Lord Jesus Christ died upon the cross to make atonement for sin, Matthew tells us that "the curtain of the temple was torn in two from top to bottom" (Matt. 27:51). It was a way of showing that because of his death the way to the Father was now open for all who would come to God by faith in him. Because he was the one, perfect, and allsufficient sacrifice for sin, there is now no longer any need for a line of priests to offer sacrifices. We no longer need an annual Day of Atonement. We no longer even need a temple, because we have been given access to the true heavenly temple by Christ's death on our behalf (cf. Heb. 9:24-28; 10:19-25).

All who believe on Jesus Christ come to God together. There is no reason for any grounds of separation between us. If we have been reconciled to God, which is the greatest chasm to be covered, then it is certain that the chasms between us and other women and men have been obliterated too.

If you are in Christ, you are one body with every other believer—whether Jew or Gentile, male or female, rich or poor. So you must act like it. You may not see eye to eye with every other believer in Christ on every possible point of doctrine or practice, but you must know that you belong to other Christians and they to you, and you must work to make that fundamental unity apparent to the world.

If you are not yet a Christian, you should learn that in the final analysis the solution to all your many problems is to be found in your relationship or lack of a relationship to God. The reason the world is not at peace is that it has rejected God. And that is precisely the reason why you are not at peace, too. You need to repent of your sin, including your suspicion of, alienation from, and hostility to other persons, and come to God through faith in Jesus Christ.

Peace Passing Human Understanding

Our final experience of the peace of which God is the author is what Paul in Philippians 4:6-7 calls the peace of God: "Do not be anxious about anything, but in everything, by prayer and petition, with thanksgiving, present your requests to God. And the peace of God, which transcends all understanding, will guard your hearts and your minds in Christ Jesus."

The peace of God is different from peace with God, which is what Romans is mostly about.
Peace with God is something that is achieved for us by God himself through the work of Jesus Christ. It is the result of his making atonement for our sins. The peace of God is something beyond this for those who have given themselves to Christ. In this verse, when Paul writes about anxiety he is thinking of the upsetting situations that come into our lives. Perhaps we have lost a job and are worried about earning enough money to provide for our families. Maybe we are sick, or a friend is sick. We are worried about the outcome. Perhaps someone very close to us has died. Elisabeth Elliot, who had one husband murdered by Auca Indians in Ecuador and another slowly consumed by cancer, said that the death of a husband was like having an eggbeater suddenly thrust into the mixing bowl of her emotional life. She called it a time when the earth seemed to be giving way, the waters were roaring, and the mountains were being cast into the sea (cf. Ps. 46:2-3). In such times of personal distress we need peace in our lives, and it is this about which Philippians 4:6-7 is speaking.

But we must ask for it! This is because Philippians 4:6-7 is about prayer —"prayer and petition, with thanksgiving" by which we "present [our] requests to God." The promise is that if we will do that, laying all our troubles, worries, and anxieties before God, then a peace which is manifestly beyond all human understanding will possess us. The hymn writer said,

> What a friend we have in Jesus,
> All our sins and griefs to bear!
> What a privilege to carry
> Everything to God in prayer!
> O what peace we often forfeit,
> O what needless pain we bear,
> All because we do not carry
> Everything to God in prayer.

I find it significant that Paul's second benediction, which is a prayer that the God of all peace might be with the Christians at Rome, follows immediately upon his request for prayer from them. They are to pray, but he is praying too. So should we! We should pray for peace ourselves and for one another.

Part Twenty-Two. Final Greetings

Chapter 232.
Phoebe, a Deaconess

Romans 16:1-2

The last chapter of Romans contains the names of many people in Rome, to whom Paul was writing, as well as those who were in Corinth with Paul and who joined him in sending greetings—thirty-three names in all. Twenty-four of these people were in Rome. Nine were in Corinth. But there are also two unnamed women and an unspecified number of unnamed men. Far from being an uninteresting listing, this chapter is actually one of the most fascinating of the New Testament.

One fascinating thing about Romans 16 is what it reveals about Paul. Some have the idea that people who are interested in ideas—in this case those who study Christian theology—are not interested in people. They are supposed to immerse themselves in books. They are not "relational," as we say. There are people like this, of course. But Paul is a refutation of the idea that those who are interested in doctrine cannot be interested in those for whom the doctrine has been given. No one could be more interested in the great truths of God than Paul. The entire Epistle to the Romans has been an unfolding of them. But here we see that Paul was also intensely interested in people. In fact, to judge by this chapter, Paul can be said to show more interest in people than anyone else in the Bible except Jesus.

Another lesson from this chapter is brought out by Leon Morris in his commentary:

[Romans] was not written to professional theologians (though through the centuries scholars have found the epistle a happy hunting ground). As we consider the weighty matters Paul deals with, we are apt to overlook the fact that it was addressed to people like Ampliatus and Tryphena and Rufus. Clearly Paul expected this kind of person to be helped by what he wrote, a fact which modern experts sometimes overlook. And it is fitting that this letter, which has given us so much solid doctrinal teaching, should end with this emphasis on persons, on love, and on a reminder that humble servants of God perform all sorts of active ministry.

The Bearer of the Letter

The first of these many persons whom Paul mentions is Phoebe. We do not know anything more about her than what we are told here, but we are told several important facts, and there is also solid ground for some additional helpful speculation.

What seems most likely, because of the way she is commended to the church, is that Phoebe was the bearer of the letter to the church at Rome. If we analyze the chapter, we will see that verses 3-16 refer to people at Rome to whom the apostle sends greetings, and that verses 21-24 refer to people who were at Corinth who sent their greetings with Paul. Phoebe stands apart, at the head of this chapter, as one who was obviously traveling to Rome and is therefore commended to the good graces of the Roman Christians. Since she is the only one so commended, it is reasonable to think that she was the one who carried the letter. In the ancient world letters were always sent by individual persons, for there was no postal service outside of the military.

What Paul asks the Christians at Rome to do is "to receive her in the Lord in a way worthy of the saints and to give her any help she may need from you, for she has been a great help to many people, including me." In other words, they were being asked to receive and help Phoebe in exactly the same manner Paul had indicated that he would like to be helped when he would get to Rome himself (see Rom. 15:24).

This woman bore a pagan name. Phoebe is the feminine form of Phoibos, a name given to the god Apollo. But Phoebe had become a Christian, was a true "servant" of the church at Cenchrea, and had helped many people, including Paul.

Here is a point at which we may speculate a bit. It was not very safe for a woman to travel alone in the ancient world, so Phoebe probably had people with her. But it is Phoebe who is mentioned and not these other persons—not even a husband—so we are probably right to suppose that she was single and a prominent woman. She must have been wealthy too, because it took money to travel. She was probably like Lydia of Philippi, a dealer in purple cloth who was converted through Paul's preaching and then opened her house to Paul and the other new Christians (Acts 16:13-15).

What a wonderful treasure Phoebe carried in her hands. She had been a servant to the church in Cenchrea, the eastern port of the city of Corinth. In this service she became an even greater servant to the church at all times and in all places. Donald Grey Barnhouse wrote, "Never was there a greater burden carried by such tender hands. The theological history of the church through the centuries was in the manuscript which she brought with her. The Reformation was in that baggage. The blessing of multitudes in our day was carried in those parchments."

Was Phoebe a Deaconess?

Was Phoebe a deaconess—that is, an elected or appointed officer of the church at Cenchrea? This question arises because the word for deacon is the same Greek word as servant, and this is the word used of Phoebe in verse 1: "Phoebe, a servant of the church in Cenchrea." The King James Version of the Bible translates the word as servant. The Revised Standard Version renders it deaconess. The New International Version reads servant but adds or deaconess as a text note. Without any real justification, the New English Bible has the words "who holds office in the congregation at Cenchrea."

The reason for these various translations is that the word itself is ambiguous. It means servant generally and broadly, but it can also mean deacon or deaconess in a narrower or restricted sense. Only the context can determine how it should be taken, and there is not enough said in Romans 16:1 to be decisive.

As I have looked over what has been written on this question in various commentaries, I have received the impression that judgments, where they occur, come more from the age or ecclesiastical tradition of the writers than from the word diakonos itself. For example, John Murray writes, "If Phoebe ministered to the saints, as is evident from verse 2, then she would be a servant of the church and there is neither need nor warrant to suppose that she occupied or exercised what amounted to an ecclesiastical office comparable to that of the diaconate." Murray was from a church tradition that did not ordain women. On the other hand, Leon Morris says, "The social conditions of the time were such that there must have been the need for feminine church workers to assist in such matters as the baptism of women or anything that meant contact with women's quarters in homes. The form of expression here makes it more likely that an official is meant than the more general term 'servant,'..."

The bottom line is that the text itself is not decisive, and a judgment on this question must be made on other grounds. In my judgment, based on 1 Timothy 2:12, there are two limitations placed on the function of women in the church: (1) an authoritative teaching position and (2) an authoritative disciplining position. Those seem to me to be restricted to male leaders, functioning together in what the Presbyterian tradition calls a session. But aside from that restriction there is no office or service in the church in which women may not perform.

Again I quote Barnhouse:

What we owe to [women] in the Sunday school and in the work among women, is shown by the devotion to the Lord of those whom he has called to direct his work. We remember that a group of women followed the Lord Jesus Christ when he was here on earth, for we read that, in addition to the twelve, there were "certain women which had been healed of evil spirits and infirmities, Mary called Magdalene, out of whom went seven demons, and Joanna the wife of Chuza, Herod's steward, and Susanna, and many others, which ministered unto him of their substance" (Luke 8:2-3). And to this day, the faithful ministration of such women makes possible a vast amount of the missionary activity of the church throughout the world.

At Tenth Presbyterian Church we have women serve as deaconesses, in the Sunday school, and on all our committees, with the sole exception of the session, and we encourage them to do so.

But let's step back from the concern for the place of women in society that has been raised for those in our day and notice that our questions were not even being raised in the New Testament era. They are not in Paul's mind as he wraps up Romans, for example, or he would have made his position on church offices clear. Why wasn't this an issue? The answer is not that the apostles were not concerned with women or the exercise of their gifts. Obviously they were. That is why they are mentioned so often, as here. The answer is that the New Testament leaders were just not as deeply concerned with office, as we are. Instead they were concerned with normal Christian behavior or functions. What they cared about was that Christian people should actually be the servants of others, as Jesus was, not whether they had a badge saying, "I am a servant [deacon or deaconess] of the church."

A Ministry of Service

Service is a necessary function of those who call themselves Christians, and every Christian should be a deaconess or deacon in this sense.

I have been helped in this area by some studies on the role of the diaconate done by George C.
Fuller, a minister in the Presbyterian Church of America and a former president of Westminster Theological Seminary in Philadelphia. Although he was concerned with the forms of service peculiar to deacons, Fuller began with an emphasis on the service ministry of each believer in Christ. He pointed out that the world measures greatness by the service a person receives. In business the "important" people are those at the top of the organizational pyramid. The bigger the organization, the more important the top person is. In personal affairs the "great" are those who have servants, and the greater the number of servants, the greater the great one is perceived to be. Jesus reversed all that. He turned the whole thing upside down, making, as it were, "the first last and the last first." In God's eyes, greatness consists not in the number of people who serve us but in the number of people we serve. The greater the number, the better the Christian.

Fuller wrote, "If Jesus had not taken upon himself the 'form of a servant,' if the Lord of glory had not 'humbled himself and become obedient unto death, even death on a cross,' the world's standard would have remained unchallenged." But Jesus challenged it. Now "he is the 'deacon,' our ultimate example, and in fulfilling that charge from God he assured power for his people, his body on earth, to do his ministry."

So why do we have official deacons and deaconesses? The reason is that we need people to lead the way in several ministries in which every believer in Jesus Christ should be engaged.

1. A ministry of mercy. The first is "the ministry of mercy," the chief service for which the office of deacon was established. You will recall that deacons came into being as a result of the situation described in Acts 6:1-7. There were many poor Christians in Jerusalem. Some Christians had a surplus of goods and gave to assist these poor people. A dispute arose between the Greek-speaking and Aramaic-speaking Jews about a perceived unequal distribution of these resources. The Greek-speaking Jews, the Hellenists, complained that their widows were being neglected in the daily distribution of food. This threatened to divide the church. So after they had prayed about the problem and sought God's direction, the apostles counseled the church to select seven men "known to be full of the Spirit and wisdom" and place this important service in their hands.

The church did this, choosing Stephen, Philip, Procorus, Nicanor, Timon, Parmenas, and Nicolas (v. 5). Judging from their names, these men were all from the Greek-speaking community. So the congregation chose wisely, the food was properly distributed, and the office of deacon was born.

2. Evangelism. Another ministry of deacons is evangelism, which arises naturally out of their other work. The first two of the deacons mentioned in Acts 6 are examples. Philip is called "the evangelist" in Acts 21:8. God used him to take the gospel to the Samaritans (Acts 8:5) and later to an Ethiopian nobleman (Acts 8:26-40). He had a gift for what we would call cross-cultural evangelism. Stephen preached with great power before the Jewish Sanhedrin, the same body that had condemned Jesus. In fact, his preaching brought such conviction to these corrupt religious leaders that they killed him too. So he became the first martyr of the church.

3. Training others. A third work of the deacons and deaconess is to train others. Some will do this by direct and explicit teaching; all must do it by example.

It is good to remember that in our Lord's parable of the sheep and the goats, told just before his arrest and crucifixion, it was the presence or absence of genuine service to others that marked the corresponding presence or absence of a saving relationship to him. What was done to and for others was regarded as a service to himself:

Then the King will say to those on his right, "Come, you who are blessed by my Father; take your inheritance, the kingdom prepared for you since the creation of the world. For I was hungry and you gave me something to eat, I was thirsty and you gave me something to drink, I was a stranger and you invited me in, I needed clothes and you clothed me, I was sick and you looked after me, I was in prison and you came to visit me."

Then the righteous will answer him, "Lord, when did we see you hungry and feed you, or thirsty and give you something to drink? When did we see you a stranger and invite you in, or needing clothes and clothe you? When did we see you sick or in prison and go to visit you?"

The King will reply, "I tell you the truth, whatever you did for one of the least of these brothers of mine, you did for me."

Matthew 25:34-40

The Church, God's Family

The church of Jesus Christ is meant to be one large and very caring family. The word church appears here, in verse 1, for the first time in Romans. It occurs five times in this chapter (vv. 1, 4, 5, 16, 23), where Paul is beginning to write about individual members of the Roman and Corinthian congregations.

It is not the only word for the body of believers, either. Paul calls these Christians brothers and sisters (Phoebe is "our sister"), saints, fellow workers, friends, a mother in one case, and those who are in the Lord. What ties these references together is that they regard those who are in Christ as members of a spiritual family. Therefore, the matter is important to Paul, and he emphasizes that these believers belong to each other and serve each other selflessly, without any regard to titles, just as members of a happy and well-functioning family might do.

These people have titles, but not the kind the world would care very much to possess. Barnhouse calls these titles epitaphs, because these people are gone now and are remembered only because of the words Paul spoke over them as he sent this letter to Rome:

Let us look through this chapter to see the designations of these shadowy figures who walk against the gray stones of ancient Rome. Phoebe is called a servant of the church, a helper of many. What an epitaph! How much can be said in a single sentence. I begin to think of single sentences that described a complete life of a person. For many weeks I glanced at the obituary columns of the New York Times and the Times of London. It was not long before I had quite a list. "A writer on food and wines" is the sentence left behind by one man. "Developer of trotting races" summed up the life of another. Still another "introduced modern conditions for bottling beer."...

In contrast to this, glance through the closing chapter of Romans and read these lines of description. Servant (v. 1), helper (v. 2), fellow workers (vv. 3, 9), four people who are called beloved (vv. 5, 8, 9, 12), two called hard workers (vv. 6, 12), fellow prisoners, men of note among the apostles (v. 7), approved in Christ (v. 10), workers in the Lord (v. 12), eminent (v. 13), a mother to me (v. 13), saints (v. 15). What epitaphs are these! How much greater than the piles of stone that emperors heaped together to preserve their memory. The Colosseum and the Pantheon are great buildings built by two of the emperors, but who knows their names? And if I tell you that one of them was built by Hadrian and the other by Vespasian, who but a few history teachers knows which was which?

But when all the stones have turned to sand, and when the elements melt in fervent heat, and Rome, supposedly eternal, is seen to be the quintessence of that which is temporal, these humble people, beloved, hard workers, and saints, will burst forth in the brilliance of the truly eternal city "which has foundations, whose builder and maker is God" (Heb. 11:10).

We do not pray to these saints; they cannot hear us. But, feeling our oneness with them, we know the true communion of saints and wait for that day when we, with them, shall be caught up together to meet our Lord when he comes (1 Thess. 4:13-18).

As Barnhouse did at the close of that chapter of his studies, so I also look back over the years of my life and think of the Christian people who have helped me along the way. Most of them would be unknown to you, and I do not know any who have been much honored by the world. But I think of them and give them these titles: Encourager, Teacher, Counselor, Fellow Worker, Friend, Companion. I know I am not remembering them all. But they are known to their Master in heaven, and they will not fail of their reward. Thank God for these great servants of his. May we be like them.

Chapter 233.
The Apostle Who Did Not Forget

Romans 16:3-16

In the last chapter of Romans Paul is thinking about other people, not about himself. But we can hardly read the chapter without thinking seriously about him.

What a remarkable person Paul was! He possessed one of the greatest intellects of all time, right up there with Plato and Aristotle. But unlike those two outstanding Greeks, Paul was not merely a thinker and teacher. He was also the first great propagandist for Christianity, a pioneer missionary with a truly global vision. And he persevered in this vision even though it meant great personal discomfort and hardships. He tells us in one place that he endured "troubles, hardships and distresses... beatings, imprisonments and riots... hard work, sleepless nights and hunger" (2 Cor. 6:4-5). Yet in spite of such troubles he persevered in the task he believed God had given him to do and by God's grace made a more lasting and beneficial impact upon this world than any mere human being who has ever lived. Only the Lord Jesus Christ was more influential.

Sometimes people with this kind of intellectual ability and drive are hard to get close to, but it is to Paul's credit that he was not at all like that. One commentator rightly says of him, "He was never, for a moment, a professional Christian." He cared for people. What drove him was his love for his Savior and his consuming passion that others might come to know and love the Lord Jesus Christ too.

Friends and Fellow Workers

We have a remarkable picture of this great apostle in Romans 16. It emerges in the way he sends his greetings to more than twenty-four people in Rome. When we remember that Paul had never been in Rome, that there was no postal service for civilians, no telephones or faxes that could have given him quick information about what was going on or who was doing what, it is remarkable that he knew so many people who were there and such a lot about them.

How did he get to know them? And how did he know so many details about their lives? There were two ways. Either these were people he had gotten to know in the long course of his missionary work and then had kept track of, following them in his mind as they left Ephesus, Corinth, or wherever and relocated to Rome, or they were people in Rome whom he had learned about from those who had come to him from that city, like Priscilla and Aquila. As we read over this list of names, we find that Paul knew most of these people personally, which means that most were people he had met in his missionary travels. Either he had led these people to Christ or they had worked with him or he had been imprisoned with them for Christ's sake. Paul loved them all. So he kept track of them and followed what happened to them in their work and travels.

We have telephones and good mail service and other modern means of quick communication. But I doubt that there are many of us who could name twenty-four people in another city, not to mention one we have never visited—people who are believers and whom we remember and support regularly in our prayers.

The Christians at Rome

When we begin to look into these names and what Paul says about them, we find a remarkable picture of life in the early church. In fact, it is one of the best early pictures of the church we have, with the possible exception of the church in Jerusalem described in Acts.

1. Priscilla and Aquila. Not many of the people in these lists are known to us in any way apart from what Paul says of them here. Priscilla and Aquila are an exception, because they are mentioned six different places in the New Testament. We learn from these scattered references that Aquila was a Jew from Pontus who had settled in Rome but had been forced to leave Rome, together with his wife, Priscilla, when the Emperor Claudius had expelled the Jews from the capital (Acts 18:2). Aquila was a tentmaker, which was Paul's occupation too. This is what brought them together when Paul had to work in Corinth to support himself during this period of his missionary outreach. When Paul left Corinth for Ephesus, this couple went with him but then stayed on in Ephesus, where they were used "more adequately" to explain the gospel to an influential orator and (later) effective Christian worker named Apollos (Acts 18:24-26). By the time Paul wrote this letter they had returned to Rome.

Aquila and Priscilla had a sound knowledge of the gospel, great ability, and outstanding courage, and they were well known to the churches at Rome and elsewhere, judging by what Paul writes. He calls them his fellow workers, adding that they risked their lives for him and that "all the churches of the Gentiles are grateful to them." We do not know how they risked their lives for Paul, but it may have been at Ephesus when the mob led by the makers of idols of the goddess Diana were rioting.

Priscilla and Aquila had a group of believers meeting in their house. They had opened their home to similar congregations earlier, at Corinth (see 1 Cor. 16:19) and probably in Ephesus. In these days Christians mostly met in private homes, and there were probably many house churches in Rome.

2. Epenetus. Epenetus, whom Paul mentions next, was Paul's friend. He calls him "my dear friend," adding that he was "the first convert to Christ in the province of Asia." Since Paul was the first to evangelize Asia, this can only mean that Paul had led Epenetus to Christ. No wonder Paul did not forget him! You always remember those you lead to Christ, especially the first man or woman.

3. Mary. There are many Marys in the New Testament, especially the Gospels, but there is no reason to associate this Mary with any of them. Paul says that Mary "worked very hard for you," which means that she was from Rome. Paul had probably been told about her by Aquila and Priscilla, who had come to Corinth about the time Paul had first arrived there. Literally Paul's words mean "Mary the toiler." She may have been one of the earliest members of the Roman church, and her toil may have been largely responsible for its spiritual and organizational wellbeing. Mary bore no title, but she had the gift of helps (see 1 Cor. 12:28), and Paul is careful to remember those who exercise such service.

4. Andronicus and Junias. Paul says four things about these two people: (1) they were his relatives, (2) they had been in prison with him, (3) they were outstanding among the apostles, and (4) they were in Christ before he was.

This is quite remarkable. Calling them his relatives could mean that they were members of his own extended family, but it probably does not. Like other similar references (see v. 11), it probably means only that they were Jews. They had become Christians before he did, however, and this means that they must have gone back to the very earliest days of the infant church in Jerusalem. Interestingly, here are Jews from the very early days of the church who were now in Rome and were part of the congregation there.

The phrase "outstanding among the apostles" is ambiguous. It could mean that they were apostles who were outstanding, or that the apostles considered them to be outstanding. In the first case, Paul would be using the word apostles in a less than strict sense to indicate those who are messengers of or for Jesus Christ It is possible that the name Junias (NIV) is actually Junia, which being a feminine form of the same name might mean that these two people were husband and wife and that Junia is therefore being commended along with her husband as an outstanding "apostle," in the broad sense, of course. John Chrysostom believed Junia was indeed a woman and was impressed enough to say, "Oh! how great is the devotion of this woman, that she should be even counted worthy of the appellation of apostle." As we saw in the last study, Paul did not belittle women but praised them highly.

5. Ampliatus. Ampliatus was a common slave name, but it may be significant that in the cemetery of Domatilla, which is the earliest of the Christian catacombs, there is an elaborate tomb with the single word Ampliatus on it. Since it bears only the one name, it seems to mark the tomb of a slave—free men had more than one name—but since it is elaborate it seems to be the tomb of an important person in the church. In other words, in the Roman church there were no distinctions based upon whether one was a slave or free. It may also be possible, since Ampliatus is associated with Domatilla, who was a woman of high status in Rome, that this is an example of how Christianity penetrated by degrees into even the highest levels of Roman rank and society.

6. Urbanus, Stachys, Apelles, and Herodion. Verses 9-11 mention four men of whom we know nothing other than what Paul tells us here. Urbanus is called a "fellow worker." Stachys is "my dear friend," like Epenetus. Apelles is "tested and approved in Christ." Herodion, like Andronicus and Junias, is called Paul's "relative." It is worth noting that Apelles means called. So putting everything we know about him together, we have one who is "called, tested, and approved in Christ." What a testimony! What a fine thing to be said about any one of us!

7. The households of Aristobulus and Narcissus. Neither Aristobulus nor Narcissus is greeted personally by Paul, which is why we count twenty-four names of those Paul knew, rather than twenty-six. Paul speaks only of their households, yet even these households are interesting.

In Rome the word household did not only describe a man's family and close relations; it included his household domestics or slaves as well. Now in Rome there had lived a grandson of the Jewish king Herod the Great whose name was Aristobulus. When he died his slaves would have passed to the ownership of the emperor and would have been known as those of "the household of Aristobulus." Thus, Paul's greeting may well be to those Jewish slaves who belonged to this household but who had become Christians and were members of the Roman church. This is made more likely because of the name Herodion, which follows Aristobulus. Herodion is clearly derived from Herod, so he may have been one of the leading slaves in this household.

Narcissus is the name of a wealthy freedman who had been prominent under Claudius but had been put to death by Nero when he took the throne. Again, there seem to have been a significant number of believers in this household.

8. Tryphena and Tryphosa. These two female names come from a root that means "to live delicately or daintily," so Paul may be using positive irony when he commends "Delicate" and "Dainty" for actually working hard. None of us should be dainty in practice as long as God has rigorous work for us to do.

9. Persis. When Paul wrote about Tryphena and Tryphosa working hard in the Lord he used the present tense, which meant that they were still working. Here he uses the past tense, translated "who has worked very hard" in the New International Version. This probably means that Persis was old; her hardworking days were over. Yet although she could no longer work as she once had, what she did was remembered and she was highly regarded. Paul calls her "my dear friend," actually "the beloved."

10. Rufus and his mother. William Barclay says that one of the great "hidden romances" of the New Testament lies behind the name of Rufus and his mother. Who was this Rufus? If you look up his name in a concordance, you will find that a Rufus is mentioned in Mark 15:21. That chapter tells the story of Christ's crucifixion, and it mentions that a Cyrenian man named Simon was forced to carry Christ's cross when Jesus was too weak to do it. Mark says that Simon of Cyrene was the father of Alexander and Rufus. Why would he mention that? He would if Alexander and Rufus were well known. Add to this the fact that Mark's Gospel was written for the church at Rome especially, and we have not only the reason why Mark would mention these men but also a probable identification of Paul's Rufus. Quite possibly he was the son of the man who carried Christ's cross.

What a story lies hidden here! Simon was a Jew who, like all Jews, would have hated the Romans. To be pressed into service by a Roman soldier and be forced to carry the cross of a condemned man must have been a hateful, bitter experience for him. But something important may have happened to Simon that day. Instead of merely flinging down the cross at Golgotha, Simon must have been struck by the person of Jesus, stayed to watch the crucifixion, and eventually been converted, perhaps by the same elements that God used to reach the heart of the believing thief. After the Passover he would have returned home to Cyrene and would have told his family about Jesus. They may have become Christians through his testimony.

William Barclay goes even farther, remembering that "it was men from Cyprus and Cyrene" who came to Antioch and first preached the gospel to the Gentile world (Acts 11:20). Was Simon one of the men from Cyrene? Was Rufus with him? Turn to Ephesus. A riot is instigated by people who served Diana of the Ephesians, and the crowd would have killed Paul if they could have gotten to him. Barclay writes, "Who stands out to look that mob in the face? A man called Alexander (Acts 19:33). Is this the other brother facing things out with Paul? And as for their mother—surely she in some hour of need must have brought to Paul the help and the comfort and the love which his own family refused him when he became a Christian."

Much of this is only speculation, of course, but stranger histories have unfolded. It may be that this happened as a result of an apparently chance encounter between Simon and Jesus on the road to Calvary.

11. Asyncritus, Phlegon, Hermes, Patrobas, Hermas, and the brothers with them. We know nothing about this group of people except for what Paul tells us here, and that is not much. Apparently these were men who in some way lived or worked together. Ray Stedman calls them "a businessmen's group." They may have been slaves of one man or have become freedmen together. Since there are brothers mentioned with them, this may be another reference to a house church.

12. Philologus, Julia, Nereus, and his sister, and Olympas and all the saints with them. The most interesting name in this final collection is Nereus. Here again William Barclay provides intriguing information. In a.d. 95 two of the most distinguished people in Rome were condemned for being Christians. They were husband and wife, and their names were Flavius Clemens and Domatilla, the woman who gave her name to the earliest Christian graveyard in Rome. Flavius was executed. Domatilla was banished to the island of Pontia, probably because she was of royal blood. She was the granddaughter of Vespasian, a former emperor, and the niece of Domitian, who was the reigning emperor. The name of this couple's chamberlain, a personal steward who in some cases handled his master's finances, was Nereus.

We do not know, of course, if this is the same Nereus, but it may be that this was the very person through whom the gospel of God's grace entered this prominent Roman household and eventually led to the martyrdoms that doubtless shocked and troubled Rome.

Not to Be Forgotten

When we look back over this chapter we begin to get a sense of how close these people were to Paul, though they were hundreds of miles away, and how much he loved them. For he calls them beloved and praises them for their faithful service to him and one another and for their labor in the Lord.

Do you love other Christians like that, especially people who are not quite like you? Some believers are bookish, working away in libraries in order to understand the Bible better and be more able to explain it to others. Other Christians are visible, popular figures. Some are quiet and self-effacing. Some are loud, enthusiastic, or even awkward in the way they express their Christianity. Some love somber liturgy. Others speak in tongues. No matter! They are all members of the one body of Jesus Christ and should be loved and appreciated by all others who are true Christians. They should be loved by you, if you are following in the footsteps of the apostle Paul in this area.

How did Paul come to know and actually love so many Christians? How did he remember them all? Chiefly because he was thinking about them rather than about himself. I think of the way he handled the delicate situation in Corinth when conflicting loyalties to himself, Peter, and Apollos threatened to divide that church. Paul told the Corinthians, "What, after all, is Apollos? And what is Paul? Only servants, through whom you came to believe—as the Lord has assigned to each his task. I planted the seed, Apollos watered it, but God made it grow" (1 Cor. 3:5-6). It is this spirit, a spirit that appreciates and values the work of the other Christian, even more than one's own, that flows through Paul's writings.

We need to be like him in this. We need to think about other people much more than we do, instead of always thinking of ourselves. Try making a list of people who have done something for you to bring you closer to Christ or whom God has used you to bless. Write down what they did and begin to thank God for them. If you can't think of anybody, at least start serving others so they will add you to their list of people not to be forgotten.

Chapter 234.
A Sudden Warning

Romans 16:17-19

Romans is not the longest book in the Bible, or even the New Testament, but it is long for a letter, and Paul has taken a long time ending it. After all, of sixteen chapters fully one and a half contain Paul's final greetings. He seemed to be ending when he commended Phoebe to the Roman church and sent greetings to these he knew who were in Rome, but then suddenly, in the middle of what appears to be his final comments, he breaks in with a completely unexpected warning about people who might "cause divisions and put obstacles in your way that are contrary to the teaching you have learned" (Rom. 16:17).

This warning is so sudden, unexpected, and sharp that some commentators consider it to be an interpolation—something added to the letter later by someone other than Paul. But to approach the paragraph this way is to miss how much Paul loved the Roman church, even though he had not yet been able to visit it, and how concerned he was that something harmful might enter into it to spoil the church and its witness.

Besides, his warning is not really unrelated to what he has just said. Leon Morris suggests that these verses may have been added as a thoughtful response to mentioning the kiss of peace in the previous verse. Paul might have thought how easy it would be for that existing harmony to be disrupted. Or they might have come into his mind as a result of his mentioning the churches he knew and from which he sends greetings in the same verse. Paul knew the problems that had developed in other churches. His letters are full of material dealing with such problems. Recalling them would suggest the troubles that might disrupt the Roman congregation in the future. Or perhaps Paul had received some disturbing reports from Rome just as he was bringing the letter to the Romans to a close.

What we do know is that his fears were not groundless. When he finally did get to Rome he found precisely what he had warned them against. Paul wrote to the Philippians, saying, "Some [here] preach Christ out of envy and rivalry, but others out of good will. The latter do so in love, knowing that I am put here for the defense of the gospel. The former preach Christ out of selfish ambition, not sincerely, supposing that they can stir up trouble for me while I am in chains" (Phil. 1:15-17).

Boars in God's Vineyard

At the height of the Reformation, when Martin Luther was challenging the corruptions of the medieval church by a rediscovery of sound biblical exegesis and preaching, Pope Leo X issued a papal bull against Luther that complained that "a wild boar is ravishing God's vineyard." Luther was not doing that, of course. He was more like an Old Testament prophet, recalling a wayward church to its apostolic roots. But wild boars really have ravished the church from time to time, and that is what Paul is warning about here. He warns against two specific things.

1. Those who cause divisions. What Paul has in mind when he speaks of "those who cause divisions" is not so much people who introduce heresies into the church, though this also sometimes happens, but those who divide churches into factions that will be loyal to themselves.

Often these are people who show up in a congregation suddenly, usually from another church where they have also caused trouble, though they give no indication of that when they come. They are knowledgeable. They usually have considerable abilities. They are leaders in the sense that they have enthusiasm and get people to follow them easily. Generally they are used to teaching, and they want to fill this role in their new church. Unfortunately, although the Bible warns us to make full proof of those who want to be teachers, people like this are usually warmly welcomed and quickly put to work, because most churches need able people who actually want to serve.

But problems develop quickly. These new teachers begin to push a particular point of doctrine to the exclusion of other equally important truths. And they are critical of people who do not see things as they do or join them in pushing their personal concerns. When everyone does not go their way—and not all people do, because God always has some in any church who are not so easily taken in, who care for other believers and who are not serving themselves—these unbalanced and divisive teachers pull most of their followers away and start another fellowship. That fellowship is always presented as a more biblical, more faithful, or truer church.

The names of some churches point back to such an origin. They are "The Christian Church" or the only "Full Gospel Church" or "The True Light Gospel Church." I have even seen such names as "The Original Glorious Church" and "Holy Ghost Headquarters." Fortunately, some of these churches mature into less factional and stronger congregations when the founder moves on.

2. Those who put obstacles in other persons' ways. The other danger Paul warns the Roman church against is those who "put obstacles in your way that are contrary to the teaching you have learned." The word Paul uses here is skandalon, from which we get our word "scandal." He is not thinking of scandalous behavior, though that is also often a problem, but rather of adding things to the gospel that get in the way of those who are merely trying to obey the Bible and follow Jesus Christ.

This is what the Pharisees of Jesus' day were doing and why he spoke so harshly against them. The Pharisees imposed all kinds of extreme, extrabiblical requirements on their disciples. They required hundreds of detailed points of Sabbath observance, strict controls on diet, and the observance of many holy or otherwise special days. Jesus said of them, "They tie up heavy loads and put them on men's shoulders, but they themselves are not willing to lift a finger to move them. Everything they do is done for men to see" (Matt. 23:4-5). He also admonished them directly, "Woe to you, teachers of the law and Pharisees, you hypocrites! You shut the kingdom in men's faces. You yourselves do not enter, nor will you let those enter who are trying to" (Matt. 23:13).

People like this do not deny the essentials of the Christian faith, but they bring in other things that are not in the Bible and insist on conformity in these areas. In the Greek text of this verse Paul uses the words para, which means along side of, and didachê, which means teaching. So what he is thinking of is those who put some other teaching alongside of what is taught in Scripture.

Because these matters are not specified in Scripture, it is not necessarily wrong for a Christian to practice them. For example, it is acceptable for a Christian to adopt particular ways of observing the Lord's Day or certain standards of dress that he believes point to Jesus Christ or glorify Christ. What is wrong is attempting to impose these standards on other believers and then dividing the church because some Christians will not conform to them.

It is important to remember Galatians 5:1: "It is for freedom that Christ has set us free. Stand firm, then, and do not let yourselves be burdened again by a yoke of slavery." This is the climactic verse of Paul's great treatise on Christian liberty, and it teaches that we must not allow ourselves to be taken into bondage by anyone.

Wolves in Sheep's Clothing

Paul has some rather harsh things to say about people who divide the church over minor matters or insist that other Christians conform to their personal standards of behavior, thus adding to the teaching of Christ. His harsh judgments concern both the motivation behind their actions and their basic methodology.

1. Their motivation. When people such as the ones Paul is describing first enter into a Christian congregation, they come as angels of light. That is, they present themselves as teachers who want to instruct and help other believers and move the church forward. They care for them. They want them to experience the fullness of God's blessing.

But this is not what they achieve, nor is it what they are really after. Paul says they really want to serve "their own appetites," not Jesus Christ. What are these appetites? John MacArthur answers, "No matter how seemingly sincere and caring false teachers or preachers may appear to be, they are never genuinely concerned for the cause of Christ or for his church. They are often driven by self-interest and self-gratification—sometimes for fame, sometimes for power over their followers, always for financial gain, and frequently for all of those reasons. Many of them enjoy pretentious and luxurious life-styles, and sexual immorality is the rule more than the exception."

These are sometimes pastors who dominate their congregations, or evangelists who make a great deal of money and live lavishly on the many sacrificial gifts of their followers.

These teachers are described in Philippians and Jude: "Many live as enemies of the cross of Christ. Their destiny is destruction, their god is their stomach, and their glory is in their shame. Their mind is on earthly things" (Phil. 3:18-19). "These men are blemishes at your love feasts, eating with you without the slightest qualm—shepherds who feed only themselves. They are clouds without rain, blown along by the wind; autumn trees, without fruit and uprooted—twice dead. They are wild waves of the sea, foaming up their shame; wandering stars, for whom blackest darkness has been reserved forever" (Jude 12-13). No wonder Paul warned the Romans against such false teachers in strong terms.

2. Their methodology. The second thing Paul says about teachers like this concerns their methodology. They operate by deception, deliberately setting out to deceive the unwary: "By smooth talk and flattery they deceive the minds of naive people" (v. 18). The New International Version's "smooth talk" captures the idea behind the Greek word chrêstologia, but it is useful to note that this compound Greek word is based on the noun logos, meaning word or talk, preceded by the adjective chrêstos, meaning kind, loving, merciful, or easy to bear. In other words, the term refers to moral talk that appears to be kind and loving. Therefore, it requires a wise person to discern what is going on. We must discern that these people are not what they appear to be.

Apostles of Deceit

It is hard to read what Paul is writing about here without thinking of two recent books: The Agony of Deceit, edited by Michael Scott Horton, and Christianity in Crisis, by radio host Hank Hanegraaff. Both examine the false teaching of the best-known television evangelists, faith healers, and "health, wealth, and happiness" preachers. These men have been wildly successful in many cases, raking in millions of dollars from their followers. But they have been guilty of precisely the kind of deception Paul was warning the Romans against—smooth talk and flattery.

1. Special revelations. Virtually all these teachers pretend to have received special new revelations from God. Robert Tilton built a television empire that at its peak brought in over sixty-five million dollars a year, promising healing to people who would covenant with him by sending in a large financial gift. He claimed, "God showed me a vision that almost took my breath away. I was sucked into the Spirit... and I found myself standing in the very presence of Almighty God.... He said these words to me, exactly these words." At that point he introduced the plan by which he would raise money. Fortunately, Tilton's empire has fallen on financial hard times since ABC's Prime Time Live showed how his listeners' prayer requests were first stripped of money, then quickly disposed of in huge dumpsters.

2. Little gods. These preachers tell their followers that they are "little gods." Paul Crouch said on a Trinity Broadcasting Network program, "We are gods. I am a little god. I have his name. I am one with him." Casey Treat, the pastor of Seattle's Christian Faith Center, said, "When God looks in the mirror, he sees me! When I look in the mirror, I see God!" Kenneth Hagin, another faith healer, said, "You are as much the incarnation of God as Jesus Christ was." Morris Cerullo said, "You're not looking at Morris Cerullo—you're looking at God. You're looking at Jesus."

3. A merely human Christ. Surprisingly, because it is utterly contradictory, some of these false teachers deny that Jesus Christ is fully God. Kenneth Copeland claims to have heard Jesus say, "I didn't claim I was God; I just claimed I walked with him and that he was in me.... That's what you're doing."

4. Demoting God. These teachers also limit God. Kenneth Copeland said, "God cannot do anything for you apart or separate from faith" because "faith is God's source of power." Frederick Price declared, "God has to be given permission to work in this earth realm on behalf of man.... Yes! You are in control!... When God gave Adam dominion, that meant God no longer had dominion. So, God cannot do anything in this earth unless we let him. And the way we let him or give him permission is through prayer."

5. Gospel of greed. This false teaching tells people how God wants them to get rich and how being poor is sinful. Frederick Price says, "If the Mafia can ride around in Lincoln Continental town cars, why can't the King's Kids?" Robert Tilton said, "Not only is worrying a sin, being poor is a sin when God promises prosperity." How different from the Son of Man, who did not even have "a place to lay his head" (Matt. 8:20).

These quotations are enough to show how heretical the evangelists I have just named are. Christians should be appalled at such teaching. Yet thousands of people who consider themselves to be sincere spiritual Christians apparently do not know that this is false, or choose to ignore it. Otherwise they would not give these men millions of dollars or recommend that others watch their programs.

What are we to call this teaching? Heresy, yes. But also deliberate deception. In some cases, as in that of some faith healers, their deception has been documented. Peter Popoff is a southern California-based evangelist. During a large crusade in which he claimed to have supernatural knowledge of the names and ailments of several people in the audience a shrewd member of the Committee for the Scientific Examination of Religion named James Randi used a radio scanner to pick up the frequency on which Popoff's wife was broadcasting information to him. She fed him names, illnesses, and addresses of people in the audience to whom she had previously spoken. In the spring of 1986 Randi made his findings public on NBC's The Tonight Show.

This is a modern-day parallel to what took place in the Garden of Eden when Satan deceived Eve by promising that if she and her husband disobeyed God and followed Satan they would be "like God, knowing good and evil" (Gen. 3:5). Of course, they already were like God, because they had been made in God's image (see Gen. 1:26-27). After they sinned, Adam and Eve actually became like Satan, who knew evil because he practiced it.

Have Nothing to Do with Them

Not all deceivers and flatterers in the church are this obvious, but they still pose a terrible threat to true Christian people and congregations. Paul gives an answer to what should be done about them in this important paragraph in Romans. It is a simple bit of advice. Yet before we notice what it is, we need to see what it is not. Notice that the Roman Christians were not told to harm the heretics physically, as many church leaders did in the Middle Ages. They were not to have witch trials or burn heretics at the stake. More surprisingly, they were not told to debate the false teachers, to try to prove them wrong.

Quite simply, they were "to watch out for" them and "keep away from them" (v. 17). Then, as if to explain what he is talking about, Paul says, "I want you to be wise about what is good, and innocent about what is evil" (v. 19). Put in today's terms, this means that Christians should not watch false teachers on television. We should not buy their books or attend their meetings. We should ignore them as figures standing entirely outside the fold of genuine Christianity.

In other words, we are to know that they are there but keep away from them. The verb translated "watch out for" in verse 17 is skopeo, from which we get our word scope, as in telescope and microscope. It has given us our word bishop, which means an overseer.

Paul is only telling the Romans in his own words what Jesus said on the issue. Jesus told his disciples, "Watch out for false prophets. They come to you in sheep's clothing, but inwardly they are ferocious wolves. By their fruit you will recognize them" (Matt. 7:15-16). He warned, "False Christs and false prophets will appear and perform great signs and miracles to deceive even the elect—if that were possible" (Matt. 24:24). He also said, "I am sending you out like sheep among wolves.

Therefore be as shrewd as snakes and as innocent as doves. Be on your guard against [them]" (Matt. 10:16-17).

That is exactly what Paul is saying in the last verse of this section when he tells the Roman congregation, "I want you to be wise about what is good, and innocent about what is evil" (v. 19). We are to know about evil, but we are not to know everything about it. We must not want to. Instead, we must fill our minds and hearts with what is good—with the doctrines of this letter, for example—and be on our guard against those who would lead us from the simplicity of what we have been taught to the deception of special revelations, new insights, novel doctrines, or movements that bow before a human teacher rather than glorify God.

Chapter 235.
The Head of Satan Crushed

Romans 16:20

One of the remarkable things about Christians is that we are able to pass rapidly and naturally from what most people regard as a merely human activity to what is spiritual. For example, we are in a gathering of friends. Everyone is talking and having a good time. We are about to sit down and eat dinner. Then suddenly we stop and pray, thanking God for the food and the opportunity to be together and asking him to bless the evening and guide our conversations in a way that will bring honor to him.

One moment we are walking down the street, enjoying the fresh balmy air of early summer. The next we are praising God as the source of life and the giver of all good things.

One moment we see some great wrong or error. The next moment we are asking God to overthrow the error. The reason we can do this is that for a Christian nothing is ever completely secular.

There is a situation like this as we come to verse 20 of Paul's closing chapter of Romans. Paul has been sending greetings to his friends in Rome and will soon join the greetings of those who were in Corinth to his own. Nothing is more natural than this. He warns about divisions that might harm the church's close fellowship. This, too, is natural. But suddenly Paul moves out of the natural realm into the realm of spiritual realities, predicting for these Roman Christians (and for us, too) that "the God of peace will soon crush Satan under your feet." This short and unexpected sentence immediately lifts what he has been saying from a merely human to a supernatural level.

Spiritual Warfare

Our world is secular and materialistic—it considers as real only what it can see or touch or measure. For our contemporaries the world is a closed system. God is eliminated. True, many people still say that they believe in God; some even believe in Satan. But spiritual beings do not matter; there is no spiritual warfare. Therefore, we are accused by our worldly contemporaries of slighting the battles that in their opinion need to be waged urgently against such visible foes as poverty, oppression, hunger, and injustice.

We do not deny for a moment that poverty, oppression, hunger, and injustice are real problems or that we should not do everything in our power to alleviate or abolish them. But we ask this: If the real problems of this world are merely material and visible, how is it that they have not been solved or eliminated long ago?

Algernon Charles Swinburne called man "the master of things." All right, then, let man master them! If he cannot—and it is perfectly evident that he cannot—let him acknowledge that it is because forces stronger than himself stand behind what is visible. Let him acknowledge that our struggle is not merely against flesh and blood, which we see, but "against the rulers, against the authorities, against the powers of this dark world and against the spiritual forces of evil in the heavenly realms" (Eph. 6:12).

Paul was acutely aware of the cosmic nature of our struggle, so it is as natural as breathing for him to mention it in closing his letter to the

Romans.

Three Surprises in One Statement

Leon Morris in his commentary calls Romans 16:20 "a little devotional section with a prophecy and a prayer for grace." It is that. But it is a remarkable statement too, and one thing that makes it remarkable—in addition to the cosmic dimensions that I have been writing about—is that it contains three surprising statements, all in one sentence.

1. That the God of peace should crush anyone. This is surprising because crushing seems ruthless to us, and we do not easily reconcile crushing with peace or peacemaking. It does not seem to be what God or any good personality should do. How can a God of peace be belligerent?
2. That the crushing of Satan should be under our feet. This is surprising because Genesis 3:15, which Paul's statement obviously refers to, says that it is Jesus who will crush Satan: "He [that is, Jesus] will crush your head, and you will strike his heel." How then are we to do it?
3. That this crushing is going to happen soon. This is surprising because Paul's words were written to Christians in Rome nearly two thousand years ago, and Satan does not seem to be defeated yet. In fact, the world is precisely what Paul described it as being then (see Rom. 1:2832).

In the Beginning

Since Romans 16:20 is an obvious reference to the verse in Genesis 3 that prophesies Satan's defeat by Jesus Christ, we should begin with the story of the fall into sin by our first parents.

Adam and Eve had been placed in the Garden of Eden by God and had been given rule over the lower forms of the created order. They were to manage the earth for God, and they were free to do as they saw fit, with but one exception. They could eat fruit from any of the trees of the garden—except the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. God told them that if they ate from it, they would die.

This was what Satan picked up on. When Satan entered the garden he approached the woman with the suggestion that if God prohibited them from eating from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil—that is, if he placed even this one, single restriction upon them—he might as well have forbidden them from eating from any of the trees. His argument was that God cannot be good, nor can he have our best interests at heart, if he makes prohibitions. We should be allowed to do anything. This, the first of Satan's temptations, was a temptation to doubt God's benevolence, and it is exactly what we have today when someone suggests that having to obey the laws of God is burdensome. We ask, If God really loves us, why doesn't he permit us to do anything we want to do?

The second temptation was to question God's truthfulness. For when the woman replied, "We may eat fruit from the trees in the garden, but God did say, 'You must not eat fruit from the tree that is in the middle of the garden, and you must not touch it, or you will die,'" Satan replied with a flat contradiction. He told the woman, "You will not surely die." Whom was the woman to believe? As we know, she decided to trust her own observations and judgment rather than the Word of God, with the result that she ate from the tree and gave some to her husband so that he ate also. This is also a temptation that comes to us today, for we are always tempted to trust our own opinions, however sin-affected and unjustified they may be, rather than the Word of him who is the very embodiment of truth.

The third temptation is what actually turned Eve to disobedience. For Satan told her that God had placed the restriction on her because he did not want her and her husband to reach their full potential: "God knows that when you eat of it your eyes will be opened, and you will be like God, knowing good and evil" (Gen. 3:5; see vv. 1-5).

Eve apparently desired to be like God, which is what Satan had himself tried to do earlier with disastrous consequences. Now, as happened to Satan and the angels that followed him in his rebellion, disaster came upon our first parents too. Their spirits, that part of their beings that had communion with God, died. So they hid from God when he came to them in the garden later. Their bodies began to die, and eventually they did die. For as God said in his words of punishment spoken to the man, "Dust you are and to dust you will return" (v. 19). In addition, God punished the woman by subjecting her to pain in childbirth and the man by subjecting him to hard labor in order to earn a living.

But God made a promise too, and it came in the midst of his judgment upon the serpent Satan had used for his temptations. God cursed the serpent, causing him to crawl on his belly and eat dust all the days of his life. But then he said this:

> "I will put enmity between you and the woman, and between your offspring and hers;
> he will crush your head, and you will strike his heel."
> Genesis 3:15

This promise is known to scholars as the protoevangelium, meaning the first announcement of the gospel. It is a promise of peace with God to be achieved by Christ's work. But strikingly, like Romans 16:20, it speaks of conflict, too. There are three levels of conflict: (1) between Satan and the woman; (2) between Satan's offspring—that is, those who follow him—and the woman's offspring— that is, those who would follow in her faith; and (3) finally and most importantly, between Satan and Christ.

We know what Satan did when he was able to strike Christ's heel. He did it at the cross. It included hatred from the religious leaders, mocking by the crowds, severe beatings, and eventually the terrible agony of the crucifixion. Satan must have been delighted by every detail of his apparent triumph. Yet although Satan might have thought he had won, it was a bruising only and not a defeat for Christ, because on the third day after the crucifixion Jesus rose from the grave triumphantly.

Moreover, on the other side, Satan's triumph turned out to be a Pyrrhic victory, for by it his power over us was broken. I do not know what

Satan was thinking when he finally saw his great enemy on the cross, but I am sure he must have forgotten this prophecy with its prediction of his eventual and sure defeat. John H. Gerstner wrote of this moment:

Satan was majestically triumphant in this... battle. He had nailed Jesus to the cross. The prime object of all his striving through all the ages was achieved. But he failed. For the prophecy which had said that he would indeed bruise the seed of the woman had also said that his head would be crushed by Christ's heel. Thus, while Satan was celebrating his triumph in battle over the Son of God, the full weight of the atonement accomplished by the crucifixion (which the devil had effected) came down on him, and he realized that all this time, so far from successfully battling against the Almighty, he had actually been carrying out the purposes of the all-wise God.

Satan's only power—unlike his pretensions to power—comes from the character of God that declares that sin must be punished. His strength comes from working within the laws of that character. Satan reasoned that if he could get the man and woman to sin, which he did, the wrath of God against sin must inevitably come down on them. God's good designs would be thwarted. Satan failed to see that Jesus would take the place of sinners, bearing their punishment, and that he, Satan, would have his power broken in the process.

Paul wrote of this triumph more completely in his letter to the Colossians: "[God] forgave us all our sins, having canceled the written code, with its regulations, that was against us and that stood opposed to us; he took it away, nailing it to the cross. And having disarmed the powers and authorities, he made a public spectacle of them, triumphing over them by the cross" (Col. 2:1315). In view of this triumph, America's great theologian Jonathan Edwards was right to call Satan the greatest blockhead the world has ever known. For although Satan is exceedingly knowledgeable and cunning, he was also supremely stupid to suppose that he could out-think the all-wise God or overpower the Almighty.

Paul's Prophecy in Romans

Having reviewed the Old Testament story to which Paul is referring in Romans 16:20, we now need to go back to Paul to deal with the puzzling features of his statement and learn what he is teaching. Genesis 3:15 is a prophecy. So is Romans 16:20. So let's compare these two prophecies, looking at these three puzzling features.

1. That the God of peace should crush anyone. Our problem with this statement, as with many other statements that involve the character of God, is that we do not understand God very well. When Satan told the woman that God could not be good if he placed even a single restriction upon her and Adam, his temptation was based on our failure to understand what is good. God's goodness is not a quality that allows us to do anything at all, even if it hurts us. It is a characteristic that lays down beneficial rules according to God's moral nature.

In the same way, the peacefulness of God is not a quality that causes God to avoid all conflict or hide from hostility. It is an active attribute that makes peace where hostility existed beforehand. In Romans 16:20 God is called the "God of peace" because he makes peace by destroying the enmity between him and us in our sin, and by defeating Satan.

God makes peace in other areas also. Robert Haldane writes:

God is the God of peace, because he... is the author of all the peace that his people enjoy. Were it not for the overruling power of the Lord, his people would have no rest at any time in this world. But the Lord Jesus rules in the midst of his enemies, and he gives his people peace in the midst of their enemies. This shows us that we ought constantly to look to God for this peace. If we seek it not, but grow self-confident and secure, dangers and troubles may arise from every quarter. Our only security is God, and our duty is constantly to ask peace of him in the midst of a world of trouble.... We ought, therefore, constantly to pray for peace to God's people all over the world. We ought to pray for the peace of Jerusalem as our chief joy....

Even in the churches there would be no peace, were it not for God's presence. Such is the cunning of Satan, and the remaining ignorance and corruption of the Lord's people, that Satan would keep them in continual broils, if God did not powerfully counteract him. God is here called the God of peace, with a peculiar reference to the factious persons against whom the believers were warned in the preceding connection.

2. That the crushing of Satan should be under our feet. When we speak of salvation we sometimes say that we have been saved, are being saved, and one day will be saved—three tenses. In a similar way, when we speak of Jesus' victory over Satan, it is possible to say that Satan has been defeated, that he is being defeated, and that he will be defeated. The first and third of these victories has been or will be by the Lord Jesus Christ alone. We have no part in it. But we do have a part in the second of these battles, Satan's being defeated, which is why Paul can say, "The God of peace will soon crush Satan under your feet."

How is Satan crushed under our feet? Here is a point where the link between this text and Genesis 3:15 is very helpful. We must remember that in the Garden of Eden Satan had come to Eve offering her and her husband the knowledge of good and evil: "You will be like God, knowing good and evil" (Gen. 3:5). In Romans 16, in the verse immediately before our text, Paul has just told the Roman Christians, "I want you to be wise about what is good, and innocent about what is evil" (v. 19). That sentence is what must have suggested the Genesis story to him and led him to write what he did in verse 20. He must have been thinking that Satan offered the knowledge of good and evil by getting Adam and Eve to do evil. Of course, they did not become like God, knowing good and evil; they became like Satan. What Paul desires of the Christians, by contrast, is that they become like God in this area, knowing and embracing the good but shunning evil, even though they will be aware of its nature and know that it is there. It is when we live like this that God will use us to crush Satan.

In other words, this crushing of Satan has to do with our victory in the sphere of the knowledge of good and evil, the same sphere in which sin first came to Eve and Adam. And it has to do with our knowing and pursuing the good, regardless of the pain Satan or his followers may cause us because of it.

In Revelation 12:11 the apostle John writes of the victory of the saints over Satan, saying, "They overcame him by the blood of the Lamb and by the word of their testimony." There are two parts to this victory: first, the victory achieved by Jesus through his death on the cross, and second, the victory won by our testimony to the truth of God. As for the latter, it is God's victory—God working in us—but it is our victory too, since it is achieved by our testimony. This is what Paul is saying in Romans, for he says that it is God who will crush Satan but that he will do it under our feet—that is, through us.

But let us not forget that we are to use God's weapons in this battle. The world has its weapons, but they are not ours. The weapons of the world are money, numbers, power, and politics. Our weapons are the Word of God and prayer: the Word of God, because it carries within it the power of God to demolish arguments and bring down strongholds; prayer, because even with the Word of God it requires the regenerating power of God to open blind minds to receive it and be persuaded of its truth.

3. That this crushing is going to happen soon. The word translated soon in Romans 16:20 has two meanings: quickly or without taking much time, and near at hand. So the prophecy that God will crush Satan soon could mean either: (1) that when he does it, it will happen quickly or (2) the victory is just around the corner. Those who choose the second meaning sometimes suggest that Paul was mistaken, since this was written almost two thousand years ago and Satan is not defeated yet.

But what is the victory about which Paul is writing? If it is what I have been suggesting—that is, the victory of believers who live by the truth of God's Word and do the right and good thing, regardless of whatever harsh consequences may come from it—then the victory is immediate, constant, widespread and absolute. For when you do the right thing,

God is glorified and Satan is shown to be a failure. This victory is complete in itself. It does not need to be added to. Nothing can diminish it or take it away.

Moreover, every victory for us like this is a promise of victories yet to come. Every act of good in this life is a victory and points to Christ's final victory. Every quiet triumph of faith over fear and pain in the hour of death is a victory, a defeat of Satan, whose ultimate but ultimately ineffective weapon is death. He has been "a murderer from the beginning" (John 8:44). It points to the final victory of the resurrection. All trust in Christ points to faith in his return, when Satan and his angels will be totally destroyed. This is the great and final victory. It is for this that we both long and wait.

Leon Morris says that "the promise of this victorious issue [the defeat of Satan by Christ] undergirds the fight of faith." This is something we must grasp. Satan is our enemy as well as God's, and he is very fierce. But God is our champion and the ultimate victor. Martin Luther wrote wisely in that great Reformation hymn "A Mighty Fortess Is Our God":

> Did we in our own strength confide,
> Our striving would be losing;
> Were not the right man on our side,
> The man of God's own choosing.
> Dost ask who that may be?
> Christ Jesus, it is he.
> Lord Sabaoth his name, from age to age the same
> And he must win the battle.

Chapter 236.
The Third Benediction

Romans 16:20

Christians love benedictions. They love them because they know that they are not meaningless but are based on the character of God, who is gracious, and they are honored by God because they are prayers for the spiritual well-being of other people, which is God's desire and delight.

Paul normally ends his letters with a benediction, usually praying that those to whom he is writing might know and continue to be blessed by God's grace, as here in Romans 16:20. It is a perfect way to end these letters. For when all is said and done, what is most wonderful about God is that he is truly gracious. He has been and will continue to be. Paul has already written two earlier benedictions in this letter. In Romans 15:13 he wrote, "May the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace as you trust in him." In Romans 15:33 he continued, "The God of peace be with you all. Amen." Here he says simply, "The grace of our Lord Jesus be with you."

Amazing Grace

A number of years ago I wrote a book in which I studied all the verses in the Bible that have to do with grace. By the time I had finished, I was convinced anew that the most wonderful theme in all the Word of God is God's grace.

Apparently other people have thought so too. Of all the songs that have ever been written, the one that has been recorded most by the largest number of different vocal artists is "Amazing Grace," the classic Christian hymn written in 1779 by John Newton, the former slave trader turned preacher.

> Amazing grace—how sweet the sound—
> That saved a wretch like me!
> I once was lost but now am found— Was > blind, but now I see.

Grace really is amazing. It is the most amazing thing in this vast universe, more amazing even than neutrons and neutrinos, quarks and quasars, and black holes. Whenever I come to a tremendous word in the Bible, one of the things I do is look in hymnbooks to see what has been written about it by Christians who have gone before me. When I did that for grace, I was surprised by the many words for grace and the many varieties of grace that were listed.

Our church uses the Trinity Hymnal, which lists hymns dealing with grace under the following headings: converting grace, the covenant of grace, efficacious grace, the fullness of grace, magnified grace, refreshing grace, regenerating grace, sanctifying grace, saving grace, and sovereign grace. It also has combined listings, such as the love and grace of God, the love and grace of Christ, the love and grace of the Holy Spirit, and salvation by grace.

Moreover, descriptive phrases are used in the hymns themselves: abounding grace, abundant grace, amazing grace, boundless grace, fountain of grace, God of grace, indelible grace, marvelous grace, matchless grace, overflowing grace, pardoning grace, plenteous grace, unfailing grace, unmeasurable grace, wonderful grace, wondrous grace, the word of grace, grace all sufficient, and grace alone.

One of my favorite hymns was written by Samuel Davies, a former president of Princeton University.

> Great God of wonders!
> All thy ways Are worthy of thyself—divine:
> And the bright glories of thy grace
> Among thine other wonders shine;
> Who is a pardoning God like thee?
> Or who has grace so rich and free?

Theologians speak of common grace, electing grace, irresistible grace, persevering grace, prevenient grace, pursuing grace, and saving grace. Yet even with these terms, I have not exhausted the Christian terminology. Grace is truly the greatest theme in Scripture.

Common Grace

Let's look at some of the aspects of grace, starting with common grace, grace made available to all persons regardless of their relationship to Jesus Christ.

A number of years ago a New York rabbi named Harold S. Kushner wrote a book called When Bad Things Happen to Good People. It was on the New York Times best-seller list for months, and its thesis was that bad things happen to good people because God is not omnipotent and things simply get away from him. At the end of the book Kushner advised us to forgive God and, like him, just try to get on with life and do the best we can.

How different from what the Bible teaches!

In Luke 13 there is an incident from the life of Jesus that has no exact parallel anywhere in the New Testament. People had come to Jesus to ask Harold Kushner's question, citing two contemporary examples. In the one example, the soldiers of King Herod had attacked some pilgrims who had come to Jerusalem from Galilee and had killed them while they were offering their sacrifices at the temple. In the other example, a tower in the district of Siloam collapsed and killed eighteen apparently innocent passersby.

The fact that the victims seem to have been innocent in both cases was an important part of the question, because the questioners wanted to know why tragedies like this can happen if God is good and if he is in control of things, as we want to believe. Perhaps he is not a good God. Or is it the case that these apparently good people were actually secret sinners and that this was God's way of striking them down for their transgressions?

For people accustomed to thinking as most of us do, Jesus' answer was startling. He replied, "Do you think that these Galileans were worse sinners than all the other Galileans because they suffered this way?... Or those eighteen who died when the tower in Siloam fell on them—do you think they were more guilty than all the others living in Jerusalem? I tell you, no! But unless you repent, you too will all perish" (Luke 13:2, 3-5).

Jesus was saying that when we ask why bad things happen to good people we are actually asking the wrong question. The right question is why good things happen to bad people. For we are all bad people, and good things happen to us every day of our lives. We have food to eat, clothes to wear, houses in which to live, families and friends, and meaningful work to do. The question is Why haven't the worst things happened? Why didn't the tower fall on us? Why weren't we struck down by Herod's soldiers? Why did God allow such wicked persons as ourselves to awake this morning, get out of bed, and go to work?

The answer is grace. God is a gracious God. He is gracious even to sinners.

Saving Grace

Common grace saves no one, of course. But although common grace does not save, the special grace of God operating by the preaching and teaching of the Word of God does. When we move into this area of biblical truth we need to speak about (1) sovereign grace, since God displays his saving grace where and upon whom he will; (2) redeeming grace, for we are saved by the death of Jesus Christ on our behalf; and (3) efficacious grace, for it is God's Holy Spirit who both accomplishes our regeneration and works faith.

Sovereign grace is emphasized in Paul's letter to the Ephesians. Like Romans, Ephesians deals with the most basic Christian doctrines. But even more than Romans, Ephesians stresses the sovereignty of God in salvation and the eternal sweep of God's plan, by which believers are lifted from the depth of sin's depravity and curse to the heights of eternal joy and communion with God—by God's grace. This is particularly evident in Ephesians 1:3-14. One commentator calls these verses "a magnificent gateway" to the Epistle, another "a golden chain of many links," still another "an operatic overture and the flight of an eagle."

This long list of interconnected doctrines is arranged in a trinitarian pattern. For Paul says that the blessings listed come from God the Father as a result of his electing choice, have been won for us by Jesus Christ by his atoning work of redemption, and are applied to us by the Holy Spirit through what theologians term effectual or efficacious calling.

1. Electing grace. Paul begins with the electing or predestinating choice of God the Father: "He chose us in him before the creation of the world to be holy and blameless in his sight. In love he predestinated us to be adopted as his sons through Jesus Christ, in accordance with his pleasure and will—to the praise of his glorious grace, which he has freely given us in the One he loves" (vv. 4-6). There are a lot of ideas in these verses, including such important ones as holiness, adoption, and the love of the Father for the Son. But the chief thought is of election.

God's electing grace is explained in several ways: as "predestination," another word for election; as being "in accordance with his pleasure and will," which explains election as being by God's will only; by "grace," which is explicitly mentioned; and finally, by the words "which he has freely given." These verses are one of the strongest expressions of sovereign grace in Scripture, for they teach that the blessings of salvation come to some people because God had determined from before the creation of the world to give them to these people—and for that reason only.

2. Redeeming grace. Electing women and men to salvation is not the only thing God has done as an expression of sovereign grace, however. Following the trinitarian pattern of this chapter, we come next to the doctrine of redemption (vv. 7-10). Redemption involves all three persons of the Godhead: (1) God the Father, who planned it; (2) God the Son, who accomplished it; and (3) God the Holy Spirit, who applies it to God's people. Redemption is chiefly associated with Jesus, however, who is specifically called our Redeemer. This is what verses 7 and 8 tell us: "In him [Jesus] we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins, in accordance with the riches of God's grace, that he lavished on us with all wisdom and understanding."

Redemption is a commercial term meaning "to buy in the marketplace so that the object or person purchased might be freed from it," which is what Jesus did by dying in our place. In this illustration we are pictured as slaves to sin, unable to free ourselves from sin's bondage. Instead of freeing us, the world merely gambles for our souls. It offers everything that is its currency: fame, sex, pleasure, power, wealth. For these things millions sell their eternal souls and are perishing. But Jesus enters the marketplace as our Redeemer. He bids the price of his blood, and God says, "Sold to Jesus Christ." There is no higher bid than his. So we become his forever. The apostle Peter wrote, "It was not with perishable things such as silver and gold that you were redeemed from the empty way of life handed down to you from your forefathers, but with the precious blood of Christ, a lamb without blemish or defect" (1 Peter 1:18-19).

3. Efficacious grace. The final expression of the sovereign grace of God emphasized in this chapter is the work of the Holy Spirit in applying the salvation thus planned by God the Father and achieved by God the Son to the individual (vv. 11-14). At first glance the word chosen in verse 11 seems to be saying the same thing as Paul's words about the Father's choice in verse 4. But the idea is actually different. In verse 4 the predestinating choice of the Father stands before everything. Here the choice made by the Holy Spirit follows predestination and means that the Holy Spirit now makes God's choice effective in individual cases by choosing those individuals or leading them to faith.

One of the greatest pictures of the grace of God calling a dead sinner to life is Jesus' raising of Lazarus, recorded in John 11. When Jesus got to Bethany he was told that Lazarus had been dead for four days and that he was already putrefying: "By this time there is a bad odor, for he has been there four days" (John 11:39). What a graphic description of the state of our moral and spiritual decay because of sin! There was no hope that anything could be done for Lazarus in this condition.

But "with God all things are possible" (Matt. 19:26). Therefore, having prayed, Jesus called out, "Lazarus, come out!" (John 11:43), and the call of Jesus brought life to the dead man.

That is what the Holy Spirit does today. He works through the preaching of the Word of God to call to faith those whom God has elected to salvation and for whom Jesus Christ specifically died. Apart from those three actions—the act of God in electing, the work of Christ in dying, and the power of the Holy Spirit in calling—there would be no hope for anyone. No one could be saved. Because of those actions even the most depraved of blaspheming rebels can be turned from his or her folly and find salvation.

Abounding Grace

In Romans 5 Paul wrote of the abounding grace of God for those who have been elected to salvation, redeemed by Jesus Christ, and called to faith by the Holy Spirit: "The law was added so that the trespass might increase. But where sin increased, grace increased all the more, so that, just as sin reigned in death, so also grace might reign through righteousness to bring eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord" (Rom 5:20-21).

Romans 5:20 was a favorite text of John Bunyan, best known as the author of Pilgrim's Progress but whose life story is told in the classic devotional autobiography, Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners. The title is taken from Romans 5:20, which says, in the King James Version that Bunyan used, "Where sin abounded, grace abounded all the more," and from 1 Timothy 1:15, where Paul refers to himself as the "chief of sinners" (KJV). The title is thus a testimony to the abundant grace of God in Bunyan's life.

Bunyan was born in 1628 of poor parents. His father was a traveling tinker—a mender of pots and pans—and Bunyan practiced this trade for a time so that he became known as "the tinker of Bedford." He had little education. In his youth he was profligate. In time he became troubled by an acute sense of sin. He wrote of himself that in those days it seemed as if the sun that was shining in the heavens begrudged him its light and as if the very stones in the street and the tiles on the houses had turned against him. He felt that he was abhorred by them and was not fit to live among them or benefit from them, because he had "sinned against the Savior."

God saved Bunyan and gave him great peace, and the title of his book is his testimony to what he discovered. He discovered that, no matter how great his sin was, the grace of God proved greater.

Persevering Grace

Another important feature of grace is that it is persevering. God will persevere with those he has called to faith in Christ so that none will be lost and, because he perseveres with them, they also will persevere, resisting and overcoming the world, and thus be ready for Jesus when he comes for them. In other words, God never begins a work he does not graciously bring to full completion. He is the alpha as well as the omega, the beginning and the end of all things.

This makes me think of three passages of Scripture that have to do with perseverance. The first is Philippians 1:6: "being confident of this, that he who began a good work in you will carry it on to completion until the day of Christ Jesus."

The second is John 10:27-30: "My sheep listen to my voice; I know them, and they follow me. I give them eternal life, and they shall never perish; no one can snatch them out of my hand. My Father, who has given them to me, is greater than all; no one can snatch them out of my Father's hand. I and the Father are one."

The third is the best known of all, Romans 8:35-39: "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall trouble or hardship or persecution or famine or nakedness or danger or sword? As it is written: 'For your sake we face death all day long; we are considered as sheep to be slaughtered.' No, in all these things we are more than conquerors through him who loved us. For I am convinced that neither death nor life, neither angels nor demons, neither the present nor the future, nor any powers, neither height nor depth, nor anything else in all creation, will be able to separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

Growth in Grace

Thus far, nearly everything I have said about grace has been in the past tense, meaning that God has revealed his grace to us or has been gracious to us in Christ Jesus, or it has been a promise that God will continue to be gracious. But Paul's benediction is a prayer. That is, it is a request that the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ would continue to be with his readers and that they might experience even more of it than they had before. What can this mean? If God has been so abundantly gracious to us, how can we continue to grow in grace? There are at least four ways Paul's prayer can and should be taken.

1. We need to be settled in the great grace doctrines. There are several ways we can fail to be settled in grace. We can allow something other than Jesus Christ to be at the center of our lives. We can forget how gracious God has been and therefore become harsh or cruel with others. We can substitute the mere form of Christianity for the gospel. The cure for these ills is to be so aware of the nature of the grace of God in saving us that we become enamored of Jesus Christ and never forget that it is by grace alone that we have been brought out of death and darkness into God's marvelous life and light.

2. We need to grow in the knowledge of God's grace. Knowledge of the grace of God is not a static thing. Therefore, we need to seek continually to grow in that knowledge. Peter wrote, "Grow in grace and knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ" (2 Peter 3:18). For this we must study the Word of God and meditate on its teachings.

3. We need to exercise the gift for serving others that God has given each of us. We do not often think of the grace of God and the gifts of God as belonging together, but a number of passages combine the two ideas. Peter wrote that each Christian "should use whatever gift he has received to serve others, faithfully administering God's grace in its various forms" (1 Peter 4:10). Paul wrote to the church at Ephesus, "To each one of us grace has been given as Christ appointed it" (Eph. 4:7). Therefore, when we pray that "the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ be with God's people" one thing we might mean is that each Christian should use the gift he or she has been given by God to help others.

4. We need a continuing supply of grace in order to complete the work God assigns us. Paul was conscious of having received grace to carry out his calling as an apostle. But he also knew that he needed it constantly, and he was aware that others needed a continual supply of grace to do the work God had assigned to them. Obviously you and I do also.

Chapter 237.
The Church at Corinth

Romans 16:21-23

When I began this exposition of Romans 16, I said that the last chapter of Paul's letter contains two long lists of names, thirty-three in all, which make this section fascinating. The first list of names (vv. 3-16) was of Christians in the church of Rome to which Paul was writing, and a study of these names reveals a great deal about the early church and of Paul's relationships to these people. The list we come to now (vv. 21-23) is of people who were with Paul in Corinth, the city from which he was writing, and it is even more interesting than the first list.

Paul had been staying in the house of a Roman nobleman named Gaius, who was also a Christian. This man had furnished him with an amanuensis, or secretary, who had been writing down the words Paul dictated. The letter was coming to an end, and now other Christians who may have followed the dictation over a period of several days or weeks gathered and were included in the greetings Paul sent to their fellow believers in the far off capital of the empire.

What is said, though brief, is one of the most remarkable pictures of Christian life and fellowship from the ancient world or, for that matter, from all history or literature.

Number-Three and Number-Four Boy

To begin our study, we need to understand something of the characters who were involved, and the place to begin is with Tertius and Quartus, who are mentioned in verses 22 and 23. In his commentary on Romans, Donald Grey Barnhouse explains that the first time he was in the Orient he was entertained in a beautiful home that had a large retinue of servants. One of these servants spoke English and had everything under his control. The man who was Barnhouse's host said, "He is the best number-one boy in China."

"Number-one boy?" queried Barnhouse. "What are the qualifications of a number-one boy?"

His host explained. "The number-one boy is a Chinese institution. He runs absolutely everything in connection with the household. He hires the other servants. He supervises the marketing. You would never find him carrying a package; a third boy or a fourth boy would be doing that. The number-one boy is the equivalent of an English gentleman's gentleman, plus a nurse, a housekeeper, and many other things. The ambition of third boy is to become second boy, and the ambition of second boy is to become number-one boy."

The same system prevailed in the Roman Empire, and the names of two of these servants, number-three boy and number-four boy, are recorded here. In a prominent Roman household, as this was, the servants would have the names Primus (one), Secundus (two), Tertius (three), Quartus (four), Quintus (five), and so on. So in Romans 16 we have a case of the number-three slave and the number-four slave adding their names to those of the missionaries, plus prominent Gaius and Erastus, as the letter is sent to their fellow believers in Rome.

A Historical Reconstruction

Let's take this social background, add what we can find out about the other characters, and reconstruct this important historical moment in Corinth. And let's follow the text closely for our guidance.

First, Paul sends greetings from Timothy, his fellow worker, and from Lucius, Jason, and Sosipater, whom he calls his relatives. Timothy was Paul's young protege, whom he had picked up in Lystra on his second missionary journey. He had a Greek father but a Jewish mother, which made him a Jew, and Paul used him to build up the Gentile churches he had himself founded earlier. Paul thought highly of Timothy, writing this of him to the Philippians: "I have no one else like him, who takes a genuine interest in your welfare" (Phil. 2:20), and "Timothy has proved himself, because as a son with his father he has served with me in the work of the gospel" (v. 22).

The only puzzle about Timothy is why Paul mentions him here at the end of his letter, rather than at the beginning, as he usually does (see 2 Corinthians, Philippians, Colossians, 1 and 2 Thessalonians, and Philemon). A possible answer might be that Timothy was not present when the letter was begun and had only come in at the end, which is also quite likely the case with the next names mentioned.

It is impossible to be certain who these next men whom Paul calls his relatives (that is, Jews) are, but we can make some probable identifications. Sosipater is most likely Sopater (a variation of the same name) of Berea, who is said in Acts 20:4 to have been one of those who accompanied Paul through Greece on the way to Jerusalem to present the offering from the Gentile churches.
He would have represented Berea. Jason was the name of Paul's host when he was in Thessalonica (Acts 17:1-7). Since this is the same general area of the world as Berea, it is likely that he was also part of the party that was accompanying Paul to Jerusalem. Lucius is not Luke the evangelist, as the early church father Origen thought (the names are distinct), but he may be one of the leaders of the church at Antioch who is mentioned in Acts 13:1, though that is uncertain.

What seems to be the case is that these men were part of the group of specially appointed representatives who were gathering in Corinth for the journey to Jerusalem. Timothy may have just arrived. Lucius, Jason, and Sosipater had come. Others were expected momentarily. It may have been the case that the ship they were taking was already in the harbor, that they were leaving the next morning and that Paul needed to draw the letter to a rapid close. It would have been natural for Paul to have dictated greetings from these important representatives as he ended.

But notice this. Paul used an amanuensis when he wrote his letters, usually adding his own greeting in his own hand at the end (see Gal. 6:11; 1 Cor. 16:21; 2 Thess. 3:17). His amanuensis on this occasion was Tertius, the one I have identified as the number-three boy in Gaius' household, and at this point this number-three slave added a greeting of his own: "I, Tertius, who wrote down this letter, greet you in the Lord" (v. 22).

It may be that Paul paused for a moment, looking around to see who else was present and should be included, and that Tertius simply went on writing, eager to send his own greeting as a Christian in Corinth to the Christians who were in Rome. Or it may be that Paul looked at him and said something like, "Tertius, you've been working on this letter so faithfully and for so long that you must have writer's cramp. Wouldn't you like to send a greeting of your own?" However it happened, this is an example of a slave sending greetings to people he had never met but to whom he felt attached because of their common identity as believers in Jesus Christ.

And there is something else too. The words "in the Lord," which are part of Tertius' greeting, are usually put after the words "greet you" by translators, so that the text reads, "I... greet you in the Lord." But in the Greek text the words actually follow "who wrote this letter," so what this lowly slave is probably saying is that he did his work as an amanuensis "in [or unto] the Lord," that is, as Leon Morris puts it, "not as a mechanical project, but as... a piece of service" to Jesus Christ."

Do you do that? The work you have may be menial, and you may not have a very prominent position as the world evaluates such jobs. But you can do your work "unto the Lord." Paul told the slaves in Ephesus, "Serve wholeheartedly, as if you were serving the Lord, not men, because you know that the Lord will reward everyone for whatever good he does, whether he is slave or free" (Eph. 6:7-8). God will reward you too if you do whatever he has given you to do joyfully and well.

Gaius, Erastus, and Number-Four Boy

In verse 23 Paul mentions two other prominent people who were present as he drew this letter to a close, plus Quartus: Gaius, who was Paul's host, and Erastus, an elected official in the city. The verse says, "Gaius, whose hospitality I and the whole church here enjoy, sends you his greetings. Erastus, who is the city's director of public works, and our brother Quartus send you their greetings."

Gaius was a common name, and this Gaius is not the Gaius from Derbe who is mentioned as another of Paul's official traveling companions in Acts 20:4. He must have been a rich man at Corinth, since he was hosting Paul in his home, was a host to "the whole church," and owned at least four slaves. He must have been a Roman. He was almost surely the Gaius Paul admits to having baptized in 1 Corinthians 1:14, though it was generally Paul's practice to leave the baptizing to others. This means that Gaius was probably one of the first of Paul's converts in Corinth. There is also reason for believing that he is the Titius Justus of Acts 18:7, into whose house Paul entered when he was forced to leave the synagogue. His full name would have been Gaius Titius Justus.

Since Gaius is said to be not only Paul's host but also the host of "the whole church," the congregation at Corinth probably met in his large home. Christians always met in homes in those days, as they had no church buildings. Gaius was wealthy, so it was natural that he would have opened his home for the Christians' worship services.

Erastus was a public official, undoubtedly a friend of Gaius. He may have been the man by that name whom Paul mentions in 2 Timothy 4:20 as having "stayed in Corinth," but this is questionable since an official like Erastus would probably not have been free to travel with Paul (see Acts 19:22).

It is interesting in connection with Erastus that archaeologists have uncovered an inscription from Corinth that bears his name. It was next to a first-century public sidewalk, and it read, "Erastus in return for his aedileship laid [this pavement] at his own expense." Officials regularly paid for public works, and this is what Erastus seems to have done. This inscription also suggests that he had held more than one office. Paul calls him "the city's director of public works"
(actually, it's oikonomos, or treasurer), but the inscription says that he served as aedile. An aedile could have been such a director, but he would not have been the treasurer.

Robert Haldane writes that the "office of Erastus, although in itself it may appear trifling, is in reality of great importance. It shows us that Christians may hold offices even under heathen governments, and that to serve Christ we are not to be abstracted from worldly business." The inclusion of Erastus rounds out this picture of the early church by showing us that rich and poor, free men and slaves, full-time church workers and public officials, were all part of its diverse makeup.

Barnhouse wrote, "I cannot pass you by, Erastus, without recording that hundreds of Negro mothers, who gave birth to their little black slave sons in the America of a century ago, pored over the names for boys found here. They did not want their boys to be called Number Three and Number Four, so they did not name them Tertius and Quartus. But they picked your name, and hundreds of black boys in early American life were called 'Rastus' because of you."

And how about Quartus? Paul mentions him in verse 23. Quartus was the least significant of all the people who seem to have been gathered around Paul that day, but he is not left out. It seems that as Paul glanced around to make sure that he had included greetings from everyone, Quartus, off in a corner, raised his hand as if to say, "Don't forget me!" So Paul didn't. He spoke to Tertius: "... and our brother Quartus." Tertius wrote it down.

In the Greek text the verb came before the rest of the sentence. So Paul would have spoken it like this: "Greets you Erastus, the city's director of public works,... and Quartus, a brother."

A Snapshot of History

We have seen who these people were and have begun to appreciate the picture of the early church that emerges at the end of this important letter. Now it is worth summing up some of the lessons from our survey.

1. The reality of genuine Christian fellowship. There is no better picture in all the Bible, or possibly in all the world's literature, of genuine Christian fellowship than this snapshot of the believers in Corinth. In the first centuries none of the Christians worried about brotherhood. They simply ignored the differences that were dividing the rough Roman world and came together as followers of Jesus Christ—the master and the slave, the Roman and the Greek, the Jew and the Gentile, the rich and the poor. "It was an actual oneness, absolutely above and beyond all human distinctions," wrote Barnhouse. "Nothing short of this could have moved the simple number-four slave, Quartus, to ask Paul to send his love to the unknown brothers across the sea."
2. Each one's special calling to serve Christ. It was an impressive gathering of full-time

Christian workers who were meeting in the house of Gaius of Corinth prior to leaving for Jerusalem, but nothing in the wording of these greetings (or anything else, for that matter) suggests that the others should have followed them in their calling. Gaius could not be an apostle, but he served Christ by opening up his home for the Christians' meetings and by hosting traveling church workers. Erastus could not travel with Paul, but he served the Lord as a public official in the important metropolitan area of Corinth. Tertius served by writing down Paul's letter, and Quartus undoubtedly had his duties too.

It is the same for us. You have your unique calling, given to you by Jesus Christ, and you are to serve him by doing it well, not by trying to do someone else's job. The body has many parts, but it is "one body" (1 Cor. 12:19). You may not be an apostle or be able to serve God as a missionary. But you can open your house to believers who are in need. And if you do not have a house to open, you can open your heart. There are many closed hearts in this harsh sinful world. What a calling, to have an open heart to others for the sake of Christ! It is important for each to do his or her part "unto the Lord."

3. The importance of people the world thinks insignificant. If this had been a secular rather than a Christian gathering, Tertius may have done his part and Quartus may have been present to attend to the demands of the master and his guests, but the two slaves would never have been allowed to take part in what was going on by sending greetings, as if they were on the same level as those who were writing or those who were in Rome. Things were entirely different here because this was a Christian community! Here each one was important: each was listened to, noticed, and respected.

4. The importance of world missions. There is a lesson too about the importance of world missions. Here are Roman slaves, people utterly without status in the ancient world, who were nevertheless contacted by Paul and the other Christian missionaries, brought to faith in Christ, and became members of the body of Christ. Barnhouse asks, "Are you interested when you hear that there are new believers in an Indian tribe on the upper Amazon? Does your heart go out to those who are worshipping in a church in Africa whose mud pews are baked in the sun before the mud walls are built around them and the palm roof goes over them? Quartus knew nobody in Rome and nobody in Rome had ever heard of Quartus, but he loved them and wanted them to know it." God has his people in all these places, and there are others who have not heard the gospel. Shouldn't you help to take it to them?

A Testimony from Corinth

As we look back across the centuries that have passed between Paul's day and ours, we can almost talk to Gaius' two slaves, number three and number four. Suppose you could speak to them, as they speak to us through this letter. Suppose you could ask them questions. Would you like to know what their lives were like? Would you like to know whether they were cruelly treated as slaves? Beaten perhaps? Were their lives empty, cruel, nasty, brutish, or short?

Let Barnhouse answer for them: "No!" they say. "We were slaves, but one day Paul came into the house of our master, Gaius. We saw a great transformation in him. Gaius was transformed. He began to be kind to us. Soon he had Paul tell us about Christ. For two years Paul lived in Corinth, and he came to our house often. We got the bread and the wine ready when the crowd came on Sunday. It made more work for us, but it was delightful. They broke the bread, and we began to eat from the same loaf as our master. They filled a chalice with wine, and our master sipped it and smiled as he handed it to us. Day after day everything was transformed. He put his hand on us and cried as he spoke of the grace of God that had saved us all. He said that he was our master, but he realized that he had a master, Christ. He wanted to treat us the way Christ treated him. Love transformed our lives."

What an amazing transformation! And there are also transformations yet to come. Tertius and Quartus, number-three boy and number-four boy, do you remember how Jesus said that in heaven the first shall be last and the last first? You did your work well here. Did you know that in heaven you would not be Tertius and Quartus, but Primus and Primus, number one? For that is what you are now. Oh, that we all might strive for that distinction and one day hear our heavenly master say, "Well done, good and faithful servant!... Come and share your master's happiness!" (Matt. 25:21, 23).

Chapter 238.
Paul's Gospel

Romans 16:25-26

There is something a bit upsetting about an individual who constantly uses the first-person possessive pronouns my and mine. Someone who is always talking about my car, my house, my job, my vacation, or my friends is usually not very likeable, especially if he is implying that what is his is better than what is ours. I am reminded that comedian Chevy Chase once began a television special with "Hello, I'm Chevy Chase and you're not." We do not like anyone to be that self-absorbed or egotistical. Is that what Paul is doing as he ends his letter to the Romans, speaking of "my gospel"? We sense at once that he is not. When Paul says "my gospel" he does not mean that the gospel is his as opposed to being ours or someone else's. The gospel is for anyone who will have it. What "my gospel" actually means is "the true gospel," as the context makes clear. This true gospel is Paul's only in the sense that he has appropriated it personally by a faith that involved committing his life to Jesus Christ, and in the sense that he was teaching it.

"My gospel!" It would be good if the gospel was possessed by each of us in exactly the same way and as intensely. But in order to possess it we need to understand what it is.

The God Who Is Able

Paul usually ends his letters with a benediction rather than a doxology, but it is a doxology that we have here. These last verses are an ascription of praise "to him [that is, God] who is able to establish you by my gospel and the proclamation of Jesus Christ." This has caused some commentators to suggest that the doxology is misplaced, and some of the early manuscripts actually work it in earlier, at the end of chapter 14, for instance, thus ending the letter with the greetings in 16:21-24. Then they add a benediction. Yet the doxology is not inappropriate here. As Brevard S. Childs said, "The doxology is not a liturgical response of the letter's recipients to Paul's words, but a liturgical response of Paul to the subject of his book."

The subject of the book is the gospel. So this tells us from the very beginning that the gospel has to do with God and what he has accomplished for us through the work of Jesus Christ.

This means that the gospel is not human in its origin. Nor is it human in its power or objective. Gospel means "good news." This good news is worth talking about. But when we talk about it we are not talking about it as if it were something some great philosopher had thought up or some scientist has discovered. It is not a new insight into human nature or a new discovery of something that is possible for us if we just learn the methodology involved or simply put our minds to it. It is not a matter of human thought or effort at all. It is something that has its origins in God, is accomplished by God, and has God's own goals as its objective.

The words who is able are especially important, for they are a way of talking about God's sovereignty. Some years ago I prepared a special series of Sunday evening messages for Tenth Presbyterian Church titled "The God Who Is Able." They were based on seven Bible verses in which the words God is able (or their close equivalents) occurred. The titles were: "Able to Save" (Heb. 7:25), "Able to Keep" (2 Tim. 1:12), "Grace Abounding" (2 Cor. 9:8), "Able to Help in Temptation" (Heb. 2:18), "How to Grow Spiritually" (Eph. 3:20), "God Is No Quitter" (Jude 24), and "Able to Raise Our Bodies" (Phil. 3:21). There were so many relevant verses that I didn't even use this text from Romans. My point was that God "is able to do immeasurably more than all we ask or imagine, according to his power that is at work within us," as Paul told the Ephesians (Eph. 3:20).

For that is where it all begins and ends. We saw that when we studied the doxology at the end of chapter 11: "For from him and through him and to him are all things. To him be the glory forever! Amen" (Rom. 11:36).

The Heart of the Gospel

When we say that the gospel begins and ends in God we do not mean God the Father only. We also mean that the gospel begins and ends in Jesus Christ, God's Son, for it was of him and was centered in him from before the foundation of the world.

This is strikingly apparent in Romans, for these closing verses are a deliberate echo of the opening paragraph of Paul's letter, where Jesus Christ is likewise prominent:

Paul, a servant of Christ Jesus, called to be an apostle and set apart for the gospel of God—the gospel he promised beforehand through his prophets in the Holy Scriptures, regarding his Son, who as to his human nature was a descendant of David, and who through the Spirit of holiness was declared with power to be the Son of God by his resurrection from the dead: Jesus Christ our Lord. Through him and for his name's sake, we received grace and apostleship to call people from among all the Gentiles to the obedience that comes from faith.

Romans 1:1-5

Romans 16:25-26 echoes at least four of those themes: (1) the gospel is "of God"; (2) this gospel is about God's "Son," Jesus Christ; (3) the gospel was promised in the "Scriptures" of the Old Testament but has only been made fully known now; and (4) the goal is that the "Gentiles," like the Jews, might arrive at "the obedience that comes from faith." Each of these themes is repeated in the letter's closing doxology, but the center is clearly Jesus Christ.

Jesus is the content of the gospel. He is the one who was promised in the Scriptures from the beginning and who has now come. Moreover, it is to him that we are to summon the obedience of the Gentile nations.

One of the great tragedies of the church down through the ages is that Christians have repeatedly allowed other things to rise to undue prominence and so eclipse the preeminence of Christ. Sometimes this has occurred in regard to minor points of doctrine. In such times an observer of Christian affairs might gain the impression that it is far more important whether one holds a right view of the sacraments, or church government, or abstinence from certain kinds of conduct, or eschatology than whether one understands who Jesus is and what he came to earth to do and is committed to him in true, living, and active discipleship.

At other times, and even more seriously, the church has allowed false teaching to obscure Christ's nature (either denying his full deity or his full humanity) and what he has done for our salvation. Any theology that allows human efforts or good works to intrude on Christ's work as the ground of our salvation destroys the gospel and denies the Lord's preeminence.

Revelation of the Mystery

The third thing these verses tell us about the gospel is that it has been a "mystery hidden for long ages past" but that it is "now revealed and made known through the prophetic writings by the command of the eternal God" (vv. 25-26).

When we use the word mystery today we are usually thinking of something incomprehensible, or quite possibly a certain kind of detective story where there is a murder at the beginning, an investigation by a shrewd inspector, and a final revelation of "who done it" in the last chapter. The biblical idea refers to something that has been hidden but has now been made known. There are many mysteries like this in the Bible, and most are in Paul's writings.

When I was looking at this word in our earlier study of Romans 11:25, I listed the following mysteries:

1. "The Mysteries of the Kingdom of Heaven" (Matt. 13:11)
2. "The Mystery of the Olive Tree" (Rom. 11:25)

3. "The Great Mystery of Christ and the Church" (Eph. 5:32)
4. "The Mystery of Piety" (1 Tim. 3:16)
5. "The Mystery of the Rapture of the Saints" (1 Cor. 15:51)
6. "The Mystery of Lawlessness" (2 Thess. 2:7)
7. "The Mystery of God Finished" (Rev. 10:7).

The question here is what specific mystery Paul is referring to. The only time that he has used the word mystery in Romans is in chapter 11, where it referred to a temporary hardening of the Jews "until the full number of the Gentiles has come in" (v. 25). That is, the mystery was that God was going to extend salvation to Gentiles as well as Jews. This idea had been mostly unknown or at least not understood until Jesus actually came, opened the door to the Gentiles, and gave the Great Commission to take the gospel to all the peoples of the world (see Matt. 28:19; Acts 1:8).

The argument in favor of this meaning is that Paul has stressed the application of the gospel to the Gentiles throughout the letter and, in fact, even ends on this note, saying that the mystery has been revealed "so that all nations [that is, Gentiles] might believe and obey him" (v. 26). The problem is that this is only part of the gospel, and if Paul is thinking of the whole gospel, then the mystery he has in mind must be bigger.

Most students of Romans think that Paul is instead talking about the gospel of salvation from sin through the work of Christ, which has been the theme of the letter. I agree. But the problem with this view is in seeing how this "gospel" can be said to have been "hidden for long ages past, but now revealed and made known through the prophetic writings." Here are some questions. If it was hidden for long ages past, how can it be said to have been revealed by the prophets? If it has been, it was not hidden. Or again, how can it even be said to have been hidden before the prophets? Don't we speak of the protoevangelium, or first announcement of the gospel, as early as the third chapter of Genesis (v. 15), not to mention intimations of it elsewhere in the Old Testament? Isn't it the case that all who were saved during the entire Old Testament period were saved by looking forward to the Savior who should come?

Most writers think of the gospel being anticipated in the Old Testament prophets, but F. Godet, the Swiss commentator, thinks that when Paul speaks of the "prophetic writings" in which the gospel has been revealed, he is thinking of the writings of the apostles, the New Testament prophets, and of himself and his own book of Romans particularly.

In my judgment this is pressing Paul's words too far. What he is saying is that the gospel is something no human being could have guessed. In the past it was entirely hidden in the mind of God. In fact, when God began to reveal it during the Old Testament period, the details were puzzling even to the prophets to whom the revelation was given, for they were unable fully to understand what God's Spirit had caused them to write. We understand it only because Jesus has now come.

Peter described the situation, saying, "The prophets, who spoke of the grace that was to come to you, searched intently and with the greatest care, trying to find out the time and circumstances to which the Spirit of Christ in them was pointing when he predicted the sufferings of Christ and the glories that would follow" (1 Peter 1:10-11).

The reason we understand the gospel now is that the Holy Spirit has given the apostles understanding of who he is and what he has accomplished in agreement with the prior revelation. Indeed, this is how Paul handled the Old Testament material in writing Romans. First, he explained the gospel. But then, at each major step in the argument, he supported his explanation with direct citations from the Old Testament. These texts were not necessarily clear earlier. But they are now, since Jesus has fulfilled them and the Holy Spirit has given the apostles understanding of what they mean.

The Wisdom of God

I want to stress again that not only is the gospel "mystery" known to us today by revelation, but it is only by revelation that the gospel can be known. There is nothing about it that you or I or any other human being could possibly dream up. I wrote about this at the end of the third volume of these studies when I was looking at the wisdom of God, showing that what draws out Paul's awe at the "riches of [God's] wisdom" is not the wisdom God displayed in the ordering of creation, as wonderful as that may be, but rather his wisdom in saving sinners such as you and me. It is what he was unfolding in the first eleven chapters of the letter.

1. The wisdom of God in justification (chaps. 1-4). In the first main section of the letter Paul explains the way of salvation. For centuries God had been saving sinners who deserved his just judgment and condemnation. But the question was this: How could God save sinners and at the same time remain a just and holy God? To use Paul's language, how could he be both "just and the one who justifies" the ungodly (Rom. 3:26)? Since God was justifying the ungodly, it would seem that for centuries there was something like a shadow over the good name of God.

This puzzle is beyond the wisdom of mere men and women. But it was not beyond the wisdom of God. Thus it was that in the fullness of time "God sent his Son, born of a woman, born under the law, to redeem those under the law, that we might receive the full rights of sons" (Gal. 4:4-5). Or, to go back to what Paul says in Romans, "God presented him as a sacrifice of atonement... to demonstrate his justice at the present time" (Rom. 3:25-26). This means that God satisfied the claims of his justice by punishing the innocent Jesus for our sins. Jesus bore the wrath of God in our place. Thus, the demands of God's justice were fully met and, justice being satisfied, the love of God was then free to reach out, embrace, and fully save the sinner.

Who but God could think up such a solution to the sin problem? None of us could have done it. But God did, and he has revealed it to us in a gospel that is utterly beyond our powers to imagine.

2. The wisdom of God in sanctification (chaps. 5-8). The next section of Romans discusses the sinner's need for sanctification. The justification discussed in chapters 1-4 is by the work of Christ, which means that it is by grace. But if that is so, what is to stop a justified person from indulging in his or her sinful nature, since the person's salvation has already been secured by Christ's work? Why should we not continue to sin? In fact, why should we not "go on sinning so that grace may increase" (Rom. 6:1)?

God solves this problem by showing that we are never justified apart from being regenerated or being made alive in Christ. Christians have been given a new nature, and this new nature, being the very life of Jesus Christ, will inevitably produce good works corresponding to the character of God. In fact, this is the only sure proof of our having been saved by him.

Who but God could think up a gospel like that? We would never do it, because we do not naturally hold grace and works together. If we emphasize morality, as some do, we begin to think that we can be saved by our good works and so strive to do it. We repudiate grace. But if, on the other hand, we emphasize grace, knowing that we cannot possibly be saved by our inadequate and polluted works, we have a tendency to do away with works entirely and so slide into antinomianism. It is a great dilemma. But God has devised a gospel that is entirely of grace and yet produces exceptional works in those who are being saved.

3. The wisdom of God displayed in human history (chaps. 9-11). The third section of Romans is concerned with the acts of God in history. The problem is that God made special salvation promises to the Jewish people, and yet, in spite of these promises, the majority of Jews do not respond to the gospel. Doesn't this indicate that the purposes of God have failed? And what about the Gentiles? There are fewer promises for them. Yet in Paul's day the Gentiles seemed to be responding to the apostles' preaching. Does this mean that God has rejected the Jews in favor of the Gentiles?

> If he has, isn't that wrong? And doesn't it destroy the doctrine of the believer's eternal security? Doesn't it mean that God fails?

Paul's answer is a magnificent theodicy in which he justifies the ways of God with men, showing that God has rejected Israel for a time in order that his mercy might be extended to the Gentiles, but adding that Gentile salvation will provoke Israel to jealousy and so in time bring the Jewish people to faith in their Messiah.

Who could devise a plan of that scope for world history? We could not do it. We cannot understand it fully even though we have it unfolded for us in the Bible. It is complex, manifold. But it is not difficult for God. It is part of the mystery, previously hidden but now explicitly revealed.

Not Just Saved, Established

I close with two important points, each part of this closing doxology. First, the goal of the gospel is not simply that we should be saved from sin's punishment and go to heaven when we die, but that we might be "established" in God's grace now—that is, that we might be settled, strong, and unshaken (Rom. 16:25).

This is exactly the word Paul used in Romans 1 when he spoke of his desire to visit Rome "so that," he said, "I may impart to you some spiritual gift to make you strong" (v. 11). Paul knew that there are many things in life that can unsettle us and that the devil wants to make us vacillating in our faith so that we will be of no use to God or anybody else. Paul wanted his converts to be strong Christians, and he tells us that this is also the goal of God for us.

But notice: It is God "who is able to establish" us and to whom we must look, not some other Christian, not even Paul. Paul was God's vehicle for giving us this great revelation that we know as the letter to the Romans. But Romans is not Paul's book. It is God's book. And the power we need to be established in the gospel it speaks of is the power of God. A Christian who leans upon some other Christian—a pastor, a teacher, or someone else—may have to be shaken loose by God through some crisis in order to learn that God alone is the solid rock and only adequate foundation for his people's faith. We must lean upon God to be established.

My second concluding point comes from Paul's last words, where he speaks of God's purpose in the revelation of the gospel where others are concerned, saying that it is "so that all nations might believe and obey him." He means that the gospel must be proclaimed to everyone.

Moreover, Paul links this objective to "the command of the eternal God" (v. 26). We find this command in the Lord's Great Commission in each of the four gospels and the Book of Acts. God has told us to take this gospel, previously hidden but now revealed, to all the peoples of the world. Paul took that command with utmost seriousness. It is why he became a missionary to the Gentiles. It is why he wrote Romans. You and I must also take it seriously by teaching it to everyone we can.

Chapter 239.
Glory to the Only Wise God

Romans 16:27

After eight exciting years of pulpit work and 239 separate sermons, I have come to the end of my expositions of Paul's great letter to the Romans, the most important book in the New Testament, probably in the entire Bible, and certainly the most influential letter in all history or all the world's literature. They have been excellent years for Tenth Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia, where these sermons were preached. The church has grown substantially and visibly stronger, Christians have matured in the Lord, and the evangelistic and service ministries that reach out into Tenth's broad city neighborhood have increased.

How should I end a series of this scope? Some might want a word about the greatness of the letter or even the outstanding intellectual, visionary, and creative qualities of the human being who composed it. But our studies should end as the letter itself does, not with words praising the apostle Paul—still less with stories of what has happened at Tenth Church through this teaching—but rather with words praising the great, sovereign, merciful, and eternal God of whose gospel Paul and we have been made missionaries.

The letter rightly ends: "To the only wise God be glory forever through Jesus Christ. Amen."
This is a doxology, and it ascribes glory to God in four respects: (1) to God simply as God; (2) to God as the only God; (3) to God as the only wise God; and finally (4) to God through Jesus Christ.

To God Be the Glory

One of the most important things that can be said about Paul is that he was always thinking about God. He saw himself as a creature made by God. He understood his work as having been given to him by God. He wanted to order his life and all the goals of his life in accordance with the will of God. Moreover, when he came to write about the gospel it had to do with God and his purposes from beginning to end.

Donald Grey Barnhouse summarized the content of Romans this way.

In the opening chapter we find the gospel of God. This is followed by a discussion of the wrath of God. Then the righteousness of God is set forth. Then we find how the righteousness of God can be communicated to sinful men. From then on we see ourselves as the people of God, at peace with God, blessed by God to such an extent that we can cry, "If God be for us, who can be against us?" (Rom. 8:31). Then after a section on the ancient people of God and the unchangeableness of God, we come to our answering obligations to God, all leading up to our text, "To God be the glory."

This is an example of what in an earlier chapter I called a Christian mind—that is, a way of thinking that revolves around God and the truths that he has made known to us. The opposite of possessing a Christian mind or thinking in a Christian way is secularism.

Secularism is an umbrella term that covers a number of other "isms," such as humanism, relativism, pragmatism, pluralism, hedonism, and materialism. But it, more than any other single word, aptly describes the intellectual frame of reference and value structure of the people of our time. There is a right way to be secular, of course. Christians live in the world and are therefore rightly concerned about the world's affairs. We have legitimate secular concerns. But secularism is more than this. Secular is derived from the Latin word saeculum, which means age, and secularism is a philosophy that does not look beyond this age or world for the whole of reality but instead operates as if this world is all there is.

In an earlier chapter I illustrated this philosophical secularism by something Carl Sagan said in the television series Cosmos. He was seen before a spectacular view of the heavens with its many swirling galaxies, and he said in a hushed, almost reverential tone of voice, "The cosmos is all that is or ever was or ever will be." That is secularism as clearly as it can be stated. It is bound up entirely by the limits of the material universe, by what we can see and touch and weigh and measure. If we think in terms of our existence here, it means operating within the limits of life on earth. If we are thinking of time, it means disregarding the eternal and thinking only of the "now."

Each of us should understand that well, because it is the philosophy we are surrounded with every day of our lives and in every conceivable place and circumstance. Yet that is the outlook we must heartily oppose and to which we must refuse to be conformed. Instead of being conformed to this world, as if that is all there is, we are to see all things as relating to God and to eternity, which is the true, Christian way of thinking that Paul models for us in Romans.

Here is the contrast, as expressed by Harry Blamires: "To think secularly is to think within a frame of reference bounded by the limits of our life on earth; it is to keep one's calculations rooted in this-worldly criteria. To think Christianly is to accept all things with the mind as related, directly or indirectly, to man's eternal destiny as the redeemed and chosen child of God." We think Christianly when we begin and end with God, as Paul did, and can say with Paul, "To the only wise God be glory forever through Jesus Christ! Amen."

Glory to the Only God

These closing words of the letter not only give praise to God as the beginning and ending of all things but also praise to God as the only God—they give glory to him and to no other. These words are opposed to polytheism and to all forms of idolatry.

This reminds us at once of the first of the Ten Commandments, which says, "You shall have no other gods before me" (Exod. 20:3). It demands our exclusive worship. This is what created a problem for the early Christians, of course. In the Greek and Roman worlds of Paul's day an individual was permitted to worship any variety of gods. So there was nothing wrong with worshiping the God of the Bible. The problem was that the Bible demanded that only the Bible's God and no other god be worshiped, and the teaching of the New Testament was that Jesus, who was the only Son of God, the second person of the Trinity, be offered exclusive worship also.

Christians were executed not because they worshiped Jesus, but because they refused to worship Caesar too. They would not say, "Caesar is Lord."

To worship any god but Jehovah is to break this command. But to break it we do not need to worship a pagan God like Zeus or Aphrodite, or even a Roman emperor. We do it whenever we give some person or some thing the first place in our affections, which belongs to God alone. In our day people do it most often when they substitute themselves for God, which they do whenever they assume the right to determine their own moral standards.

Most of the commandments are in negative form ("you shall not"). Only two are positive. But the negative clearly implies the positive, and the positive the negative. Therefore, the command to have "no other gods before me" also means that we are to worship God with all our heart, soul, and mind, as Jesus said when he was asked to state the first and greatest commandment (Matt. 22:37). In order to do this we would need to see everything in life from God's point of view, as disclosed in the Bible; to make his moral will our guide and his glory our goal; to put him first in our thoughts, first in our relationships, first in our work, first in our leisure time and recreation. It would mean exercising responsible stewardship of all the money, time, and talents he has entrusted to us.

Paul put his whole life at the disposal of this one true God. This is what we are required to do too, if we are truly Christians. If we are serious about our faith, we must say with Paul, "To the only wise God be glory forever through Jesus Christ! Amen."

To the Only Wise God Be Glory

The third way in which this doxology ascribes praise or glory to God is as the only wise God. This is the point I emphasized in the last study when I was writing about the "mystery" of the gospel and how it is now revealed.

Verses 25 and 26, the earlier part of this doxology, emphasized God's power. It is what was meant by the words "to him who is able." It is a way of speaking about God's omnipotence and sovereignty. Here, however, the stress is upon God's wisdom. Why this change? Obviously because this is a natural and proper response to the mystery that Paul has written about. There is nothing about the gospel that could possibly have occurred to the natural mind. We could not think up the way of salvation. How to preserve the justice of God while at the same time allowing him to save sinful men and women is beyond us. We could not think up a way of sanctification consistent with this gospel. Either we would emphasize good works and so repudiate grace and fall into legalism, or else we would emphasize grace, forget about good works, and fall into antinomianism.

And as for the purposes of God in history, who would ever have guessed that God is using history to demonstrate his many glorious attributes—his grace, mercy, and compassion in saving those who are being saved, and his justice and wrath in passing by those who are being passed by? And who would have viewed history as a stage upon which God has hardened the Jews so that the gospel might be extended to the Gentiles, and that he is provoking the Jews to jealousy by the salvation of Gentiles so that in the end all Israel might be saved (Rom. 11:25)?

None of us would ever be able to think up a gospel like this. This gospel is divine in origin, and it displays the supreme wisdom of God in all its parts and on every page of the written revelation. We are therefore right to say with Paul, "To the only wise God be glory forever through Jesus Christ! Amen." The sad thing is that the world continues to regard this gospel as foolishness even after it has been revealed, a point Paul makes in the first chapter of 1 Corinthians:

For the message of the cross is foolishness to those who are perishing, but to us who are being saved it is the power of God. For it is written:

> "I will destroy the wisdom of the > wise; the intelligence of the > intelligent I will frustrate."

Where is the wise man? Where is the scholar? Where is the philosopher of this age? Has not God made foolish the wisdom of the world? For since in the wisdom of God the world through its wisdom did not know him, God was pleased through the foolishness of what was preached to save those who believe. Jews demand miraculous signs and Greeks look for wisdom, but we preach Christ crucified: a stumbling block to Jews and foolishness to Gentiles, but to those whom God has called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God. For the foolishness of God is wiser than man's wisdom, and the weakness of God is stronger than man's strength. 1 Corinthians 1:18-25

Glory to God through Jesus Christ

The fact that Paul preached Christ leads to the last of the four points of the doxology that closes Romans. In these closing words he also ascribes glory to the only wise God "through Jesus Christ." There are two ways glory is given to God through Jesus:

1. It is only through Jesus Christ that God can be known by us. Only through Jesus can we know God's glory in the fullest sense. In the Upper Room shortly before his arrest and crucifixion, Jesus gave his final teaching to his disciples. He spoke about going away from them, trying to prepare them for his death, and Thomas said, "Lord, we don't know where you are going, so how can we know the way?"

Jesus replied, "I am the way and the truth and the life. No one comes to the Father except through me."

This was puzzling to the disciples too. It must have shown on their faces. But eventually Philip voiced a deep desire, which was and has always been the deepest longing of the people of God. It was the desire Moses expressed on Mount Sinai when he asked to see God's face (Exod. 33:1820). Philip said, "Lord, show us the Father and that will be enough for us."

Jesus answered, "Don't you know me, Philip, even after I have been among you such a long time? Anyone who has seen me has seen the Father. How can you say, 'Show us the Father'? Don't you believe that I am in the Father, and that the Father is in me?" (John 14:1-10). This was a clear and unmistakable statement that if we want to know what God is like, the place where we are to find him is by looking to Jesus Christ.

Later on in John's gospel Jesus said the same thing, only this time using the very word of our text, glory. Here he is praying to the Father in what we call his high priestly prayer, and the theme of his prayer is glory. Jesus prayed, "Father, the time has come. Glorify your Son, that your Son may glorify you.... I have brought you glory on earth by completing the work you gave me to do. And now, Father, glorify me in your presence with the glory I had with you before the world began" (John 17:1, 4-5). This has to do with the honor given to the Father by Jesus through his obedience and the glory to be given to the Son by the Father through his resurrection and return to heaven.

Then Jesus prayed for his disciples and eventually for the church that would come into being through their testimony, and his point was that he had made God known to them. Finally, summing it all up, he said, "I have given them the glory that you gave me" (v. 22). In other words, God is glorified through Jesus Christ because the nature of God has been made known to God's people through Jesus' life and testimony.

2. It is only through Jesus Christ that we can glorify God. It is only through Jesus that we can come to God in worship, for worship means praising or glorifying God. Jesus also taught this in John 14 when he said, "No one comes to the Father except through me" (v. 6).

There is a wonderful illustration of this truth in the Old Testament. The Shekinah Glory was the visible manifestation of the presence of God among the Jews during the days of their wilderness wandering—the cloud that guided the people in the desert and settled down upon the tabernacle when they camped. By day it was a pillar of cloud. By night it became a pillar of fire. When it came to rest upon the tabernacle and actually entered into the Most Holy Place of the tabernacle to abide between the wings of the cherubim above the mercy seat of the ark of the covenant, it became a bright light. This was a symbol of the intense, holy presence of God that was so pure and so terrible that no one could enter the Most Holy Place and live. In fact, some who attempted to do so were at once struck down.

This is what any Jew would immediately have thought about when a person spoke of God's glory, an unapproachable earthly symbol of the greater and likewise unapproachable heavenly glory, concerning which, when Moses had asked God to see his glory, God replied, "You cannot see my face, for no one may see me and live" (Exod. 33:20).

Matthew in his Gospel tells us that when Jesus died "at that moment the curtain of the temple was torn in two from top to bottom" (Matt. 27:51). The curtain separated the room of the temple known as the Holy Place from the room known as the Most Holy Place, which housed the ark of the covenant. So the tearing of the veil showed that the way into the presence of God, into the very presence of his glory, has now been opened to us by the death of Jesus Christ. Apart from his death for our sin none of us could approach God and live. But now, because of his death and through faith in him, even the poorest and least distinguished of God's people can approach God joyfully and without fear and offer worship that the Father will accept.

All this is possible only through the Lord Jesus Christ. It is through him alone that we can know God, through him alone that we can come to God, and through him alone that we can give God glory. So we say with Paul, "To the only wise God be glory forever through Jesus Christ. Amen."

Amen and Amen

And what about the "amen"? We have been working our way through Romans slowly, verse by verse and at times almost word by word. It is appropriate that we also think carefully about this last word of the letter. What does it mean to say "Amen"?

Amen is a wonderfully rich word. It is found in nearly half the languages of the world, and it refers to what is true, firm, or faithful. In its intransitive form it means to be shored up—to be firm, unshaken. It means to be faithful, trustworthy, sure, something that one can lean on or build upon. In this sense it is used as a name for God in Isaiah 65:16, though the New International Version translates it by the word truth. The verse says, "Whoever invokes a blessing in the land will do so by the God of truth." But the Hebrews text actually says "by the God of the Amen." It is a way of saying that God is a sure and solid foundation for those who lean upon him. He is utterly reliable.

One of the most fascinating things about this word is how Jesus used it. He commonly prefaced something he was about to say by a double use of the words, as in John 3:3. The NIV has, "I tell you the truth, no one can see the kingdom of God unless he is born again." But the Greek reads, "Amen, Amen, I say to you...," which the King James Version rendered, "Verily, verily..." There are probably more than twenty or thirty sayings like this in the gospels.

We use this word at the end of something God says. In other words, when God says something he begins with "Amen, amen": "What I am about to say is true; pay attention." For our part, we hear the words, repeat them, and then say "Amen," meaning that we agree with God's declaration. We set our seal to our belief that the Word of God is true and that he is faithful.

That is what Paul is doing as he comes to the end of Romans and offers these last words of doxology. He is setting his seal to God's truth, saying that he believes God's Word. Can you do that? Can you add your "Amen" to what Paul has written?

For my part that is what I am determined to do. There is much in this world that I do not understand. There is much even about the ways of God that I do not understand. But what I do understand I believe, and to God's declaration of these eternal truths I say a hearty, "Amen." "There is no one righteous, not even one" (Rom. 3:10). Amen! "For all have sinned and fall short of the glory of God" (Rom. 3:23). Amen! "For the wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom. 6:23). Amen! "Neither death nor life, neither angels nor demons, neither the present nor the future, nor any powers, neither height nor depth, nor anything else in all creation, will be able to separate us from the love of God that is in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom. 8:38-39). Amen!

"Then all the people said, 'Amen'" (1 Chron. 16:36).
